Cecil B. DeMille brings you Gary and Jean in their grandest picture... the story of Wild Bill Hickok and Calamity Jane, the hardest boiled pair of lovers who ever rode the plains... a glorious romance set against the whole flaming pageant of the Old West...

"You've got courage enough to kill a dozen Indians... why haven't you courage enough to admit you love me?"

"Save your fire, boys, 'til they come close and then blast the varmints. There's got to be room for white men on these plains."

"Gentlemen, my name is Wild Bill Hickok and I think we can settle everything very... very peacefully... unless somebody wants to deal out of turn."

"Go ahead. Do your worst. We'll still be laughing at you. Laughing at a great chief so small he'd kill two helpless persons for spite."
Taylor our American Beauty.

At the present time it would be little short of amazing to pick up a movie magazine without encountering the fair, or should I say beautiful, features of Robert Taylor. The fickle fans have elevated Mr. Taylor to stardom merely because he happened to be endowed with good looks. If this endowment alone were to be taken as a standard, I am certain there are innumerable chorus boys in Hollywood that could more than make the grade.

This shatters my perhaps idiotic delusion that it was a primary necessity for a player to possess histrionic ability before hoping to reach the seemingly unattainable heights. Mr. Taylor has proved that it is mainly, if not solely, through the medium of beauty that one can endear himself to the public.

The majority of the male stars of today have passed their thirtieth birthday; quite a few have passed their fortieth; while still others have left their fiftieth behind. In comparison to these stars, Robert Taylor, who has but recently passed the quarter-century mark, may still be termed a youth.

One is either a born actor or mellows into one after years of experience. In both cases there must be a groundwork of talent present. Mr. Taylor most assuredly does not belong to the former group, and time alone will tell whether he belongs to the latter class. Until he gives an inkling of having the makings of an actor, Robert Taylor should be classified as the American Beauty, which I sincerely hope will not fade as quickly as it has bloomed. As a man, I bear Mr. Taylor no malice, but as an actor I think he is putrid. Joseph W. Pucci,

A. E. Z.—Lloyd Nolan was born in San Francisco, California, August 11, 1903; five feet ten and a half, weighs 176; brown hair and eyes. Married. An interview with him appeared in the November issue.

B. L. N.—Between five feet four and five feet five is the usual height of an actress. Carol Lombard is five feet two; Jean Harlow, five feet three and a half; Joan Crawford, Cladette Colbert, and Joan Blondell, five feet four; Dolores del Rio, five feet four and a half; Myrna Loy, Barbara Stanwyck, Marlene Dietrich, Margaret Lindsay, five feet five; Greta Garbo and Kay Francis, five feet six; Eleanor Powell, five feet six and a half; Gail Patrick, five feet seven.

J. Hamus.—Brian Aherne is appearing opposite Merle Oberon in "Beloved Enemy."

M. N. S.—Bobby Breen was born in Montreal, Canada, November 4, 1937. He has light-brown hair and dark-brown eyes. "Rainbow on the River" is his next film. Fan mail is usually opened by the studio fan mail department and those of special interest are brought to the attention of the star.

M. P. V.—A Francis Lederer interview appeared in September, 1936. This player was just thirty on November 6th. Tyrone Power, Jr., played the role of Simone Simon's cousin in "Girls Dormitory." He is also in the cast of "Ladies in Love." He is the son of the late Tyrone Power of the stage.

Marney.—Because of lack of space in the magazine for all your answers, I replied by mail. The letter has come back because of insufficient address. I'll mail it to you again if you'll send me your full name and address.

All persons writing to The Oracle are requested to include their full name and address. This will permit a reply by mail if there isn't space here. For information about stills, cast, fan clubs, stars' films, please inclose a stamped envelope.

Marianne Eddy.—Nelson Eddy was born in Providence, Rhode Island, the son of Mr. and Mrs. William Darius Eddy. His mother's first name is Isabelle. Tom Brown and Richard Barthelmess in New York City; Ronald Colman in Richmond, Surrey, England. Allan Jones was twenty-nine on October 14th. He has been twice married, and has a six-year-old son. Eric Linden's latest is "In His Steps." Alison Skipworth seems to be the only player who celebrates her birthday on July 25th.

A Great Michigan Fan.—John Howard was born in Cleveland, Ohio, on April 14, 1913; five feet ten, weighs 150; brown hair, blue eyes. He was educated in the public schools of East Cleveland. An excellent student, he won a scholarship to the Western Reserve University in Cleveland. Continuing his high grades, he was awarded a scholarship to the graduate school, which he was unable to accept on account of lack of funds to maintain himself. A Paramount talent scout discovered him in a campus show. His first film was "Car 90," released in March, 1935. We published an interview with him in February, 1936. Still single.

Christine Fenner.—Ronald Colman has not married since his divorce from Thelma Ray. He was born in Richmond, Surrey, England, February 9, 1914; five feet eleven, weighs 165; black hair, brown eyes. Address the MGM Publicity Dept., 1540 Broadway, New York, for stills of "A Tale of Two Cities." They cost ten cents each.

A. M. A.—For photographs of Robert Taylor and Joan Crawford such as you saw in our September issue, you might inquire of the Metro-Goldwyn Studio, Culver City, California. It is advisable to inclose twenty-five cents for each photo.

Jeanettte Mason.—Ian Hunter was born in Kenilworth, Cape Town, South Africa, June 13, 1906; six feet; brown hair, gray eyes. He has appeared on the London stage and in British films. "Stolen Holiday," with Kay Francis, is scheduled as his next for Warners. As far as I know, he uses his right name. Married.

J. A. M.—Jean Harlow had no previous stage experience before going to Hollywood in 1928. She appeared as an extra in "The Saturday Night Kid" and "Paramount on Parade." Her next was "Hello, Angel," in which she attracted considerable notice. Mitzi Green was born October 2, 1922.

Milburn Myers.—Fred Astaire will be seen next opposite Ginger Rogers in "Stepping Stone." It is possible that Fred will be teamed soon with Margo. Juan Torena played the role of Luis Maderos in "A Message to Garcia." Previous to that he played in "The Eagle's Brood" and "Storm Over the Andes."

Lilian S.—There are several fan clubs in honor of John Arledge. I shall be glad to mail you a complete list upon receipt of a stamped envelope. His latest release is "Don't Turn 'Em Loose."

Anne Green.—Nelson Eddy is re-starring with Jeanette MacDonald in "Anytime." For a still of "The King Steps Out," address the Publicity Dept., Columbia Pictures, 720 Seventh Avenue, New York. They cost ten cents each.

What the Fans Think

Avoid the theater when a certain actor or actress appears whose previous efforts have made me-squint in my seat. Here are my triumphant ten.

- Jeanette MacDonald. The radiant prima donna of the films.
- Maureen O'Sullivan. Whom I began by liking just for appearance alone. Twice during the past year when she was given the opportunity she arose to the heights.
- Ann Harding. The incomparable. At her best in light comedy.
- Elissa Landi, intellectual, artistic, with a most interesting background. One so diversified should be worshipped by all fans.
- Edna May Oliver. I adore her completely and her work speaks for itself.

Shirley Temple. The precocious darling. A savior in disguise. I am sure she will do away with agaijng stars that continue to be coy and ingenuous.

John Barrymore. Slightly mad but a genius.

Paul Muni. Another of the truly great ones.

Robert Montgomery. His finest work is yet to come.

Maurice Chevalier. He has the brains to be himself in private life, so when we do get the Gallic touch it's not worn out.

Why Are They Overlooked?

There are many lesser actors and actresses in Hollywood deserving of more praise than they have been accorded. John Arledge and Dorothy Wilson are the two secondary players foremost in my mind because they have given consistently fine performances in all their pictures. All Arledge's performances are well above the average and are completely unaffected, proving his natural ability to act.

And Miss Wilson—a fine actress who has not been repeatedly overlooked by Hollywood producers. She was excellent in "In Old Kentucky" with our beloved Will Rogers, and more recently she was in "The Milky Way," in which she again proved to be a decided asset to the picture. She is the typical American girl and hasn't let Hollywood transform her into a painted, artificial beauty like so many other young actresses. She is deserving of far better roles. So let her fans try to speed her on.

Blondes versus Brunettes.

Why can't any of the stars have a mind of their own? They all seem to follow a trend and have no individuality. A couple of years ago every time we went to a picture we saw platinum blondes. Now they're all brunettes. The actresses should pick out the best shade of hair for their personalities and stick to it. Some of them look better blond, some brunette; some look better natural while others should use peroxide, henna, dye, or what have you.

I think Jean Harlow's dark hair is a big improvement over the platinum, but the same does not apply to Bette Davis, who lost all her sex appeal in "The Petified Forest" with dark hair. I'd hate to think what Miss Davis would look like if she weren't platinum.

Fay Wray was a blonde for a few pictures, but I think foolishly reverted to brunette. Ann Sothern had dark hair in a recent picture and it looked awful. Marie Wilson ought to stop bleaching, but Rochelle Hudson, beautiful as she is, would be smart to go blond.

I recently saw Eleanor Powell on the stage, just before her breakdown. She was blond-haired and it looked swell. Margaret Lindsay ought to give blond hair a whirl, but Patricia Ellis should let her hair grow out natural.

Ginger Rogers's hair gets blonder with every picture, and it gets worse. Grace Moore should be her natural brunette self, and Virginia Bruce should go back to dark hair. I know she says she is a natural blond, but if she's the Virginia Briggs of Fargo that I used to know, she's real.

Most important of all, Norma Shearer, the screen's outstanding actress, should let "swell enough" alone.

The Human Side.

There is a phase of movie life which I have not seen published in any magazine, and which I thought did not exist until I came here a year ago from Kansas.

When I came to Los Angeles I did not think home life existed among the movie people. However, on personal observation I find they really like to live normal lives, even as you and I, and do normal things, if people would "only let them be." Being a devotee of the theater, I try to attend all stage productions and once found Joan Crawford and Franchot Joe Cook, famous stage and radio comedian, plays the lead in "Arizona Mahoney," a Western comedy.

What the Fans Think

Tone in the theater, holding hands and seeming perfectly thrilled at some performance. I have seen Joan Bennett shopping for little things for the house like a ditzy little wife, unaware of some of the washing, who would love to do the shopping for her.

I have seen Marlene Dietrich take her little daughter, Maria, who is up to her shoulders, to a matinée performance of "Little Lord Fauntleroy," accompanied by Lectrice Gilbert, the little John Gilbert's little daughter. I have seen Paulette Goddard spend an entire Saturday afternoon at a dog show, with the two Chaplin boys home from military school.

I have seen the younger generation, composed of Paula Stone, Patricia Ellis, Tom Brown, and others, often accompanied by Fred Stone, roller-skating, bicycle riding, or attending the circus, having the time of their lives. I have seen Al Jolson and Ruby Keeler practically every Friday night entering the Legion prize fights, dressed in sport togs, mingling with the average American family.

How I have enjoyed seeing this side of Hollywood life! It has made me most happy, but I'm only sorry that the other side is usually pictured in movie magazines.

I would like to pass on this happy and contented Hollywood life. I have seen it myself, day after day, on all sides of me, so believe it.

Elyse Everett, 764 South Normandie, Apartment No. 265, Los Angeles, California.

Close Observations.

I'm so glad our synthetic blond actresses are going back to their natural tresses. Jean Harlow in "Wife versus Secretary" looks ten years younger and many times sweeter. Come on, Bette Davis, Ann Sothern, Jean Arthur, Ginger Rogers, Miriam Hopkins, Jean Blondell, Carol Lombard, go back to your original hair shade. Watch that "hard" look disappear.

Say, Fredric March, come out of it will you? In your last few pictures you've been about as attractive and interesting as a stick of wood. Is your head completely in the clouds? Just forget about the famous actor and be the Freddie March of "Sinning Through" again.

Can't Ruby Keeler smile often when she's being photographed? She looks as if she had a permanent frown. Why doesn't somebody give Barbara Stanwyck a break with a good picture? How can anybody say Marlene Dietrich is beautiful when her face is so heavily made up and altered, besides being photographedＷ badly? I can't tell just what she does look like. I do so hope Olivia de Havilland isn't dropped somewhere by the wayside and forgotten now that she's been discovered. And, Olivia, don't wear those impossible eyelashes on you or alter the shape of your mouth or eyebrows. You're perfect as is.

Will somebody please take one photograph of Robert Taylor without that toothpaste-aed smile? I must be wrong, but I can't see the reason for all this fuss about Myrna Loy. She leaves me cold. When is Bing Crosby going to reduce? Why has aderable Maureen O'Sullivan been pushed aside? I think Mona Barrie the most poised and really "real lady" in pictures. She wears her own eyelashes, mouth, and hair, and has a remarkably beautiful voice and manner, besides a delicious sense of humor and what does she get? Bit parts!

What a place, Hollywood! Can anybody tell me why these stars who have been adopting babies left and right can't have some of their own? When Hollywood ceases making a publicity stunt out of having and adopting children and getting married and unmarried, and things of that nature, only then will it be looked upon with respect and sincere admiration.

Now that I've told everybody where to head in, I'll stay just a second more. Please, oh, please, won't somebody star Nelson Eddy and Jeanette MacDonald in "The Desert Song"? DIANE KANE, Milwaukee, Wisconsin.

Ruth Chatterton Inspiring.

I am so glad to see Ruth Chatterton back in pictures again.

Miss Chatterton's characterization of Celie, "Lady of Secrets," was superb. In one part she was so gay and charming in the role of a young girl, that it was a delight to see her.

A Chatterton performance is something to look forward to, and I'd never miss one. Her artistry is of the highest quality. Being asked to take the leading role in the film version of "Dodsworth" is proof enough.

May Miss Chatterton continue to have the success she so well deserves—and I am convinced that she is worthy of only the best in pictures.

A Chatterton Admirer, Scranton, Pennsylvania.

Autograph Hounds.

Reading about handsome leading men and glamorous actresses of Hollywood isn't enough for this adventure-seeking autograph-hunter. "Seeing stars in the flesh" is our motto. Our aim is to discover if these wonderful beings, who bring joy to so many millions of people, are really as nice as Picture Play tells us. The report of a professional star-gazing autograph hound is as follows:

Joan Crawford heads the list as the best signed actress. She is such a wonderful, thoughtful person that more than any of the hundreds of cinema people I have seen. Talking to Joan was like conversing with one of the crowd. She would stop and sign no matter when and where she was going, and believe me Miss Crawford was pestered plenty on her sojourn in our fair city.

Honorable mention goes to Franchot Tone, another one who has an A-New York autograph-seeker's rating. Together with his wife they make a favorable couple who go over big with us.

Ginger Rogers signed every autograph book that was handed to her when she stepped off from the train, with news photographers and reporters around her. Every actress wishes to appear cordial in front of cameras, but did she come through the usual entrance where there were kids waiting for their favorite cinema queen? I should say not! Maybe, I have you wrong, Ginger, but come back and prove it.

Clark Gable is very spry and quick. He is one swell guy to talk to when you finally get hold of him, but it is a difficult job to trip up Clark. One requires technique for this type of trick.

Miriam Hopkins is quite temperamental as to when and where she gives her autograph. Get Miriam in a small group and she's another swell dame, but a crowd just leads her to walk off as though she were the Queen of Sheba. But then again this marvelous actress isn't far removed from this title.

Mae West, an autograph hound who goes over big with the women, is a fifty-fifty proposition. The boys are not so keen over Mr. Aherne. They were told by this English actor that autograph-collecting was a girls' game. Boys should be out playing football, says he. I'd enjoy witnessing you kicking the ball around, Mr. Aherne, so when you do just call us up.

Mary Pickford is another autograph hound's delight. She is one of the sweetest stars we ever met. In the center of Fifth Avenue is where we spied Mary, but she halted and signed in spite of the tremendous crowd that was gathering. No, it wasn't conceit that made Miss Pickford stop and attract attention; it was her charming manner and her wish to be congenial to us.

The one great menace whom we are trying to live down is Wallace Beery. After following him through this hotel elevator, the big meanie wouldn't sign. When asked for his photo, he politely told us to send to the studio and inclose twenty-five cents. Did we send for his picture? What do you think?

Summing up the majority of the Hollywood elite, they are all pretty regular. Naturally there always have to be some exceptions. The thing that gets us is that the disagreeable person practically always gets us with his pleasing manner on the screen.

Esther Hayden,

First Consideration.

OFTEN in reading Picture Play I notice comments from both writers and fans concerning the beauty, talent, or ability of some one actor or actress. While each may merit such praise, we must not overlook the fact that others may not possess the same ideas. There's room for every good actor and actress in the film world, and each is entitled to his or her share of good fortune as well as other rewards.

In discussing the merits of various pictures and the work of various actors and actresses, I have never found any one who disliked Evelyn Venable. She has always been most considerate toward the fans who wrote to her. I know of quite a number who received letters from her. Fact is, I've had that pleasure a number of times. Such a record of satisfactory work and friendly consideration should merit greater consideration from the producers.

We hope that the years to come will see Miss Venable regarded as good as the best of them. An actress may make a hit once or twice in the course of her career, but when her work proves satisfactory every time, she should be given first consideration in the production of future pictures.

In Carol's Defense.

In reference to a letter published in your magazine not long ago, I wish to state that some of the opinions expressed with regard to Carol Lombard are totally without foundation.

For example, Carol is not too conceited to possess a sense of humor. It is clearly shown by her performances that she has a very keen sense of humor, but the parts which she is called upon to play often demand affectation and seldom demand humor.

Her performances in "Rumba" and "Lady By Choice" I think were especially creditable, although Carol always fascinates me. Moreover, do arm-folding, eyebrow-lifting, and jaw-clenching alone comprise Carol's acting? Definitely not!

Carol Lombard is, and always has been, my favorite female star mainly because she seems to fit into each role so admirably. In "Rumba" she made an ideal Diana, and naturally appeared superior to George Raft, because in the film she was! She was a wealthy society girl while George was merely a nightclub dancer. Go on with the good work, Carol. I am eagerly looking forward to seeing you soon!

OPEN letters to stars often are impudent, sometimes helpful and perhaps interesting. I hope that mine to Jean Harlow will escape the former classification and come within the latter. Well, here it is: Dear Miss Harlow: As a constant picture-goer and an interested observer of the stars, I hope that you will not make the mistake that so often has spoiled careers and lessened popular respect for a star’s performances. No, this has nothing to do with your personal life, the color of your hair, the choice of your friends, or your attitude toward fan clubs! It is strictly concerned with your work on the screen and more particularly with the parts you play. So, you see, I’m not being impudent at all but I am showing very special concern in your thoroughly delightful self as we know it in your pictures. Believe me, I am reminded of that more than ever in your current “Libeled Lady,” an enchanting comedy and a performance by you that could not be matched by any one in the same rôle. Or, for that matter, in any rôle. You are utterly perfect as Gladys, the rowdy sweetheart of Spencer Tracy who marries William Powell to oblige the man you love. Only a girl with a magnificent sense of humor could play that part seriously and still make it hilariously comic. No director could give you what you put into Gladys. Miss Harlow, nor could any one but God give you the physical allure that adds so much to your equipment as an actress of a unique and extraordinary kind.

BUT, like many others before you, you crave distinction in another field of impersonation. You want to play rôles that are catalogued as sympathetic, which means conventional. You are, I judge, afraid that the public will think that you are Gladys and others of her type in real life—hard-boiled, quick on the wisecrack and a little dumb. You want, in fact, to be a serious artist. I can only arrive at this conclusion when I look back upon “Suzy,” in which you kept a good deal, were wistful, looked pretty and were as nearly commonplace as you could ever be. Or at “Wife versus Secretary,” in which you were a blond actress merely and not the incomparable comedienne that you are. Don’t be just another blonde! Be the one and only Jean Harlow, as you are in “Libeled Lady.”

AS for fearing to be typed to the extent of having the public think you are the characters you play—nonsense! The picture-going public is much more enlightened than Hollywood thinks. It doesn’t believe the Marx Brothers are nitwits just because they are goofy on the screen, or that Eddie Cantor runs the streets joking with all and sundry. The public knows these comedians are hard-working men striving to make people laugh when they pay for the privilege. As for the heroines of the screen, the public much prefers to think of them as human beings rather than figures in the romances arranged for them by the scenario writers. They are credible, of course, while the film unreels, but the average picture-goer does not think that they continue to play their rôles when the picture ends. To them, Mae West is not preoccupied with sex, hard as the publicity writers work to make them believe just that. She is, instead, a veteran entertainer who conserves her energies to make the most of her opportunities while they last. The popular conception of Mary Pickford is not that of a little girl who has recently parted with her curls, but a woman of affairs, a business executive; and I don’t think that any one considers Gracie Allen mentally deficient simply because she wins laughter by pretending to be. The time has passed when the villain in a play is believed to be one with his wife and children. That illusion perished with the nickelodeons.

NOW, about what people think of you. Miss Harlow. You have the good will of everybody, the affection of a great many, and the love of those nearest you. Your fans adore you, as you know, and with cause. Your kindness, responsiveness, gratitude for friendly interest are as warm and unfailing as is the trustfulness of a child. No negative traits are ever associated with you—and never have been. Those who work with you on one picture after another, as well as others who do not work on your pictures but who see you every day at the studio—they, too, are as one in voicing the tribute that never varies: “Jean is a darling.” So, you see, Miss Harlow, if you fear that the public thinks you are playing yourself when you give them girls like Gladys, it isn't so. And you would have to wipe out an ocean of affection for the real Jean Harlow before you would win one believer in Gladys as the real you.

BESIDES, think of the artistic achievement in creating the character you project—surpassingly well. You have the gift of making her understood and of making her sympathetic, too. She is far more real than some of the conventional, ladylike heroines whose striving for sympathy, as it is catalogued on the screen, deprives them of character and individuality. She is honest, spontaneous, and victorious. Just because she is slangy, sexy, and uninhibited, don't rate her as worthless. Continue to give her your glamour and she will continue to uphold your standing as an artist unlike all others.

KATHARINE HEPBURN is my favorite problem star. Like the famous little girl with a curl, "when she's good she's very, very good, and when she's bad she's horrid." And there's no telling which she will be the next time—and I am, of course, only speaking of her films. They are the most uneven, the most unpredictable of any offerings of an important star. Because of this uncertainty, Miss Hepburn's popularity sustains setbacks instead of increasing with each appearance of this uniquely fascinating and sometimes inspired artist. For all her great talent, she lacks judgment in her choice of vehicles and the development of them. She betrayed this weakness in choosing to appear in "The Lake" on the stage a few years ago. On the crest of popularity as a newly-arrived cinema star, she returned to the stage in a play so futile that not even a Duse could have vitalized it. Contrary to widespread report, it was the play that failed and not Miss Hepburn. She gave her enchanting, best to it, but the part was monotonous, morbid, permitting her none of those gay and charming moments she needs, none of those flashing changes of mood that are found in all her screen performances.

MISS HEPBURN is no slave compelled to do the bidding of studio master minds. She is a woman of intelligence, taste, discernment—vision, even. But, like many other talented people, she needs advice and, perhaps, humility. There is no reason why "Mary of Scotland" should have run three weeks at Radio City Music Hall and "A Woman Rebels" but one. Except, of course, that the public favored the former and neglected the latter picture. The star was the same; she had not been forgotten in the short time between the two films. Obviously the newer picture was inferior. Interesting in concept, it was dull, plodding and lacked vitality. But why should a costly venture miss the fundamentals of first-class entertainment? Miss Hepburn did not slight her own task, though she may have slighted her study of the picture as a whole. What about the rushes seen from day to day? Conferences between director and star? Does Miss Hepburn concentrate only on her part in a picture and disregard which way the wind is blowing the completed work? Is she self-satisfied? She is, as I say, a problem star, when she might easily be a fixed and blazing planet in the cinematic heavens.

DO pictures often seem too long for what they have to say? They are becoming longer and longer all the time. The film of an hour's duration is exceptional nowadays and causes the constant picture-goer to call it a short one. Whereas until recently about an hour and a quarter was the length most frequently encountered, we find average pictures running fifteen minutes more and a two-hour film no longer causes comment. "Valiant Is the Word for Carrie" lasts one hour and forty-nine minutes, "The Big Broadcast of 1937" consumes an hour and thirty-five minutes. "The Charge of the Light Brigade" falls short of two hours by five minutes, and "Libeled Lady" exceeds an hour by thirty-eight minutes. Some of these pictures entertain for the time they run; others are padded and show it. It is a question whether even the better pictures among this group could not have been improved by cutting and condensation. An overblown masterpiece is always exceeded in worth by a compact one. "Anthony Adverse" to the contrary notwithstanding. But fans complain of everything but this. In fact, I never heard any one except a reviewer criticize a picture because it lasted too long for his taste. However, the public indirectly registers its dis-approval by becoming tired of stars without knowing why. They think it comes from undue familiarity with the star's personality and acting. Actually it is because the star's powers of attraction are quickly exhausted in a picture that is carried along too far. Give him several such films in a row and the effect is the same as if he played in twice as many. Instead of voicing dissatisfaction with the roles given him, the wise star might better give thought to the length of the picture built around him. Of course, producers are aware that pictures are longer nowadays than, say, a year or two ago. It is their way of combating the double-feature evil. By stretching pictures out to the breaking point, they lessen the likelihood of two of them being included on a single program. But the dual bills go on just the same and only the critics find fault. So what?
JEAN HARLOW wishes one and all a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year. The packages she handles tenderly are symbolic of her good will toward everyone. Most amiable and friendly of stars, she would like to hand a gift to everybody in the world, and especially her loyal fans, but as that is impossible, she chooses this lovely photograph of herself to greet every reader of Picture Play.
"My reputation for daffyness has an obvious origin," says Carol. "'My Man Godfrey' was a mad force. As soon as I get a rôle I can guess what my new false face is to be."

I'm tired of reading those half-truths about Carol Lombard. She is Hollywood's most misinterpreted young modern. The nonsense which has been so deliberately conjured up isn't at all necessary, anyway. For colorful as the Lombard legend is, Carol herself actually can top it far interest. You have never had a chance to know the real woman because her employers and gaga interviewers have created a part for her to play off-screen.

A steady build-up has gone on. Carol, finally, has definitely succeeded to the title of Glamour Girl Number One, the distinction formerly held in turn by the Misses Bow, Crawford, and Harlow.

Now it is Lombard who is acclaimed the movie colony's pace-setter. She is the dazzling Hollywood lady in all her dashing, dizzy glory. Presumably hers is the gayest manner, the most ultra wardrobe. She reputedly throws the best parties and has the most sought-after bay friend in America. To-day she is the idol of the repressed. Of course you've heard how she refused to build a dining room in her new mansion? A typical gesture, clariated the columnists. Nothing so passé for Lombard!

It certainly has given the public something to talk about, this manufactured line. In spare moments you've always been able to wonder what on earth she was plotting next. Writers who feel duty bound to present red-hot romance angles have had a field day. Her civilized divorce has been elaborately analyzed. Lately it's Clark Gable's devotion which has caused endless speculation.

"Aren't they silly?" This is the comment Carol will make to you, as friend to friend, when the conversation turns to the carryings-on of her supposed self.

The most amazing fact about Lombard is that she isn't fantastic at all. Furthermore, she hasn't endeavored to be. "Personally, I resent being tagged 'glamour girl,'" she says. "It's such an absurd, extravagant label. It implies so much that I'm not."

As usual, she was being completely frank the afternoon I dropped in to her dressing room. The irresistible quality about Carol's honesty is that it begins abruptly at home. She isn't hypocritical in her opinions; but, more important, she isn't fooled about herself.

Her superlative trade-mark insinuates that she is the constant pivot for hectic doings, that she is a frivolous exponent of the superficial. Apparently clothes, beaus and fresh thrills monopolize her time.

But, emphatically, this is not so. The Carol I know is almost the very opposite. She is practical, down-to-earth. She has the normal femininity lack for chic, but she isn't in the least fashion-crazy. Men intrigue her; yet she isn't capricious. Her heart obeys her brain. Instead of being impulsive, she's exceedingly well-balanced and invariably
The Real Low-down on Lombard

Consider the consequences first. Her horizon is anything but narrow.

This is the true reason why she has climbed in Hollywood. From the beginning she's had not only a talent and a willingness to concentrate, but a keen perspective, too. She's been ever aware that she is in a business. The flattery which deludes so many favorites is accepted for its exact worth; Carol realizes she isn't in an art where her whims can rule.

"I'm the incomparable wit this fall," she declared, her wide blue eyes sparkling with gusto. "In another month or two I'd have had Dorothy Parker back off the map. Only I'm through with comedies for a while." She lounged more comfortably and added, "But maybe not; my humor has been so decidedly half-witted!

"My reputation for daffyness has an obvious origin. In 'My Man Godfrey' they had an utterly mad force. I had to rattle on furiously, be the spirit of Park Avenue abandon. As soon as I get a rôle I can guess what my new false face is to be. The type of picture charts the publicity program."

Carol is currently ballyhooed as Hollywood's style queen.

"I can't imagine a duller fate than being the best-dressed woman in reality," she remarked pointedly. "When I want to do something I don't pause to contemplate whether I'm exquisitely gowned. I want to live, not pose! My ambition is to be an excellent actress. So far as clothes go, all I try to do is be well-groomed. I don't spend two thirds as much on my wardrobe as a number of the stars. I don't believe in being lavish that way. It'd be a career in itself and there are too many other things to enjoy. Besides, I couldn't afford it!"

Her flair for appearing strikingly smart is undeniable. But credit it to her ability to relax, to forget that she is probably stunning. In her own tastes she is conservative, leaning strongly to the tailored. She is wise to proper costs and secures full value by reutilizing materials and furs. The fashion halo was accidentally won when she had to do stories that were weak and in need of daring costumes to aid at the box office.

"I had to struggle for years to do comedy. But I don't think I was at the top when I was merely an insipid ingenue, and I don't agree that I'm so proficient in comedy as I can be in straight drama. It's my goal, professionally. Otherwise I want a sane private life. That's why I look at those so-called glamour yarns as more of a handicap than a help. Fun's fun, in its place. I don't laugh always, though."

She hasn't merrily skyrocketed, either. There have been many hurts for Carol, rebuffs that were overcome finally by her determination not to be licked. There was the nearly tragic automobile accident which threatened to disfigure the beauty which is an essential for the screen. There have been romantic disappointments, which she has taken with a smile when they weren't casual.

When her family moved to Hollywood from Indiana, Carol was seven. She was entered in a girls' school; then she went to Los Angeles High. But before she even got a toehold in the studios she studied for three years at a local stage academy.

Branding her a playgirl is silly. She adores to joke. She is an absolute democrat, and would rather purposefully high-hat a snob than fail to greet the humblest worker on the lot with a cheery quip. But there is nothing parasitic in her nature and she is earnest behind the devil-may-care mask she puts on occasionally. Carol has gayety, but not bravado.

I have seen her plan and scheme and fight for opportunities, just as the astute office worker does. What I admire most is her sportsmanship. She battles for her breaks with the studio executives; she hasn't advanced a single step by pushing another girl down. When I mentioned an actress who hasn't had much luck recently Carol said,

FAMOUS PREVIEWS

GRETA GARBO

IN "Luckiest Girl in the World," Jane Wyatt’s wealthy father agrees to allow her to marry an insurance salesman with a small income if she can support herself for a month on a limited amount. In a boarding house in New York, she meets Louis Hayward who helps her to forget all about her sweetheart.
"REMBRANDT" is the story behind the great painter whose spark of genius leaves him upon the death of his wife. Charles Laughton, top, plays the title rôle. Elsa Lanchester, above. Gertrude Lawrence, below, his housekeeper, arranges a banquet. Left, with John Clements. Right, with students viewing her master's painting. Bottom, right, the Civic Guard pay a call.
IN "Stolen Holiday," Kay Francis is a mannequin in a small modiste shop. Claude Rains, above, a penniless adventurer, involved in a series of crooked deals, sets her up in a shop of her own strictly on a business basis. She refuses his offer of marriage. Meanwhile, she meets Ian Hunter, left, a British diplomat, to whom she loses her heart. Alison Skipworth, top, resents the designer's association with Mr. Rains.
A CURE FOR CHRONICS
I suffer with dyspepsia;
I am mean, and grim, and drear;
I go to motion pictures
To hiss and groan and jeer.

I watch The Crooner's efforts,
And laugh a bitter laugh—
Comparing his expression to
That of a dying calf.

The Glamour Girl receives my sneers;
I hate The Spotless Cutie;
To criticize The Big He-man
I feel my solemn duty.

But I just saw "Swing Time,"
And darned if that Astaire, Didn't warm my frozen innards
With his way so debonair.

His rhythm soothed my raspy nerves,
Irowned the wrinkles from my brain;
His gay grin spoiled away my grouch—
I couldn't growl disdain.

I'll have to miss his pictures,
If I'm to remain meon;
Too much of his smooth cheerfulness,
And I'll forget my spleen!

Dee Chapman.

UP POPS THE DEVIL
I like a smooth and snappy boy
Like Raymond or Novarro;
Montgomery fills me with a joy
I shan't forget to-morrow.

Yet still I really must admit
I get that certain feeling:
Whenever Laughton scores a hit
He has me simply reeling!

Bee Buckley

LESSER LIGHTS
It's not the stars who add enjoyment
To my movie bill o' fare,
But the players whose employment
Of their talents spells for me a treat most rare.

I know that I am in for pleasure
When Paul Kelly's on the bill;
His crooked grin's a thing I treasure,
His simple manliness gives me a thrill.

Then there's the lady of the lovely name—
Spring Byington—an actress whose sweet charm
Will win her fans, if not undying fame.
And whose portrayals are so real and warm.

With comic sobriety he marches through his part,
His tones sepulchral would do credit to a preacher.
He's very English yet he's won my heart
I mean, of course, that big and handsome Arthur Treacher.

Dorothy Garbutt.

THE

TIME GOES BY ON WINGS
Janet Gaynor is adorable,
But I cannot forget
The beauty of Mary Pickford
And her little-girl wistfulness.
Nor the exquisite Corinne Griffith
Who was the loveliest of them all,
And gorgeous Pola Negri,
Whom it thrills me to recall.
Garbo is a magic name,
But once it was true
That Gloria Swanson had such tone
And mystery and magic, too.
So, little stor, remember
You don't get too high to fall,
Try to remember that, baby,
When you're strutting at a Mayfair ball.
Ruth Whitman Bowers.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?
She's a very provocative miss,
And I hope she'll be with us for good.
The thing I can't fathom is this:
Why movie officioldom should Take a name that's as simple as Simon, Pronounced as in this bit of rhymin'
And solemn as judges, intone
You must call her Seemoan Seemoan.
Brock Milton

SUPPLY AND DEMAND
Ladies fat and slender
Would all like him for their own.
Dames hard-boiled and tender
Wish that he was theirs alone.
Grandma's for adoption,
And a lot of old-maid aunts
Would like to buy an option
On this omen of romance.
Womankind grows fraiiler
Broken hearts throughout the land.
For there's just one Robert Taylor
And supply won't meet demand.
Louise Rabb.
HOW DOES Hollywood
HAVE FUN—Really?

BY HELEN LOUISE WALKER

STRANGE AS IT SEEMS TO THE WORLD AT LARGE, STARS DO NOT ENJOY LIFE AS FULLY AS THEIR PHOTOGRAPHS SEEM TO INDICATE. THIS ARTICLE EXPLAINS WHY.

Who ever heard of Joan Crawford taking a week off just to play? Singing lessons, physical training, her constant, intense study and her huge correspondence absorb all her spare time.

When Garbo appeared for the first scene in "Camille," with Robert Taylor, she was deeply sunburned. She didn’t know that sun-bathing had been forbidden the stars in her absence.
When the great Garbo appeared upon the set for the first day's shooting on "Camille," there was vast studio consternation. For Garbo was deeply, healthily, gloriously sunburned. And the Lady of the Camellias, you recall, was a pale, a most unhealthy lady. Garbo had been away from Hollywood for many months and she didn't know that another of the stars' favorite pastimes—sun bathing—had been forbidden them.

The advent of color and the increasing sensitiveness of black and white photography have made it more and more difficult to photograph successfully ladies whose skin approximates the shade of a piece of overdone Melba toast, and studios have issued stern edicts against tropical complexion. A corps of make-up experts solved Grethe's temporary difficulty, but a less important artist might well have lost her job.

I am beginning to be downright worried about these darlings of the screen. Restrictions are coming upon them so fast that one wonders what in the world they can do to have fun! As a matter of fact, I should think that they would get all mixed up about when they are working and when they are playing. Maybe they do, and that might explain a lot of things about Hollywood.

If you or I pay our money to look at a picture, it is because we hope to enjoy ourselves. But when an actor looks at a picture, he analyzes, studies, dissects the performances, the direction, the story and the cutting of the film. Looking at a picture is no idle evening's relaxation for him. It is an important part of his job.

And when he emerges from the theater? Well, I saw Ginger Rogers leave the "Mary of Scotland" preview. There was a shout and the waiting sidewalk crowd surged toward her, as several staidwalt policemen and a brace of studio employees whisked her through the lobby to a chugging car.

Ginger was pleased, of course. It was a genuine tribute. But she also looked frightened. No matter how gracious and charming a little star may wish to appear, it is pretty difficult to achieve it when several hundred people look and sound as if they may tear her limb from limb in an excess of enthusiasm.

Ginger is a gay soul and loves theaters, bright restaurants, gay lunch spots. But, goodness! A girl doesn't want her clothes torn to ribbons when she goes a-frolicking, and it must take the edge off things if you must always be accompanied by a bevy of strong-arm gentlemen.

What does Ginger do in her lighter moments?

No wonder that they claw on the set or indulge in games of leap frog when they find themselves unobserved. They have to do something, don't they?

Miriam Hopkins once told me that the thing which she resented most was the work she had to do when she wasn't supposed to be working.

"Of course, you know that when you are on a picture you must rush home to bed, have dinner on a tray, study your lines for the next day," she said. "But when the picture is finished, you feel somehow that you should have some time to yourself—time to read, to see your friends, to laugh, to indulge in lots of casual, gay conversation. You want time to spend upon your personal wardrobe—dozens of things. But what you do is to start preparing for your next picture, reading scripts, planning costumes, posing for photographs. If you get away to New York
Did any one ever hear of Katharine Hepburn doing anything in public that might be mistaken for having a good time? Her frolicking is confined to the set.

Mae West likes nothing better than to show off her jewels. But where may she do it these days with safety? She can only wear them with an armed guard near by.

Honeymooning in New York, Dick Powell and Joan Blondell attended the theater to see "White Horse Inn." Before they knew it they were on the stage being photographed with Kitty Carlisle and William Gaxton, stars of the show.

George Raft is forbidden to poke the nose of any one in public no matter how greatly his belligerent ire is aroused.
CLARK GABLE and Joan Crawford are co-starred in a gay and irresponsible farce comedy, "Love On the Run," with Franchot Tone, Reginald Owen, and Mona Barrie. It takes place in France, where Miss Crawford is an American heiress who leaves her titled fiancé at the altar to become mixed up in a wild adventure with Mr. Gable and Mr. Tone as rival newspapermen. All three unwittingly become involved with a couple of foreign spies. It's a gay and modern and smart picture.
THE LITTLE FRENCH GIRL, SIMONE SIMON, IS HARD TO SEE AND HARDER TO KNOW. THAT IS WHY SO MUCH FICTION HAS BEEN WRITTEN ABOUT HER IN THE FORM OF INTERVIEWS. YOU WILL FIND THIS ONE MORE REALISTIC—AND MORE PROBABLE—THAN ANY YOU HAVE READ.

BY WILLIAM H. MCKEGG

I KNOW there is no seventh heaven in life, so I will put into the rôle of ‘Diane’ everything I would want and wish for if there really was an earthly heaven.

Simone Simon seemed to mean what she said, but not even the most pessimistic mortal could agree with her statement as to where heaven might be found.

One has only to step back and impartially regard Simone’s Hollywood standing.

Making for herself a very definite hit in “Girls’ Dormitory,” 20th Century-Fox picked her out as their present and future best bet.

With the departure of Janet Gaynor, her vast studio “home” has been the goal of the majority of female players. Every one wondered who’d get it. It means a lot of prestige.

Rochelle Hudson, hitherto the boasted star of the studio, was overlooked. Loretta Young, who deserves a prize bungalow if any one does, went disregarded. Alice Faye, Arlene Judge, June Long, Gloria Stuart, Astrid Allwyn, or Claire Trevor—one and all could claim precedence over Simone. While so far as box-office receipts go, Shirley Temple could calmly tell the rest to stand aside for her to say whether she’d take it or leave it.

Without a yea or a nay, the famous Gaynor bungalow was bestowed upon Simone, along with the coveted rôle of “Diane,” in “Seventh Heaven,” that made Janet a star ten years ago.

Only one conclusion can be adduced from this: Heaven is right in Hollywood for Simone!

Established, she is buying a home in Beverly Hills. Her mother is joining her for Christmas, to remain permanently. And whether Simone disbelieves in worldly paradies or not, Madame Mauique Simon must agree that her little daughter has reached heaven on earth.
Her arrival in Hollywood, over a year ago, went unnoticed. Later, a lunch was given for her, with the announcement that she would play "Cigarette," in "Under Two Flags." The press saw Simone as a little last girl. I could only see her as one having a good laugh up her sleeve.

Light-blue eyes, wide apart, a turned-up nose, a rather large thin-lipped mouth, set within a square face, capped by wavy auburn hair — such were her looks. On the plump side, not what you'd call pretty, her main charm was her Pucklike personality.

This is written in the past tense. Since then Simone has undergone the usual Hollywood transformation. A little weight was dispensed with. Her hair was touched up, false eyelashes glued on, a new mouth shaped to suit her face. Also, it was declared, she had to be taught English.

It is my belief that Simone knew more English than some of the workers on the lot. She was canny, and failed often to understand what was not to her liking. But when her first option came up she proved herself a worthy equal to Constance Bennett in finesses. It was said she was eighteen.

Simone's responses to press questions were vague. Speaking to her later on, she told me she had five years' stage experience and some four years in films.

"How could I say I'm only eighteen?" she asked. "My friends in Europe would laugh at me." She frankly informed me she was twenty-six. The studio has since compromised on twenty-two.

Prior to her arrival, Hollywood was running out of artistic enigmas. Simone arose on the cinematic horizon, and once more the picture town is in the throes of bewilderment, essaying to solve the mystery of this maid from Madagascar.

It is not her native land. French born, with an Italian mother, Simone claims Marseilles as her birthplace. But like Marco Polo, she places such importance on the French island possession, as to the shaping of her thoughts and innate desires, that Madagascar must be stressed a little.

She was taken there when she was about ten. Her father's work had to do with mining properties there. So Simone entered adolescence amid tropical surroundings. Days were spent romping or lying on a golden strand, and in the sapphire waters of the Indian Ocean.

Now Madagascar is an odd place. At the turn of the 18th into the 19th century, occult philosophy was much practiced. Elemental spirits were supposed to fly all over the show. Simone got used to everything.

Back in France, she was prepared for anything, you might say. So she was not much taken aback when an unknown man spoke to her, while she sipped coffee outside a Paris sidewalk café. "You must forgive me," he said. "You are so beautiful. I am an artist. Will you——" Here he received the Simone slap.

However, it was all right. The man was Tourjansky, a former director of the Moscow Art Theater. But his comment on Simone's beauty seems incongruous, for she is far from beautiful. Yet the fact remains that she worked for him in pictures. Bigger parts came her way, under her mentor's guidance. Europe is said to have eventually gone on its knees.

Simone to-day is most reluctant to talk of her European career. In fact, she is reluctant to say anything about her past, save for very innocuous statements.

Summoning to my aid some rare elemental spirits from Madagascar, I demanded some inside information about the maiden. Bound by my magic spells, they complied.

It seems Winfield Sheehan spotted little Simone in Paris. He offered her a Hollywood contract at five hundred a week. Simone was in love at the time. It was a great romance. With love in her hand, she refused the five hundred in the bush. "You couldn't get me to Hollywood," the lovestick maiden sighed.

Mr. Sheehan knows his temperament players. The bidding increased. Back in New York, he cabled an offer of fifteen hundred.

By this time, Simone was left stranded on love's rocks. Free to set sail, she accepted, believing she had done all the conniving.

To-day, Simone is hard to see, hard to know, and indifferent to everything. You cannot blame her. She has good reason to act thus.

Hollywood completely ignored her. She was an unknown, so far as the town cared. "I never got one single invitation," she SKIMMED FROM HUNDREDS, THESE REVEALING PARAGRAPHS OF HUMAN INTEREST CAPTURE THE SMILES AND THE TEARS THAT LURK IN EVERY CORNER OF HOLLYWOOD.

SIMONE SIMON’S temperament has been well publicized since her arrival in Hollywood. It got Director E. H. Griffith down to such an extent that after completing “Ladies in Love” he was in a state of utter dejection. “What’s the matter with Ned?” a friend asked as two of them passed him.

BETTY FURNESS, whose freak hats have been the cause of more snickers than any other one thing in Hollywood, recently went to New York to shop. She is reported to have said in an interview, “There are no smart clothes in Hollywood. They are always a year behind the styles.” On her return a couple of her friends gazed at one of Betty’s new outfits. “What do you think of it?” queried one. “She looks at least two years worse than she did when she left,” flipped the other.

ONE of those contretemps that break the heart of a woman arose at Dorothy Parker’s recent cocktail party. Joan Crawford and Gladys Swarthout arrived wearing identical dresses. Miss Swarthout promptly retired to the ladies’ room and threw her silver fox cape around her shoulders to cover as much of the offending gown as possible.

“I don’t mind so much,” she smiled, “because they are really lovely gowns. But it serves me right for going anywhere but to my usual couturier.” The dresses were black, severely plain, with a rolled collar of red, blue and green velvet.

THE nose-drop manufacturer who sponsors Grace Moore’s radio broadcasts is going to bring suit against Columbia for giving as their failure to start Miss Moore’s new picture on time the fact that Miss Moore was ill with a cold!
Off the Set

Bruce Cabot drives around in an elegant Rolls-Royce. Most people don't know that it is almost as old as Garbo's car. But at a recent premiere when Bruce drove up in style, the car stalled and had to be pushed out of the way.

A certain director's wife who had had one too many stopped a perfect stranger at a club recently. "Young man," she announced, "I've been annoyed all afternoon at your outfit. Don't you know you can't wear a figured bow tie with a checkered shirt? You should wear a plain tie, and besides, nobody wears bows any more."

The gent stared at her a moment, then shook his head sadly. "Lady," he opined, "any one who looks as you do shouldn't try to tell any one else how to dress."

Lewis Stone, who is seen less around Hollywood than almost any other actor, was entertaining friends at the Coconut Grove recently when a gushing, middle-aged woman barged up to his table.

"Oh, Mr. Stone," she babbled, "I've admired you for so long. My mother took me to the theater to see you act when I was just a little, tiny girl."

"Madame," replied Mr. Stone, with all the dignity he could command, "that was another Mr. Stone, and he died in the Revolution."

Charles Farrell and Ralph Bellamy, anticipating a big season at Palm Springs, have boosted the membership fee in their famous Racquet Club to $750. Even at that price, most of the film colony belong. The price, prohibitive to most people, guarantees one place where the cinema elite can play without being stared at by outsiders.

A candid cameraman we know was taking many photographs of Constance Bennett at a recent sports event. She followed all his suggestions for poses, and seemed pleased at the attention she was getting.

Presently we cornered the photographer. "Why all the pictures of Connie—special assignment?" we queried.

He grinned sheepishly. "No," he confessed. "Fact is, I get a kick out of snapping her, now that she's so gracious about posing. It hasn't always been easy to get pictures of her, you know."

ROBERT TAYLOR makes interviewers promise—before they reach him—that they won't ask him a single question about Barbara Stanwyck. So it's true what they say about Bobby. He has love bod. MGM couldn't even pin the usual Garbo romance on him while he was working with Greta.

OVERHEARD at Jon Garber's cocktail party: "What kind of party is this?"
Reply, sotto voce: "Haven't figured out, yet. It can't be social—because Cesar Romero isn't here! And it can't be a press party—because I don't see Hymon Fink. D'you suppose—incredulously—that it's just a party?"

HOLLYWOOD is so house-und-interior-decorator conscious these days that if you move a chair an inch from its prescribed position you find yourself the recipient of agonized looks from your hostess. You have committed the crime of throwing the room "out of balance." Therefore, it was refreshing the other day to call upon Tom Brown, who proclaimed, "Everything in this house is meant to be used! The ash trays are for ashes, and the tables are meant to hold glasses or teacups. The chairs are to be moved to any position that suits you. If you want to look at a newspaper and then throw it on the floor—well, what's a floor for?"

We intend to call upon Tom rather often.

LOS ANGELES enjoyed its very first street circus parade recently. Chester Morris and Robert Montgomery have just confided that they were the naughty "Arabs" who rode along just in front of the lions' cages and wise-crooked the crowds. One should have guessed that some such Shenanigans were up, we suppose. Whenever the two swarthy, turbaned and burroosed gents spotted a celebrity in the crowd, their remarks become exceedingly pointed.

Joan Blondell and Dick Powell were more than a little puzzled by New York. When they had a chance to steal off by themselves they were "as blithely contented as any young couple enjoying a normal honeymoon.

Karen Morley's next picture is "Happiness Preferred," which is a fitting title for her because nothing can disturb her calm.

Serious illness checked Gertrude Michael's dash to England where she was scheduled to make a picture.
UCH swarms of stars descended on New York all of a sudden! Such hoop-la and resounding cries of "Darling, are you coming to-morrow?" Everybody answers "Yes" even though they are referring to four or five other parties.

If two or three plays open on the same night, stars, talent scouts, and directors try to take them all in. For the price of opening-night tickets—provided you also have influence enough to get them—you have the privilege of hearing on occasional line of dialogue while the hubbub of late-arriving stars dies down.

You may even be so honored as to get your toes stepped on as Fredric March, Florence Eldridge, Dick Powell, Joan Blondell, Randolph Scott, Rosalind Russell, or Paulette Goddard clamber over you. Blessed be the Irene Dunnes of this world who manage to go everywhere, do everything, arrive serenely and on time!

All Just Extras Here.—By one-thirty every day "21" is packed to the rafters. No celebrity is considered officially in New York until the harassed man at the desk just inside the door has taken five messages for him or her. Elbow-room is found somehow for Miriam Hopkins, Randolph Scott, Ernst Lubitsch and others, but when Rosalind Russell with four slightly pompous friends from Brookline, Massachusetts, and a friend with influence in these here parts arrive, there isn't a crack or a cranny left and they must wait.

The Last to Know.—Players careening around New York on vacation try to do everything at once because they never know just when a summons from the studio will come. Randolph Scott clutches friends who not only have time to read the papers but write for them, and says, "Is it true that I am to play in 'High, Wide and Handsome,' with Irene Dunne? And when do we start? Is she still here? When is she leaving?"

Elizabeth Patterson, that droll, keen-witted character actress who is more loved on Broadway than the professional beauties, asks plaintively of friends in the Hotel Gotham cocktail room, "Do any of you know Fredric March well enough to ask him when he is going West? I'm to be in his next picture, 'A Star Is Born,' and no one has told me how soon I have to leave."

Tells Nothing, Tells All.—E. H. Griffith, who directed Simone Simon, Loretta Young, Constance Bennett, and Janet Gaynor in "Ladies in Love," when asked how he survived the strain replied succinctly that he was going to Spain for a few weeks of peace and quiet.

Rouben Mamoulian, when asked how he persuaded Nino Martini to be less the opera star and more the comedian in "The Gay Desperado" explained, "I took a firm stand. Before production started, I said, 'No tonsil photographs in this picture.'" Expensive, But Fun For Whom?—Dick Powell and Joan Blondell had the noisiest and least spontaneous welcome that has yet fallen to any star. As the ship which brought them from the Coast, via Panama Canal, nosed its way up the harbor, airplanes drummed overhead, tugboats bearing huge streamers chugged through the water, sirens screamed and fog horns moaned. It was Warner Brothers' doing at a boasted cost of twelve thousand dollars. What is a few thousand dollars to them?—that is, until Powell and Blondell take it into their heads to ask for it as salary rather than public demonstration. Miss Blondell's only comment on it at the time was, "Cute, isn't it?" Mr. Powell seemed puzzled by it all.

Patsy Ruth Miller was a success but her play a failure on Broadway. Pat is philosophical about it, though.

Getting Away From It All.—When the noise of the welcome had died down, Warners put Mr. and Mrs. Powell through a routine of cocktail parties, interviews, and sessions with photographers that would have sent less hardy souls gibbering to a rest cure. But come evening and a chance to steal off by themselves to the theater and they ACTORS AREN'T SAFE ANYWHERE, IT SEEMS. PAUL KELLY IS INTERVIEWED WHILE IN A DENTIST'S CHAIR. THE RESULT IS CHARACTERISTIC OF THE MAN.

Paul Kelly's recent trip East was for the sole purpose of having his teeth fixed, and I believe I hold the distinction of being the only reporter ever to interview a star while he was in the process of having a molar yanked. Paul, with a towel wrapped about his neck, could only nod in confirmation and shook his head in negation while I plied him with queries, his mouth being otherwise engaged. He spoke between groans.

He's hard to interview. He warned me before I began.

"Please don't ask me to talk about myself. You can ask questions if you like, and I'll answer them, but I won't volunteer a thing."

But I already knew a good deal about Paul. His dentist, true to the tradition of his profession, isn't a bit reticent, and likes nothing better than to talk about the Kellys, his favorite patients.

"They've been coming to me for a few years now. Paul is a fine fellow, and one of the best patients I have. Let me do what I like and never ob-

Mrs. Kelly, formerly an actress, is Paul's business manager and private secretary nowadays.

Paul Kelly might be mistaken for a business man or a salesman or just a plain, everyday sort of he-guy. Yet he's been acting since childhood.

The bell rong then and Mrs. Kelly come in for her appointment. She's a plump, good-humored young woman who wore, as she described it, "a $2.75 hat" on a plain little print dress under which an impertinent slp peeked surreptitiously.

"My slip is hanging," she announced. "I saw myself in the store windows and couldn't do a thing about it," she complained, even as you and I. "Please," she said to me, "haven't you a pin to lend me?"

I had and did, and I liked this woman who, as Dorothy Mackaye, was a well-known stage actress.

She reminds me of great deal of Patsy Kelly and would, I believe, have become a popular comedienne in pictures if Paul hadn't wanted her to remain quietly at home.

"I've been shopping," she explained, "and I bought a load of things. I saw some sables that I like," she confessed, "and a gorgeous automobile, too. I must tell Paul about them."

The bell rong again, and this time it was Poul Kelly himself. He kissed his wife nanchantly, with no trace of the dramatized emotions that...
Edward Arnold has broken every rule of the game of keeping on top, as Hollywood plays it, but he receives one of the largest salaries. Here he is with his daughter, Elizabeth, who helps him memorize his roles.

I DON'T know what people mean when they say they 'have' to do certain things in Hollywood," Edward Arnold said, looking puzzled. "Ever since I came here about three years ago I've heard so much about what people 'have' to do. Who says they have to do these things, and why?

"They must entertain the right people. They must live in the right neighborhood. They must be seen at the right places. It sounds like that old gag of 'keeping up with the Joneses' to me," and he dismissed with a laugh a procedure considered vital to most actors and actresses in Hollywood.

And if those people who think it is so important to have their house "done" by the decorator who did Norma Shearer's or Claudette Colbert's could see Mr. Arnold preparing dinner for his family, whether it was the cook's day off or not, because cooking is his hobby, they would quite likely be in for a shock.

Edward Arnold does everything wrong, according to Hollywood standards. He has broken every rule of the game, as Hollywood plays it, but he receives every week one of the largest salaries paid to an actor.

In the first place, he doesn't look like Clark Gable. He isn't athletically inclined, and he doesn't fit at all the popular idea of a screen hero. In fact, we may as well be frank about it, for Mr. Arnold is, and admits that he is, fat and over forty.

He started his screen career as a villain, which is considered the hardest way to get to be a hero, and, incidentally, it is on his broad shoulders that we must place the blame or the credit for introducing the suave, well-dressed gangster who became a popular type. After plodding along through crime after crime, they allowed him to be a lovable character in "Sadie McKee," and the rest is history. So it seems he is also entitled to credit for making crime pay.

He doesn't act like a star. He doesn't try to keep his half-grown children in the background, and says: "My children and their happiness mean more to me than anything in the world."

He is satisfied with his roles and happy over his salary, and doesn't know the meaning of the word "temperament," which is nothing short of treason.

Colleen Moore gave Gretchen Young the name of Loretta and Mary Pickford was the first to address the fledgling actress as "Miss."

PART II

DIRECTOR MERVYN LeROY says that before he knew what had happened Gretchen Young was in the picture that he was directing. She had talked him into taking her in place of Polly Ann, who had been out of town on location when the call came. She worked hard, he remembers, and somewhat resembled her sister.

Once she got a chance, she knew that she could make good. The star, Colleen Moore, interested in her naive self-confidence, plugged for her, giving her scenes alone.

Her rôle in "Naughty But Nice" was much more than a bit.

Gretchen, the tag-along and hand-me-down, had "done something" at last! She was up in her big sisters' class!

"Mamma! They paid me eighty dollars for my work!" Eagerly she gave the check to her mother, adding with characteristic assurance, "I must have done all right."

Among her mother's keepsakes is a blue and silver Valentine, signed by the fourteen-year-old: "Gretchen— [Star]." Her name, an asterisk, followed by a parenthetical explanation, to make sure that everybody got the idea!

"Gretchen" disappeared, except in the family circle, and "Loretta" emerged. Her new name, chosen for her by Colleen Moore, won her approval because of its religious significance and its musical rhythm.

On contract at First National, playing make-believe in the fascinating world of motion pictures, life became interesting for Loretta. There was only one drawback: Mrs. Carmen Holiday accompanied her onto the sets and gently but firmly insisted upon periodic lessons. One must study until one graduated, which she did at sixteen.

"Laugh, Clown, Laugh," in which Lon Chaney starred and for which she was lent to Metro-Goldwyn, established her as a success. She was publicized and interviewed. There were wonderful notices to paste in her scrapbook.

Besides, there was her first movie party. It was at the new Mayfair, and she met all the stars, thrill enough for any young girl. Her crowning moment occurred when Mary Pickford came over to her and asked, "You are Miss Young, aren't you? May I compliment you on your wonderful work in "Laugh, Clown, Laugh? You have a marvelous future, I'm sure."

Loretta could hardly wait to get home and tell her mother.

"Just think, the first time I've ever been called 'Miss Young!' And Mary Pickford was the one who said it! Wasn't that wonderful of her? I'm grown up now!"

Her main yearnings then were for a fur coat and a car. Though an established actress, she was permitted only fur-trimmed coats, her mother insisting that part of her salary be put away for a possible "rainy day." Probably the grandest surprise of her life was the fur wrap which was her mother's Christmas gift, shortly before her sixteenth birthday.

She and Sally were chosen Wampas Baby Stars of 1929. For the first time she wore her all-fur coat. As she bowed, only one thought disturbed Loretta: Polly Ann hadn't been selected to share their honors.

The trio of beautiful, charming sisters became the most popular girls in Hollywood. There was a standing joke about "joining the male line-up in front of the Young home" on a Sunday afternoon. With gracious Southern hospitality, all were welcomed, and jolly times they had. Their beaux included practically all of the eligibles.

The compliment that most pleased them, however, was the enthusiastic remark of a service-station attendant: "You three are the sweetest girls I've ever known!"

Though similar in their gentlemannered manners, they are all very different. Polly Ann always has been serious, while Betty Jane was so effervescent that the movie producers just naturally tilted her Sally, adding the Blane to distinguish her from her sisters.

Loretta was the languid one, superficially. Her energy is of that quiet, steady kind which accomplishes a great deal. You have to be around her a lot, however, to realize it. For she is so tranquil, and moves with such liquid grace, that she seems to have no nerves.

Returning from parties or personal appearances, Loretta frequently remarked: "Mamma, Polly Ann is the most gracious girl in the world. She has an instinctive tact and handles every situation just right. And Sally is so bubbly, so delightful."

They stand out. Polly Ann with her poise and Sally with her magnetism. But I look dumb. It's all right for them to be prettier than I am," she would add loyally. "I just wish that I had something for such occasions."

She hasn't even yet realized that her own considerate friendliness and kind sympathy are very endearing traits.

Though the youngest of the three girls, Loretta has made the greatest progress. She is, I think, the most beautiful, and she has the staunchest spirit. Polly Ann and Sally are sweet and lovely, but in Loretta there burns a stronger flame, which must be forever busy doing something for some one, giving forth a flow of constructive activity.

Why, then, have they found happiness in love, while she hasn't? Sally is Mrs. Norman Foster. Polly Ann is the wife of James Carter Hermann, Pasadena socialite and executive of a plumbing-fixature concern.

The answer lies, I believe, in Loretta's incurable—or is it?—romanticism. For her, love must be grand and big, a sweeping thing; nothing less than perfection will do.

Renunciation, when it seems wise for all concerned, is equally idealized. What repels her is commonplace association, the disturbing rasp of any one except her mother or sisters too close to her. Reserve infolds her like a delicate armor.

Her marriage to Grant Withers temporarily disillusioned her, but hers is a resilient imagination. One man whom she loved died, unaware of her girlish devotion. Another, in whom she was very interested several years ago, was separated from his wife. Though it costs her considerable heartache, she persuaded him to resume his marriage which, to-day, is one of Hollywood's happiest.

"I always seem to care for the wrong man," she once told me, "but I've found that I could give up each one. Do you think I am just in love with love?"

"An impulsive romance, too exciting to last," she summarizes her marriage to Grant. "We were both young and impetuous. I knew nothing about love. Dreams and actual marriage are so different," she sighed.

"My mother's objections made me stubborn and headstrong. As usual, I resented interference. Also, as usual, I learned that an older, wiser head knows best. I am glad that I had the experience, though. The only thing that I really regret was that we didn't have a baby."

I recall a talk that I had with her when she said, wistfully, "Here I am twenty-one, and I've had all the womanly ASSURED event of the future, we would say, is the marriage of Binnie Barnes and Don Alvarado. Miss Barnes secured her preliminary decree of divorce from Samuel Joseph, art collector, which paves the way for a wedding in about eight or nine months for Don and Binnie, who are seen together constantly these days.

Ann Alvarado, Don's first wife, some time ago married Jack Warner, the picture producer. So there you have a complete shift in the Hollywood world of romance. What we wonder is, whether Ginger Rogers and James Stewart will some day be altar-bound.

What—No Bachelor Girls!—Hollywood is a poor place to start a "We Won't Marry" club. Evidence of this is the fact that such an organization, duly formed, had sixteen members a year ago, and to-day has only one, its president, Olivia de Havilland, who is a really resistant charmer. The hearts of the others were all captured, and they either resigned or just dropped out.

Ann Sheridan and Ann Nagel were among those who actually married, and Patricia Ellis, Rosalind Marquis, and June Travis found themselves too deeply devoted to engaging gentlemen to keep up active participation. Jean Muir also found membership in a bachelor girls’ club irksome. So another bright notion of the girls’ set goes into oblivion.

"Awkward Age" Girls Thrive.—Adolescent "finds" seem suddenly the rage in movieland. There’s Deanna Durbin in her early teens, who is already being slated for stardom by Universal, and even having stories specially written for her. She’s known to radio listeners through the Eddie Cantor programs, and is a remarkable young coloratura singer. She’s as pretty as a spring flower, too.

Then there’s Judy Garland, glimpsed in "Pigskin Parade," whose torch singing is nothing short of amazing. All the studios are interested in her future. She has been a hit at the Hollywood night clubs for a long time, but her screen success was really won in the football musical comedy.

A few years ago girls of this age would not have dared a film début, but "time marches on." However, Deanna and Judy are anything but awkward.

The interesting setting, above, represents modern decoration at its best. It is a penthouse living room as seen in Eleanor Powell’s new picture, "Born to Dance."

Don Alvarado, one of the handsomest actors, probably will marry Binnie Barnes when her divorce becomes final.

Shirley Temple’s name is included in the new edition of "Who’s Who in America" along with statesmen, scientists and captains of industry.
"Pink Tea Pinks."—Accusations that Hollywood is turning “pink” are being flung about in the movie colony. It’s probably because numerous writers and actors profess an admiration for Russia and its activities, but try to get this same group to adhere to any tenets of communism! If they are “pink” it’s purely in the parlor sense. Just a kind of revolt, probably, from too much luxury.

On the other hand, there is quite a real war over the unionizing of the picture workers, and lots of excitement when a group of actors including Herbert Marshall, Gary Cooper, Edward Arnold, Eddie Cantor, Robert Montgomery, Fredric March, James Cagney, Boris Karloff, Melvyn Douglas and others recently contributed aid to an aggregation of lettuce-picking strikers in California. The move was made in support of labor movement. Quite a large number of players were recently placed under the ban by the Actors’ Equity, the stage union organization.

Among the Souvenirs.—Despite all the terrific publicity attendant on her death, which was a sort of nine days’ wonder, the wardrobe of Thelma Todd, which was sold so that her estate might be administered, only brought $229. A dress shop owner purchased these effects, which included forty dresses, fifty-seven pairs of gloves, thirteen hats, thirty-six pairs of shoes, thirty-five bags and various other articles. Apparently there is doubt whether souvenir hunters can be interested as buyers of the articles, which will probably be sold simply for their actual worth as used articles.

Bushman Mine Host.—Francis X. Bushman as the proprietor of a drive-in refreshment stand and lunch counter is one of the odd developments of recent days—Bushman, who used to be the great matinée idol of the screen, and who even scored a hit of recent years as “Messala” in “Ben-Hur.”

Bushman plays the rôle of manager of the establishment most of the time, but he does step into the chef’s job, as relief, when business is pressing. While not active in the films of late years, he has been heard on the radio, and appeared on the stage, but he is finding the new job pretty absorbing.

ONE OF THE REASONS IS THAT WARNER BAXTER IS A SALESMAN AT HEART. HE'S BEEN SELLING THINGS, INCLUDING HIMSELF, ALL HIS LIFE. THIS INTIMATE, REVEALING ANALYSIS OF THE MAN IS THE BEST EVER WRITTEN.

If you want to be an actor, take a practical course in salesmanship. That's what Warner Baxter says, and by the Lord Harry, it's what he did, too.

It was a long leap from the position of traveling salesman of farm implements in the Middle West to that of the artist who gave such compelling performances in "The Prisoner of Shark Island" and "The Road to Glory." But Warner made it.

Maybe I shouldn't call it a leap, exactly, for it was a long, hard pull. Nevertheless, Warner says that it was salesmanship that did the trick. I wish that I had had same training in the same school.

The first time I met Baxter, he was singing a lusty lead in an impromptu male quartet composed of those raucous scribings, Hy Daab, Weed Dickerson, and—and—could it have been I? He was doing a good job, too. He has a nice, smooth baritone voice, and later on it proved useful to him on the radio and—but I'm getting too far ahead.

He said, on that early "musical" occasion, that he thought that his days in pictures were numbered. He was philosophical about it. 'A fellow has just so long to go in this game,' he remarked. 'I think I've just about run my course.'

He was so cheerful about it all that I couldn't have guessed, as he returned to his warbling, that life was looking, just then, a precarious affair to Baxter. He had worked so hard and progressed so far that it must have seemed a cruel thing to him to realize that his professional career was closing.

He was still young; he had believed so firmly in his ability and his future that he hadn't bothered a great deal about saving his money. Things were so unpromising in his acting career that on that very day—I didn't know this until long afterward—he had arranged to go to work the following week as an automobile salesman in Los Angeles.

Maybe that's what made him so cheerful. He was a crackerjack salesman, and he knew it. If he couldn't do what he wanted to do, which was to act, he could always sell things to willing or—what was, perhaps, more important—unwilling customers.

Warner Baxter is one of the best-natured men in Hollywood, but he has two phobias. One of them is women fans who pursue him on the streets, the other is the story of how he got his chance in the out-of-door talking picture "In Old Arizona."
Why He Stays On Top

Subsequent events are history. He was signed, more or less by a fluke, and to his own astonishment, for "In Old Arizona." The production was an experiment in out-of-door talking-picture technique. The mechanical and scientific findings were the stars of that picture, and it was mostly on those that the money was to be spent.

It didn't seem to matter much who comprised the cast, so long as they were not too expensive. Baxter knew this and didn't care. It was another chance to act, and the automobile business lost, for all time, a supersalesman.

You know what happened. That picture not only marked the most important advancement in the technical development of pictures since they began to talk, but it brought back to the screen one of its most important and enduring stars. Warner has never considered returning to a career of salesmanship since.

"My first really successful job," Baxter reminisced, "was as a traveling salesman in form implements in the Middle West. Afterward I sold insurance. At the time I didn't see how those jobs could prepare me for acting, but in the back of my head I knew that I must at least try to act. Maybe it was for that reason I really worked at the selling game. A good salesman must learn how to sum up a prospective buyer: he must learn to make people like him. What more, I ask you, does an actor need?"

I thought of things like courage and self-confidence, and the word for intestinal fortitude which begins with a "g," and which a man doesn't acquire but has to be born with.

There is a legend among Hollywood reporters that Baxter is "tough copy." That usually means that a fellow lacks color; that he is, in private life, conventional and unimaginative.

None of these things is true of Baxter. The fact is that he is genuinely shy, and it takes a long time to penetrate his protective shell of reserve. Once you do penetrate it, and establish a certain informal intimacy, the man crackles with personality. No dull or uninteresting man could have crowded the drama into his life that Warner has. No events in his life have ever moved smoothly toward a placid conclusion. His career has been a series of sudden upward swoops and sickening nose dives.

He may hire himself to that hedge-locked estate atop Bel Air's highest hill, and woo peace and quiet as intensely as possible. But he won't achieve it. He is not that sort of person.

I must interrupt myself for a moment to tell you something about that house. It will tell you something about Baxter. In the first place, it was a kind of symbol to him—a symbol of his accomplishments. It is large. It has every STANDS for Bob. It also stands for bozooka. And when it comes to Bob Burns, it is impossible to speak of one without the other.

Right now Bob is being touted as the greatest comedy discovery of the year by reason of his work in "Rhythm on the Range" and "The Big Broadcast of 1937."

Bob is in demand now. Yet for six long years he hung around Hollywood, offering his talents for buttons, with no takers. And he finally had to go to New York to get his break.

When Bob Burns picked up an old piece of pipe in Hayman's plumbing shop back in Von Buren, Arkansas, he had no idea that Dame Fortune was in the act of touching him with her golden wand. The pipe became a bozooka. On such seemingly unimportant incidents often hinges the brightest success.

If any one had told the gawky, half-shy country man that he would some day be one of the most illustrious natives of his State, Bob would have put that person down as pixilated. In his wildest imag- inings he never even dared dream of such success.

When you meet the big, outdoors-looking hulk of good-natured manliness that is Bob Burns, it's hard to believe that most of his life has been spent in show business. No poses. No exaggerated ego. Just a plain, down-to-earth, small-town guy who has been smart enough to act dumb—and make it pay.

ERIC LINDEN EMBODIES ALL THE SHY, SENSITIVE CHARACTERISTICS YOU'VE SO OFTEN ENCOUNTERED IN STORY-BOOK HEROES—THE TYPE THAT FINDS IT NECESSARY TO SEEK SECLUSION AT TIMES.

In some ways Eric seems not to have grown up. His manner, while talking about his fiancée, Cecilia Parker, was that of a blushing schoolboy.

"My mother," he told me, "used to leave me alone a great deal. I was by myself a lot."

Try that on your zither, and see what kind of character-building tune it produces. Naturally, as do most sensitive children, he turned to books for companionship, and from those books come thoughts and dreams—dreams of impersonating some of the fascinating characters in the theatre.

But it was a long time before his dreams were realized. He spent as a bank runner, a travel-bureau clerk, a book-keeper, a dispenser of a well-known baby medicine, a theatre usher, and finally an actor. His high school dramatic coach found him ushering in a New York theatre—the closest he could get to acting at that time—and, remembering his early ability, sent him to the offices of the Theatre Guild with a letter of praise.

No doubt the officers of the Theatre Guild had received hundreds of applicants with such letters before the appearance of young Linden; but as chance or plon would have it, Eric got a chance—and made good. He spent two years with the Guild, then went to France with the Paris American Company, a theatrical venture. Returning, he went into a stock company, where he stayed for two more

"The Charge of the Light Brigade."—Warner. Helpful as "Captain Blood" was in favorably introducing Errol Flynn, this picture does more. It clinches his position and advances him both as a romantic figure and an actor. It is one of the most exciting pictures with a cavalry charge the like of which I had never seen. Augmented by sound and music, it literally has one gripping his seat in a crescendo of emotion. If you have high blood pressure, see it at your own risk! The rest of the film is colorful, picturesque, dignified, a valid excuse for fictionalizing the events that preceded the heroic charge of the 27th Lancers against the Russians at Balaklava in 1854; and the love story is properly subordinated. Olivia de Havilland is charming, Patric Knowles is another hero who promises much, and Mr. Flynn is every inch a gallant soldier, a gentleman and a modest hero.

Rating: Romantic military spectacle superbly directed."

"A Woman Rebels.—RKO. "Katharine Hepburn at her thrilling best." That is what I thought when this picture began. So determined was I to stick to my guns that I had to write the sentence to relieve my disappointment, especially as Miss Hepburn can't be blamed for what happened afterward. And she is at her thrilling best as long as she can hold out against a dully obvious story tediously directed by a man hitherto responsible for musical comedy. Out of his element in picturing prim and delicate character in Victorian England, he makes the most out of the episode which has Miss Hepburn falling in a stream and displaying old-fashioned drawers in a swirl of hoopskirts. Otherwise the picture's pulse never changes, thudding along with the monotony of a tom-tom. But we must not forget that Miss Hepburn achieves an appealing character, spirited, tender and picturesque. She is a girl who rebels against the restrictions of the period, defies convention by being unladylike and going to work, and fighting for women's rights. The other part of the story, which has her concealing her relationship with her daughter and barring her "past" on the witness stand, is claptrap one has seen many times before.

Rating: Katharine Hepburn, a Victorian heroine with modern ideas handicapped by story that lacks vitality."

Young, Constance Bennett, and Simone Simon all but committing homicide in the course of their association is calm after all. Calm and pleasant and worth seeing for more than four stellar reasons. One of them is the skill of the director in evading censorship by shying away from realism and making the heroines ladylike instead of what they probably were in the Hungarian original. However, one's imagination can penetrate the sugar-coating and discover characters and a story more piquant than our screen permits. Another reason is the beautiful production that perfectly simulates Budapest. Still another is Don Ameche, whose sense of comedy is as gravely winning as his serious roles in "Ramona" and "Sins of Man." The slim story has three girls, one who works in a dress shop, another in the theater, and the other peddling neckties, living together in a magnificent apartment to save money and having their little love affairs. Mademoiselle Simon has the smallest part in the story. She runs away from school and steals Miss Bennett's lover from her, winning by her odd combination of childish innocence and adult seduction. All this makes neat, delight entertainment, as unimportant and superficial as an April shower.

Rating: Fragile, charming comedy of four girls in Budapest fiction.

"Libeled Lady."—MGM. That rarity, a picture that is as highly esteemed by the critic as it is by the public—well, here it is! A worldly comedy, it is hilariously funny while suave, knowing and exciting. The outcome can't be guessed until it happens—something else to cheer about. Too, there are scintillating performances by the stars and their associates. I've never laughed more at William Powell nor been more acutely appreciative of his art. So it is with Myrna Loy, Spencer Tracy, Jean Harlow, and Walter Connolly. Each one is in superlative form; each has a perfect rôle. Briefly, the story has Mr. Powell attempting to compromise Miss Loy as the result of a price from Mr. Tracy, a newspaperman whom she is suing for libel. It isn't necessary to tell you more. No words of mine can do justice to the story and the beauty of its telling. Whatever you do, don't confuse this with ordinary comedies. It's tops above every recent one.

Rating: Sparkling comedy with quartet of famous stars at their best.

"Pigskin Parade."—20th Century-Fox. A football musical might be something to shudder away from, but this is an exception. It is tuneful, pleasant and funny. Though mildly satirical, it has substance and certain fine high lights. One of them is the singing of Judy Garland, a deep-chested youngster who is all the more remarkable if her given age of thirteen years is true. Another is the skillfully acted characterization of Stuart Erwin, a farm boy whose ability to pitch melons with unerring aim earns for him a place on the football team of a rural college for its game with Yale. One more is Patsy Kelly, the nagging wife of a coach, Johnny Downs, most pleasing of juveniles, and Arline Judge in the rôle she always plays well, a college vamp. All these and more high lights enliven a story that is original and a picture that is full of pep from start to finish. The music is good, too.

"The Big Broadcast of 1937."—Paramount. One of the most difficult feats in film production is to give cohesion and distinction to a hodgepodge such as we find in revues.

"The Magnificent Brute."
On and Off the Set

THERE is a well-known film hero who has often been lauded for his seemingly unselfish friendliness to newcomers who are potential rivals. He makes them feel at home, and "shows them the ropes."

Recently his studio found out that what he actually does is preach rebellion, instill suspicion, and advise newcomers against giving the sort of cooperation that is vital to their success. So now the studio is warning newcomers against the actor and his method of eradicating likely competition.

ANN DVORAK will not like this, but we’re going to tell it, anyway. Ann is one of the few stars who really try to keep their good deeds in the dark. She recently gave up a (five-hundred-dollar) binocular microscope to the cause of cancer research.

The microscope had been a birthday gift from her husband Leslie Fenton. She donated it to a doctor who heads one of the many sadly under-financed groups of American scientists struggling, with little help or encouragement, to find cures for cancer and other plagues of mankind.

WHEN night comes, I like to get away from all this!" opined Warner Baxter, gesturing toward the lighted set.

"Same here!" we agreed.

That night, attracted by movie lights glaring beside a suburban railway station, we joined a crowd of spectators watching Herbert Marshall bid Gertrude Michael good-by in a location scene of their latest picture. One of JIMALS become bigger and bigger problems in Hollywood. Pat Withers has been shopping frantically and, to date, unsuccessfully, for a hippopotamus which he needs for his current picture, "Jungle Jim." You have a spare one, communicate. Grant at Universal City, Calithe other spectators was—imagine our astonishment!—Warner Baxter.

When he saw us there was a moment of silence. Then Warner raised his hand. "Now, all together!" he said. And we chanted in chorus: "When night comes, we like to get away from all this!"

WHEN Rochelle Hudson, Robert Kent and the others of the company were in Canada recently making "Reunion" with the quintuplets, they found it impossible to buy many luxuries in the little village. Among other things they couldn't find in the local stores was sauerkraut juice, which Director Norman Tourgoff thinks he must have every day. His wife sent some to him by express from Hollywood.

"I have a feeling I'm drinking rare champagne," he said when he opened the cost of the juice plus the express charges plus the duty he had to pay. Then, to make him feel worse, Rochelle found a store near by where he could have bought it at the regular price.

JOHNNY WEISSMULLER's description of all he has suffered for the past two years on account of his long hair would make you cry. Imagine him, dressed in evening clothes, accompanied by his ermine-clad, bejewelled wife, Lupe Velez, attending a theater and hearing someone in the crowd outside yell: "Why don't they put him back in a cage?" But for a thousand dollars a week people have been known to suffer more than that. Recently it came under the heading of news—good news to Johnny—that the picture was finished and he could get a hair cut.

B. P. SCHULBERG, discoverer of Claro Bow and other big names, found one of his new contract players piloting a transcontinental air liner. Two women passengers thought Pilot LoVerne Brown just "too divine," so Schulberg signed him to a contract, changed his name to John Trent, and you'll be seeing him.

I MAKES my hair lighter," Simone Simon confided to a friend. "But, Simone," the friend protested, "do they like it at the studio?" "Oh, no, they don't like it," Simone replied airily, "but I swear to them it is the same darkness it was.

DESPITE the gossip about that it was romance that took Constance Bennett flying to Joe Schenck's side when he was ill in a New York hospital recently, it was not. Constance wants to be an operator, and it was business, not love, that prompted the trip.

NELSON EDDY is using a small studio for his Sunday-afternoon broadcasts, but the fans found it, and when he went next door to a tiny candy shop to get a cup of coffee between rehearsals, a crowd soon gathered.

"I'll send them away if you want me to," the storekeeper said, "but I do need the business."

"Oh, don't send them away," replied Mr. Eddy, and when he finished his coffee he obligingly signed all their autograph books. The proprietor of the little shop now reports his business has increased so much he has to enlarge his shop.

EDDIE CANTOR was in a spot. He had to follow Bob Burns on the stage at a recent benefit. Burns rated encore after encore, and Eddie faced an audience in a "make me laugh, damn you!" mood. He met the situation with the finesse of an old-timer. "I predict Burns will be the next great comedy star," he began. Every one cheered this tribute. Then Eddie proceeded to prove that Parkyakarkas is still a more effective prop than a buzzsaw.

IT'S not always the stars' fault when they're accused of being reserved, reticent, and glum during interviews. Warren William told us the star's side of one of these occasions—you usually read just the interviewer's story. "A lody reporter began our chat by saying archly, 'Oh, Mr. William, I hear you're a hard nut to crack—but I'll crack you!' From then on," Warren added, "even though I was genuinely interested in her ideas, I couldn't bring myself to say more than 'Yes' or 'No.'"

AT Eleonore Whitney's birthday party for Johnny Downs, a rather handsome dummy in tailor's sat prominently at the table. Why? "We just thought it would be fun," said Eleonore. Meanwhile Carol Lombard, who started this fad for insanity, has tired of the pose and became very social and dignified.

THE press agent have been telling us for so long that extravagance is quite, quite dead in Hollywood that it's really unkind of Jane Wymon, one of our newest newcomers, to confuse them. On her North Hollywood estate, she is having constructed a private lake large enough for her favorite sport, aquaplaning. Let them explain that!

W'VE just learned another story about the "Ladies in Love" set, where Janet Gaynor, Constance Bennett, Loretto Young, and Simone Simon were not nearly so friendly as their press agents insisted. So much rivalry about portable dressing rooms ensued that each star was supplied with one measuring exactly the same number of feet and inches as the others. (Connie, the first day, had complained that Janet's was bigger.) Miss Bennett managed to put it over on the other girls, though. Her dressing room contained the only fully appointed bath!

Priscilla Lawson, who used to be a photographer's model, is an actress now, like a good many other newcomers. Anyway, you can decide for yourself when you see "Rose Bowl."
And here's the rousing treatment that keeps it vigorous . . .

HORRID skin faults are usually under-skin faults. Blackheads come when tiny oil glands underneath are overworked, give off a thick, clogging oil.

Next thing you know, your pores are looking larger.

Lines around your eyes, mouth are just your outer skin crinkling, because your under-skin is getting soft and flabby.

But you can stop those cloggings! Bring fresh life to that faulty underskin—

Twice a day invigorate your underskin with a rousing Pond's deep-skin treatment.

Pond's Cold Cream contains specially processed oils which go way down deep into your pores. Right away it softens dirt . . . Floats it out . . . and with it the clogging matter from the skin itself. You wipe it all off. Right away your skin feels fresher—looks brighter.

Now waken glands . . . cells

Now a second application of that same freshening cold cream! You pat it in smartly. Feel the circulation stir. This way little glands and cells awaken. Fibres are strengthened. Your underskin is toned, quickened.

In a short time, your skin is better every way! Color livelier. Pores smaller. Lines softened. And those mean little blackheads and blemishes begin to show up less and less.

Get a jar of Pond's Cold Cream today. Begin the simple treatments described below. In two weeks see your skin growing lovelier—end all that worrying about ugly little skin faults.

Remember this treatment

Every night, cleanse with Pond's Cold Cream. As it brings out the dirt, stale make-up, and skin secretions—wipe it all off. Now put in more cream—briskly. Rouse that failing underskin! Set it to work again—for that clear, smooth, line-free skin you want.

Every morning, and during the day, repeat this treatment with Pond's Cold Cream. Your skin comes softer every time. Feels better, looks better, and now your powder goes on beautifully.

Keep up these Pond's patting treatments faithfully. As blackheads soften, take a clean tissue and press them out. Now blemishes will stop coming. Soon you will find that the very places where pores showed largest will be finer textured.

so often accompany embraces of Hollywood couples. Mrs. Kelly introduced us and added, "Miss Barron wants you to bare your soul. While you’re baring your soul I’ll go gnash my teeth. When you’re through talking, I must tell you about some gorgeous sables I saw."

"Oh, yeah?" asked Paul. Dorothy and I laughed, but Paul didn’t. It seemed to me that he has almost forgotten how to laugh. His mouth smiles gaily, but his eyes don’t, and one can see that his hair is touched with gray that is very premature.

Then he sat down on a divan while he waited to be called to the execution chamber, and he seemed very calm for a person who was to part with a favorite tooth in a few minutes.

"Please tell me something quite startling about yourself," I pleaded.

Paul smiled. "I’m not a very startling person, I’m afraid," he said quietly. "I live a very sedate life. It’s nice and peaceful now, and I want to keep it that way. My wife and step-daughter and I are real home-bodies. She’s thirteen and graduating from grammar school."

The dentist beckoned then, and I followed Paul into the room where angels fear to tread, and I pried my questions while the doctor, the old meanie, went right ahead with his kind of plying.

I asked Paul how he liked working in the land of make-up believe.

"It’s all right," he said. "I miss audience reaction, but screen work is O.K., too." That’s the sort he is. Honest, straightforward. No wild bursts of enthusiasm.

He’s one of ten children, a real Irish family. His mother, a hard-working woman, always loved the theater, but never got the time to act in it. However, she gave to three of her brood so much of her zest that they found the stage their medium.

"Sis married," said Paul, "but my brother and I are still holding the fort."

The dentist now took all Paul’s attention, and his wife, who had been treated by an assistant in the meantime, came in to see how he was coming along. Theirs is an exceptionally happy union. She is his business manager, and when she gets the time she writes children’s plays and film scenarios. Between them is an unusual understanding, for they have gone through much together.

She watched as the dentist gave a yank and laid what had been a troublesome molar on the little marble table.

"Is it out?" asked Paul in great relief. There hadn’t been a sound out of him before that.

"It’s out," said Doctor Simon Legree.

"I’m afraid I can’t be able to talk any more," Paul said, extending a hand in parting. "You understand how it is."

When the Kellys left, the dentist said, "His life reads like a novel. He’s had some tough breaks, but he’s always come through them like the man he is. He’s afraid of nothing. When he had to start his life all over again he was in debt to the tune of thousands of dollars.

"Well, Paul was determined to pay every cent of it back. He found employment on the stage, and then he went to Hollywood. He lived simply, denying himself every luxury. He paid back every cent. Now he’s building a ranch that’s going to be a real human’s camp. Not ostentatious—he hates anything like that—but modern and comfortable. If ever a man deserved a break, it’s Kelly."

I saw Paul once more before he and his wife left for the Coast. It was on the street, and he was in a great hurry. I didn’t think he had seen me, and I certainly didn’t think he would stop. But he did. He came over and said, "Thank you very much for the interview. I’m sorry I didn’t have more time to give you. We’re leaving tomorrow. We came by plane, but we’re going back by car. I just bought an automobile for Mrs. Kelly." Dorothy’s technique had won out.

I learned later that they made the trip in less than five days and had averaged sixty-five miles an hour. The Kellys, you see, never do anything by halves.

He pays not the slightest attention to his fast-increasing waistline, and eats everything and as much of it as he likes.

"I suppose I should be lunching on a lettuce leaf," he said with a sly chuckle, "but this looks much better." And he helped himself to a huge portion of spaghetti and baked beans.

In defense of his lunch, which looked equal to defending itself, he was serious and convincing.

"Motion pictures show life as it is," he said. "Each picture shows a certain slice of life, each character in the picture depicts a type of the time and place. I am a type, and I must say my type is just as important to the world as any other. There always were and always will be fat men.

It was on location when he was making "Come and Get It" that I encountered him eating outdoors with the extras. The food was served cafeteria style on long, bare tables. When it was noticed that Mr. Arnold was eating outside, a tablecloth made its appearance, and half a dozen people rushed over with his lunch so that he didn't have to stand on the long line and wait his turn. There were many who, for no apparent reason except that they like him, seemed delighted to serve him in the slightest way. They had the feeling that he would rather eat with them than inside with the big shots, with whom he is equally popular.

Otto Kruger pays tribute to his unfailing good humor in telling of years they traveled together in road shows. Mr. Kruger was the star, and if there was no part for Arnold, he saw that one was written in, or a place made for him somehow.

"I've never known him to lose his temper," Kruger said. "And he also kept the whole company in good humor. On winter nights when we played small towns where sometimes there was water ankle-deep in the dressing rooms, it was Arnold who kept up the morale of the company.

"And many a time on Sunday he cooked dinner for the company over a single gas jet," he added.

In direct contrast to many former stage stars, who continually complain of Hollywood's shortcomings and cry to go back to the stage—but never go—he likes pictures and intends to stay in them.

"Hollywood has brought me real happiness," he said simply. "The house we rent now in Beverly Hills is the first real home I've ever known.

For thirty years I moved from hotel to hotel, from town to town—the uncertain, hazardous life of a tramp.

"My children can have a home here. Security is important to growing kids. They need to feel that some definite place in the world is theirs. I don't want them ever to endure the hardships that I went through, but I don't want to spoil them. I believe every child should have certain responsibilities, certain duties to perform at regular times.

"For that reason," he continued, "I keep no gardener and no chauffeur. My son has to keep the cars clean and take care of the garden. My daughter acts as my secretary and handles my mail.

"I know from experience how it develops one to feel that he is independent by earning his keep. I want them to know the value of money.

"I encourage them to write their own scenarios and act in them," he continued. "I coach and criticize. It gives them initiative and is good experience if they decide to take up acting seriously later on.

Try to imagine your screen hero spending his evenings in the bosom of his family, reading plays with his children, or listening to his musical wife and her friends at their music!

"I hope to retire in five years," he said. "I figure if my luck keeps up I'll have enough money by that time to retire and live comfortably the rest of my life. Of course, I'll never quit working," he laughed, "but at least I'll feel I can if I have to."

"Yes, I'm over forty," he admitted, "and I'm afraid I'm not as slim as I was once"—and he glanced toward his waistline—"unless my chest has slipped!"

One and Only Bazooka

Silver Tones Concert Band,'" to which Bob belonged not so many years ago.
Six years before, Bob had passed through his home town on the way to Hollywood. Things looked rosy, then. He had a contract to appear in talkies. He felt he had reached the peak. All his lean days were over. He was made.

But the disappointment which assails so many screen hopefuls was also to be his lot. He had been signed as the result of his work in vaudeville, where for years he had appeared in a black-face act called Burns and West. Consequently, Bob's natural face never graced the screen. The few parts which he played were all done in burnt cork make-up. His individual comedy method was smothered in small, thankless roles. When the contract expired, he was let out.

Bob liked Hollywood and decided to hang on. He managed to crash several of the local radio stations. The pay was small and his savings soon dwindled. For several years he just managed to get by.

In the meantime, Bob had dropped his blackface character and was getting well known as the "Arkansas Philosopher." Bing Crosby heard him and picked him as a "natural." Bing insisted that his radio sponsors sign Bob, but they turned down the idea because the latter had a "name."

Bob's hopes, which he had once more allowed to soar, were dashed. "I mooned around the house until my wife finally said: 'Wall, if all you need is a name, why don't you go to New York and get one?'

Next day Bob started East in a rattletop car which just about held together. His stoke was fifty dollars, which he had borrowed from a friend.

He had one definite purpose in mind—to get on Redy Vallee's program. Down to his last dime, he kidded Vallee into giving him an audition which landed him the desired spot on a repeat performance several weeks later. By this time Bob had a "name." He had come back to Hollywood in style.

It's not difficult to interview Bob. He likes to talk, and has nothing to hide. He admits his formal schooling was brief. "I started running away from home when I was fourteen. I always had the itch to travel and finally got a chance to join a minstrel company playing my bazooka.

his backwoods manner when off the screen. Bob is always well groomed. His pet dislike is what he terms 'Brooklyn Hill Billies' who parade around in boats and wide hats. "I've never worn that stuff, and I don't intend to," he drawls.

His right name is Robert Burn. "That's the way I was christened in the old Episcopal church back home. Some of my kin-talk insisted that I was called 'Robin,' so I looked it up for myself the last time I was in Van Buren."

Bob's father, William Robert Burn, was a native of Alabama. His mother, Emmo Needham Burn, was born and reared in Tennessee. It was in the latter State that the couple met.

After marriage, they settled in Van Buren because of its scenic beauty. "The prettiest country in the world," the bazooka player describes it.

Bob's return to his birthplace was made in triumph. With pardonable pride he showed me clippings from the local press, proclaiming his arrival in front-page streamers.

'Bob Burns Day' was celebrated by the natives with a parade lasting over an hour. In the line of march were four bands, including the "Queen City Hoggard Boys," and the "Arkansas Silver Tones Concert Band," to which Bob belonged not so many years ago.

One and Only Bazooka

"How did it happen to get that name? Well," explained Bob in his inimitable way, "dawn in Arkansas, when a man talks a lot they say he 'blows his bazoo too much.' I guess that's where I got the idea."

Bob broke into show business playing his bazooka with the Black Cat minstrel troupe.

The budding showman, now almost seventeen, stayed with the company all summer, touring small towns in the Southwest.

When the United States broke with Germany in 1917, Bob was working for the "Chicago Herald" as an ad solicitor between engagements. His bazooka, strangely enough, had been a factor in landing the job.

Always a showman, Bob used to haul the thing around to businessmen's lunches and play tunes mixed with flashes of his typical dry humor. The men were so delighted that when Bob would come around the next day to sell them ads he was pretty sure of an order.

The urge to fight hit Bob bad, and he enlisted the first week war was declared. His fellow employees staged a parade to the train the day he left for camp. Like the Pied Piper, he marched along playing his bazooka with the happy crowd tagging behind. He spent seventeen months at the training station, where he was rifle instructor. But music was his main interest, and he organized a jazz band. Finally, in the fall of 1918, he set sail for France, where he arrived after several narrow escapes from submarines.

Bob and his jazz band spent the next year entertaining wounded soldiers at the various hospitals. "I'll never have a more appreciative audience," he recalls with pride. He is also proud of a gold medal for marksmanship pinned on him by General Pershing.

After the armistice, Bob and the band stayed in Paris, where they were taken up by Parisian society. When he finally returned home to be demobilized, it was with the idea of going back to Paris after a brief visit with his folks.

However, once on American soil, Europe didn't seem to appeal. Following a short tour with the band, he decided to strike out for himself.

Broadway got its first glimpse of Bob and his bazooka at the Bal Tabarin, where he shared honors with Cliff Edwards. Later he went to the Palais Royale, where an unknown band leader from Denver was just getting started. The beginner's name was Paul White-

The white lights never "got" Bob. Fundamentally, he believes in the sane and steady life. His adored wife, to whom he was married for fifteen years, recently passed away. Ironical that this had to happen just when things had become easy after years of ad-

Bob, Jr., now thirteen, will probably develop into a writer. He already gives his father many ideas for gags, and it is not unusual for the two to work on a script together.

Bob, having missed many advantages himself, is determined the boy shall have a thorough education. However, although the father is practically self-taught, he has a native wisdom which no college could ever give.

In spite of his success, Bob still lives in modest fashion. "No sense puttin' on airs," he reasons. "It can't last forever."

That's Bob Burns for you. The sham and tinsel of Hollywood cannot affect him. He just goes on being himself.

Happened to the Boy Friend Lately

- There's Dick now! He's coming in! De-didn't even talk this way, Marge ought to do something about this.

- But, Trudy - how can I? You know how pretty Louise is - and just look at me with these awful pimples.

- Marge - I bet that's the whole trouble. If you get rid of those pimples everything will be all right - listen, Fleischmann's Yeast is what you need - c'mon, let's get some now!

Don't Let Adolescent Pimples Keep Your Boy Friends From Making Dates

Pimples often call a halt to good times for many girls and boys after the start of adolescence. At this time, between 13 to 25, important glands develop and final growth takes place. The entire body is disturbed. The skin gets oversensitive. Waste poisons in the blood irritate this sensitive skin. Pimples pop out.

If you are bothered by adolescent pimples, do as thousands of others—eat Fleischmann's fresh Yeast. It clears these skin irritants out of the blood. And then — pimples vanish!

Eat 3 cakes daily — one before each meal — plain, or in a little water — until your skin is entirely clear again. Start today!

were as blithely contented as any young couple enjoying a normal honeymoon.

They proved to be pleasant and engagingly modest. Breezy and brash, definitely theatrical, but very much alive are these two.

Surprise Party.—Na Trumpet’s wild flare welcomed Karen Marley to New York, but once word got around that she was here, every one wanted to meet her. Instead of waiting that she was here on vacation and didn’t intend to have her time taken up with busi-

New York advertising firms have been forced to turn to Hollywood for beauties to adorn advertisements. First to be used is Jane Weir, currently appearing in “Champagne Waltz.” An artist was sent from New York especially to paint her portrait.

the company manager told them. “You’re not being selected because you have any acting talent or because you are good-looking. You just happen to fit in the design of the picture we are fanning on the stage, and the first one caught acting will be put out at once.”

Lark Under a Cloud.—In spite of a saccharine, gritty, sickening portrait of Marian Talley that reared into the sky over the Criterion Theater, all the young and old flocks from the Metropolitan Opera House trooped in to see her first picture. “Stunned” was hardly the word for their object horror when they came out. She looks, one of the more kindly of the lot insisted, like a female impersonator of the old vaudeville days.

Jeanette Gives In.—In Hollywood Jeanette MacDonald and her managers have set such a prohibitive price on her services for radio that disgruntled sponsors who wanted her took to chanting, “Who does she think she is anyway?” A lad whose specialty is the deflation of egos decided to find out.

Calling on her in New York, far from the heady incense of Hollywood, he murmured that it was too bad that she had never made the Metropolitan Opera, because that ruined her chances of getting a good break on the radio. All the radio people, various acquaintances reminded him, thought of her as an ex-chorugirl. Too bad she couldn’t overcome that. A good radio program would build prestige for her. This went on and on. It worked. Miss MacDonald’s engagement on the radio is coming—at a price that does not look like the national treasury report.

Unfair Competition.—A lot of girls around town will be much happier if the studios will just send for Anita Louise and Paulette Gaddard. No one else has a chance as long as they are here. They make every one else look washed out and limp, and they capture all the beau.

Melancholy Dames.—All you stage-struck girls who figure that you would be well on the road to fame if you could get a walk-on part in Leslie Howard’s “Hamlet” should have been at a rehearsal where a few girls were being selected from draves of candidates.

“Don’t get the idea that you are any better than the rest if you are chosen,” Hollywood’s truly perfect figure belongs to Marie de Forest, a chorus girl appearing in “The Big Broadcast of 1937.” And we agree; don’t you?

many heated discussions which she enjoys much more than adulation. She had always cherished an illusion that New Yorkers are serious about their theater-going, and she found them violently prejudiced against miscasting as a dramatic subject.

"If a play is a good play, what does the subject matter?" cried Pat in ringing tones. She made us feel shallow and frivolous. She made us feel cynical and cruel toward serious playwrights. Hers was an exhilarating presence. She is the only girl I know who left pictures without regrets, and who has steadily grown into a more interesting person.

All Around the Town.—En route to England to make a picture, Gertrude Michael became seriously ill, went to a hospital, and could not see visitors for weeks. Rouben Mamoulian will be the first to see her. . . . Marle Oberon is off to England where they will transform her back to the femme fatale type, in "I, Claudius," with Charles Laughton. Hollywood's report that she is just a nice, wholesome girl dismays the sponsors of her career. . . . Several hundred tourists swarm to the Cotton Club on Broadway nightly to see Bill Robinson dance. They cluck when he nears the tables to ask what his best friend, Shirley Temple, is really like. "A little angel and a dancing genius," is his answer.

Irene Dunne is in favor of drying those fears before the camera permanently; she had so much fun playing comedy in "Theodora Goes Wild." . . . Maria Ouspenskaya, that wonderful actress who played "Kurt's" mother in "Dodsworth," runs a dramatic school in New York that the most famous of actresses attend at odd moments. Chico Marx's daughter has just enrolled, and she will have to be good to stay there.

Before you lose your heart to Burgess Meredith in "Wintererset," you might just as well know that he is happily married to Margaret Perry, whom you can see in "Go West, Young Man." If you want to write him fan letters, send them to Nyoack, New York. He has a farm there where he spends quiet week-ends, and he is in the East now rehearsing a play. . . . Marlene Dietrich is bringing back a wardrobe that will introduce a sweeping cloak of super-shiny black satin, and day clothes in fog colors—misty blue, green and gray.

"She would have been grand in my 'Lave Before Breakfast.'"

I happened to speak of a visit with Paul Muni and she revealed herself as an anxious student of his superb technique.

You have read of her porties. She is, nevertheless, comparatively unsocial. She seldom goes to the Tropicana or the other night spots. "But when I do go out I try to be a welcome guest, and when I entertain I attempt to be original. Why not?"

Her new estate has been eulogized. No one asked Carol her motive for moving.

"I'd been in the old house three- and-a-half years," she explains when queried, "and suddenly the owner announced my rent was to be tripled. I thought that unreasonable, so I politely bid him good-by." She doesn't care for big establishments and the little pseudo-farmhouse in which she now resides is far from being a manor. "There's no dining room simply because the building was too small for one!"

Where Clark Gable is concerned, Carol is silent. She makes no statements. Life can't be centered wholly on a job; she is human and no one senses it better than she does herself. When she marries again—and she's not so independent as to fancy she doesn't want a husband—it will be for always.

Rosina Lawrence features something new in the way of hats. You'll see her in the next Laurel and Hardy picture, "Way Out West."
The property man on any musical picture is the busiest of the troupe. Here is Harold Thurberg, between scenes of "Born to Dance," applying an iced chamois skin to Eleanor Powell's forehead, a treatment that relieves fatigue.

Later, spilling the rumors that linked her name with Clark Gable's, she spoke with customary candor: "I admire Clark very much. But I was disappointed, in one way. I had expected him to be a suave cave man. And he's not at all sophisticated! Very boyish, in fact. Why, he teases me unmercifully!"

She and Eddie Sutherland, the director, spend hours over their dinners at the Brown Derby, engrossed in talk. Theirs is a fine friendship. Loretta thinks right now that she prefers intellectual men, so his cultured mind appeals to her.

"He understands me," she explained. "No other man ever tried to do that. He listens to me talk. And he is not possessive."

To Eddie she is practically a saint. He puts her on a pedestal.

"Loretta loves that," her mother chuckled. "I suppose she gets it from me. Southern women respond quickly to a chivalrous adoration. Each wants a big, strong man to cherish her."

"But Loretta discovered, as we all do, that romantic daydreams and marriage are two different things altogether. She idealizes, and is rebuffed by the slightest intimacy. A platonically loving, with herself the object of a man's reverent, unselfish worship, would suit her, I think."

"I hope that she marries again some day. When real love comes along, perhaps she will not be so finicky."

Recently Loretta spent a joyful day shopping for a layette for Sally, who has since become a mother.

Loretta's longing for a baby is well known. Her conversations on the subject are rather amusing.

"Mamma," she often says, "I want a baby, but I don't want to marry again. I can't help it, mamma; I just crawl when a man tries to paw me."

"Well, my child," her mother will advise, "I guess you'll just have to adopt a baby."

"I still like good dancers," Loretta admits, "and enjoy looking at handsome men, even if they aren't brainy. One afternoon in Rome," she smiled, "I decided to take a drive in a horse-drawn victoria during the siesta hour. When every one was resting, I found an empty one. The driver was asleep."

"He was so good-looking that I just sat and stared at him until he finally woke up."

"Italians have such sweet and kind expressions. They look so romantic, too, as though they would be very kind and tender."

Loretta is inherently spiritual. Her slim beauty stands a little apart, like a crystalline shaft. Gradually life is schooling the impressionable lassies of her elastic imagination.

Bit by bit she is slipping into the grooves of proved values."

"My creed carries with it many rules and restrictions," she defined her present views. "Whenever I have ignored them, I have suffered. If they deny me something that I think I want, I later discover that it was meant as a wise protection from my own rashness. Let others follow the light as they, individually, see it."

The strain between herself and her mother during her marriage to Grant was Loretta's worst heartache. Infolded again by maternal love, the drooping flower of her beauty bloomed anew. They grow closer together as the years pass. Slim, young-looking Mrs. Belzer seems more like an older sister.

To Be Concluded.

seasons. Then followed more Broadway plays, and a radio program. Ironically, it was the radio work that led to his discovery by picture executives.

His first picture was "Are These Our Children?" in 1932. At the time I was working in the New York office of the company which produced that picture. When the print reached us, the employees were called into the projection room to view it, as was the custom.

Hard-hearted salesmen left the room moaning that it was a "turkey"—meaning that it was doomed to die at the box office—even if that new kid, Eric Linden, did give a swell performance. Whether it turned out to be a turkey or not, I am not qualified to say, but while it zoomed Eric to the attention of most interested parties, it threatened to spell "turkey" to his career, for right away his home studio wanted him to go on playing parts such as the one he played in that picture, that of a hard, tough, misled youth who develops a case of hysteria.

They gave him several more such roles, and Eric began to realize that he was being pressed into a mold which, if he did not escape it, would give him a real case of hysteria, with jitters thrown in. So he packed up and went to Europe.

"I was getting all mixed up," he told me. "I don't know whether I was doing right or not at the time; but it has worked out all right. I rented a villa at Nice, got a French cook, and proceeded to write it all out of my system. I had no definite plans, so I don't know what I would have done after that. However, a cable came, offering me a good part, and somehow I felt that I was ready to come back. I no longer had that confused feeling when I thought of Hollywood."

When he took that jaunt to Europe, all Hollywood conjectured that he was running away from an unhappy love affair. Magazines printed stories about it, but he denied them upon his return, and he denied the story to me as we sat in the bright, new commissary, surrounded by hundreds of sightseers, calloused waitresses, famous actors and actresses, a pretty girl from the press department on his right, and a hungry fan-magazine writer at the table with him.

I noticed that he was, from time to time, looking out over the heads of the eating throng, to a spot against the far wall, but far be it from us press guys to ask personal questions, so I asked:

"Have you any matrimonial plans?"

I got ready to duck, but he didn't bat an eyelash. "Yes," he said, "one very much of the present. In fact, a few months ago I called my mother long distance and told her to bestow her blessings, that I was going to be married right away."

"What happened?" I asked, not recalling any announcement of marriage.

He was silent for quite a long time, while I furtively eyed the pretty girl from the press department. Finally, he said, "This is a screwy town."

"Of course, you don't have to talk," said I, reaching for the rubber hose and brass knuckles which, along with

Out of a Book.

Tyrone Power, Jr., did so well in "Ladies in Love" and "Lloyds of London," that he may be teamed opposite Simone Simon in "Seventh Heaven."

In some ways he seems not to have grown up; his manner, while talking about his romance, was that of a blushing schoolboy. And, with all his experience in the theater and in pictures, he says that he would be afraid to go back on the stage. He has been away too long, and the difference in the techniques of stage and screen is so great that he'd have to go back into stock for a season or two to relearn how to act on the stage.

And he still finds it necessary to seek seclusion at times. He now has a cabin in a lonely spot near Big Bear Lake, not too many miles from Hollywood. There, he says, "the ground has hardly been walked on." It's not as far away as Europe, anyway.

Being very fond of music, he has divided his musical library of records, taking half to the cabin and leaving the other half in his Los Angeles home.

"I'd like to go back to college," Eric said, "I came back from Europe planning to do a lot of studying, but I never got around to it."

His brother, it seems, is now attending Columbia University, though working, and married. The example has fired Eric with the desire to emulate. All he needs is a wife who wouldn't object to seeing him just occasionally. I wonder if he's talked it over with Cecilia?

Like all boys—I can't help thinking of him as a boy, for that's the impression he gives—he has a dog, a collie. He and the dog take long walks together in the Hollywood hills. His chief relaxation is reading; in the way of sports he enjoys horseback riding and swimming. For a hobby, he collects things—jade, porcelain, and such.

When I first went out to meet him, I had some curiosity about his age. What with old men playing juveniles, and young men playing bearded patriarchs, I wouldn't have been surprised to find Eric Linden being wheeled in, his aged limbs refusing to stand the strain. But I found him to look even younger than he does on the screen.

Now, one just doesn't ask a star his or her age. But while we were eating, with me asking purely impersonal questions, my spies were at work in the studio at large. As I left, one of them sidled up to me and slipped a piece of paper into my hand. I ducked down the nearest alley, and opened it with shaking fingers. This is what was written on the paper:

said. "Yet as soon as I gained a little notice, invitations poured in, even from people I did not know!"

As "Marie Claudel," the budding adolescent in "Girls Dormitory," in love with Herbert Marshall, Simone achieved a clever performance. Indeed, Simone will be able always to play this sort of rôle. I think she has been disillusioned during adolescence. We can always play best what has never happened.

For instance, Simone pretends to be always seeking love. Like a cat, she plays with love as a feline plays with a mouse. Of course, sometimes the mouse gets away.

"I would like to have a boy friend," she remarked, as one uttering a longing impossible to fulfill. "You know, some one to escort me places at night; but I can't find one."

When Simone talks this way, you wonder if she is being silly, or surmises that you are.

"I get lonely," she explained, when asked the reason. "And an unescorted girl can't go out at night."

She says quite frankly that Hollywood's eligible bachelors don't attract her. Indeed, she is hard to please.

"They are too interested in themselves to be good company," she declared. "They are nice, but they talk too much about themselves. The interesting men in Hollywood are all married."

Despite her severe rulings on Hollywood's male attractions, Simone is well liked by the gay young bloods, and by older ones, too.

She loves life. She gets a kick out of everything. Enthusiasm! Why, Simone oozes it. When genuine, it is a most likable trait in any one. With her, it is real. Her mind is more attractive than her looks.

Occasionally, she is a woman of the world, with the wisdom of the born enchantress. She possesses an uncanny instinct of being able to see into the motives of other people. You could not fool her with flattery.

Usually she is a child, reflecting every whim and mood—as she used to be as a child, when she swayed with the palm leaves to the simoom in far-away Madagascar.

She attracts men, but I think men have little attraction for her. She herself is too boyish, too vacillating in moods. Yet romance still hangs round.

Her recent withdrawal from 'White Hunter' was explained as a case of influenza. Her doctor said she could not work or do anything for two or three months.

None the less, Simone was seen at the tennis courts, in swimming, entering the Trocadero with Pat di Cicco. Even at death's door, Simone has a good time.

Simone has a wonderful opportunity. All the gifts of Hollywood are being placed in her lap. Yet she has a lot to learn in the acceptance and handling of those gifts. She admits being temperamental, and every one agrees with her.

"Seventh Heaven" will be her great chance to prove definitely her star rating.

If, however, her Madagascar temperament is not controlled, little Simone may wake up one morning and discover that Hollywood is not heaven but the opposite.
Incidently, we might mention anent 'Ben-Hur' that the picture cleared $1,000,000 when it was recently re-revived along with other older films.

Shirley Attains Eminence.—Honor are literally heaped on Shirley Temple. Imagine this strelt having her name in the pages of the discreet and aristocratic 'Who's Wha in America'! Such is the case in the latest edition of this chronicle of "big names," and though Shirley's biography is a brief one, her name gleams as probably the youngest ever to appear on the sederate pages of a publication that has never taken any great token of screen achievement. The names of Janet Gaynor and Nelson Eddy are among other new ones added.

A Witching Marriage Hour.—The midnight wedding of Ann Sothern and Roger Pryor set a new pace for marital events. The crowd that came to see them through the church ceremony was in the gayest mood imaginable, but that didn't prevent a few tears being shed. There was a nice note of suspense, because the bride and groom didn't appear until about twelve twenty. Then the company adjourned to Ann's home for a champagne supper that lasted almost to the breakfast hour. It won't be surprising if there are a train of midnight marriages, though this is the first recorded among the stars.

Janet Gaynor Pursues Way.—It didn't take Janet Gaynor long to find a new niche for herself as soon as her contract with 20th Century-Fox expired. She was almost immediately cast with Fredric March, in "A Star Is Born," by David O. Selznick, the independent producer.

Janet closed her stay with her one and only campany in "Ladies in Love." Also she completed the engagement in a burst of fireworks, abjecting to being relegated to simply costarring prominence with Constance Bennett and Loretta Young.

Janet's adventuring on the high seas of free-lancing will be something to watch. It's the biggest change in almost any player's fate in four or five years.

Faithful to the Rules.—The greatest formality prevails in the plans of Jeanette MacDonald and Gene Raymond for their wedding. First they went together for almost a year before announcing their engagement, and now there is practically another year's lapse before their marriage, as they definitely plan a June wedding. Bath, by the way, are seeking a two months' leave of absence from their respective studies.

Jeanette and Gene don't want their union to be confused with any other in Hollywood, either as to policy or precedent. Their marriage is to be permanent, and they are even building their home in advance so that they may move right into it as soon as they return from a honeymoon trip.

Grief Haunts Norma.—Simultaneously, and as recited last month in these columns, change hovers over Norma Shearer, whose recovery from the effect of the death of Irving Thalberg has been slow indeed. Worry and grief took time even in the midst of her sorrow to write notes to her special friends who had extended sympathy to her in her bereavement.

Pixilated to Fame.—Oddest of conquests is that attained by the two pixilated sisters, as they are called, of "Mr. Deeds Goes to Town." It looks as if this pair will became a permanent institution. Maybe some producer will even take a chance on starring them. The women are Margaret McWade and Margaret Seddon. It's funny they should both have the same first name. Other casting arrangements made by Paramount, they're to be seen in "Let's Make a Million," in which Edward Everett Horton is starred.

Success smiles under strange auspices—for by a trick of fate these two very clever actresses were fitted out of obscurity by the business of presenting them together in two unique roles in the picture which enjoyed such tremendous acclaim.

That Silly Old Question.—They simply can't break up Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers as a team. And why should this be attempted? Friction between the two stars has often suggested a split far one or more pictures, but certainly it should be clear by this time that Fred and Ginger together are big favorites, whereas separately there is no telling just how they would drift.

Anyway, all parties to any belief in separation have had to submerge that idea in response to public demand, following the appearance of the two in "Swing Time." Fred and Ginger will be seen in the very near future in "Stepping Ties."

Charlie Vies with Alice.—The grand old combination of Charles Ruggles and Mary Boland seems momentarily to have struck the shoals, far Emanuel Cohen, the producer, is performing an experiment of same possibilities in casting Ruggles and Alice Brady together. While that's only far one picture, it's an idea that might "take."

Ruggles and Miss Boland have already played in about a dozen films together, and have an agreement by which one's name is mentioned first one time as a member of the costarring team, and the next occasion the other is given that prominence. It's a pretty successful method of maintaining peace.

Peace at Last.—Bette Davis is coming back to work. A valiant battler always, the gifted star who won the Academy award for "Dangerous," ran into a losing fight over her contract with Warner Brothers. Even the English courts took sides against her and eliminated her chance to earn $50,000 for a British film appearance.

Warner Brothers plan to present her in "The Changeling" on her return.

Regardless of any criticism she may have suffered at the hands of judicial tribunals and others, Bette is a game fighter.

Bill Takes No Chances.—William Powell is seemingly insuring his bachelorhood. Smart as a business man, he recently sold the palatial estate that he once occupied for $250,000, a deal by which he is said to have profited to the extent of about $75,000 to $100,000.

But most important, this domain which looked as if it might some day be the setting for a Powell chatelaine will probably be the last residence of the type occupied by Bill, if he has his way about it.

Still, there is always Jean Harlow.

Claudette Colbert's Setback.—Being married to a doctor doesn't safeguard her well-being of Claudette Colbert. After all, there are auto accidents, which can induce a lot of trouble, quite independently of germs and microbes. Miss Colbert suffered seriously as a result of a crash in which her car was involved during the production of "Maid of Salem." She was out of the picture for the better part of three weeks, due to the injury diagnosed as a very slight basal skull fracture. Slight or not, that's nothing to joke about.

Introducing Michael Brooke.—Watch for Michael Brooke when he appears in pictures. That's the screen name of the Earl of Warwick, probably the most handsome of the peers to attempt the movies. He will shatter all precedent if he does succeed.

If he makes good, his salary a few years from now will amount to two hundred thousand dollars annually. Furthermore, he has more servants than almost any star in Hollywood—just as a matter of course, for he brought them over with him from England, and MGM paid their fares.

Comedians' Day of Grief.—Stan Laurel is highly nervous, excitable and temperamental. So said his wife, Virginia Ruth Laurel, when she filed a separate maintenance suit after a marriage that lasted about a year. She asked for twelve hundred and thirty-five dollars per month, and said that the comedian receives seventy thousand dollars per picture.

Slim Summerville was another of the screen's funny men whose marriage reached the shoals. His wife received thirty-five thousand dollars in securities, a Toluca Lake home, and twelve thousand dollars cash when the court proceedings were ended.

Ted Healy also broke up with his bride of a few months.

So it's been a poor season for the laugh-makers, particularly with the large amount of money that exchanged hands in Summerville's case.

A Mother's Victory.—Joan Bennett finally settled the question of whether she had full right to her child by her marriage to John Fox. The youngster even has been given her present married name. Joan and Fox had a legal wrangle over the child, but she proved she had been principally responsible for the little girl's support and upbringing, and the judge finally gave Miss Bennett the right of way. So Diana Bennett Fox has become Diana Bennett Markey.

She is eight years of age, whereas Melinda, daughter of Miss Bennett and her present husband, Gene Marky, is two. They are as pretty a pair of children as you would care to see. Especially that cute little Melinda.

How Does Hollywood Have Fun—Really?

Once that Joan had taken a week off just to play.

Jean Muir, Mae West, Ann Harding, with their theatrical experiments, their hopeful encouragement—at their own expense—of young artists, must reap rich rewards. But I'd feel better about any of these busy women if I caught her, just once, sitting down with a detective story or even a bit of crochet work.

They have parties, you say. Of course they have parties in Hollywood! You have never seen such a town for a busman's holiday as is this strange community. Most of the big parties are, for goodness' sake, costume parties. Now, wouldn't you think that when an actor spends days and days darning make-up and costumes for his work, he'd be pretty bored at spending hours and hours darning make-up and costumes to go to a party? Not at all. He loves it.

Bonita Granville cautions her playmate about being as naughty as she is in "Maid of Salem." These dolls are now the rage with the younger set in Hollywood.

clause in Rita La Roy's contract, forbidding her to slide down banisters. Honest! It seems that the studios can forbid almost anything.

Why, George Raft has even been advised, earnestly, to refrain from poking any one in the nose—in public, at least—no matter how great the provocation, no matter how greatly Georgie's belligerent ire is aroused. Now, there is a real privation!

Olivia de Havilland signed a contract with Warners in which she promised not to marry for at least three years. Betty Grable may not wed, under the terms of her contract, until she comes of age. In the excitement over the discovery of Fred MacMurray, the studio apparently forgot to insert any paragraph relating to this important matter. But, believe me, there was plenty of feverish executive agitation on the Paramount lot when Fred calmly and without notice, took the fatal step recently. Such an adagio!

Of course, Joan Crawford, with her singing lessons, her physical trainer, her experimental theater, her constant, intense study of the theater must arouse your admiration. But, gracious! It would be a relief to me if I heard just Gale Sondergaard is importantly cast in "Maid of Salem." You remember her, of course, as the housekeeper in "Anthony Adverse."

What is more, they spend most of their time at these parties being photographed—for the newsreels and the news services. These people who do nothing all week but pose before cameras—do it again on Saturday evening when they are supposed to be having fun. And Jean Harlow told me that when she was working on a picture—she had been working on one then for seven or eight weeks—she never stayed out on a Saturday night later than eleven because she was so bitternly aware that she must spend six or eight hours in a beauty shop on Sunday.

Lee Tracy, too long absent from the screen, has the leading role in "Criminal Lawyer."
The director of this, Mitchell Leisen, has done exactly that: The result is a gay, infectious picture so skillfully put together that Leopold Stokowski and his Philadelphia Orchestra do not contribute anything to the result in addition to a "swing" band. Each occupies its proper place; the artistic worth of each is given due. And the story, sligtly as it properly is for this sort of picture, is never lost track of. It sticks together and it moves. All the players you find distinctly at their best, and when I saw the film the audience liked best of all Bob Burns and Martha Raye, judging by their laughter and applause.

"Adventure in Manhattan."—Colum- bia. Jean Arthur and Joel McCrea are a new and interesting combination whether they are seen together or not. And their picture is first-class diversion, too. It is a mystery-comedy that is never believable but always good fun and is most engagingly acted by the stars. Miss Arthur is, of course, one of the screen's leading sorceresses in that she can go any part-interesting, arresting and sympathetic; and Mr. McCrea becomes increasingly expert without ever losing a whit of that easy likability he displayed as a beg- inner. Their adventure in this is goofy but speedy, having to do with a reporter with the unexplained gift of predicting robberies, before they are committed, and an actress who helps him solve a big bank explosion. There isn't any particular reason for anything, but the goings-on are interesting just the same.

Rating: Mystery-comedy splendidly acted by favorite players.

"The Magnificent Brute."—Uni- versal. Victor McLaglen bel lows and belabors his way through an original story against the spectacular back- ground of a steel mill. It is all stirr- ing enough if you are easily pleased, but it is a deplorable comedown for him after realistic pictures such as "The Lost Patrol" and The Indian Fighter. There is no reason why any one who liked Mr. McLaglen in films that preceded those masterpieces shouldn't admire him in this conventional display of his talent. It is good melodrama at that. It seems that "Big" Steve Andrews comes to a Pennsylvania hamlet to assert the bsendMessage of his boarding-house-keeper's little son and is betrayed by his sweet- heart, a siren who works in a bakery. We have Mr. McLaglen as a sultan be- sought by both England and a foreign power to sign a treaty. His crafty refusal keeps the plot going for a while until his son falls in love with a Brit- ish officer's wife, then that becomes important. The affair is given impetus by the arrest of the sultan's husband for rum running in the sultan's domain and he is sentenced to die. The feeble love story reaches no conclusion and the sultan enjoys a maso- trombium. An interesting actress, Lucie Mannheim, plays the wife gracefully.

Rating: George Arliss as a crafty Oriental, dominating story that does not matter.

What the Fans Think

Defending Producers.

I AM so incensed over a fan letter in September Picture Play that I simply have to retaliate. I refer to the one about "Misceating being one of the worst crimes of Hollywood producers."

Maybe the producers do make mistakes once in a while. Who doesn't? But isn't it true that their executives are put under the spotlight, why don't our reader skip them and remember at least a few of the many perfectly cast pictures? Do you suppose she didn't see "Mr. Deeds Goes to Town"? Could any one else in the world have been the pitiable, misunder- stood, and altogether lovable Long- fellow Deeds except Gary Cooper? And where could the producers have found another Fellini agent as alive or half as human as Lionel Stander?

Then again, that grand picture, "Rhodes, the Diamond Master": Was Oscar Homolka miscast as Paul Kruger? That man's acting made "Rhodes" a pic- ture that will never be forgotten.

Stepping on to the lighter pictures, what about the spirited, restless little Kagy in "Small-town Girl"? Wasn't that part just made for Janet Gaynor? Would the story have gone over so well if she had been miscast? And was be- loved Will Rogers ever miscast in any picture?

Although "It Had to Happen" is generally ranked as a three-star picture, it certainly can't be accused of any mis- casting. George Raft as a smashing poli- tician as well as a faultless lover and lovely Rosalind Russell unsurpassed as the inscrutable rich man's wife. I could go on forever citing examples of what not only I, but dozens of others feel to be perfect assignments.

Just another word about Greta Garbo looking "fourty-five" in some scenes of "Anna Karenina." Just why shouldn't she have looked that age in those scenes? Mental pain ages the face more quickly than any known cause. Only Garbo could have portrayed the unutter- able anguish of Anna Karenina and made the suffering that aged her face show on the screen.

Steve gets even, M. Mignonneau Burch, Mount Hebron, California.
Gratia Fenton.—Henry Wilcoxen is not under contract to any particular studio. That's why his name isn't listed under Addresses of Players. You may be able to reach him at the United Artists Studio, Criterion Films, of London, are seeking him for Douglas Fairbanks, Jr.'s, new film "High Treason."

V. C.—British International have announced that they want to star Buddy Rogers in "Hunt the Pearls," and Columbia would like him for "College Hero." August 13, 1901, is Buddy's birthday. You'll have to send me a stamped envelope if you wish a list of all of his films.

Joan and Ruth Baer.—John Marsh and Ray Walker played the leads in "Brilliant Marriage." Matty Kemp was Marian Nixon's husband in "Tango." Matt Moore was the pilot and Robert Livingston the copilot in "Absolute Quiet." Michael Living was Ricardo Cortez's brother in "Postal Inspector." He is now playing in "Yellowstone."

T. V. C.—Though neither is under contract to any particular studio, you might write to MGM for photographs of Basil Rathbone and Dennis King. They cost twenty-five cents each.

Robert Kugta.—"Maytime" will be released shortly. This operetta was filmed as a silent picture in 1923. Nelson Eddy resumed his broadcasting on September 27th. I hope you didn't miss the story about him in the December issue.

Humphrey Bogart Devotee.—Your favorite was born in New York City on January 23, 1900; five feet ten and a half, weighs 150; dark hair, brown eyes. His parents were Doctor Belmont, D. Bogart and Maud Humphrey. Educated at Trinity School in New York and Andover Academy in Massachusetts. Left school to join the navy and enter the World War. Has had much stage experience. Married. New pictures are "Isle of Fury" and "The Great O'Malley."

M. J. E.—Frances Drake was born in New York City, October 22nd; Alice Faye, New York City, May 3, 1912; Ida Lupino, London, England, 1917; Merle Oberon, Calcutta, India, February 19, 1913; Virginia Bruce, Minneapolis, Minnesota, September 29, 1910; June Travis, 1913; Dixie Dunbar, Atlanta, Georgia, January 19, about 1910; Simone Simon, Marseilles, France, April 23, 1914; Ann Sothern, Valley City, North Dakota, January 9, 1909; Jean Harlow, Kansas City, Missouri, March 3, 1914; Barbara Stanwyck, Brooklyn, New York, July 16, 1907; Madeleine Carroll, West Bromwich, Staffordshire, England, February 4, 1906.

F. B.—Buster Crabbe was born in Oakland, California, February 7, about 1908; six feet one, weighs 188; brown hair and eyes. Graduated from the University of Southern California. Spent his boyhood in Hawaii, where he learned enough about swimming to become an Olympic champion. His right name is Clarence Linden Crabbe, and he is married to Madeline Virginia Held. Their daughter, Clarence Lynn, was born on July 16, 1936. His next after "Rose Bowl" is "O'Reilly of Notre Dame."

K. R. S.—By the time you read this Ginger Rogers and Fred Astaire will have started on their next picture, "Stepping Stones."

Laren's Terry.—Frank Albertson played the role of Allan in "The Last Gentleman," in which he married George Arliss's granddaughter, Charlotte Henry. Frank was born in Fergus Falls, Minnesota, February 8, 1909; five feet nine, weighs 145; light-brown hair, blue eyes. He married Virginia Shelley, a stage actress, in 1931, and they have a son, Frank III. Started pictures in 1922.

R. T. H.—Herbert Marshall is a native of London, England, born there May 3, 1890; six feet, weighs 153; hazel eyes, brown hair. Studied to be an accountant. Won the stage in 1911, Served in the World War. Married Edna Best in 1918. Their daughter was born in London in 1933. The Marshalls have been separated since about 1934.

L. Pangle.—Robert Taylor did not appear in the cast of "Annapolis Farewell."

R. A. H.—David Manners played the role of Joseph in "Roman Scandals." He appears in Katharine Hepburn's...
“Flatbush water is as hard as nails. It gave me plenty of trouble until I started using Ammo. Now I put a little Ammo in with the dishes, and the wash, anywhere I clean around the house. It’s a wonderful water softener and certainly gets rid of that hard water scum. Ammo has made things a lot easier for me.”

N. M. Q.—Some of the scenes for Richard Arlen’s Guinmott-British picture, “The Great Barrier,” were made in Canada, and is quite possible that the leading lady, Lilli Palmer, visited her grandmother in Ottawa while there. There is a still picture made of each and every scene of a film. These stills are taken for use in newspapers, magazines, theater lobbies and all other publicity purposes. The studies issue them at a cost of ten cents for each still. When writing for them it is well to mention just which scenes you wish or at least who in the production you wish represented.

Dot H.—Pat Paterson was born in Bradford, England, April 7, 1911; five feet two, weighs 105.

“The Woman Rebels.” David was born in Halifax, Nova Scotia, Canada, April 30, 1905. Fredric March was born August 31, 1899, Bobby Breen, November 4, 1927; Ann Sothern, January 9, 1909; Barbara Stanwyck, July 16, 1907; Michael Whalen, June 30th.

T. N. T.—It is quite possible that the MGM Studio can supply photographs of Lotus Long, Mamo Clark, and Mala. Lotus and Mala played in Loth “Eskimo” and “The Last of the Pagans.” Mamo Clark and Mala are now making a serial for Republic called “Robinson Crusoe of Clipper Island.” Igor Gorin sings on Dick Powell’s radio program on Friday nights over Radio Station WABC. You might address him in care of that station at 485 Madison Avenue, New York. Al Jolson, Minna Gombell, and Phil Regan celebrate their birthday on May 29th.

FLORINA TONIATTI—Stanley Morner has appeared in “I Conquer the Sea,” “The Great Ziegfield,” “Suzy,” and “Bedadly Jim.” Studied music at Carroll College, Waukesha, Wisconsin, and eventually appeared on the concert stage. Mary Garden heard him sing and recommended him for the Ziegfield pictures. Dick Powell and Joan Blondell have the leads in “Gold Diggers of 1937.”

MARRIUS LOW HOREM—The role of Marsevitch, in “The Princess Comes Across,” was played by Mischa Auer. James Stewart is six feet two and a half.

KUBLA—Rafael Ottiano was Mrs. Higgins in “Curly Top.” I keep no record of the religion or nationalities of picture people.

C. E. M.—John Wayne was born in Winterset, Iowa, May 26, 1907; six feet two, weighs 200; dark-brown hair, blue eyes. He is married to Josephine Soren, a non-professional. They have a son and a daughter.

LET MUSIC MAKE YOU POPULAR
it's easy to learn this 'short cut' way

ONLY a few short months ago, Bill was a back number socially. At parties no one ever noticed him. He always sat alone, enviously watching other people do the entertaining.

Then suddenly, Bill amazed all his friends. Almost overnight it seemed, he became the most popular man in his crowd. He was in demand everywhere—always invited to parties—the center of attraction wherever he went.

How it Happened

The big chance in Bill's life began at Dot Webster's party—and quite by accident, too. At the last minute Jim Barnes called up and asked Bill to come along, as they needed an extra man.

As the party got under way, Bill took his usual place in the corner. But this time he had a strange grin on his face—a smile half triumph, half determination. "What's Bill schel-tering about?" someone whispered. "There's nothing funny about a party without our prize piano player.

Dot's face flushed.

"I'm sorry, folks, but Dave Gordon, our pianist, couldn't come. Isn't there someone here who can play?"

For a moment no one answered. Then suddenly Bill rose and strode to the piano. "Do you mind if I fill in?" he said. Everyone burst out laughing. "What's Bill doing? Trying to make a fool of himself?" someone asked. But Bill pretended not to hear.

As he struck the first few chords, everyone leaned forward spellbound. For Bill was playing as Dave Gordon had never played. Playing with the fire and soul of a master musician, while everyone sat in awed silence until the last dreamy chord had died away. In a moment Bill was the center of an admiring throng. In answer to their eager questions, he told them how he had always wanted to play, but never had the time or the money to realize his ambition. And then one day he read about the wonderful U. S. School of Music, and how anyone could learn, at home, without a teacher, in half the time, and at one third the cost, of ordinary old-fashioned methods. "That day," said Bill, "was a lucky day for me. I sent in for the course, and when it arrived, I was amazed! I never dreamed that learning music could be so easy. The course was as much fun as a game, and in a few short months I had mastered some of the most popular pieces. That's the whole secret. There's no mystery about it. Learning to play is actually as easy as A B C, this 'short-cut' way."

This story is typical of thousands who have found this easy way to popularity and good times. If you have always wanted to play, but have the notion that learning requires years of practice, and expensive teachers, here is your opportunity. You can learn to play right in your own home, in your spare time, without an expensive teacher.

No Talent Needed

You don't need any special musical ability to play. If you can learn a tune, you can learn to play your favorite instrument, this easy as A B C way. The secret lies in the amazing print and picture method, perfected by the U. S. School of Music. With this simple, 'short-cut' system, you are first told how a thing is done, then an illustration shows you how, and then you play it and hear it. Studying is fun, and in almost no time, you are playing real pieces—classified music—popular songs—and dance music, by actual note.

“Garbo is the most mental of players. She is possessed of a truly classic beauty to which no eulogy can do justice. She is poetry, sunrise and great music,” says Jack Hitt.

Garbo Is Poetry.

PICTURE PLAY'S verbose battles provoke the thoughtful film student because they are lively and pungent, and surely none intrigue more than the sporadic nominations for the honored title of the screen's First Lady. Among the many mentioned, the two most obviously deserving of this honor are Greta Garbo and Norma Shearer—always keenly competitive.

Rivalry becomes genuine with the unveiling of Miss Shearer's memorable "Juliet." Even a certain studied sincerity and a slight dearth of lyric rhetoric only gently detract from a superb performance. Garbo scaled undreamed-of heights in her ethereal realization of an inadequately transcribed "Queen Christina," her most telling exhibition.

Miss Shearer is an expert technician, a thoroughly legitimate and admirable artist; Garbo a fascinating personality and the most mental of players. She is possessed of a truly classic beauty to which no eulogy can do justice. She is poetry, sunrise and great music.

This department needs a spirited controversy, and since its contributors are uncommonly responsive, let's settle this question. I admire many actresses, especially Norma Shearer, but my vote goes to the glorious Garbo, First Lady of the Screen.

Jack Hitt.

Another Hollywood Mystery.

I WAS extremely disappointed, as all other readers of "Anthony Adverse" must have been, when I saw the screen interpretation of the popular book. The presence of Fredric March in the title rôle, however, warned me what to expect. He is the male Garbo of the movies. A thoroughly colorless personality, he has a few studied gestures and a limited number of facial expressions—including a mirthless laugh—from which all normal and human spontaneity has been carefully deleted. And he never varies his style. This must pass for genius, as he appears to be the first hero of filmdom. Why a man of his type and age should have been chosen to portray the most virile and romantic character in recent fiction is just another Hollywood
There she sat... TENSE...SILENT...WATCHING!

ADDRESS YOUR QUESTIONS TO THE ORACLE, PICTURE PLAY, 79 SEVENTH AVENUE, NEW YORK, N. Y.

BY THE ORACLE

F. L.—Herbert Marshall was born in London, England, May 29, 1890; six feet, weighs 155; brown hair, hazel eyes. He has been married to Edna Best since 1938, but a divorce is anticipated. Intended to be an accountant; went on the stage in 1911. Severely injured his leg in the War. Address him at RKO Studio.

E. M. S.—Don Ameche is under contract to 20th Century-Fox, where you might write for his photograph, enclosing twenty-five cents to cover the cost. He hails from Kenosha, Wisconsin, and attended the University of Wisconsin. Five feet eleven and a half, weighs 170, hazel eyes and brown hair.

M. E. D.—Phillip Reed is not a real Indian as he appeared in "The Last of the Mohicans." He was born in New York, graduated from Erasmus High School and put in one year at Cornell University studying engineering. Left college to join a stock company. At present he is appearing on the New York stage opposite Tallulah Bankhead in "Reflected Glory." Formerly played on the stage under the name of Milton LeRoy. Not married. That is Franchot Tone's right name. His birthday is February 27, 1906, and he has hazel eyes and light-brown hair.

S. H. C.—James Ellison was born in Guthrie Center, Iowa. Played in Moscow Art Theater until he reached stardom. While playing at the Beverly Hills Little Theater he was discovered by a talent scout. His first picture was "The Play Girl," released in 1932. Has never been married. I find no fan club in his honor.

FRANCES ROBERTS.—Their birthdays are: Rochelle Hudson, March 6, 1913; Simone Simon, April 23, 1914; Fay Wray, September 15, 1907; Anne Shirley, April 17, 1918; Jean Arthur, October 17, 1908; June Lang, May 5, 1916; Marsala Hunt, October 17, 1917; June Travis, 1915.

D. M. S.—For photographs of Michael Whalen address him at the 20th Century-Fox Studio. Frances Langford has made pictures for Paramount and MGM and is scheduled to make one for Warners. You might write either Paramount or MGM for her photo. It is customary to inclose twenty-five cents with each request. If you wish to know in which back issues we have published photographs of these two players, please send a stamped envelope.

All persons writing to The Oracle are requested to include their full name and address. This will permit a reply by mail if there isn't space here. For information about stills, casts, fan clubs, stars' films, please inclose a stamped envelope.

A. A.—For stills of any Shirley Temple's pictures, address the Publicity Dept., 20th Century-Fox Studio, Box 900, Beverly Hills, California. For those of George Houston as he appeared in "The Melody Lingers On," write to United Artists, 729 Seventh Avenue, New York, and for "Let's Sing Again" to RKO Pictures, RKO Bldg., Rockefeller Center, New York. All stills sell for ten cents each.

V. V.—Franchot Tone comes from Niagara Falls, New York, where he was born on February 27, 1906. He is six feet, weighs 160, and has light-brown hair and hazel eyes. For stills of "The King Steps Out," address the Publicity Dept., Columbia Pictures, 729 Seventh Avenue, New York, inclosing ten cents for each still requested.

GERTRUDE LYNCH.—We have never had an interview with Madeleine Carroll. She was born in West Bromwich, Staffordshire, England, February 20, 1906; five feet five, weighs 122, golden hair, blue eyes. Married Captain Philip Astley in 1931.

JOSEPHINE.—Tony Martin played the role of Tom Williams in "Back to Nature" and that of Tony Renaldo in "Sing, Baby, Sing." However, there is no Tony listed in the cast of "Educating Father." You might address Mr. Martin at the 20th Century-Fox Studio. Douglass Montgomery has returned from Europe. Victor Jory has been making pictures in Australia.

J. M.—Katharine Hepburn was twenty-nine on November 8th. Ricardo Cortez was born Jack Krantz in Vienna, Austria. I'm quite sure that Virginia Pine pronounces her daughter Joan's name to rhyme with "loan."

T. A. AND M. R. F.—Their birthdays are: Bob Steele, January 23, 1906; Buck Jones, December 4, 1888; Tom Mix, January 6, 1883; Tom Tyler, August 8, 1903; Richard Dix, July 18, 1894; Nick Foran, June 18, 1910; Ken Maynard, July 21, 1893; Charles Starrett, March 28, 1904; John Wayne, May 26, 1907; Gene Autry, September 26, 1907; George O'Brien, September 1, 1900; Hoot Gibson, May 18, 1892. Most of these were born and brought up in the West.

B. W. M.—Bobby Breen has not been adopted legally by Eddie Cantor. The latter calls him "son" only on the radio. Bobby has made out one picture, "Let's Sing Again," with "Rainbow on the River" to be his next.

J. E. T.—Florence Rice was born in Cleveland, Ohio, February 14, 1911; five feet four and a half, weighs 108; light-brown hair, blue eyes. Robert Young was born on February 22, 1907; six feet, weighs 170, brown hair and eyes. If you will inclose a stamped envelope, I'll be glad to give you a list of his films.

Lyrics — Again, Warner Bros. steal the film spotlight with a streamlined musical as smart as the "Queen Mary"—as modern as the "China Clipper"—returning radio's romantic rave to the screen in a rollicking riot of rhythm and roars.

Laughter — It's like a holiday in a madhouse—with the craziest comedy cast ever corralled in a single straight-jacket running wild on all eighteen floors and the bargain basement of a big city department store.

Lunatics — Zasu as the last rose of leap year and Hughie as the Hammerschlag quadruplets (pronounced Cuckoo Cuckoo) are only two of the milder cases in this nuthouse set to music—by Harry Warren and Al Dubin.

Love — Ask any lovely lady if Patricia isn't striking a real bargain when she sells her heart for a song—as Jimmy pours vocal magic into the rhythmic hit, "The Little House That Love Built."

murder mystery, for murder Anthony he certainly did.

Changing the plot, also, seemed excessuous to me. Having to discard so much material because of the great length of the story, I should think some of it could have been used for a legiti-mate conclusion instead of the cheap melodrama which destroyed the epic style of the book. Hervey Allen told the story of a man and what life did to him over a period of fifty years. He was not concerned with remunerations, reformations or heroes in any form.
Those who read the tale will never forget it. Warners have made the screen version a milk-and-water carbon copy of a thousand other film plots, dull and unexciting, with nothing to remember and less to forget. Edith Nelson.

Not Her Favorite.

THE time has come when I can no longer remain silent on the subject of Barbara Stanwyck. If only they wouldn't cast her opposite my actors so often, I wouldn't have to go to her pictures, but she completely spoiled for me "The Bride Walks Out" and "His Brother's Wife."

The extent of Barbara's acting, so far as I can see, amounts to either weeping or screaming. Her voice is too deep to be attractive, and she certainly isn't beautiful—though I believe she would be much better-looking if she didn't wear her hair the way she does.
With the center part and the hair straight to the ends, it is terribly unbecoming, emphasizing the width of her lower jaw and making the top of her head look too narrow. These opinions are not only my own, but are shared by almost every one I know.

I'm not saying that Miss Stanwyck shouldn't be in pictures at all; as a sister or friend of the leading lady she might be quite convincing, but as a leading lady—never! I don't mean to be harsh, but it seems to me that any star who greets an interviewer, no matter how well-known to her, with as cheap and vulgar an expression as "Hi, you toots? Park it there!" deserves all that's coming to her.

In the Wonderland of Hollywood.

Is there any fan with soul so dead that never, to himself has said: "I long to go to Hollywood"? Well, keep on wishing hard enough and one day your dreams may materialize into the bright reality of seeing your star friends in person. I found it so much fun that I'd like to share a bit of my pleasure with the fans who have not yet trekked westward.

I spent more than seven months there recently, my fourth visit, and I find so much diversified beauty and varied interests there that I like to claim it as my second home.

Ah, Hollywood, Jollywood, too often Hollywood! It all depends on the breaks that come one's way. A fan's paradise, where dreams come to life, slake hands, standing heart and her devoted husband, Franchot Tone, who is headed for the heights, a pretty fine-looking lad, too.
One guess, anyway. May their happiness endure forever and a day.

Is there a motor heat putt-putting? Oh, no, dear reader, only the flittering of many a maiden's heart when good-natured, smiling Clark Gable puts in an appearance at an opening or at the lights at the Legion Stadium. Friday night is top night there, and once again it's fun to be an onlooker. The stars go to see the lights, and the fans fight to see the stars.

Almost always expect to see jovial Al
Johnson and his pretty wife, Ruby Keeler, the mad Marx Brothers, minus make-up and hardly recognizable. A never-failer and great favorite is Mae West, smaller than the screen suggests, with her pattented little strut—and a multitude of stellar personalities are present. Vive Acta Non Verba draws them before and after the fights.

Norma Shearer—an exquisite little lady, always stunningly groomed and gowned. A pleasure to gaze upon.

Carol Lombard—beautifully blond, and from my home town and so doubly interesting to me.

Claudette Colbert beautifully brunt —a lovely lady and a gracious one.

Robert Taylor—better-looking snuff since if this be possible; the female contingent of fans swarm around this honey.

Nelson Eddy—reaches pretty high in feminine favor as well as musical notes.
Very democratic with his fans.

Kay Francis—a dark beauty, and a friendly one, too.

Gertrude Michael—one of the dearest stars, grand to her fans—a very dramatic, magnetic personality.

Warner Baxter—one of the grandest most obliging of them—all endeared himself to autograph-seekers when he gladly signed his name for one and all.

Dolores del Rio—another stunning.
A husky Latin lady.

Marianne Dietrich—an ethereal beauty, very considerate to her fan friends.

George Raft—trimly sleek, but not villainously so; generous to the demands of the autograph.

Jeanette MacDonald—a good-looking redhead, I caught her making a friendly grinace at a movie cabshe.

Alice Faye—as pretty as a picture—bestowed upon me a flashing smile.

Mae Clarke—so very sweet in looks and manners.

I've only told of some of the successful screen luminaries I saw in the enchanting land of the glittering shimerring screen world—HOLLYWOOD.

How Producers Blunder.

WHY should a promising young actress be trained and developed, given several good parts in fair films, and then eventually a really fine role in a really swell picture, only to be fed inferior parts in weak pictures as a means of showing appreciation, once she has won a place in fans' hearts? As soon as the producers realize that said actress has made a hit, instead of following the result with singular worthwhile films, they seem to think that she can rely on that one hit to offset any error that they might make in casting for her next. And for the next two or possibly three films, they are quite correct, but it cannot last forever. Why don't they handle those precious careers with care? It's money in their pockets in the end.

I've followed the progress of movies for the last six years and I have seen carried off by every known method.
Of course, in a few instances the star has seen far enough ahead to protect, but in doing so she has been labeled "temperamental." Look what Paramount did to Carol Lombard.
A series of poor pictures after her first hit, and then even after "Twentieth Century" and "Now and Forever" they let her listen, beautifully gowned and coiffured while Bing Crosby crooned into her ear. Fortunately, I believe they've awakened at last, after seeing her sensational "Hands Across the Table."

The same studio used the identical manner in handling that really fine artist, Nancy Carroll, and in her case just about succeeded.

She tried to keep from being railroaded out, but in doing so the critics of Hollywood called her temperamental. Remember what a bit she was in "Devil's Holiday," "Stolen Heaven," and all those frothy numbers like "Honey" and "Sweetie?" Instead of capitalizing on her success in those and rewarding her with equally good parts, they cast her in "Follow Through" and "Night Angel." Later, they did give her a fine film in "Laughter," only to hand her weak vehicles in return for her sensational performance. And now, Columbia seems to be doing the same thing, even though she has to her credit a fine characterization in the stage flop "Undesirable Lady."

Remember Sally Eilers's brilliant "Bad Girl?" Soon after "Dance Team" was completed she had a series of weak films and has never regained her lost ground. And Dietrich's début was badly mutilated with the subsequent films, as was Mary Brian's and Richard Arlen's screen careers. After their first success, they were weakened by poor vehicles. More recently, the cases of Heather Angel and Jean Muir have carried out the general idea. "As the Earth Turns" and "Desirable" were hits for the latter, but what good did that do? She was subordinated to Pat O'Brien and Josephine Hutchinson in "Oil for the Lamps of China," and then "Stars Over Broadway."

In closing, I'll admit that I'm only a fan and perhaps do not understand the intricate methods that the producers employ, and I'll also admit that along with those mistakes they have made hundreds of stars and treated them accordingly, but I have particularly noticed the cases of those few and have always wanted to air my views.

WHAT AN Awful HEADACHE!

- Splitting headaches made me feel miserable, I can't tell you how I was suffering! I knew the trouble all too well—constipation, a clogged-up condition. I'd heard FEEN-A-MINT well spoken of. So I stopped at the drug store on the way home, got a box of FEEN-A-MINT, and chewed a tablet a before going to bed.

- FEEN-A-MINT is the modern laxative that comes in delicious mint-flavored chewing gum. Chew a tablet for 3 minutes, or longer, for its pleasant taste. The chewing, according to scientific research, helps make FEEN-A-MINT more thorough—more dependable and reliable.

- Next morning—headache gone—full of life and pep again! All accomplished so easily too. No gripping or nausea. Try FEEN-A-MINT the next time you have a headache caused by constipation. Learn why this laxative is a favorite with 16 million people—young and old.

What the Fans Think

JOAN CRAWFORD: Her vulgarity and coarseness are pathetically and unsuccessfully hidden behind a grotesque artificial mask.

Ronald Colman: A salute to England for its generosity in allowing America to have introduced its “first, last, and always” finest actor and gentleman.

Helen Hayes: If she forsakes the cinema for the stage, the finer artists of the world will understand her choice, but the screen will have lost the greatest actress of time immemorial.

Leslie Howard: His intelligent portrayals and fine characterizations are further proof that England produces the personification of good breeding and true art.

Greta Garbo: Her acting is not acting, so sincerely does she portray her characters; her facial expressions are too spiritually beautiful to describe.

Plain But Good.

Most of the male stars can be placed in one of three classes, namely: Real actors, intermediates and matinee idols.

Real actors: Paul Muni, Charles Laughton, Victor McLaglen, Peter Lorre, and Colin Clive are the best of this group. They are a pretty plain-looking lot, but what a goodly company. All have the gift for making a character live.

Intermediates: Ralph Bellamy, Chester Morris, William Powell, James Cagney, Leslie Howard, Clark Gable, Warner Baxter, Ronald Colman, and Lee Tracy. These have real talent for the business of acting, but because of their star rating are often poorly cast. William Powell, for example, lost much of his effectiveness when he was elevated to stardom. While a featured player, he gave us one good performance after another. His villains and scoundrels were high spots of the silent era. And he was a first-class comedian, too. Now the best he can give us is Philo Vance.

Matinee idols: Gilbert Roland, Nils Asther, John Boles, Gene Raymond, Francis Lederer, and Ramon Novarro. This is the group of very handsome fellows who supply the love interest or heart throbs in films. Fans of both sexes often mention them as being great actors. The truth is that these men have never been given any opportunities to act because of the limitations of their roles. Potentially, they may be great, but one would need to have clairvoyant power to discover such a fact.

George Brent has a poor voice and should never be cast opposite Kay Francis. Robert Montgomery is a fugitive from the matinee idols, who sometimes rises above his material and gives a likable performance. Victor McLaglen stole “The Informer,” and when the star steals the picture, that’s news! Nat Pendleton is a first-rate comedian and should be starred in stories by Sinclair Lewis, Damon Runyon, and J. P. McEvoy. He’s the ideal American mug.

TO every reader of Picture Play a Happy New Year! Just as 1937 shows every indication of becoming extraordinarily significant in the world of motion pictures, so does this magazine enter upon a year of greater fulfillment than ever before. For it reflects the optimism, prosperity and progressiveness of pictures in general. To-day more persons are attending theaters and more are reading about films and picture personalities. In New York the theaters are crowded as never before, with seats at a premium and waiting lines the rule. The public paid $90,000 to see "The Garden of Allah" in the course of a week at Radio City Music Hall. "Go West Young Man" netted $23,000 in two days at New York's Paramount Theater. Such amounts are not merely a flash of figures but an augury of what the New Year will bring to picture-goers everywhere.

MORE money will be spent in Hollywood than in any previous year. It will be spent on valuable properties such as "Gone With the Wind," and in assembling unusual casts such as was found in "Ladies in Love" rather than heaping money on a single star and letting the support be what it may. We are much more likely to see all-star casts in the truest meaning of the term and we are virtually sure of seeing favorite players in carefully chosen roles rather than in mediocre ones. All this indicates spending money, for nothing is costlier in Hollywood than time and care.

SO, when we wish our readers a Happy New Year, it is with the knowledge that they, as loyal followers of the screen and Picture Play, will find cause for satisfaction, stimulation and happiness in what both will offer in the twelve months to come.

ONE of the pioneers of motion pictures celebrates his twenty-fifth year as a leading figure in an industry that has undergone countless changes and upheavals since he established his leadership a quarter of a century ago. He is Adolph Zukor, chief of Paramount, whose Silver Jubilee will begin on his birthday, January 7th, and will continue four months. "Champagne Waltz," starring Gladys Swarthout and Fred MacMurray, is the picture chosen to commemorate the anniversary. Mr. Zukor will press a button in Hollywood that will release the picture throughout the world.

YOU will see this picture as a matter of course, but I wish you would keep your eyes opened for another which will, perhaps, be not so widely publicized. It is the first full-length film starring a great personage of the stage ever to be shown in this country, Sarah Bernhardt's "Queen Elizabeth." Produced in France, it was exhibited by Mr. Zukor in New York on July 12, 1912, and it not only attracted audiences that had hitherto refused to recognize pictures but it was the first entering wedge in the breach between stage and screen. Incomprehensible as it seems today, the screen had no standing with first-rate stage actors twenty-five years ago. Mr. Zukor was the first to make a move toward achieving an alliance. The outgrowth of his ambition was the formation of Famous Players and the appearance on the screen of top-notch stage stars.

QUEEN ELIZABETH" should be seen by every serious picture-goer, not merely as a museum piece but because it is concrete proof of such progress as we do not dream of as we look, for example, at "Champagne Waltz." The photography is bad, continuity is worse and history is garbled, but the film remains important, nevertheless. It is the only visual record we have of Sarah Bernhardt. Florid though her acting is, it is founded on the soundest principles of traditional pantomime, a lost art nowadays. One has only to see Bernhardt in her declining years to sense acting that made her queen of her profession for more than half a century. This was but one of Mr. Zukor's contributions to the advancement of the screen, if not actually its cornerstone. In the years that have followed he has built a structure that towers solidly and will never crumble. We wish him a Happy New Year, more jubilees and many of them.

DOES stardom handicap an artist? Does maintaining the stellar position retard progress in acting? I begin to think it does. The state of being a star may be excellent training for the future, but that is all. For stars who have stepped down lately have given better performances than in their heyday. It doesn't mean that they have been relegated to subordinate rôles, either, or that we are to weep over them as passé. Far from it. They have taken on added glamour as superlative artists. They command a degree of admiration that was sometimes withheld at the height of their stardom. For example, Ruth Chatterton.

OF TEN criticized for her mannered acting, especially toward the end of her starring engagement, and frequently called affected by critics who refused to be impressed by her smooth, glittering technique, what does she do? Ceasing to be a star, she enters the cast of "Dodsworth" and, playing what is called an unsympathetic part, brings to it such depth and understanding, that it becomes one of the conspicuous triumphs of the season. In every particular her impersonation is of stellar proportions, but she is not the star of the piece. The picture does not rest on her shoulders alone. Is it not possible, then, that because of this comparative freedom from responsibility, Miss Chatterton was able to concentrate on her part and give to it more thought than if she had been the sole reason for the existence of "Dodsworth"?

CONSIDER Janet Gaynor, too. Not strictly the star of "Small-town Girl," since she shared the spotlight with Robert Taylor, Miss Gaynor likewise gained by stepping down. Her acting was deft, sparkling and real—a far cry from those days of unchallenged stardom, when her sweetness was insisted on to the exclusion of every substantial quality. She won new admirers and cemented her position with old ones by giving more of her experience and skill than had been possible to the old-fashioned ingenues she played as a star. "Ladies in Love" continued her sensible course and again Miss Gaynor shone as a splendid artist rather than a personality to whom everything was sacrificed. The same, too, may be said of Constance Bennett who stepped down from the eminence of full-fledged stardom gracefully, intelligently and with wit and charm acted a rôle which, by all the signs, should have been unpalatable to a star. But Miss Bennett chose to make it one of the most attractive parts she has ever played, through skill and artistry making it sympathetic to the critical picture-goer. And we have John Barrymore forsaking the attitudes of the profile-conscious star to make a dazzling figure of Mercutio in the current "Romeo and Juliet." Next he is to support Nelson Eddy and Jeanette MacDonald, in "Maytime," and we may expect a brilliant account of himself in whatever part he plays.

GOING back a bit, one need only to compare Miriam Hopkins, in "The Three of Us," with Miss Hopkins in a number of pictures whose titles are difficult to recall, in order to decide that she gave her best performance when she shared prominence with Merle Oberon—and the story itself—then when she bore the burden of a picture made solely for her sake. Always excepting, of course, "The Story of Temple Drake."

VICTOR McLAGLEN commanded world-wide respect for his acting in "The Lost Patrol," and won the Academy award for his superb characterization in "The Informer." In both pictures he sacrificed stardom, returning to it in "The Magnificent Brute." You make the comparison this time. Adolphe Menjou, erstwhile star of a score of French farces, now is one of the screen's most adept and humorous players, his fame greater and his income larger than when he starred, and his responsibilities and restrictions infinitely less. I don't exactly know where all this leads, except that apparently the best acting bids fair to come from years of experience, and we may expect promise and personality from newcomers rather than any breath-taking exhibits.

FOR no reason at all, except that it is the New Year, we promise a reform—call it a resolution if you care to. It concerns Carol Lombard and the spelling of her name. Some months ago we explained why Picture play omitted the final "e" from the accepted arrangement of her first name, and no one challenged us. Now that Miss Lombard is even more celebrated than ever and her name is more often displayed, we have decided to alter our spelling and throw in that extra "e" with the rest of the world. The Happiest of New Years to you, Miss Carole!
SHIRLEY TEMPLE points a pink chubby finger at the minute that ushers in the New Year. She knows that it is the beginning of the best and most prosperous year in the entire history of motion pictures, a year in which every film-goer will share enjoyment in the best entertainment that has ever been offered them, with four pictures by Shirley herself.
THE RUBAIYAT OF ÓMAR KHAYYAM INSPIRES PHILOSOPHICAL CONTEMPLATION OF THE PAST YEAR'S EVENTS IN HOLLYWOOD.

The year 1936 has come and gone, leaving in its wake many changes and developments. In Hollywood new faces are seen, familiar ones have vanished, careers have been made or lost, marriages were contracted, divorces were granted, babies born, love affairs flourished or died, Shirley Temple's career reached its soaring perihelium, and Robert Taylor usurped Clark Gable's place as Public Lothario Number One.

Through all these activities and efforts runs a note of finality which Omar Khayyam so lyrically expressed in his 'Rubaiyat':

The Moving Finger writes; and, having writ,
Maves on: nor all your Piety nor Wit
Shall lure it back to cancel half a line,
Nor all your Tears wash out a Word of it.

Most of the changes in the movie industry during the past twelve months have been of an agreeable nature. On the first day of the year the starring pictures of two new players, Errol Flynn and Lily Pons, were released in Hollywood. Both stars and their pictures were extremely well received.

Miss Pons has so long been accustomed to the operatic spotlight—later traffic was tied in knots for six hours when thirty thousand people gathered in Hollywood Bowl to hear her sing—that additional fame did not affect her ego. Mr. Flynn, however, has been accused by a radio reporter of having developed a rather alarming case of megalomania. The charge is indignantly denied by Mr. Flynn, who adds that if necessary he will defend his reputation with his fists. I am inclined to side with the actor in the matter as I have not taken this reporter seriously since his admission to me that a certain lurid story which he wrote about Clark Gable and his girl fans was almost wholly a product of his own imagination.

On January ninth the Moving Finger wrote the final chapter in the career of John Gilbert. This turbulent life, which held so much of exaltation and despair, might have been the inspiration for the Persian poet’s lines:

With them the seed of Wisdom did I sow,
And with mine own hand wrought to make it grow;
And this was all the Harvest that I reap’d—
“I come like Water, and like Wind I go.”

"HIDEAWAY GIRL" is the story of a young woman being hunted by the law on suspicion of a bold daylight robbery of the bridal jewels at a society wedding. Martha Raye, above with Louis DaPrato, seems dumbfounded by it all. Left, she joins in the chorus with some of the boys. Shirley Ross and Robert Cummings, below, add a romantic note to this hilarious comedy.
"COLLEGE HOLIDAY" has Mary Boland and Jack Benny, right, George Burns and Gracie Allen, Martha Raye, and a hundred college students who try to run a dudes where they try to run a defunic hotel on the Grecian plan. Miss Boland and Eti-no Girardot, below. Included in the student body are Louis DaPrima, Olympendna, Eleanor Whitney, and Johnny Downs.
IN "Dreaming Lips," Elisabeth Bergner has to decide between pity for her husband and love for his best friend. Upper left, with Romney Brent, violinist in a large symphony orchestra. When Raymond Massey, outer left, also a famous violinist, learns that she is the wife of his old friend, he is indifferent to her advances. Right, he seems to be under her spell. Below, Miss Bergner and Joyce Bland attend a concert at Queen's Hall.
"CRACK-UP" has to do with the building of "The Wild Goose," which is to pioneer commercial passenger service between America and Europe. Every one, it seems, is out to steal the plans of the giant airship, including Peter Lorre, below, who is not as harmless as he looks. With him is Brian Donlevy, ace pilot of the ship. Thomas Beck, assistant pilot, is shown with them, above. Left, with his sweetheart, Helen Wood.
BOBBY BREEN makes his second starring appearance in “Rainbow on the River.” Pangs of impending separation grip the heart of Louise Beavers, right, when she is induced by Henry O’Neill, parish priest, to relinquish her claim to Bobby in favor of an aristocratic old lady represented by Alan Mowbray. Below, the youngster gives Charles Butterworth an impromptu banjo lesson. Marilyn Knowlden is the little girl.
DEserting her lover at the altar, Lily Pons, in "The Girl from Paris," flees to America by hiding aboard the same boat that is carrying Gene Raymond and members of his band. Their calm routine is disturbed in trying to conceal her from the immigration authorities. The boys in the orchestra as shown with Miss Pons, left, are Frank Jenks, Jack Oakie, Mischa Auer, and Mr. Raymond, who is least impervious to her charms. See how happy they are in the picture below.

DUST STORMS
ON PROBATION

Margot Grahame and Gordon Jones as they appear in "Night Waitress." It is a rough class that the former must serve at Toree's Fish Palace along the San Francisco waterfront, so when she is accosted by this handsome captain of a small schooner moored near by, she discourages his advances. But when the two become involved with crooks and the police over a secret cargo of gold, excitement reigns and bullets fly.
THE ORIGIN OF STAR NAMES

CAROL LOMBARD means a strong money-lender. Coral is short for Caroline, which is feminine for Charles, and comes from the German Karl, meaning strong. Lombard was originally the name of a Teutonic tribe that lived on the River Elbe. From Elbe, this tribe moved to the Danube, and later to the River Po in Italy. There the Lombards became pawnbrokers and bankers whose influence spread all over the world, and their tribal name became synonymous for a money-lender. Lombard Street in London was named for the ancient money-lenders who settled there.

ANDY DEVINE means a manly fortune-teller, or soothsayer. Andy is a nickname for Andrew, which comes from the Greek root signifying mony. Devine is old French. In comparatively recent times it has come to mean a clergyman, but in earlier days it designated a clairvoyant, or one gifted with second sight and the ability to read the future.

ALICE FAYE means the truthful fairy. Alice comes to us from the Latin. Its original meaning was truth, or truthful. Faye is old French, with the accent over the “e” removed, and originally meant fairy. An interesting variation of this surname is found in the name Lafayette.

BOBBY BREEN is a name completely synonymous with that of the famous poet, Robert Burns. Bobby, of course, stands for Robert, and Breen is a variation of Burs. The name means a bright and famous brook, and when we consider the rippling lines of the poet and the rippling tones of the young singer, we find it appropriate in both cases. Bobby, or Robert, is old high German for bright and famous. Breen, or Burns, is Scotch for a stream or brook.

LILY PONS symbolizes a French bridge, and she is indeed a wonderful bridge of good will between France and all other nations. Lily means the flower of that name, but the flower of that name, known as the fleur-de-lis, has always represented France, so much so that the French people were once called Liliants, and their kingdom Lilium. Pons is French for bridge, and both names originally derive from the Latin.

BILLY BURKE means a resolute head that is warmed by fondling, but it also contains the idea of a fanner and a lively assertive person. Billie is feminine for Bill, which is short for William, and William is German for a resolute head. Burke has three possible origins. In English dialect it means warm by fondling, derived from the Scandinavian it suggests a barker or fanner, and in Scotch it implies a lively, assertive person who talks spiritedly.

ROCHELLE HUDSON suggests one who is a little rock of protection. Rochelle is French for little rock, and reminds us that cities in New York and Arkansas can have the same name and yet write them differently. Hudson is Dutch for a child of protection. The syllable Hud is variously represented in our words, hood, hot, hut and hide, but the basic idea is that of some sort of protection.

IT is a little doubtful whether Ralph Bellamy stands for a fine and friendly raven or a fine and friendly famous wolf. Some authorities claim that Ralph is a contraction of Rudolph, which in old high German meant a famous wolf. But in local English the word Ralph, spelled just as it is and frequently capitalized, means the raven. Bellamy, of course, is French for fine and friendly.

BILLIE BURKE means a resolute head that is warmed by fondling, but it also contains the idea of a fanner and a lively assertive person. Billie is feminine for Bill, which is short for William, and William is German for a resolute head. Burke has three possible origins. In English dialect it means warm by fondling, derived from the Scandinavian it suggests a barker or fanner, and in Scotch it implies a lively, assertive person who talks spiritedly.

GARY COOPER means the worklike barrel-maker. Gary comes from old French and old high German, where it originally meant to make war and to be strong with the spear. Cooper is Dutch for one who makes and repairs barrels. Its basic idea is to bind with hoops.

MERLE OBERON means a blackbird belonging to the king of the fairies. Merle is French from the Latin “merula,” the name of the European blackbird. Oberon dates back to ancient German, and in medieval mythology was the king of the fairies, the husband of Titania, made famous in Shakespeare’s “A Midsummer Night’s Dream.”

WARREN WILLIAM means the careful protection of a determined head. Warren is old Saxon for to be careful, and is akin to our word wary. At the same time it is related to an old high German word meaning to defend and protect. William is also German and means a determined or resolute head.

LEO CARRILLO means a cheeky lion. Leo is Latin for lion. Carrillo is Spanish for cheeky. It is true that in Spanish Carrillo also means a sort of wagon, but it is far more likely that some ancient Spaniard was named for his cheekiness than for a vehicle.

"He was the most romantic man I've ever met, before or since," says the ex-Mrs. March of Fredric. "He was sweet and enthusiastic, and so terribly in earnest about becoming a really good actor."
husband—FREDRIC MARCH

They'd been married in Toledo, where he was a member of Mobel Brownell's stock company, and she was visiting friends. He, unsophisticated, shy, impressionable, rather looked up to Ellis, for she was already making a name for herself in stock; her uncle was Edward Ellis, the famous character actor; her mother had written such hits as "Mary Jane's Pa" and "Seven Sisters." But those were not the sole reasons the young man was so impressed. There was another—more potent.

Ellis Baker received a daily special delivery letter from John Barrymore, then in Atlantic City. Some days even a telephone call, and lots and lots of telegrams. She'd met the actor that to-day's newspapers dub "Caliban" while she was playing in Atlantic City, and when he invited her somewhere, the other members of the company stopped her from going, although they nearly had to use sheer force. However—— "That must have piqued his interest, I guess," Ellis hazarded, "because after that he wouldn't take 'no' for an answer, and just bombarded me with letters and telegrams. But you know, that gave me a sort of Barrymore fixation," I guess you might call it—because when I met Freddie later in Toledo I first fell for him because he looked like a young edition of Barrymore.

"And, of course, he was sweet and enthusiastic and terribly romantic—oh, there could only have been one answer! And Fred was so terribly earnest about becoming a really good actor. Not just an actor, or even just a very highly paid actor—but a good actor."

Ellis—and, of course, Ellis's mother—were invaluable mentors to a young man with such lofty ambitions. They advised him to go on playing stock until he had mastered sufficient theater technique. Their work naturally caused Ellis and Fred to endure long separations—but he made even absences seem pleasant. Every day the girl received a long letter. When she went abroad he arranged for her to receive a letter and some little present every day. She remembers——

"He was the most romantic man I've ever met, before or since!"

The engagement dragged for two years before they were married in Milwaukee. Ellis was playing Chicago in "The Show-off." All thoughts of self became secondary, though, after her marriage. She lived only for Fred's career.

"That was easy—he was so very teachable," she explained to me. "He had the most extraordinary quality

Ellis Baker, the first Mrs. March, comes from a famous theatrical family. But she made the mistake of minimizing the importance of Fredric's early success on the stage, and gave him an inferiority complex.

Mr. March, seen with his present wife, Florence Eldridge, found in her an invaluable aid in restoring his self-confidence when they were playing in the same company. She praised him!
EN years ago, listed by New York artists as "too round-faced" to portray sophistication. To-day, the film's Number One Brunet Interpreter of Urbane Ladies. Sometimes Kay Francis must give a howl of glee, oil to herself, at the way things were shaped by her destiny.

The story of Kay's slim wardrobe—two street dresses, two evening dresses—has been told every time she has been persuaded to talk about herself. Which is not often. Occasionally, however, Kay's advice on how to get along with a limited number of costumes creeps into print. She, herself, did it once, she tells. But the lively days surrounding those few, smart Patou frocks she seldom mentions.

The fact that Kay Francis cares little about retelling the story of her early New York triumphs probably means two things. One, that she is not vain. Two, that she doesn't think it worth the breath it takes to recreate them. In this she becomes a feminine paragon. Few women could resist boasting that they were once "the bell of New York." It would creep out in conversation. Not in Kay's.

In the winter of 1925-26 a new beauty appeared on the horizon of New York's artistic world. You are right. It was Kay Francis. Smartly dressed, with tremendous poise, she immediately took the art world by storm. Inasmuch as the art world in Manhattan is closely allied to the world of letters, music, theater, Kay soon became the toast of the entire colony. You can accept this as truth, because it was told by her long-time friend and apartment-sharer, Lois Lang, the redoubtable "Lipstick" of "The New Yorker." More about her later.

Kay was nineteen or twenty then. She looked older because she was tall, dark, poised. Actually, she was as noive as the young Western girl she was. Kay was born in Oklahoma City; schooled in New York, Massachusetts, and New Jersey. She was the owner of a Paris divorce, true enough, from Dwight Francis, and she had enjoyed a gorgeous time in Paris getting it. She had barged all around the ancient city, doing what the elite were supposed to do. But for all that, Kay was still only an overgrown girl who happened to look like a worldly-wise woman.

When Kay docked at a Manhattan pier ten years ago she knew that she would have to make some strenuous gestures about assembling a career for herself. She had no definite ideas about the theater. If it presented itself, all right. She was an adequate secretary; that she knew. She could always find work in that field. The biggest thing to her was that life held a lot of laughs, and she was going to see that she got her quota. If Kay has more than her portion of beauty, she also is generously endowed with humor.

In no time at all, Kay was sharing an apartment with a girl named Virginia. Virginia Chambers, it is now. It wasn't much of an apartment. A walk-up. The bedroom the girls shared was so tiny that they had to hustle the bedstead ends to climb into the twin beds that stood side by side with a foot or so separating them.

To see her descend the walk-up steps on her way to a smart restaurant for lunch—popular girls like Virginia and Kay seldom had to worry about cooking their own meals—any one would think that she had stepped from her boudoir, attended by two maids and a butler. A little beige number by Patou did the trick. It was trimmed with lynx, and a smart hat, the right gloves, shoes, handbag, went with it. Or if it wasn't the beige ensemble, there was also a black, lynx-trimmed Patou frack.

For two years, without another purchase, Kay wore the beige and the black costumes from one smart party to another, and she got away with it. Of course you have noticed Kay's flair for wearing clothes. That was the answer. Also Kay's nonchalance. If she had worn the same garments, time and again, with an apologetic manner, undoubtedly her admirers would have grown tired of Monsieur Patou's ingenious cuttings and stitchings.

Ten years ago Kay, noted to-day for her perfect portrayal of urbane sophistication on the screen, was considered impossible as a model. Her round, firm cheeks, her forthright look and direct gaze didn't qualify her to pose for sophisticated advertisements.
Instead, Kay wore them with supreme indifference. She didn't care that they were all she had for street wear. She knew that they were the finest any one could buy; they were becoming; she liked them. It was the same way with her black lace evening dress, and her other one of black crépe. With only four complete costume changes, Kay became the toast of the town. A lot of debs don't do as well on the entire season's output as their favourite couturier.

With that “tawny skin, those sea-green eyes, jet-black hair”—these are Lais Long's descriptive adjectives—Kay was in constant demand as an artist's model. But nothing ever came of Kay's posing. For all the rich coloring and warmth of her beauty, when the artists commenced to get Kay's likeness down on canvas, they were startled to discover that painting Kay was like reproducing a forest fire on their canvases. She was too colorful, too flamboyant. Kay's modeling days were short-lived.

"All right," reasoned Lois, who by this time was one of Kay's and Virginia's cronies, "if you're not good in all, you'll be marvelous for the camera." At that time Lois was editorially employed on "Vogue," the fashion magazine. She did all the string-pulling she could to get Kay to the attention of the advertising photographers. They were as enthusiastic as was Lois about Kay's distinctive style and beauty. Entranced, they looked again—and shook their heads.

Kay, they declared, with her round firm cheeks, her far-thright look, her direct gaze, was not the sophisticated type. Na, the sophisticated type, in predepression days had high cheek bones that showed above caved-in cheeks. Funny, the set ideals of the ideal-setters. Anyway, Kay didn't get the job. Lois and Virginia and Kay thought it was a good laugh. Everything was a good laugh to the trio.

Kay's first theatrical jab came shortly after this. Basil Sidney was about to introduce an innovation to bisé Broadway. He was to present "Hamlet" in modern dress, discarding the ancient trappings. Kay got the part of the "Player Queen." She received thirty-five dollars a week. And spent thirty-seven fifty. Just as thrill and simplicity mark Kay's life to-day, ten years ago she was forever splurging her newly earned money.

Lois, earning fifty a week, and thinking she was practically plutocratic, met Kay the night of the annual Beau-Arts Ball. Wrack her memory, she can't think what the costume motif was for that year, but she knew that one or

TO Gladys Swarthout falls the honor of being Adolph Zukor's Silver Jubilee star in "Champagne Waltz," with Fred MacMurray. The picture will commemorate Mr. Zukor's twenty-fifth year as a pioneer leader in every phase of motion pictures, including introduction of many stars past and present.
A young lady we know experienced the double thrill of being rescued from a predicament by Clark Gable, and of being mistaken by him for Carol Lombard, all on the same afternoon. Stranded on the roadside by motor trouble, the attractive blond girl was just about to go for help when Clark drove up. First he apologized for mistaking her for Carol, and then pushed her ailing car down the street a few blocks to a garage. Prior to that adventure, the young lady’s favorite actor was Clark Gable. He’s still her favorite actor.

What’s the matter, Mike?” queried Shirley Temple, looking both puzzled and anxious. “Are you scared of something?”

Mike was embarrassed. He couldn’t very well explain to Shirley that years of being a studio yes-man had given him the habit of approaching stars, even seven-year-old stars, with a serflike air of frightened humility.

This is how Mae West holds a grudge. Once a certain reporter wrote something about her that she didn’t like. She called him and his publication to task. For a long time after that, relations between the two were decidedly cool. Then the reporter hit a run of hard luck. The star heard that he was down and out. Did Mae glaat? On the contrary; she found a roundabout way of caring for him and his family until he was on his feet again.

If a pal of yours went to Hollywood and found fame and fortune, would he give you a warm welcome there and urge you to stay? In the vast majority of instances, the answer is no.
Ginger Rogers, for example, is not an unfriendly star. Yet she recently turned a cold shoulder on a young man who had tramped with her in small-time Texas shows. The lad was astonished at the sort of reception given him, but studio friends soon explained that one who has known a star "when" is often an unpleasant reminder of less rosy days.

It must be more than coincidence that we keep catching one of the screen's foremost glamour girls wearing funny headgear. Probably Kay Francis simply doesn't care what sits atop her raven locks, except when she is before the cameras.

The other day in her garden, it was a wilted cloth contraption. At a sports event it was a newspaper fastened on like an old-fashioned sunbonnet. Funniest of all, however, was the rubber ice-bag she wore nonchalantly one hot day on a crowded set.

GENIUS may be granted special privileges by adults, but children have less patience with it. The other day we saw a ten-year-old boy ask Charlie Chaplin for an autograph. Charlie, who stopped giving autographs a good many years ago, merely shook his head. The youngster stared quizzically.

"Yuh never give autographs, da yuh?" he asked.

With a flicker at amusement Chaplin said, "No."

"What's the matter?" asked the inquisitor, scornfully. "Can't yuh write?"

THE mother of your favorite child star is becoming amazingly mercenary, according to the latest inside tale. She was discussing the fate of some hundred and fifty dresses given her illustrious daughter by commercial firms. "Why not give them to an orphanage?" someone suggested.

"The kids need clothes, and would be particularly thrilled at wearing those." The mater's retort was, "I should say not! I'm going to sell them."

THE old order changes everywhere, even in Hollywood. Until recently no one would have dreamed of sending regrets to Marion Davies. An invitation from her carried all the weight of a royal command. But now there are even mere ingenues who are sorry to be so busy when Marion's secretary calls.
ALL that's required to make you a fashionable fad-setter in Hollywood is a good photographer to snap you in the act. Carole Lombard displays admirable bowling technique in certain poses now current. But the bowling alley where these shots were taken a whole year ago has never seen the fair "enthusiast" since she blew in for the fetching views of herself and her new hobby.

YOU can't hope to reach George Brent between pictures except by leaving a message for him at Ralph Bellamy's Racquet Club at Palm Springs. It seems that there is no telephone in the house George is renting some twenty miles from the popular oasis. He dashes to the desert to keep his physique in perfect trim, and doesn't want many callers. Of course, he always has the polite alibi that he didn't receive your dispatch.

THAT health cafeteria next to the Hollywood Pantages Theater is attracting all the town's diet-conscious folks. Francis Lederer began the vague. Robert Cummings won't touch a bite of lunch at any other spot! And so you can take your tray and select what's good for you with the best of them.

THERE was a concerted twitter when the great Garbo made her appearance at Virginia Faulkner's party. But one wondered, later, whether her presence was so much an addition, after all.

One guest, when presented to her, burbled, "I met your mother in Sweden last summer and we had such a delightful chat!" Garbo surveyed her with cold distaste and then remarked, slowly, "I don't think that's very nice of you!"

Later a distinguished writer remarked, smiling, "I'm going to have such fun, telling every one that I've met you!" To which Garbo returned, "I hope you will explain that it was an accident."

How would you like to have Garbo at your party?

WHICH brings us, logically enough, to Pat O'Brien. A guest on the "San Quentin" set asked Pat whether visitors annoyed him... or whether he preferred closed sets.

"Gosh, no!" Pat replied to both questions, "I'm an actor I hope!
An actor needs—should have an audience. If he can't work with people around, then he's no actor. The more people, the better performances, say I. Did you ever try to play to an empty house?

THINGS are reaching a point at which timid souls hesitate to venture farth in Hollywood after dark and not for fear of bandits but far fear of jilted actors. Almost every actor in Hollywood travels about either with an armed guard or with a gun of his own.

Karen Morley is the one who has really persuaded me that we'd better stay at home evenings. Karen has had a gun fastened to the top of her car so that if any one says "Hands up!" and she complies, there will be her trigger finger right on the dangerous gadget. But what if Karen merely pulls up alongside of you at a boulevard stop and feels like stretching her arms after a long, hard day's work? How do we know what's going to happen to her finger?

RICHARD ARLEN was recently made a member of the locomotive engineers' union and the brakemen's union in Canada. This was because he had to learn to run a locomotive and handle brakes for his British picture, "The Great Barrier." Painstaking research has revealed that Dick is a member of the truck drivers' union in St. Paul, Minnesota, of the steamfitters' union in Toledo, Ohio, the electricians' union in Kansas City, Missouri, and the automotive mechanics' union in Indianapolis, Indiana. What's more, he has learned these trades and worked at them in all the aforementioned cities.

What we want to know now is, if Dick becomes discontented with things as they are and decides not to work for a while, does that constitute a general strike?

BRIAN DONLEVY was a trifle disconcerted a day or so ago when two very young gentlemen popped from behind a hedge, as he left his home, and chorused, "We want you!"

"Indeed? What...what?" queried Donlevy.

It was explained that the youths had been sent to interview a star for their high-school paper.

Donlevy, amused, invited them into the house. Once within those

A SEDATE old gentleman sits in his rocking chair on the front porch of one of the many homes along Kinnickinnic Avenue in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. Suddenly a big missile whizzes past his head and glass spatters at his feet. He rises with alacrity to stare at the gaping hole in the front window.

Neighborhood kids, playing in the alley near by, vanish like magic. The doorbell at the Tracy home a half block away is soon buzzing ominously. A cheery "Hello" and "Won't you come in?" from Mrs. Tracy.

"Where's Spence?" the old man asks, getting right to the point.

Mrs. Tracy sighs.

"Oh, Spence," she calls. "Some one here to see you."

"Young fellow," the old man accuses, "that front window you broke in my house will cost you two dollars."

Like a white curtain drawn over his features, innocence floods the face of Spence. His mother intercedes.

"When was it broken?" she asks.

"Just a minute ago," replies the old man, keeping the eye of guilt fixed on the bland face and wide eyes looking up at him from behind the mother.

"It couldn't have been Spence," she says. "He's been right here in the kitchen helping me for the past hour."

The word of Mrs. Tracy is as good as gold. So the old man, with an "I'll get you next time" glint in his eyes, hobbles away to seek new clews.

Thus did Spencer Tracy, the tough guy of many pictures, earn an early reputation for these roles as a youngster in Milwaukee. "The scamp," "the tough kid," the neighbors called him, but down in their hearts they knew he was only giving vent to his bubbling energy. They take you back over memory's lanes as they allow you to browse through dusty picture albums. "That's him," they say, stopping you at intervals as you turn the pages.
Spence often embarrassed his mother. At least on Sunday afternoons, when everyone was all dressed up and she would discover him with one pants leg up, the other down, and a hole as big as a dollar in his stockings.

And Mr. Tracy had his troubles with his young son, particularly on a Saturday night.

No doubt Spence inherited some of his father's wit, for we learn that he was a charming Irishman who always had a fund of funny stories to tell.

One figure always stands out from the group. It is Spence, posing in some ridiculous position and cutting up before the camera.

Delving deeper into the memories of these friends and neighbors who are still living on Kinnikinnic Avenue where Spencer shot his marbles, we unearth some amazing facts not intended for the publicity department.

He seldom wiped his nose. He wasn't as good-looking as his brother, Carroll.

He often embarrassed his mother. At least on Sunday afternoons, in the days of nickel movies and dust-catcher skirts, his mother holding her lace parasol, would remark to her friend, Mrs. Fountain: "Oh, dear, I hope we don't run into Spence."

And like as not they would see him rounding a corner at full speed, one pants leg up, the other down, and a hole as big as a dollar in his Sunday stockings.

Mrs. Tracy would shake her head, sigh and laugh. She wasn't one to hamper her boys. She chose to let them grow up as they pleased.

Mrs. Tracy, the neighbors recount, was beautiful, loving, and patient. She came from an Illinois family, and her clothes and her house always reflected the modern note of the times.

As for Mr. Tracy, he was, they say, a charming Irishman with such a fund of funny stories that all the wives at the card club would stop their game of five hundred to chuckle over his wit. Mr. Tracy had his troubles with Spence, particularly on a Saturday night. The neighbors grin as they tell you about it.

"On Saturday night Spence's voice could be heard all over the neigh-

Arriving in New York, Eleanor Powell went into a complicated tap routine on the station platform, to the delight of commuters and waiting fans.

While Lily Pons glories over her approaching marriage, the coming opera and concert season, she lets others do the worrying over a blackmail plot against her.

BY KAREN HOLLIS

HOLLYWOOD VISITORS SURGING INTO TOWN FIND LESLIE HOWARD DOMINATING BROADWAY.

Ten days in New York are practically guaranteed to shatter the nerves of any star, but still they come back periodically. All except Jean Harlow, the slacker, who just won’t face being photographed and interviewed all day, and fighting her way through clamorous crowds all night.

Eleanor Powell is here, and so are Lily Pons; Ruth Chatterton, Margaret Grahame, Kay Francis, Jane Wyatt, Sylvia Sidney, the Universal starlets, Deanna Durbin and Judith Barrett, and a splendid cargo of good-will ambassadors from the British studios—Anna Neagle and Tamara Desni.

The Talk of the Town. — Even with all those glamour girls lending a decorative note to first nights and dining haunts, the main topic of conversation these days is Leslie Howard.

Just as Hollywood producers decided that the public does not want Shakespeare, Mr. Howard yielded to the temptation that besets all good actors and played “Hamlet” on the stage.

Newspaper reviewers were venomous, but the paying public flocked to his support adoringly. Caustic critics accuse him belligerently of confusing the rôle of “Hamlet” with everything from “Romeo” to “Peter Pan.”
Certainly he endows the role with more poetry, more reserve, and more charm than has ever been associated with it before. But the public loves him, and nightly a cordon of police have to escort him from the theater through the ranks of fans.

Stars Congregate.—All the visiting celebrities who are not present in Leslie Howard's audience of an evening are pretty sure to be found right next door, where Margaret Sullivan is playing in "Stage Door."

In this play the little Sullivan comes into her own as one of the most deft and ingratiating players on the stage to-day. And when she delivers caustic lines about the mechanics of making pictures in contrast to the art of the theater, all the ex-stage stars applaud vehemently and the girls who are studio-trained gasp in amazement.

The more violently Miss Sullivan protests that she hates pictures and will have none of them, the more determined picture producers are to get her under contract.

Romance Rampant.—Simultaneous announcement that Mary Pickford would marry Buddy Rogers, that Margaret Sullivan had married Leland Hayward—long rumored falsely to be Katharine Hepburn's husband—and that Lily Pons would marry her favorite orchestra conductor, Andre Kostelanetz, caused an acute shortage of telegraph blanks in the bar at "21." Inspiration failing, the mad wags just wired in triplicate, "I won't give the bride away."

Free Sample.—The crown of good sportsmanship for this month—and probably this decade—goes to Eleanor Powell. Arriving in New York for a vacation, she was met by Metro-Goldwyn publicity men who thoughtfully brought along a bamboo mat and a little red piano.

Right there on the station platform, Eleanor went into a complicated tap routine. Commuters paused, red cops hovered around, and fans waiting in the station broke through the ropes.

OLIVIA DE HAVILLAND UPSETS SO MANY CONVENTIONS—IN A NICE WAY, OF COURSE—THAT SHE STANDS OUT FROM ALL THE STARS WHO VISIT NEW YORK. AND EVEN HER START IN PICTURES WAS MIRACULOUS, TOO.

OF COURSE, IT ISN'T SURPRISING THAT SUCH A PARAGON AS MISS DE HAVILLAND IS INTERESTED IN HER FAN MAIL. SHE LIKES TO BE INTERVIEWED, TOO; LIKES TO BE PHOTOGRAPHED, LIKES TO BE FRIENDS WITH EVERYBODY, AND LOVES BEING IN PICTURES.

WHEN A STAR REPEATEDLY TURNS THE CONVERSATIONAL SPOTLIGHT UPON SOMEONE ELSE, THAT'S NEWS. FOR IT IS ONE OF THE PHENOMENA OF HOLLYWOOD THAT ONCE A PREVIOUSLY NORMAL PERSON JOINS THE ENCHANTED RANKS OF THE FILM GREAT OR NEAR-GREAT, ALL SPOTLIGHTS—CONVERSATIONAL AND OTHERWISE—MUST BE TRAINED UPON THAT INDIVIDUAL, ELSE BOREDOM AND RESTLESSNESS REAR THEIR UGLY BUT NEVERTHELESS OBVIOUS HEADS.

AND THE RESULT OF FAILURE TO OBSERVE THIS LITTLE NICETY IS AN INCREASING NUMBER OF IMPATIENT GLANCES AT THE NEAREST EXIT, FOLLOWED BY A GATHERING-UP OF CELEBRATED WRAPS AND A HASTY DEPARTURE.

THEREFORE, WHEN I SAY THAT OLIVIA DE HAVILLAND NOT ONCE, BUT AS A GENERAL RULE, TURNS THE CONVERSATIONAL SPOTLIGHT UPON OTHERS, YOU'LL BEGIN TO UNDERSTAND SOMETHING OF THE LACK OF EGOISM AND THE COMPLETELY SINCERE UNSELF-CONSCIOUSNESS OF THAT YOUNG WOMAN.

A LITTLE THING IN ITSELF, HER REFUSAL TO MONOPOLIZE THE ATTENTION OF ALL AROUND HER IS SIGNIFICANT OF HER REAL INTEREST IN LIFE AND PEOPLE, HER SANE PERSPECTIVE, AND HER AWARENESS OF THE RELATION OF ANY ONE INDIVIDUAL TOWARD SOCIETY.

IN FACT, THE LITTLE DE HAVILLAND IS PERHAPS THE MOST NATURAL, NORMAL AND WHOLLY DELIGHTFUL PERSON EVER TO COME OUT OF THE WEST TO CAPTIVATE ALL WHO MET HER IN THE EAST.

YOUNG AND FRESH, AND ENJOYING THE DOUBLE THRILL OF NEWLY-ATTAINED STARDOM AND A FIRST VISIT TO NEW YORK (HER INITIAL GLIMPSE OF BROADWAY WAS MADE MORE THAN NORMALLY EXCITING BY SIGHT OF THE MAMMOTH ELECTRIC SIGN BLAZONING...
Nothing Short of a Miracle

"Errol Flynn and Olivia De Havilland in "The Charge of the Light Brigade"), she has the poise of breeding rather than that of sophistication, the composure of a well-educated, well-stocked mind rather than familiarity with night clubs and night life, as affected by so many young actresses.

Actually caring little for the bright lights, she enjoyed her evening excursions to the famous nightspots less than any of her experiences in New York. She loves the theater, of course, and went as many places as she could crawl into her schedule, but one of her pleasantest hours was that in which she slipped away from attendant press agents, interviewers and autograph hunters and walked around the reservoir in Central Park-alone.

Even her play-going differed from that of most visiting celebrities, for instead of following the usual formula of glittering raiment and a premiere or nothing, Olivia wore simple street clothes and chose plays she really wished to see, regardless of whether it was a first night or month of the play’s run. Imagine a civilized person!

"I'm afraid I'm not a very civilized person," explained with a note of regret.

"I don't seem to value the things a girl is supposed to value—clothes, parties and long walks I'd rather put on slacks and a sweater and walk in the country with one of Hollywood star-spangled nights.

"Of course my aversion to the screen is due to the type of my screen roles. I've been in costume all my life and I've had more fun than my share of playing outfits during the day and after dragging my skirts from pounds from the morning through the night, just to have something to lounge in that is comfortable.

Not that I'm bony; it's just that I'm myself. I'm a person on my own, not someone for which she'd get Errol Flynn.

Olivia is an actress of the screen, with walnut hair instead of light golden brown, pearly lips, and a complexion that has always been marred by intensive make-up—this land in that that young man will probably refuse to believe this statement.

"It's fun working with Errol," she explained. "He has so much humor and charm and vitality, and he really is all of those things that a hero is supposed to be—and so seldom is. He can ride and swim and play tennis and sail, he can fence and fight—and he's a good actor, too. Besides, I'm always sure that any picture Errol's in will be a success," she concluded naively.

But she modestly refuses to admit that her presence, as well as that of Mr. Flynn, in "Captain Blood" and "The Charge of the Light Brigade," may have had a great deal to do with the success of those films. She takes her career, but not herself, seriously, and has not yet reached a place where she can consider her presence in a picture as other than a miracle.

She emerged a little, far instance, in the days of "Morning Glory," and then disappeared until the time of "Little Women." Again she was accessible at about that juncture when "Alice Adams" had proved itself a joyous event.

So Katie apparently has phases just like the moon or the planet Venus, or some of the other heavenly bodies. Well, it's quite a poetic way of working out a career, anyway, even though the idea may not be a wholly popular one with the scribes and the publicity departments.

"Inside" on the sudden marriage of Leland Hayward, who was accepted as Katie's fiancé, to Margaret Sullivan is that he and Miss Hepburn had broken up some time ago, due to temperamental differences.

First, Joe Schenck, the producer, brought her one from England, and then the little lass went out to the county fair, near Los Angeles, and was presented with what was termed the "best pony in America" by the head of some famous stables.

The new horselet is quite on acquisition, since he is five-gaited, and a hackney, which means that he can be ridden as well as driven. The animal was tendered Shirley on the spur of the moment—and we're not kidding about "spur"—because the stable owner fell for the little star hook, line and sinker. So Shirley's appeal is suddenly working with a vengeance in private life, and evidently one pony leads right to another.

Million-to-one Shot.—It only happens once in a million times, they say; so it's worth chronicling. Boris Karloff and Jean Hersholt exchanged cars on leaving the Screen Actors' Guild one night, and were absolutely unaware of the trade.

Karloff drove home in Jean's automobile, and Jean took Karloff's. The amount of gas in their tanks was approximately the same; the mileage was about identical, and their individual keys fitted both cars. Neither was aware of the mistake he made until the following morning, when Alan Hersholt, Jean's son, discovered a robe in "To Her That Hath—"—Shirley Temple's having a grand time acquiring ponies. She's probably going to get enough to run a stock farm before she's through.

Ernestine Schumann-Heink, admired as a singer and beloved as a woman by the whole world, died November 17th without getting the chance in films that she craved.

Fernand Gravet, French cinema actor known in Europe as Fernand Graavey, will appear opposite Joan Blondell in "The King and the Chorus Girl." He's charming.

On the opposite page Gene Raymond and Jeanette MacDonald are all smiles as they announce their marriage for June 17, 1937, making a record for the longest engagement with a fixed wedding date.

Right, Mary Pickford and Buddy Rogers duet their happiness in formally announcing their oft-rumored engagement.
WE LOVE

TEN-YEAR-OLD MISS WITHERS IS EVERYBODY'S FAVORITE. ALTHOUGH HER STORY HAS BEEN TOLD MANY TIMES THIS ONE GIVES A MORE INTIMATE CLOSE-UP OF THE CHILD STAR AND HER MOTHER.

Two months later Mrs. Withers cradled in her arms a girl-morsel—a child who from the beginning was dedicated to the theater and to fame. Ten years almost to the day the name "Jane Withers" is part of the vocabulary of the world. Her lusty, wholesome personality, her vitality and her unmistakable near genius have made for her a quick and secure place in the admiration and the affection of millions.

Jane's charm is not a fragile charm, but the charm of reality, of vividness, with a dawn-to-earth, simple quality. She is a healthy, slightly raptund little girl. Sweet, well-bred, and gentle and considerate. And wholly natural.

In my day I have met any number of screen darlings. A good percentage of them have made my palm itch with a desire to spark. But this Jane—now there's a real kid! Make no mistake—she knows she's a star. She knows she's a good trupper. Jane is far too intellent not to understand these things. But at the same time it hasn't impaired or influenced her department. She'll run errands—whether it's a five-dollar-a-week allowance. "And, sometimes I'm awfully poor by the end of the week, 'Cause mom makes me put most of it in the bank."

Jane's gang consists of the neighborhood youngsters—and it's give and take, with no servitude to fame from the alters.

Jane's normalcy may be by the grace of God, or by the grace of the carefully casual training of her mather. Far if Ruth Withers asked the lates for a talented child, it is of her own doing that with talent there is a graciousness, a sweetness, a superior understanding few children at ten possess.

On the afternoon I went to see Jane to renew an acquaintanceship begun during a scene when she was peting Irvin S. Cobb with over-ripe tomatoes for a scene in "Pepper," it was a blistering hot day. The Withers live in a house perched on a hill, and only the sound of wind and the ambitious al soul climb the nearly hundred steep steps to their front door.

Even before Jane Withers was born, her mother determined that her name should be in lights above the theaters some day. She even chose the name for its shortness.

SOME day," remarked Ruth Withers to the friend at her side. "my daughter's name will be up there."

She pointed to the blazing theater marquee which was heralding a star name, and in the expectant mather's eyes there was nothing but glowing assurance.

"I have her name picked out. Jane! A simple name to remember. Jane Withers—aneasy name far the lights to spell," she mused half to herself.

CALAMITY JANE

A berry-brown Jane in an abbreviated sun suit reached a sturdy hand for the last few steps. "That's a terrible climb," she said with concern. "But I'm glad you came. Too bad you didn't come earlier. I had the garden hose going, and I got nice and wet and cool."

No set greeting, certainly, to impress an interviewer. It wore him out just to watch her. Now in the picture, there was plenty of action—all the way from sliding down the chute-the-chutes countless times for the camera, to leading kid gangs in raids. But Jane wasn't satisfied. The moment the camera stopped grinding she was pedaling.

BY SONIA LEE

It took Jane Withers two years to get a break in Hollywood. Now she receives a thousand dollars a week. Here she is in a scene from her latest film, "The Holy Terror."

For all of Jane's energy and high spirits, she is docile and obedient when the time comes for her to study her next day's lines with Mrs. Withers. Jane knows she's a star and a good trouper. She is too intelligent not to understand these things.

Jane genuinely likes people. She seeks out ways to serve, to entertain, to make happy every one who comes near her. She will do her famous imitations, play the piano, explaining as she does, "Please don't expect too much. I love to play, even if it's mostly with one finger."

Danky, her fox terrier, enters the arena with Jane and goes through his bag of tricks according to her whispered instructions. Danky, Jane will inform you, is a most remarkable dog. He understands every word she says to him—"But, of course, sometimes he gets jealous when I pay too much attention to my dolls. But I've got almost two hundred of them—and they do take up a lot of time, what with making clothes for 'em and seeing they get their proper sleep."

Jane's energy is boundless. "Dynamite. "Quicksilver" might be attached as handles to Jane. They'd be apt. I've seen her on the set wearing every one down with her ambitious activities. As a matter of fact, before Mr. Cobb left on his vacation after the completion of "Pepper," he said—"I've got to take a rest from that energetic Withers child."
CONCLUDING THE EVENTS THAT TOOK A HALF-GROWN GIRL OUT OF OBSCURITY AND LIFTED HER TO A PLACE AMONG THE IMPORTANT WOMEN OF THE SCREEN.

PART III

She walks in beauty! Those words might have been a paean to Loretta Young. For her floating grace is a joy to behold. Despite her delicate appearance, she has endurance. The long hours on the sets do not tire her; largely because she is so intensely interested in every detail of the work. Each morning she is as fresh as a dewy rose.

Many glasses of milk have increased her weight from ninety-eight to a hundred and seven pounds. Slim and willowy, she seems taller than her five feet three inches.

Her energy is a quiet, steady flame. Always she is tranquil; sometimes rather wistful. She never rushes about, but is doing something every moment.

She loves to dance and, since she recovered from her illness, has resumed the sports in which she most delights, swimming and riding. Invitations to yachting parties are a thrill. Sunbathing is a favored recreation, accompanied by her complaint that she cannot acquire more than a mild tan.

"I want to get as brown as Polly Ann did when she visited Africa three years ago," Loretta smiled. "Yes, I still copy-cat my sisters! They have much prettier legs. Though, I guess," she sighed, "I can't ever do anything about my legs."

Her strange complex, that her limbs are too thin and not well shaped, amuses the cameramen, who insist that her svelte grace is a joy to photograph.

The idol of her little half sister, Georgianna Belzer, who is almost twelve, Loretta Young expresses much of her maternal spirit in doing things for the child.
‘I eat and eat, but gain little weight,’ she remarked one day over a hearty lunch. Though her appetite seems enormous, hers preference is for dainty, creamy dishes, subtly flavored.
Meat loaf is the only very substantial fare that she likes.

‘Aversions? No, really violent ones. Mamma cured us of disliking certain foods when we were children. She would wait until we were hungry, and then give us small portions.
As it tasted good on empty tummies, we came to like it.

‘I admit that I am a gourmets, with a particular fondness for steamed clams. One evening in Paris’—Loretta’s blue eyes twinkled—‘mamma and I dined at Prunier’s. Our hosts were three young Frenchmen.

‘Mamma and I each ordered one dish of steamed clams.
When they were served, we sniffed, remarked each other in perfect understanding, and simultaneously requested another, which we shared. After that was disposed of,” she gurgled, “I had two more helpings! I could have eaten at least one more, but remembered my manners. Our hosts were begining to look alarmed.”

Such ridiculous things have been said about her illness last year that the truth had better be told. Contrary to reports, she was not made ill by worrying over silly rumors of her “poor-ity,” or by other equally untrue and unfair gossip items. Nor did she have any sign of tuberculosis.

She was in bed for three months, suffering from an abscess which had not drained properly and which had to be operated upon—a matter of minor surgery—after three years of intermittent pain.

A blundering reporter acquainted her with the “news” that she was “broke,” and “dying,” and also “unhappily in love.”
All of which surprised her, and for a few days disturbed her.
But her elastic spirit rallied. Plenty of rest overcame her exhaustion, and she resumed her work, anxious to refute those rumors.

“Nothing any one can say about us can hurt us in the long run. We can only hurt ourselves by letting it bother us. But false reports can affect our professional standing, to some extent, because people believe a great deal of what they read and hear.

“The one about my ‘sad financial state’ must have been generated,” she explained, “by the fact that when we went abroad we rented the house, principally to have some one here in authority to see that it was looked after properly.

“I feel that we each must work out our own problems, for which reason I have never been to a psychic or fortune teller.
All our answers inevitably must come from within ourselves, our perception of our destiny and our willingness to cooperate with the divine plan for us.

“Each of us sees things a bit differently, so it isn’t often that others can help us, except with sympathy.

“During my illness the fans’ cheerful letters and verses buoyed me when I got blue. I had worked hard, and was tired out.
Sometimes it seemed as though I would never get my strength back. But in every mail there would be encouraging boosts that peppe me up. I made a scrapbook of their messages and deeply appreciated their loyal thought of me. I just had to get well and back to work, to prove myself worthy of such faith.

“No, I had no intention of joining a sisterhood and retiring from the world. My ambition always has been to be a good actress. I never did think the religious life my vocation.

“When—I ever leave pictures, it will be when I am very much up, not when any one is saying that I am through. Being lent by 20th Century-Fox to Metro-Goldwyn for ‘The Unguarded Hour’ was proof the producers still believed in me.’
Regarding her work with a supreme self-confidence, she claims: ‘I can play any rôle that is within the possibilities of "Rembrandt."—United Artists. Charles Laughton again proves himself one of the great actors of the day. He is as mild and spiritual as the Dutch painter who gives his name to the picture as he was vicious as Captain Bligh, in "Mutiny on the Bounty," and implacable as Javert, in "Les Misérables." The true measure of his greatness is found in the humanity and pathos underlying every rôle he plays. Sometimes one must look deep to find human qualities but they are very evident in his Rembrandt. He offers a quietly compelling portrait in this biographical film of the master. The picture lacks excitement and spurious drama, but it is conscientious and steadily interesting. If the characters remain a bit aloof from the spectator they are none the less alive and fascinating. We must approach them from the British viewpoint which always leaves more to the imagination than Hollywood. We have Rembrandt at the height of his power in 1642, when he painted "The Night Watch" and was flouted by those who could not understand his masterpiece. From then on his fortunes decline as his character develops with adversity. Superbly costumed and lighted, the picture is equally well acted though I think that Elsa Lanchester outshines every one with the exception, of course, of her husband, Mr. Laughton.

"Lloys of London."—20th Century-Fox. This is an attempt to recapture the great success of "The House of Rothschild." It is a chronicle play dealing with the founding and development of the British underwriting syndicate that plays so large a part in world affairs to-day. But it is no such engrossing material as that which inspired the "Rothschild" picture. Somehow insurance isn't so humanly dramatic as banking. However, the film is richly costumed, the cast is large and the production costly, all of which is neither a novelty in itself nor ever has compensated for a story that is uninteresting. And so it is here. I found the picture slow, shallow and tedious in spite of first-class direction and acting, and high praise from many. As for the love story that excuses the chronicle of business, it is conventional and unconvincing—obviously fabricated to romanticize the dull routine of insuring ships in the first place and, later, everything. However, from the standpoint of the typical fan Tyrone Power will make the picture important. An interesting newcomer, son of a famous stage actor, he promises to become a favorite. Already he is a good actor, sympathetic, handsome and young. Unfortunately, Madeleine Carroll's great beauty is diminished by Hollywood's major evil, that of making natural blondes blonder to the point of doll-like artificiality.

"The Garden of Allah."—United Artists. The age-old spell of the African desert is woven with enchanting beauty in the finest Technicolor that has yet been seen. No medley of garish color this, but a muted symphony of rust and brown and dull reds, mellow plaster walls and limitless sky and sand, brooding shadows and burning sun. The novel which dramatized the desert for the first time comes to the screen skillfully adapted and, naturally, with more beauty and realism than the stage ever gave it. The conflict remains the same, however. We still find Domini Enniden seeking refuge from the weariness and sadness of life in the desert and meeting reviving, burning love there. We still find the monk, Boris Androvsky, trying to forget his vows in his love for the lonely woman, marrying her and then undergoing the torment of having betrayed his holy order and deceived his wife. Their parting is inevitable. The rightness of it atones for the unhappy ending. Charles Boyer portrays the soul of the tortured monk with sensitive, sad eloquence and Marlene Dietrich plays her part with the calculation of the strip-tease artist who doesn't strip. Tilly Losch thrills in her seductive dance.

“Winterset.”—RKO. Maxwell Anderson's prize-winning stage play comes to the screen in a laudable attempt to give picture-goers something fine and different and uplifting. What is given us is another story of the underworld, serious, eloquent, but disappointing to those who expected a picture that would set a record and rise to new heights. This has everything to recommend it—fine writing, direction and acting—but it tells us nothing new about life or character. However, it does acquaint us with an example of dramaturgy that depends more on coincidence than the good old Hollywood scenario writers would dare. We have a man unjustly condemned to death whose son five years later, after wandering over the country, is drafted by an alley under Brooklyn Bridge where he finds the town criminals responsible for the father's death as well as the judge who sentenced him. Here, in the murk of overhanging arches, the drama of retribution takes place. It is absorbing rather than exciting. Burgess Meredith plays the son as he did on the stage and makes an excellent job of it, but I do not think he is yet ready to edge any of our favorites off the screen, nor will the arty Margo inspire a fan club until she loses her self-consciousness. John Carradine and Edward Ellis give, in my opinion, the best performances. They have the vivid, unstudied eloquence that the newcomers have not.

“Go West, Young Man.”

Carradine's picture is that the new, young man cannot bring himself to dimiss the fact that a big theater from breakfast time till midnight, the gilded rafters to ring with laughter and applause, do I apologize for being entertained, either. Miss West is West's latest, adapted from the stage “Personal Appearance,” is as full of sexual implications as any of her past performances and is bolder than her recent ones, which is why it is breaking records. The picture is slow and Miss West is limited and monotonous, but I give her credit for slyly getting past the censors and causing ribald mirth among

"QUALITY STREET" is the second of Barrie's plays to provide a screen vehicle for Katharine Hepburn's unique charm and it bids fair to be as successful as "The Little Minister." Laid in quaint Georgian England, it tells the appealing story of a young girl who fades while waiting ten years for the man she loves to propose, and her ingenious ruse to bring him to his senses. Franchot Tone is the reluctant suitor.
We Love Calamity Jane

—and so again our hopes were renewed and we remained in Hollywood.

"I think our luck turned when I changed Jane's hair. This was the day when curly-haired, angelic little girls were in demand. Jane's hair was straight and short, and worn in a Dutch bob. I let it grow a little longer, let it curl on the nape of her neck. She's never been a beautiful child—but this helped."

"Aw, who wants to be pretty?" Jane interposes from her corner where she is busy with crayon and cardboard, copying with amazing fidelity a costume she wore in one of her pictures.

"I want to be a comic when I grow up, anyway. Or maybe a clown." She puckers up her eyes and mouth, looks critically at her artistic endeavors, and quietly fades into the background again.

"When all is said," Mrs. Withers continues, "Jane made her own destiny. David Butler was casting the brat part for 'Bright Eyes.' We went to see the casting director, and he told us to stand by. We'd been standing by for two years—and nothing ever happened."

"Suddenly Jane took matters into her own hands. 'You've got a minute,' she insisted to Casting Director James Ryan, 'I want to do something for you.' And she went into her impersonations before he could stop her. After a few moments he grabbed her by the arm and rushed her to Mr. Butler's office. There Jane repeated her show."

"'Can you pretend you're popping a machine gun?' Butler asked."

"'You mean like this?' And Jane extended her arm and wiggled a menacing forefinger and thumb."

"'I think she's in,' Mr. Ryan told me. But I wasn't putting any faith in promises. So many things had been promised us. None of them had fully materialized."

"As it happened, Mr. Withers arrived in California that day. His company had finally transferred him to the Coast so that he could be with us. I told him what had occurred at the studio."

"'For Heaven's sake, don't write your friends in Atlanta about it until we see the size of her rôle and she's actually working. The last time you were so excited about a part and wrote everybody in town the good news, all we could see of Jane was the back of her neck.'"

"I didn't write. I waited. It was Friday, my lucky day! And somehow I had a feeling that this was Jane's real break at last!"

Jane's meteoric rise to stardom is now history. To-day she has all the trappings of a star—her thousand-dollar-a-week salary, stories tailored to her measure, important advertising contracts.

Jane is afraid of nothing. She takes the bumps and the blue spots which the rowdy scenes in which she excels earn her, with a carefree grin.

A tale is told of her well worth repeating here. While she was on a recent personal-appearance tour, she ran a needle into her foot. Panic-stricken, Mrs. Withers rushed to the phone to call a doctor. 'Now, don't get excited, ma'am. Have you got a pair of tweezers?' Jane took a firm hold on the needle and yanked. Out it came. By the time a physician arrived, Jane had her foot swabbed with iodine. 'You did a pretty brave thing for a little girl,' the doctor complimented her. Jane's answer to that was a disgusted 'Aw, piffle!' May her answer always be 'Aw, piffle' to compliments. For then she will remain the engaging, refreshing youngster whose forceful personality and dynamite talents have brought the world to her feet. of endearing himself to people so much that immediately they would feel a deep personal interest in his well-being and his future.

Even after their marriage, when her husband was nearest to her idea of the perfect lover, Ellis recalls that he often scolded her for not putting herself out more to be nice to people who might help him or further his career. But even before he became a great success, he had mastered the knack of endearing himself to every one up and down the line, from office boy to producer.

It is, however, as the perfect husband, that Fredric March's one-time wife remembers him most vividly. He got a job in a Denver stock company, "Go, by all means, if it's best for you," Ellis urged him. He went, and every day Ellis received eighteen- and twenty-page letters, telling her how trying it was to be apart from her.

Then, as if the tides stood still, the letters stopped! For a week none came. Ellis was alarmed. She was consulting time tables when a letter finally arrived. She read it—and re-read it. It said nothing of how her husband missed her, as the others had done. It told only of the success he was meeting.

That was welcome news to Ellis—and her mother—but they feared triumph might have come too quickly. Ellis's mother advised her to go to Denver. She went—and she admits now that she did the worst thing she possibly could have done—even though her intentions were the best in the world. Thinking to preclude the possibility of her husband hurting his career by undervaluing the value of the success he was scoring, Ellis tried—no matter how nicely—to minimize its importance.

Florence Eldridge, the present Mrs. March, was leading woman in the stock company. Fred looked up to her—as he looked up to all who evinced an interest in his career. Miss Eldridge had seen the same potentialities for success in the young actor that Ellis had seen—save that her tactics for bringing them to the fore were different. Miss Eldridge praised him.

When Fredric concluded the Denver engagement and returned to New York he remained only two days. Then he disappeared for a week. Ellis was frantic. They had made social engagements together, and she couldn't even say where her husband had gone. She told inquirers he had gone to a fight in Philadelphia.
mother had gone out from England to visit her brother, who was an instructor in a university in Tokyo, and while there she met and married Mr. De Havilland, another professor—with her mother she came to this country when she was two and a half years old.

She and her sister, then six months old, were delicate children, so, soon after they landed in San Francisco, a doctor advised that they be taken to the small town of Saratoga, which has a mild and healthful climate.

There the small Olivia grew up, going to the local school and winning a scholarship to Mills College, which she intended to use to prepare herself for a teaching career. As she explains: "It wasn't that I thought myself especially equipped to teach, but I knew I had to make some plans to support myself, and my liking for English literature and languages made me feel that teaching would be a good choice."

Looking at Miss De Havilland, at her wide-set, gentle brown eyes, her softly curling chestnut hair and her generous, humorous mouth, noting the stillness of her figure and the delicate structure of her body, it was difficult to envision her as a dignified schoolmarm—yet possibly she would have been a capable one.

"Of course, I had dreamed of the theater," she went on. "Just as has almost every girl. But it never seemed like something that was really a possibility for me."

"However, because of my innate love of acting, I used to work in amateur theatricals there in Saratoga and during the summer after I finished high school, and before I was scheduled to enter Mills on my scholarship, we put on a performance of 'A Midsummer Night's Dream,' in which I played 'Puck.'"

"Soon after that we read that Max Reinhardt was to produce 'Dream' in the Hollywood Bowl, and some of my friends suggested that I go to Hollywood and try to watch rehearsals. That seemed an utterly preposterous idea, but these same friends were persistent, and when they heard that a man they knew was to be one of Reinhardt's assistants and that he would be in San Francisco for a few days, they insisted on taking me to see him, to ask him to let me work as an extra in the Bowl production."

"Well, when I met him, he asked me to read some lines—and instead of telling me I could have a job as an extra, he told me I could understudy Gloria Stuart, who was to play 'Hermia.'"

The rest is screen history. Miss Stuart was unable to finish the picture in which she was working in time to assume her rôle for the Reinhardt production, so on opening night it was the little understudy, De Havilland, who walked out under the giant spotlights. As she insists:

"When you read about the star failing to appear and the understudy getting her big chance, or see such a situation in a play or movie, you say, 'Such things don't really happen! But it happened to me! It was like a miracle!'"

And from then on life became even more miraculous for the little Saratoga schoolgirl. For after the Bowl production, Reinhardt started his film production of the same play for Warners—and he chose Olivia to portray the rôle of 'Hermia' before the cameras.

Of course, no story about Olivia De Havilland is complete without some reference to her mother, who has been an unusual influence.

"I want, above all else, to be with Olivia when she needs me, and I want to soften for her whatever blows she must inevitably receive from life. But I do not want to spare her all blows, for it is only by suffering, by enduring the vicissitudes of life that a woman grows and develops a heart and soul."

"I hope that I can help her to keep a sane balance, and in this I believe I will be helped by the fact that my other daughter has started in pictures, too. She's using another name in order not to take advantage of Olivia's earlier start. And with two sisters both building careers in the same medium, the natural family rivalry will tend to prevent either of them from getting a false idea of her own importance."

This in itself was an unusually long speech from Olivia's mother, whose difference from other movie mothers was never more clearly defined than in her reluctance to talk about her offspring. Undoubtedly it is from her that Olivia has inherited her lack of pretense and her interest in people other than herself.
Reduce Pores...Soften Lines

Pores

Lines

WITH THIS ROUSING UNDER SKIN TREATMENT

Age signs begin here
Under your skin are tiny active glands, tend to form tiny, deep clogs. When they function poorly, age signs start!

Miss Kathleen Williams: "A Pond's Cold Cream treatment makes my skin feel wonderful—just so fresh and invigorated. It smooths out little lines."

YOU'RE TWENTY...you're twenty-five...you're thirty or more!

The years slip by quietly enough. The things that tell it to the world are—little lines and—a gradual coarsening of the skin's very texture.

Coarse pores and ugly, deepening lines do more to add years to your face than any other skin faults. What causes them? How can you ward them off?

A Faulty Underskin—

Both come from a faulty underskin.

Pores grow larger when tiny oil glands underneath get clogged... Lines form when fibres underneath sag, lose their tone.

To keep these little glands and fibres functioning properly, you must invigorate that underskin. You can—with regular Pond's deep-skin treatments.

Pond's Cold Cream contains specially processed oils. It goes deep into the pores, clears them of make-up, dirt, clogging oils. Then you put more cold cream in briskly. You feel the circulation waken. Your skin tingles with new vigor.

Day and night—this thorough cleansing and rousing with Pond's Cold Cream. Soon cloggings cease. Pores actually reduce. Under tissues are toned, and lines smooth out. You look years younger!

Day and night—this simple care

Here's the simple treatment that hundreds of women follow, because it does more than cleanse their skin:

Every night, pat on Pond's Cold Cream to soften and release deep-lodged dirt and make-up. Wipe it all off. At once your skin looks clearer! Now rouse your underskin. Pat in more cream—briskly. The circulation stirs. Glands waken. Tissues are invigorated.

Every morning (and before make-up) repeat... Your skin is smooth for powder—fresh, vital looking. Your whole face is brighter, younger!

Start in at once to give your skin this invigorating daily care. Get a jar today. Or, send the coupon below. It brings you a special 9-treatment tube of Pond's Cold Cream.

SPECIAL 9-TREATMENT TUBE and 3 other Pond's Beauty Aids

POND'S, Dept. 14-CE, Clinton, Conn.

Rush special tube of Pond's Cold Cream, enough for 9 treatments, with generous samples of 2 other Pond's Creams and 5 different shades of Pond's Face Powder. I enclose 10c to cover postage and packing.

The career of Jeanette MacDonald has flourished throughout the year, yet off screen this actress seems to have lost something of the blooming beauty that was formerly hers. Probably she has worked too long and steadily and needs a vacation.

Her frequent costar, Nelson Eddy, has also leaped into the front rank of favorites, yet feminine reaction to his charms is not quite so rabid as his press agent would have us believe.

1936 being Leap Year, many girl fans took advantage of the opportunity to propose to their favorite actors. Fred MacMurray was sounded on the subject by a widow with four children. A weight lifter in a circus proposed to George Raft. A pair of frisky twins tossed a coin to determine which should offer her hand to Randolph Scott. The winner instructed Randy to forward two hundred and fifty dollars so that she might come to Hollywood and complete the deal. (The good Omar offers nothing to cover such situations.) Both MacMurray and Scott have since married, while Raft is still stanchly true to Virginia Pine.

During 1936 the Moving Finger recorded growing popularity for such newcomers as James Stewart, Frances Farmer, Luise Rainer, Ross Alexander, Claire Trevor, Lloyd Nolan, Madeleine Carroll and, above all these, Robert Taylor and Fred MacMurray.

Hard on the heels of Taylor and MacMurray comes one Don Ameche. Besides the usual qualifications of good looks, good diction and ability, the fellow's personality combines an endearing Old World mellowness with the better qualities of modern Americanism. If given suitable opportunities he will become an outstanding star.

From France came Simone Simon to set 20th Century-Fox, to say nothing of the fans, by the ears. Tempestuous and daring, Simone seems to be guided by the admonition:

Ah, make the most of what we may yet spend,
Before we too into the Dust descend.

During the first months of the year there was an unusual amount of dash- ing about and running away in the colony. Fifty-five-year-old John Barrymore fled about the country with his twenty-one-year-old inamorata, Elaine Barrie, close on his trail. Freddie Bartholomew was yanked about from pillar to post during a family squabble over his custody. Ann Harding made a heroic dash across country with her daughter, pursued by her former husband, Harry Bannister. And, as usual, there were numerous matrimonial flights to Yuma, and hurried trips to New York, Europe, and Hawaii.

Some malignant clown hit Victor McLoglen between the shoulder blades with an egg when he knelt to imprint his hand in soft cement in the forecourt of the Chinese Theater. (The re- doubtable Rob Wagner opines that future archaeologists will unearth the ruins of the Chinese Theater and, seeing the hand and footprints of our top-notch stars, conclude that the people of our day walked on all fours.)

The summer season brought with it much grief and hectic activity. Within one short month five men of present or former film eminence were taken by death: Henry B. Walthall, Thomas Meighan and James Murray, all excellent actors, and two fine directors, Alan Crosland and Stephen Roberts.

Truly "a moving row of Magic Shadow-Shapes that come and go."

On the heels of these untimely departures came numerous courtroom dramas. The husband of Polly Moran attempted a wild West impersonation and had him clapped in the hoosegow. A legal battle for custody of talented little Edith Fellows was shoved off the front pages by the Mary Astor conflict.

With the coming of autumn the Universal Studio brought a ray of light to the troubled colony by giving a $25,000 party—quite the most sumptuous and beautiful studio function in years. It was interesting to note that of the many stars present Lee Tracy received the most applause. It was also interesting to note that he quaffed sparingly of "the grape."

The passing of Irving Thalberg shocked the entire industry and created much speculation as to the changes his absence would create. Now at its zenith, the career of Norma Shearer has been dealt a severe blow, as have those of other MGM stars. Possibly this studio has completed its cycle of supremacy and another will gradually assume first place.

In November, Laird Doyle, noted young scenarist, was killed in a plane accident, and once more we regretfully "turn down an empty glass."

And John Barrymore's hectic romance with Elaine Barrie came to a surprise ending with the couple hopping off to Yuma to be married.

Many long established players continued throughout the year with unabated success. Gary Cooper's appeal has at last penetrated even my hard shell. Paul Muni is still our greatest actor. The year gave Marlene Dietrich two excellent films, which she desperately needed. It irked me to find middle-aged Warner Baxter portraying "Joaquin Murietta," who was shot to death at the age of twenty-three, but no one else seems to have objected. "The Gorgeous Hussy" and "Mary of Scotland" were considered excellent films, but I was unable to judge for myself since I refuse to see pictures which distort history.

As the year closes we find that the astonishing vogue of Mae West is noticeable only in certain theaters. Marion Davies' pictures justify huge production costs only because of the popularity of her leading men; Carole Lombard has improved in make-up and technique; Eleanor Powell is the greatest feminine dancing star of the screen, and "A Woman Rebels" was stolen from Katharine Hepburn by a saucer-eyed baby.

And so the Moving Finger continues to write.

TOP-SHELF STAR

BY MALCOLM H. OETTINGER

MERLE OBERON IS LITERATE AND LOVELY, A CHARMING EXAMPLE OF WHAT HOLLYWOOD KEEPS IN RESERVE FOR SPECIAL OCCASIONS. THERE ARE FEW, INDEED, WHO COULD GIVE SUCH A FAVORABLE IMPRESSION AT NINE IN THE MORNING, WHEN LIFE IS GRAY AND BLANK AND HOLLOW.

If you had been watching Merle Oberon on the screen, from "The Private Life of Henry VIII" all the way through "The Dark Angel" to "These Three" and "Beloved Enemy," lulling your eyes with her beauty, marking her charm, wondering at her effortless vitality, cataloging her as one of the half dozen top-flight beauties on the screen—if you had done all these things and one day found yourself face to face with Miss Oberon, would you be disappointed? Would she turn out to be a film phantom, losing glamour in the flesh? Would you rue the day you set eyes upon her? In a word, no!

There is no star aloft at the moment who carries more magic with her, no star more pictorial at the prosaic hour of 10:00 a.m., no star more potently deserving the acclaim that is hers than this same sloe-eyed, ripe-lipped, pocket-size destroyer, Merle Oberon.

Miss Oberon was to be in New York in much the same manner that one finds oneself in Terre Haute or Binghamton—between trains.

Not that Miss Oberon eyes Manhattan askance or gives it the go-by. But she had a very important date with a boat. She was due to arrive in the morning, just after sunrise, have her hair done, her picture taken for 'Vogue.'
Top-shelf Star

...passport O. K.'d, her horoscope read, gowns fitted, her picture taken for "Harper's Bazaar," her nails manicured, her contract submitted, her picture taken for "Town and Country"—and all in one day—then she was off on the "Queen Mary" for England.

So the best way to see her was to meet the "Twentieth Century" and guide her to her hotel from the station. It was a good idea.

If you saw a star arrive at nine in the morning, when life is gray and blank and hollow, and the toothpaste still too recent a memory—if you saw the ordeal a star submits to, you'd be sorrier for them than you are.

The station was smoky and dull. No bunting greeted the traveling favorite. The grim little reception committee included half a dozen raffish newspapermen, two or three emissaries from the publicity office, and a full battalion of photographers panoplied for the arrival, flashlights in hand, cameras unslinged, tripods rampant.

At nine, as accurately as the crack of doom, the "Twentieth Century" steamed in. Miss Oberon, radiant despite the sleeper jump, glowing regardless of the unholy hour, appeared in the vestibule of the car, hatless, smiling, excited.

The publicity people greeted her warmly, and hurried her back into the car to be photographed leaning out of the window. Again. Again. Bulbs flashed, porters stopped to store, cameras were thrust within two feet of the lovely Oberon face. More bulbs flashed. She smiled, reappearing at the door of the Pullman, looking tiny in her mink coat, a box in one hand, her hand bag in the other. There were more pictures taken. More flashlights.

"Wave, Miss Oberon," shouted a photographer.

Miss Oberon looked at the box in one hand, the bag in the other, shrugged, smiled helplessly.

A publicity man relieved her of the box, whispered to her.

"Wave, Miss Oberon," demanded the indefatigable cameraman.

Finally she emerged from the train, to be engulfed by the working press, a fast-talking group of four or five men and one woman. "How's David Niven?" asked one.

"Fine, I guess," said Miss Oberon.

"Married to him, aren't you?"

Miss Oberon shook her head, smiling.

"Going to marry him, aren't you?"

"No," she said.

"Are you unofficially engaged?"

"No," said Merle with what seemed to me Jubilike patience.

"Did you see him on the train?" inquired one of the gentlemen of the press. This was the straw that terminated the interview. The Oberon entourage started for the station and cabs.

As we walked along crowds sprang up, from nowhere and as quickly a small escort of police expertly cleared the path and walked between Miss Oberon and her importunate admirers. Still hungry for pictures, photographers backed up in front of the star, snapping her as she walked.

Finally we made our way to a taxi and started for the Waldorf-Astoria with motorcycle sirens screeching ahead of us.

She is dark and porcelain-like in her beauty, which is dazzling. Her eyes are Eurasian, her mouth full and daintily shaped, her body slimly alluring.

At the Waldorf one of the tower suites was blooming with flowers, awaiting the Oberon presence. There was a wire from Douglas Fairbanks inviting her to breakfast with him. Another telegram advised her that the retakes were beyond expectations. A third invited her to a night-club opening.

Samuel Goldwyn was so delighted with her work in the picture just finished, "Beloved Enemy," that he had given her all the costumes she wore in the film, a tidy present in this instance, since it was a modern story, with the usual emphasis upon style.

Merle said she was looking forward to her voyage on the morrow, chiefly because it would bring her to the Alexander Korda lot outside London for the leading woman's rôle in "I, Claudius," opposite Charles Laughton. This same Korda rocketed the Oberon fortunes in "Henry VIII." No wonder she has just signed a joint contract with Goldwyn and Korda that will bind her services to these two excellent mentors for the next five years.

Merle Oberon talks in a clipped accent that is not English nor American, but combines the best features of each.
She is not loquacious, nor is she reti-cent, expressing herself well, choosing her words with discretion, making her points quickly and intelligently.

While we were talking, a wiry, pleasant-looking young man with a mustache came to say "bon voyage."

"Darling!" cried Merle. "You must come with me. I'll wire the Coast I'm taking you. I simply must have you with me!"

This emotional appeal was easily understood when the gentleman was introduced as Gregg Toland, ace Goldwyn cameraman. It would not surprise me if Miss Oberon had him shanghaied. For no matter how radiant a star may be, the final transposition of her beauty to the screen lies in the skill of the lens treatment she receives. Didn't Mary Pickford always depend upon Charles Rosher to imprison the sunlight in her curls? Has not Marlene Dietrich pouted for days when Victor Milner was not available?
Did not Carol Lombard hold up production until she could be photographed by the expert Teddy Tazoloff?

Mr., Toland came and went. While she sipped coffee and nibbled toast
Merle said that she enshrines Norma Shearer as her favorite among actresses as well as one of her most intimate friends.

Miss Oberon, if you pin me down, is literate and lovely, a charming example of what Hollywood keeps on its topmost shelf for special occasions.
On and Off the Set

WILLIE FUNG, the Chinese actor, was being interviewed for a part. The director explained that the part, although small, was important. He concluded with, "And, besides, you can't expect to become a star overnight."

"Okey-dokey," replied the Oriental. "I come back to-morrow."

SOME one inquired of Pandro Berman, production head of RKO, if he had read "Gone With the Wind."

"No," Berman answered, "it's already been bought for pictures."

SOON after the engagement of Mary Pickford and Buddy Rogers, some indelicate fellow mentioned, in Mary's presence, the difference in their ages.

Mary made no effort to evade the issue. She was wearing a blue jumper, and her hair was done in a bunch of little curls, à la Shirley Temple.

She said serenely, "I believe every one is sixteen in the sight of God!"

THE open car had been standing in the rain (under the studio rain machines) for some time. So when Grace Moore plumped down on the seat she squealed, "Oooh, it's all wet!" The comment wasn't in the script, but it sounded so naive and amusing that they left it in anyway.

CONSTANCE BENNETT visited a shop near Hollywood and bought forty layettes for a maternity hospital. She didn't just stroll in and order them, either, but spent over two hours picking everything over so each one would be individual and charming.

Then, since she'd kept the salesgirl overtime, she had her taken home in the Bennett limousine. That's thoughtfulness!

O N your college or club goes Hollywood and makes a motion picture of its own—and everybody's doing it, these days!—be sure to send a reel to Samuel Goldwyn. Since discovering Andrea Leeds in an amateur film, Sam promises to seek out all his future talent in this fashion.

A NYTHING for a gag! So Mrs. Pat O'Brien, commenting, wifelike, on Pat being an ice-box-raider and a pantry-snooper-arounder, had all the cupboards adorned with miniature padlocks. They don't work, though. Just curiously designed handles.

P RIVATE message for Dolores del Rio: the lad whom you hire to exercise your white bull terrier sometimes sneaks around the corner, pulls out a book, and reads for a couple of hours, while the pup snoozes. A nice old lady who's a neighbor of yours told me the awful truth. She blushed, too, at being such a tattle-tale!

W HILE Catherine Doucet would shudder with horror if any one called her a prig, she is, nevertheless, appalled at what she describes as "uncivilized" drinking that she observes round about town. Although she has a cellar well stocked with choice wines, her guests recently have been astonished to discover that she is serving nothing stronger than tomato juice or a nonanxietycausing punch. It is just her gentle protest against what she considers a bad habit.

P A LUPINO gave a party in honor of Hollywood's newest newlyweds, Grace Durkin and William Henry, MGM juvenile. They had to share the spotlight with some other romantic couples, but they didn't mind a bit because, as Bill said, "It only proves that love is the thing."

Ida said the hostess came very nearly not showing up. "My feet hurt and my ankles are swollen, and I get nervous around so many people. I've been fighting with every one at the studio, and I don't think my career is doing very well," she said.

Sue Carol and Howard Wilson had been married just three weeks before
On and Off the Set

Toby Wing and Pinky Tomlin were at the Lupino party and were beaming, having recently announced their engagement. No one will believe, however, that they will ever actually reach the altar. Toby's close friends say she likes to be engaged frequently as a pastime and a means of publicity but they don't think she is at all interested in getting married.

Now this is what this department would call being a star. Although Mae West is contracted to make but one picture a year for Emanuel Cohen, he has built a bungalow dressing room for her at the General Studios that is the envy of any one who is looking for a nice, cozy little house in which to live. And no one else can as much as put a foot inside it, even if Mae doesn't occupy it for nine months at a stretch. It is white, trimmed with blue on the outside. White predominates inside, and the fixtures and hardware are copper. The furnishings are typically Mae West, being the last word in luxury besides being lavish and lush. Could we say more?

Mary Carlisle and Lew Ayres are the latest combination, romantically speaking, to burst upon the consciousness of the local columnists. It just goes to prove that newspaper censorship in England is enforced, for that is where this romance started and got to the serious stage before any one here knew anything about it.

Lew had a new version of the black-eye-from-bumping-into-a-door story. He was limping and leaning heavily on a cane and explained that "Believe it or not, a door fell on my foot!"

In grief, Norma Shearer proved herself as lovely and patrician as she was in happiness. Refusing to accept friends' suggestions that she travel in Europe, she preferred to remain in the Sonto Monica home where she and Irving Thalberg were so happy. Alone, wearing a simple white suit, she walks along the beach where they used to stroll together.

Lee Dixon is the latest whirlwind dancer to make Hollywood gasp. You will be excited, too, when you see him in Ruby Keeler's "Ready, Willing and Able."

Skin Flaky?

HAVEN'T you come in often from the crisp, cold air and felt your skin all dry and flaky?

Impossible to put powder on. Those little flaky bits catch your powder in horrid little clumps.

You can change all that—in no time at all. Change that flaky "feel" of your skin to a slipping touch under your fingers—with just one application! See your skin so smooth you can put make-up on with joy?

How can this be?

A dermatologist explains

It's a special kind of cream that works this quick transformation. A keratolytic cream (Vanishing Cream). This is how a distinguished dermatologist explains it:

"A keratolytic cream has the ability to melt away dry, dead cells clinging to the surface of the skin. It does this the instant it touches the skin. This brings the new, young cells into view at once—smooth and soft."

That's how Pond's Vanishing Cream can smooth away skin roughnesses so quickly. Use it two ways:

For powder base—Right after cleansing, put on a film of Pond's Vanishing Cream. It gives your skin a wonderful smoothness. Powder and rouge go on softly. Stay for hours.

For overnight—To give your skin lasting softness, apply Pond's Vanishing Cream after your nightly cleansing. Leave it on. It won't smear. As you sleep, your skin gets softer.

WON'T TAKE MAKE-UP?

Melt it Smooth ... Instantly!

How skin roughens. Dead, dried-out particles on top scuff loose, catch powder. You can melt them off!

8-Piece Package Pond's, Dept. K-V, Clinton, Conn. Rush sample package containing special tube of Pond's Vanishing Cream, generous samples of 2 other Pond's Creams and 5 different shades of Pond's Face Powder. I enclose 15¢ for postage and packing.

the back of his father's car. "Do you want me to bring in the robe?" Alan asked Jean, "What robe?" exclaimed his father; "I have no robe."

He went out and looked at the car and saw by the license number that it did not belong to him. Jean was frightened, and though maybe he might be arrested for theft. He called up the auto club, investigated the ownership of the machine, and then traced it to Karloff. The remarkable thing is that only once in about ten thousand instances does one key fit two locks on automobiles.

Triumph of Formality.—Latest bulletin on Gene Raymond and Jeanette MacDonald is that they will spend their honeymoon in Hanolulu, and maybe go on to the Orient. The wedding will take place June 17, 1937, probably at high noon. The engagement holds the record as the longest with a fixed wedding date, and all announcements most formally made in advance, in the history of Hollywood. It gives the impression at Newport, Boston's Back Bay, or the like. And the colony is really somewhat astounded about it. But then, it's the correct social way to do things.

The Romance Carousel.—Young romances which are really flourishing are those of Betty Furness and Allan Lane, and Anne Shirley and Owen Davis, Jr. These couples are surprisingly faithful, and when Betty and Anne returned from the East recently by plane they were greeted most effusively by their respective swains.

Meanwhile, Bob Taylor and Barbara Stanwyck have apparently cooled their devotion with Bob exhibiting a fleeting interest in Ginger Rogers, who had previously been attended by James Stewart. And Jimmy—oh, well, we give up; this romance business is a regular merry-go-round.

Thus Endeth the Book.—The Pickford-Fairbanks chapter seems finally closed. The announcement of Mr. and Mrs. Buddy Rogers looks like the last line, Mrs. Rogers being professionally known as Mary Pickford. And about a year ago, at this time, curiously enough, Douglas Fairbanks and Miss Pickford were very near a reconciliation. Finis was written to that, however, when Doug married Lady Ashley last spring. Mary and Buddy many times denied their intention of wedding before the official pronouncement was made.

And don't be misled by those rumors of marriage between Charlie Chaplin and Paulette Goddard. "Isn't true, or wasn't at least, at the time that somebody supposedly revealed their secret wedding that was supposed to have taken place about a year or so ago.

Raft Wins Point.—For once it looked as if George Raft were completely free of his contract with Paramoun, which has always seemed pretty irksome to the star. He actually secured his release just before "Souls at Sea" started, and it was about the third flare-up within a year.

Hollywood High Lights

Ann Dvorak finds a cup of tea just the thing to stimulate her ability to concentrate on the script she is reading.

Other studios started bidding for Raft, and then he met Producer William Le Baron at a party, and the two ironed out the difficulty. And it seems as if this time it were really ironed out. Raft's complaint happened to be pretty legitimate in the case of "Souls at Sea," because the character he was to play was painted in inkiest black. George, for a long time, has professed the determination to get away from enacting villains, and so, it is understood, the script for the sea story was partly revised. Raft receives about four thousand dollars a week.

Sue Carol Resuming.—Almost simultaneously Sue Carol, who was much favored as a leading woman a few years ago while she was the wife of Nick Stuart, remarried, and returned to picture work. Her new husband is Howard Wilson, who acted in such films as "Lost Patrol," "Car 99," and "Red Salute." Their romance had begun under way for more than a year. The picture which will return Sue to view for the first time in about three years is "A Doctor's Diary," in which the new player, John Trent, and George Bancroft and Helen Burgess are to be seen. Sue just happened to visit the set, and was immediately engaged for a part by the producer, Ben Schulberg.

Cupid Also Likes Laughs.—Despite the fact that Charlie Chaplin and Paulette Goddard are probably not wed, Cupid and the comedians are doing a lot of frolicking together lately. For instance, there's Harpo Marx, whose secret marriage to Susan Fleming was revealed as having occurred last September. Also Bert Wheeler, who plans definitely to wed Sally Haines, after romancing for two years, in February; Pinky Tomlin, who will take Toby Wing as wife in the spring; and Harry Ritz, at the Ritz brothers, whose marriage to Charlotte Greenfield about three months ago was kept a secret for a time.

Lady comics won't be behind hand, either, it reports may be believed that Marie Wilson and Nick Grinde, director, and Glenda Farrell and Drew Eber- son have their eyes on the altar.

Olivia's Independent Sister.—Joan Fontaine is the most independent miss in movieland. You'll see her in "Quality Street," with Katharine Hepburn. She's the sister of Olivia de Havilland. But Joan has it stipulated in her contract that no such references are to be included in publicity written about her. She's determined to carve her way alone. Joan was exceptionally good in a stage production of "Call It a Day" on the Coast, and was signed by Jesse L. Lasky. She's a blonde.

A Haunted Epoch.—A strange series of tragedies has haunted Hollywood late. The death of John Bow- ers and Marie Walcamp, both popular stars of the olden day, reputedly by the suicide route, left an unhappy impression of the pathetic fate which stalks so many old-timers. June Caprice died only a few days later of pneumonia, fulfilling again the rule of three, as applied in this particular group.

Chic Sale had passed away previously. Then a little later Madame Schumann-Heink, who had just glimpsed film success in "Here's to Romance."

Curiously, at the time that Madame Schumann-Heink passed away, her first film for MGM called "Gram" had just been O.K.'d for production. That same picture was one proposed for Marie Dressler.

All-star Reviva.—We heartily approve the idea of a revival of "The Last of Mrs. Cheyney," with William Powell, Joan Crawford, and Robert Montgomery as the leads, don't you? That should be one of the Flashiest films of the season, especially when you consider that Joan and Bill Powell have never played in the same feature at MGM.

Norma Shearer was the star in "The Last of Mrs. Cheyney" last time it was produced, and do you remember who acted the part of the smart-talking nobleman, which is the one that Montgomery will have? None other than Basil Rathbone. Whereas George Barraud, now scarcely ever seen in pictures, did the rôle which Bill Powell is to play. But that is to be built up considerably. It's the crook-butler.

A Bewiskered Gag.—Just a little publicity story sent out about Clark Gable wearing a beard in "Parnell" caused more of a furor than anything of a similar nature with the single exception of Marlene Dietrich's determination to wear trousers a few years ago.

Mail was received from all parts of the United States, a great deal from fans, but some from barbers' associations advising that the idea be dropped for fear of a falling off in the tinsorial trade.

Also, it seems there are various bearded men's organizations in the United States which strenuously advocated the idea.

After the stage play, there was nothing particular to suggest that Gable ga bearded, and so he decided in favor of just a mustache.

Gable later is to play in "Idiot's Delight," the Pulitzer prize play, probably with Garbo.

They Say in New York—

played in innumerable two-reel comedies. She played Irene Dunne’s daughter in “Cimarron.” And then she up and married Cliff Edwards and tried to settle down. It didn’t work at all, and after a clash of temperaments she obtained a divorce, took a new name, and got a contract with Universal.

Ambassador of Good Will.—Vanity is something you do not know you have until it gets a jolt. Anna Neagle confessed that ruefully when she arrived from England.

Old-fashioned Blackmail.—It is lucky for Lily Pons that she is blessed with a happy disposition. She lets others do the worrying, while she glories in her delight over her approaching marriage, the coming opera and concert season, getting back to her lovely little house in Silvermine, Connecticut, and planting the lily bulbs which Adolphe Menjou gave her.

While she was so blithe and carefree, her lawyer and a score of detectives were having their troubles.

An old blackmailing war was being waged against her. Expert photographers had superimposed her face on some one else’s nude body and she was ordered to pay or the pictures would be put in circulation.

Finally the culprit was located—a prisoner at West who was whiling away his jail term working in the prison laboratory. This trick has been tried against most girls who have risen to any prominence, but so far as is known, only one was so foolish as to pay.

The New Prima Donna.—The biggest party of the month was given by Eddie Cantor to introduce his newest protegée to the New York press. Perhaps you have heard Deanna Durbin trilling away on his Sunday night radio program, but I think you would be even more impressed if you met her. Deanna has reached the ripe old age of fourteen. She has none of the bravura manner of a Bobby Breen or a Shirley Temple; she is just a natural, candid little girl with an amazing voice. She plays a leading rôle in Universal’s “Three Smart Girls,” and will go on making musical films for them. She thinks that it is a grand joke that she looks much older in her photographs.

Just Call Her Miss X.—Something of a prodigy in her own way is Judith Barrett, star of “Flying Hostess,” who was one of the most enthusiastic guests at the party for Deanna Durbin. About five years ago she broke into pictures under the name of Nancy Dover, and Marie Wilson, quaintly original comedienne, announces her engagement to Nick Grinde, director.

One of the two most popular British film stars—the other being Jessie Matthews—she found that she was little known here. All who saw her in “Peg of Old Drury” remember her with great enthusiasm, but her favorite picture, “Nell Gwynn,” was slaughtered by the censors. She was a little hurt to find that people confuse her with a Warner newcomer, Ann Nagel. As soon as United Artists release her next picture here, she won’t be confused with any one else, she can be sure.

She is the traditional blond English beauty, but with an irrepressible sparkle like champagne. The two great favorites of British audiences, and hers, too, are Greta Garbo and Norma Shearer. And she wants American audiences to adopt Sir Cedric Hardwicke with all the enthusiasm given Charles Laughton.

Charmed Life.—If all your dreams came true, things would probably happen to you just as they do to Tamara Desni. She was under contract to Alexander Korda to play small parts when the American director, William K. Howard, selected her to play a lead in his British film, “Fire Over England.” And at the finish of the picture, Mr. and Mrs. Howard brought her to New York for a week’s visit.

She saw all the shows, went to all the night clubs, met Clark Gable, Jimmy Durante, Jack Dempsey, and Kitty Carlisle. But most of all she enjoyed sitting in the window of her room at the Hotel Pierre, looking over Central Park and watching the lights flicker on. She is very tall and slender, and fairly hypnotizes everyone who meets her in person. Soon we will see if she can do it from the screen.

Little Man—What Now?—Douglas Montgomery is out to get the rolling stone championship. He left Hollywood shortly after “Little Women” and went to England to make a picture with Constance Bennett. Since then he has toured Italy extensively, written a play, and waited around London for his next picture to start. Bette Davis was slated to play opposite him, and as you may recall, Warners and the British courts contrived to stop her.

Dashing over to New York for a few days to consult doctors about an ail ing wrist, young Montgomery told me that he figured his greatest talent was guessing wrong.

“When I left Hollywood, immediately producers wanted me for bigger parts in better pictures than I had had. When I took the Bette Davis picture in preference to another, that was called off. I’m going back to London now to do a play with Raymond Massey and Adrienne Allen, so you can be sure I’ll be offered something even better here,” he said. But he looks so much more vital and interested than he did in his Hollywood leading-man days, I am sure you would approve, even if you do miss him on the screen.
Loretta Young's Life Story

Mary, Queen of Scots. I would love doing such things."

Taking a keen interest in the mechanics of picture-making, she asks the technicians questions, and snaps scenes with her small camera and her own movie camera, proudly displaying the results to her family and friends at home. Now Technicolor opens a new and fascinating field.

In addition to romances, her reading includes plays and historical novels which might have film possibilities.

The dramatic fire of Katharine Hepburn, Luise Rainer, Elisabeth Bergner, and Garbo makes them the stars whom she most admires.

When Polly Ann and Sally married and moved into homes of their own, considerable light and laughter went out of the big house. One misses Sally's sparkle, particularly. Loretta's gayety is of the appreciative, chuckly kind.

Regarding Hollywood from a Bel Air hilltop, the white colonial manse seems too large for Loretta and her mother. They like it so well, however, that they will keep it.

Red-bricked walks wind upward between cascades of camellias. Rose vines drape the white pergolas with fluttering, pale-pink charm, and spire petals over the walls. In the rear a curved patio is backed by a mossy rock wall, in the center of which is a niche containing a blue-and-white plaque of the Blessed Virgin.

The entrance hall, paneled high in white, above which gold-figured wallpaper rises like a decorative bosom, has for its only contrasting touches vines trailing from ruby jars set on glass shelves. The drawing-room is formal, the white woodwork and the mahogany furniture of the South.

Meals are given a certain enchantment by the hand-painted dining-room walls: quaint figures, costumed in the frills of bygone ages, delectably limned in ashes-of-roses. The artist chose to use the girls' faces for some of the paintings in the garden scenes. Even Georgianna is there—a saucy minx in crinoline.

The house is a setting of dignified beauty for Loretta's slim and elegant grace. For chummy confidences, however, she takes her friends to the den, walled in knotty pine. A brick fireplace faces the modern bar. The furniture, with its red-and-ten leather, the gay scarlet-and-blue rug, and the red Venetian blinds are accents of color.

Odd lamp standards and shades, Japanese figures, and quaint statuettes, all testify to her artistic appreciation. The recessed shelves contain a mixed library: histories, biographies, as well as romantic novels and things written in the brittle modern manner.

Loretta's directorio bedroom is dainty in blue and peach, with a French carpet, 18th century wood carvings, and her exquisite Dresden figurines.

She isn't much of a cook, but she loves to sew. During her illness last year she made breakfast jackets for her mother and sisters and six slips for herself. Absolutely without false pride, she will get down on her knees and scrub her bathroom floor if the maid is very busy. Her own room is scrupulously clean and neat.

The idol of her little half sister, Georgianna Belzer, who is almost twelve, Loretta expresses much of her maternal spirit in doing things for the child. Particularly since the other girls married, they are comrades.

Touched by others' suffering, she gives generously to worthy causes and to help individuals, many of whom do not know the name of their benefactress. But she never discusses such acts and objects when her mother tells about them.

So Loretta stands today, young and lovely and kind, with unknown possibilities ahead of her in her personal life and in her work. With buoyant faith, she expects all her wonderful dreams to come true. The End.
That Tough Tracy Kid

Another kindly friend of the Tracys recalls incident about Spence.

"It was an evening in early spring," she recounts, "and I was returning from the grocery store with two big boxes of strawberries when I met Mrs. Disch.

"'What lovely berries,' she said.

"'How much did they cost?'

"I told her they were ten cents a box, so she gave Spence a quarter and sent him to the store. The next morning, when Mrs. Tracy was out in the back yard, she told me she thought the grocer was unfair, charging me only twenty cents for two boxes and her a quarter.

"'Hm-m-m, I thought, and when I went to the grocer's next morning I questioned him about it.

"'Why,' he said, 'I charged that Tracy boy only ten cents a box, too. He spent the extra nickel for candy, and ate it in the store before he went home.'

"I told Mrs. Tracy about it, but she only laughed. She did love her boy so much."

There are other neighbors, relatives, and friends, all proud of him, who have comments to make on Spencer Tracy as a boy. Listen to them:

Mrs. Lyle Fountoin—"A great eater, All the Tracys liked good food."

Joe Beornman—"A tough kid, but a good one. Ran with the hard-boiled gang of the neighborhood."

Mrs. Fountoin's sister goes more into detail.

"I remember the time he returned after his first year as a freshman at Ripon College. He took me for a ride in his father's car."

"'Well, Spence,' I said as we rolled along, 'how are you getting on with your studies?'

"'Not so good,' he answered. 'To tell you the truth, I'm not interested in anything but dramatics.'

"'Then dramatics is what you should major in,' I said."

Spencer Tracy took her advice. And now that the years have passed quickly and slowly for some on Kinnikinick Avenue and quickly and slowly for some in Hollywood, Spence's choice of his major study has proved to be correct.

It's Never Been Told

two of the twelve young business and professional men that made up the gang that chatted about the girls, called for her and took her to meet Kay and Virginia.

She had on some sort of rose-colored velvet gown, made by one of the town's leading costumers. It might have been a Louis Quatorze, trimmed with gold lace. Whatever it was, it illuminated Kay's beauty until it was almost breath-taking. The costumer realized this possibility. That is why he had created it expressly for Kay and secured her consent to wear it in the grand march. He knew that her appearance in his dress would bring him fame.

But Kay, always full of healthy fun, was restless in the velvet elegance. The gang milled about the small living-room, putting off its departure until the last moment. Finally Kay could stand the formality of the dress no more. She retreated to the tiny bedroom and came out a few moments later clad in the homemade page costume that her mother, the former actress, Katherina Clinton, had made for her. At last she was comfortably attired. Of course she returned to the velvet masterpiece before the party went on to the Beaux-Arts rout. But the gesture was like today's Kay. She would rather wear slacks or palomos than the elaborates dresses that are created for her by Worner's Orrie Kelly. She is not interested in fussy clothes.

About a year and a half after Kay met Lois, she and Virginia gave up their apartment, and Kay and Lois took one together. Kay was making thirty-five a week. Lois fifty; the apartment rented for seventy-five a month.

It was in predepression days and living costs were sky-high. Their one extravagance was that each girl had her own phone. They were taking no chances on losing an invitation because the other one was keeping Mr. Bell's device busy with her date-making. That the girls barely got by on their joint earnings, didn't bother them at all. They were having a big time for themselves. Kay's beauty was attracting even more attention—men, screen tests, proposals of this, that, and the other thing.

Kay never bothered about patronizing the beauty salons to enhance her looks. Her short, smart hair cut, which set the nation's style as soon as it was seen on the screen, was contrived in a men's barber shop. Gown designers begged her to wear their creations.
knowing that Kay was present at all the places where the smartest people gathered. Unconcerned, Kay danced all night, was up early the next morning to take a screen test. She never even thought about conserving her energies. She was disgustingly healthy.

Kay still has fun, but it's not the riotous fun of ten years ago. Her amusements are tempered to spectator sports, instead of active athletics; to dinners, a few parties.

When Kay went to Hollywood and a screen career, it spelled the end of the household of Francis and Long. Four years passed, during which much happened, before the girls met again.

Much happened, yes. Lois was divorced from cartoonist Peter Arno; Kay was married to actor Kenneth MacKenna. One morning, at a little ramshackle farmhouse that she had taken for the season, so her small daughter could have country air, Lois had a wire from Kay saying that she and her new husband were coming to see her. Knowing Kay so well, Lois was nevertheless a little frightened at the prospect of entertaining a Hollywood star. Supposing Kay had changed? To add to her panic, the water main had burst, which deprived the house of water.

Lois, not without ingenuity, hurried to the small town's general store and bought all available old-fashioned chino receptacles and hastily thrust them in the conventional spots in the bedroom. She was relying on the healthy humor of the Kay she had known to help her over a discomfiting situation. If Kay had grown storied, conscious, she was lost. If Kay had not, she knew the scene would bring one of her hearty laughs. Kay and her husband arrived. Kay took one look, and laughed that throaty, lush laugh that. Lois remembered from their Thirty-ninth Street apartment days. The week-end was a glorious reunion for the friends. P.S. The water main was repaired that afternoon.

Their last meeting was this past summer. Lois Long made her first trip to Hollywood to write dialogue.

"Kay, for the first time, is thinking of to-morrow, instead of spending all she makes to-day," said Lois Long. But with her sense of humor Kay is still very-lovely. A good joke is still worth a deep, throaty Francis-con laugh.

BETTE DAVIS means the beloved servant of God. In this instance the idea of servant is contained in both the first and last name. Bette is a shortened spelling for Betty, which is short for Elizabeth, and Elizabeth is from the Hebrew meaning a worshiper or servant consecrated to God. Davis, on the other hand, is obviously derived from David, which is also Hebrew and means beloved; but influencing this last name we have the Latin word Davus, which in ancient Roman comedies was the stock name for a servant or slave in the drama. Incidentally, the Latin phrase "Davus sum," meaning: after all, I'm only Davus, a servant, was equivalent in those days to our modern expression "ask me another."

JOAN BLONDELL means the little light-haired one who is a gift from God. Joan is a feminine version of the masculine John, which comes from the Hebrew and means a gift from God. Blondell is a diminutive of the French for blond, and means the little light-haired one. An interesting corollary on the name Joan, by the way, is that between the thirteenth and seventeenth centuries more than a hundred and fifty authors claimed that there was a woman pope of that name.

CHARLES RUGGLES means the strong and manly shaker, and the name suggests a hearty handshake. Charles is German for strong and manly. Ruggles is Scotch for one who shakes, rattles, tugs or pulls, and is ultimately derived from an Icelandic word meaning to rock.

GEORGE BRENT means a farmer with a smooth brow. George is from the Greek meaning husbandman, or farmer. Brent is of Anglo-Saxon origin, and means a high, smooth, unwrinkled forehead.

certainly there is beauty and talent, innocence and sophistication among the modern movie queens, but show me one who has earned the title of "America's Sweetheart" or any such endearing term from the masses. Something will be lacking in either looks, character, or human warmth in any one you name.

Grace Moore and Irene Dunne can be forgiven facial imperfections because of their voices; ditto Jeanette MacDonald's profile. Madge Evans, Janet Gaynor, Jean Parker, Mary Brian and a few others cash in on their reputations for sweet harmlessness. Bette Davis and Joan Crawford undoubtedly owe their prominence to enormous, staring eyes and distorted features.

Maureen O'Sullivan will never be anything but a street urchin in looks no matter how good are the rôle she is given, just as Loretta Young must always remain the thick-lipped Tenton she was born. Age has so patently overtaken Kay Francis, Norma Shearer, Constance Bennett, Dolores del Rio, Marion Davies, Ruth Chatterton, and Gloria Swanson, that they are no longer in the running.

Ann Harding has never been anything other than a lifeless doll with a slightly sinister expression on her face, and Greta Garbo and Marlene Dietrich aren't even wax. They are pure wood, with their hollow cheeks and soppy eyes, false eyelashes, et cetera. If Katharine Hepburn or Margaret Sullivan have any talent, they do not take time off from their silly publicity-seeking stunts to show it.

On again, off again—that’s the record of the Errol Flynn-Lily Damita marriage which occurred in June, 1935. Latest is their decision to give it another trial. So they’re off on a second honeymoon.
And speaking of queens, reminds me that the laurels for perfection in every respect must go to two men. A couple of blond princes, composite pictures of charm, grace, physical perfection, and what winning ways and glorious voices! One with a trained baritone to make the welkin ring when he raises it, and the other with the natural soft cadences to steal your heart away! What a riot it would be if they ever played together! It's too much to hope for, but you must have guessed their identities, anyway. Nelson Eddy and Gene Raymond. Long may they reign! Ernest Cavender.

her followers. I give her credit, too, for sticking to her type through thick and thin and not trying to go grand or arty or ladylike. Her picture is a fine example of a Hollywood starlet in a small town and the rumpus she creates. Her support is splendid.

"As You Like It."—20th Century-Fox. Elisabeth Bergner's flight into Shakespeare isn't at all edifying. It is rather deplorable, even though it may have the indorsement of Europe and Sir James M. Barrie. She does more to keep Shakespeare off the screen than be the lead in a production standing with the film-going public. There is less fault with the production and the condensed version of the comedy than with Bergner's Rosalind. But the picture still has the aspect and flavor of a photographed stage play. However, Bergner is the snag that stands in the way of accepting it even as a satisfactory adaptation. Instead of the warm and pensive heroine of literature, we have a sexless creature—Gemma of "Escape Me Never," chirping the lovely speeches in a German accent. Undoubtedly it is modern, but it is neither poetic nor glamorous. However, the fine company of bona-fide Britons surrounding the star do justice to their native tongue and Barric reads are worth seeing on their account.

"Three Men on a Horse."—Warner Bros. The current comedy success of the New York stage comes to the screen with none of its humor lost. Of its original authors, I do not say this with reservation but as identification for those who know nothing about the play and are not, perhaps, likely to catch the rat-race taxi-drivers. For it is a wisecracking insight into the lives and psychology of that class. Witty, revealing, it is a perfect photograph of Broadway taxi cabs. At this writing the stage play is in its hundredth week in New York, is on tour and has run successfully for the majorities. We have Frank McHugh in his best performance, incidentally—a quaintly dumb writer of greeting-card verse, who is selected by a psychic hair for picking the right horse to win. This faculty is an attraction for professionals. Followers of the races who attach themselves to him with hilarious results. All this makes for coarse, bawdy entertainment hugely accented by clever direction and a cast more appealing to picture-goers than that in the stage version although two of the better members of the latter, Sam Levene and Ted Healy, have their original roles with heartiness.

"Theodore Goes Wild."—Columbia. Irene Dunne and Melvyn Douglas are teamed in a gay, frothy, inconsequential comedy that serves beautifully to throw into high relief their ability to put across the light touch in a way that doesn't make the beholder squirm with embarrassment. Both are joys. Mr. Douglas because of his technique, born of stage experience, Miss Dunne because she rises so engagingly to the occasion and brings so much personal loveliness and innate humor to the situations. Especially do I praise her for never losing her identity in the merry doings; never stooping to clown or becoming a jumping-jack in the delusion that it is comedy. She is still a lady, praise be, but such a daintily frolicsome story has Miss Dunne, flanked by maiden aunts, in a small town, publishing hectic novels under an assumed name and meeting the self-proclamed artist who illustrates them. The expected battle of wits and emotions follows, with a conclusion that is right if not surprising. The company is splendid, especially Elisabeth Risdon and Spring Byington.

"Tarzan Escapes."—MGM. How would you like to have a rustic house in a tall jungle tree, with an elephant to motor your elevator up and down? And a lion for the roost and the overhead fan, as well as Maureen O'Sullivan or Johnny Weissmuller for your mate? These are some of the charms of the new "Tarzan" picture; the excitement are supplied by man and beast, the comedy by "Cheetah," an amazingly well-trained chimpanzee. Mr. Weissmuller repeats his much-liked picturesque, athletic performance and Miss O'Sullivan is winning and enchanting. The English girl who prefers a jungle love to five o'clock-tea at home. The fascination of the "Tarzan" pictures for young and old lies in wish fulfillment, as the psychiatrists call it. More than any other screen star, they enable us to forget the world of realities and live enchantingly free of hampering conventions.

JUNE VARNER.—Tommy Rup was born in Norfolk, Virginia, about 1927. He is 51 inches tall, weighs 51 pounds, and has blond hair. Appeared on the screen in “Mating Time” at the age of fourteen months. His latest is “Conflict,” with John Wayne. You might address him at the Universal Studio.

ONTARIO, CANADA.—Bruce Cabot lead the mob in “Fury.” He was born in Carlsbad, New Mexico, April 29, 1910; six feet one and a half, weighs 180, dark brown hair, gray eyes. Married to Adrienne Ames. He also appeared in “Em Perfection.”

DOROTHY HELM.—We published an interview with Michael Whalen in the November issue. This may be had by sending your order with remittance of fifteen cents to Subscription Dept. He was born in Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania, June 30th; six feet two; brown hair, blue eyes. Irving Thalberg was born in New York, New York.

D. S.—If you will send me a stamped envelope I’ll be glad to tell you where you might get stills of all those films you list.

JESSIE FAN.—For a photograph of Jessie Matthews, address the Gaumont-Brilliant Studio, Lime Grove, Shepherd’s Bush, London, W. 12, England. A music publisher like G. Schirmer, 3 East 4th Street, New York City, might be able to supply a copy of the song she sang in “Evergreen” called “Springtime in Your Heart.” For stills of “Champagne Waltz” such as you saw in Picture Play, address the Publicity Dept., Paramount Bldg., Times Square, New York, and for one of “The Devil Is a Sissy,” Metro-Goldwyn, 1540 Broadway, New York. They cost ten cents each.
ON APPROVAL!

We defy you to tell this tiny from one costing $300.00! If you are not able to obtain them by addressing the Gaumont-British Publicity Dept., 1600 Broadway, New York, inlosing ten cents for each.

M. L.—There doesn’t seem to be any fan club listed in honor of Joan Blondell. She is appearing in “Three Men on a Horse” and will be seen next in “Gold Diggers of 1932.” She became Mrs. Dick Powell on September 19th.

NINA MAY.—Desmond Tester, who played with Nova Pilbeam in “Nine Days a Queen,” was born in London, England, February 17, 1919; free feet, one, with auburn hair and hazel eyes. His parents are non-professionals. Has had stage experience. You’ll see him in Maurice Chevalier’s English-made picture, “The Beloved Vagabond.” It is true that Nelson Eddy wears glasses for reading but surely that doesn’t mean he is going blind.

R. A. Y.—Low Ayres was born in Minneapolis, Minnesota, December 26, 1908; five feet nine inches; 150 pounds; brown hair, dark-blue eyes. Educated at the University of Arizona. He was divorced from Lola Lane in 1933. Married Ginger Rogers in 1934, but they are now separated. Played with an orchestra before entering films. Made “Shakedown” and “Panic on the Air” for Columbia. For stills, write to the Publicity Dept. of that company at 729 Seventh Avenue, New York, enclosing ten cents for each still desired. He is scheduled to make “O’Reilly of Notre Dame” for Paramount.

R. J. E.—After completing “Meet Nero Wolfe,” Victor Jory went to Australia to appear in two pictures. We have never published an interview with him in Picture Play.

BETTY COLIN.—Tony Martin, who sang in “Sing, Baby, Sing,” is a former night club singer. He also had a small part in “Follow the Fleet” as one of Fred Astaire’s sailor buddies.

Ginger Rogers Fan.—The May, 1936, issue containing a gallery portrait of Miss Rogers, may he be had by sending your remittance of fifteen cents to our Subscription Dept. I regret to tell you that the January, 1936, number has been completely exhausted.

Dr. W. D.—Karen Morley will be seen next in “Beloved Enemy,” with Merle Oberon and Brian Aherne. She was born in Ottumwa, Iowa, December 12th. Her son was three in September. “Too Busy To Work” was Dick Powell’s second picture for the screen. Marian Nixon is still in films, now playing opposite (site George Houston in “Captain Calamity.”

H. E. C.—An interview with Boris Karloff appeared in February, 1933. To receive information on ordering your remittance of fifteen cents to our Subscription Dept. I must ask you to send a stamped envelope if you wish a list of his films.

Capra Captures Top Screen Honors With “LOST HORIZON”

By RUSSELL PATTERTON

THAT man Capra has done it again! And when I say “again” I don’t mean that his new Columbia picture is just as good as “Mr. Deeds”, “It Happened One Night”, etc. I mean it’s better! “Lost Horizon” is so magnificent artistically and so gripping dramatically that it stands practically alone on my private and unofficial recommended list for the month. I know you’ve heard about this famous James Hilton best-seller and its unique story of a secret romantic paradise on the roof of the world. So I don’t have to tell you what a stupendous job it was to reproduce this fabulous Oriental “hideout” on the screen, and to portray the amazing romance that takes place within its walls. But Columbia, Capra and Colman have done it—done it so superbly that for my money “Lost Horizon” is going to be one of those talked-about pictures that everybody just has to see. The star role is the best thing I’ve seen Ronald Colman do, and the supporting efforts of Edward Everett Horton, Margo, H. B. Warner, Jane Wyatt and thousands of others, plus Robert Riskin’s exciting adaptation, all go to make “Lost Horizon” a big picture in every sense of the word. I’m telling you—don’t miss it!

FASCINATING FACTS ABOUT “LOST HORIZON”

- It was two years in the making
- The cost numbers 150
- Two complete towns were erected for the production
- One set alone took 150 men two months to build
- Book translated in 14 languages

DEATH waits outside the mystery plane grounded in a secret corner of the earth from which no man has ever escaped.

KIDNAPPING an unknown lover (Ronald Colman) from the other side of the earth, Sondra (Jane Wyatt) imprisons him in her fabulous Oriental “hideout” on the roof of the world.

changed my name from "Miss" to "Mrs."

LES than a year ago I was friendless, lonely, unhappy. No one seemed to take to me. Then came the amazing event that changed my whole life. Suddenly I found myself with hosts of friends—the center of attraction—the life of every party. I was popular everywhere.

Here's how it happened!

Somehow I've never had the knack of making friends. I was never noticed at a party. Always I found myself sitting alone, I guess as my own fault, though I had nothing to offer! No musical ability—no gift of wit—nothing to entertain others. So I was left to myself more and more—left to dreaded solitude.

One night my spirits were at their lowest ebb. I sat in my lonely room gazing from the window. Suddenly from across the street through an open window came the sound of jazz and happy laughter. I could see couples dancing—others talking—all having a good time.

Everything seemed to center around the girl at the piano—Mary Nelson. How I envied her! She had friends, popularity, happiness—all the things I longed for—but didn't have! I was just an outsider. I turned away with a lump in my throat.

The next afternoon I dropped over to see Mary. I unburdened my heart to her—told her how lonely and depressed I felt. To cheer me up Mary sat down at the piano and began to play. The time sped fast as rhapsodies, waltzes, jazz hits, sonatas poured from her expert fingers. When she had finished, I sighedviously.

"Thanks, Mary, it was wonderful. What wouldn't I give to live like that! But it's too late now! I should have had a teacher when I was in school—like you!"

Mary smiled and said: "Ann, I never had a teacher in my life. In fact, not so long ago I couldn't play a note."

"Impossible!" I exclaimed. "How did you do it?"

The New Way To Learn Music

Then she told me about a wonderful new short-cut method of learning music that has been perfected by the U. S. School of Music. You learn real music from the start. When I left Mary it was with new hope. If she could learn to play this way, so could I. That very night I wrote for the Free Book and Demonstration Lesson.

Three days later they arrived. I never dreamed that learning to play the piano could be so simple—even easier than Mary had pictured it. And as the lessons continued, they got easier. Although I never had any "talent" I was playing my favorite pieces—almost before I knew it. Soon I will be able to play jazz, ballads, classical numbers, all with equal ease.

Then came the night that proved the turning point of my whole life. Once more I was going to a party and this time I would have something to offer.

What a moment that was when our hostess, apparently troubled, exclaimed: "Isn't it a shame that Mary Nelson can't be here. What will we do without someone to play the piano?"

Amazed at my own confidence, I spoke up:

"I'll try to fill Mary's place—if you're not too critical."

Everyone seemed surprised. "Why, I didn't know she played!" someone behind whispered.

As I struck the first ringing chords of Nevin's lovely "Airesissi," a hush fell over the room. I could hardly believe it, but—was holding the party spellbound!

When I finished you should have heard them applaud! Everyone insisted I play more! Only too glad, I played after pieces. Before the evening was over, I had been invited to three more parties. And it wasn't long until I met Tom who shortly afterward asked me to become his wife.

This story is typical. You too can learn to play your favorite instrument by this remarkable easy "at home" method that has helped thousands of men and women to increased pleasure and financial gain. And there's nothing marvelous about it. It's just a common sense practical method—all simple people don't have to know the slightest thing about music. You find your progress amazingly rapid because every step is easy to understand.

NEXT MONTH: WHY IS MYRNA LOY THE PERFECT WIFE?
THE INSIDE STORY OF "MAID OF SALEM"

By FRANK LLOYD

(Director of "Cavalcade", "The Sea Hawk", "Mutiny on the Bounty")

Naturally, ever since "Mutiny on the Bounty" swept the country, I've been on the lookout for another yarn with the same sweep and power to bring to the screen. I wanted a story with plenty of drama and with plenty of chance for me to direct big out of doors scenes, the kind I get the most kick out of.

» Well, to make a long story short, I found just such a yarn ... "Maid of Salem". Here is the story of a young girl and a young lad who have the nerve to fight off a whole town of fanatics who try to break up their love ... a story with the same drive and surge of "Mutiny". For here love and courage face the fanatic venom of a whole mob of Captain Blighs.

» But finding a story is only half a director's battle. The next thing was to find stars able to play the parts. I had recently directed Claudette Colbert in "Under Two Flags" and knew what she could do in a highly emotional part. Fortunately, I was able to cast her as the stout-hearted little "Maid of Salem". A hero? I needed a swashbuckling, hard-boiled lad who could carve his way with a cutlass through an armed mob, with a grin on his face ... I found him. Fred MacMurray, I honestly believe, does as fine a job in this picture as any of the heroes of my big adventure pictures. The girls are going to say it's Fred's swellest part.

» Last but not least a producer-director has got to have freedom to make a picture his own way. I, personally, want my pictures absolutely authentic. If it's an historical picture, I want my history correct. Well, let me say, right here and now, Paramount has made this, my first picture for their company, the easiest I have ever worked on. For they have told me to spare no expense to make "Maid of Salem" the most authentic, the most powerful of my productions. So I think when you see "Maid of Salem" you will agree with me that it tops them all for sheer entertainment.

A typical Lloyd action scene, a bunch of hard-boiled vagabonds hitting their strength against the courage of one tough lad and his stout sword arm.

Frank Lloyd looking for a new screen yarn.

Frank Lloyd on the set with Claudette Colbert as the cameras start cranking for "Maid of Salem".

Claudette Colbert in her greatest part, as the young New England girl who dares the wrath of a whole countryside for the love of her dashing Southern hero.

Fred MacMurray in his first big historical role since "The Texas Rangers", as a swashbuckling Southern gentleman who can carve his way through any mob with his good sword.
How Much Opera?

I HAVE just read the letters in December Picture Play, which is, by the way, the finest fan magazine, and the only one I read.

With all due respect for Miss Watling's devotion to opera, may I suggest that Victor Herbert's "Rose-Marie" is not so trite and light as she would have us believe. Of course, it cannot compare with "The Barber of Seville" or other of the purely operatic plays.

When a person goes to see a Nelson Eddy picture, he is generally pleased to hear him sing "Rose-Marie," "Song of the Mounties," or other songs from Herbert's operetta. They suit his grand voice beautifully, and more people enjoy them than they would the more serious operas. Mr. Eddy would be very fine in opera—there I agree with the English fan—but do the majority of moviegoers want to see a feature-length film devoted entirely to opera?

Thanks, Sue Riddle, for your enlightening comments on Robert Taylor. Such a letter helps those who are unable to see a star in person to understand his true character. However, it must be admitted that Mr. Taylor is a good actor, and perhaps his popularity has merely gone to his head and that he will wake up to his mistake before it is too late.

I should like to express appreciation for the letters in praise of John Boles and Joan Crawford. Mr. Boles is a fine singer and has proved his acting ability in many fine films. Just why he has been neglected by 20th Century-Fox in the past, I cannot understand. He will, I hope, secure more and finer roles now that he is a free lance. Joan Crawford is surely one of the greatest actresses in pictures to-day. She may have faults, but if she has, she keeps them to herself. She doesn't shun her public, nor "go Hollywood," nor indulge in publicity stunts as so many of the top-notchers do. She is always kind and generous,

Nelson Eddy inspires a controversy. Has opera a place on the screen, or has it not? The cream of letters on the subject are printed this month.
The same mad-cap, riotous spirit that set “My Man Godfrey” apart from any other picture makes this spectacular musical DIFFERENT from anything you’ve ever seen! It tops them all!

Giant cast! Sparkling personalities! Seven songs by that never-miss hit team, McHugh and Adamson! Breath-catching gowns! Fun, frivolity, frenzy! Music, mad-waggery, mirth and magnificence!

Annette Jean Rogers, was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, July 11, 1909; six feet two and a half, weighs 181; medium brown hair and blue eyes. Attended the University of Cincinnati night school. Was checker and stoker at the grain elevator in that city; associated with radio and furniture firms and an automobile agency. Was in lumber camps in New Mexico and Arizona. Returned to his home town, then sang and announced over a radio station. In 1934 joined Ben Bernie and his band. Tested by Universal, and signed to a contract.

Betty Weinacker.—Fred MacMurray was born on August 30, 1909. That is his right name. He married Lilian Lamarre, a model, on June 29, 1935. Nelson Eddy, June 29, 1901. That is his real name. Rochelle Hudson, March 6, 1915; five feet three, weighs 105. Carole Lombard, October 6, 1908; blond hair, blue eyes. Her latest picture is "Swing High, Swing Low." Every one seems to think that Robert Taylor will marry Barbara Stanwyck. An interview with Simone Simon appeared in the January issue.

Byron Anderson.—Marion Davies was thirty-nine on January 1st. She has been in pictures since 1917. Her next release has yet to be decided upon.

H. M.—Madeleine Carroll is appearing in "Lloyds of London" and is to make "On the Avenue," with Dick Powell. She is English; five feet five, and weighs 122.

Mitzi.—We have used many pictures of Fredric March but no gallery portrait since September, 1933. This issue may be had by sending your order with remittance of fifteen cents to our Subscription Dept.

A. M. Elyard.—Glady's George was born in Maine, but she doesn't say when. She is five feet three, weighs 115, and has blond hair and hazel eyes. For stills of her in "Valiant Is the Word for Carrie," address the Paramount Publicity Dept., Paramount Bldg., Times Square, New York, and for those of "The Great Ziegfeld," Metro-Goldwyn Pictures, 1430 Broadway, New York. All stills sell for ten cents each.

Mildred A.—Maurice O'Sullivan appeared in two films with Charles Laughton, "Payment Deferred" and "The Barretts of Wimpole Street."

E. G.—Interviews with Irene Dunne appeared in March and November, 1936. Either of these issues may be had by sending your order with remittance of fifteen cents to each for subscription Dept. That is Miss Dunne's real name. She is married to Doctor Francis Griffin. They have no children.

Evelyn N.—Bobby Breen has not been legally adopted by Eddie Cantor. The latter calls him "son" only for his radio programs. For stills of "Let's Sing Again," address the Publicity Dept., RKO Pictures, RKO Bldg., Radio City, New York. They cost ten cents each. Jackie Moran is with Paramount. In the film "Anthony Adverse," Anthony at the age of ten was played by Billy Mauch, and Anthony's son by Angela was played by Scotty Beckett. Billy is appearing with his twin brother, Bobby, in "The Prince and the Pauper" for Warners, and Scotty in "The Charge of the Light Brigade" for the same studio.
Salute a stunning new musical joyride produced with all the smartness and variety and zest Warner Bros. are famed for! ... A grand all-round show ... new dances ... new song hits ... and girls galore! A side-splitting story as new as the New Year! ... with a star cast of favorites willing and able to either sing it or swing it! This riot of rhythm and fun easily takes the screen honors of the month.

"READY, WILLING and ABLE"

Ray Enright directed ... Bobby Connolly arranged the dance ensembles ... And Johnny Mercer and Richard Whiting wrote the 3 song hits—"Too Marvelous for Words", "Sentimental and Melancholy", and "Just a Quiet Evening".
What the Fans Think

Nelson Eddy Overrated.

With regard to Freda Wakeling's letter in the December issue about Nelson Eddy, I'd like to put it in my two cents' worth. In my opinion, Eddy is a very much overrated young man. He has a good voice, that is to say he has unfailingly studied hard and handles his voice well. His tone are often not as pure and mellow as they should be; and the quality of his voice leaves much to be desired. It reveals that same dullness and flatness that characterizes his speaking voice. It lacks life and animation and warmth. And that is something that a voice either has or hasn't. No amount of work and study will develop it when it is lacking.

Further, I would like to ask what was Freda Wakeling's idea about James Melton in her letter? I'm rather afraid she doesn't know much about music or she would realize that it is scarcely true to say that he is "not much worse than a crooner." I have heard him on the concert stage and on the radio countless times and his voice is distinguished by exquisite clarity and mellowness of tone, as well as by that same life and warmth which Mr. Eddy lacks.

"Romeo and Juliet" a Classic.

Out of the hundreds of films produced each year, only a very few are of outstanding quality—only a few are classics that will go down in history. "Ben-Hur" was one and now "Romeo and Juliet" is another. Here certainly is a gem for the treasure house of beautiful film productions. The presentation of "Romeo and Juliet" at the Majestic Theater in London was an event of the year—society and film celebrities turned out for this great evening. Many police were needed to control the large crowds that gathered outside. The film was cheered by the most enthusiastic audience I have ever seen, and to every one's delight, Basil Rathbone, being the only actor in the film over here that evening, made a magnificent speech from the balcony. The whole audience gave and gaveglorious tribute to Irving Thalberg.

Perhaps Leslie Howard is more the poetic dreamer than the passionate youth, but I cannot think of any one who could deliver the beautiful passages as he does. His gestures and sensitive expressions add to the charm of the words which he speaks with perfect naturalness and unfeigned grace.

And who can say one word against Nelson Eddy's beautiful and inspiring performance? She is well rewarded by the many months of study she put into this part. Her acting is truly enchanting, and no trace of accent mars the perfect beauty of her speeches. And any fear that her age might make the role too mature for its original conception is banished by the easy and childlike unhappiness she so happily displays in her earlier scenes. It is indeed very difficult—almost impossible—to imagine any screen actress who could have played Juliet so well as Miss Shearer, and I'll warrant her acting will be valued the best and most outstanding of the year.

It is very interesting to compare "Romeo and Juliet" with "As You Like It," produced in England. One would have naturally thought Shakespeare in England would have been absolutely perfect. But no, it is America who has achieved this accomplishment.

I'm afraid Elizabeth Bergner made a great mistake in playing Hamlet. Her voice is so terribly un-English and the accent so very noticeable against the very English voices of the rest of the cast, who, by the way, were excellent. Laurence Olivier makes a perfect Orlando. I am afraid Miss Bergner rather spoiled what might have been a very good film. To me, she was just Gemini Jones from "Escape Me Never" in fancy dress.

And now it's up to America to give us a perfect Hamlet. Jinx Edwards, 7 Carlton Vale, London, N. W. 6, England.

Bob's Handwriting.

NOT long ago I was fortunate to get enough of my favorite star's handwriting to give a fairly complete analysis of his character. I am referring to Robert Taylor, and the mention of this star's character recalls to mind a letter which was published in Picture Play for December in which the writer seems to be anti-Taylor. I am going to do my best to correct her impression of Mr. Taylor, not by my own unimportant opinion, but by the irrevocable facts of graphology.

1. Self-respect. Taylor is definitely not conceited. This is shown by the plain simple capitals. The usual way he forms an "R" shows originality.

2. He is lacking in self-assurance and very sensitive.

3. Excellent imagination and keen vision. Fluency of thought.

4. Tendency to complete a task quickly rather than accurately. Good judgment and precision.

5. Friendliness, good entertainer.

6. A quick thinker, always on the go—either mentally or physically.

7. Physical strength.

I believe readers will agree with me that graphology is not like fortune telling. It is logical that a person should express his emotions through his hands.

19th Century-Fox.

Along Come Don Ameche.

THREE rousing cheers for Don Ameche! There is a newcomer who is not receiving the praise he deserves. He was so grand in "Ramona" and so miscast in "Ladies in Love," that I should think 20th Century-Fox would come to their senses and put him in the right pictures. I was just becoming a little weary with all the so-called actors who do nothing but walk about reciting lines, when this talented player came along. He goes about his work so seriously that it is a pleasure to view his untinted, finished performances on the screen, and his fine, rich speaking voice is a delight to listen to.

He was an ideal Alessandro in "Ramona," so convincing and sincere, as if he had been born for the part, and I believe that of all the pictures he might make he will be best remembered by this one. I shall never forget his scene with the small-town doctor.

In "Ladies in Love," he did well what he had to do, but the part was definitely intended to be done by a player we have meant of Don Ameche and that he be given bigger and better parts.

Robert Slotterbeck, 6610 Makee Avenue, Los Angeles, California.

Speaking of Voices—

I HAVE been a reader of Picture Play for years, but this is the first time I have been impelled to write my views about the different voices in the films—Burt Lancaster and all because of Norbert Lusk,—to whom my salutations—praise of John Geilgud in "Secret Agent." But, Mr. Lusk, you forgot this great actor's finest attribute—his beautiful voice and perfect diction.

What so grand as an actor for a father? That's what Carol Ann thinks of her darling daddy, Robert Young, who spends all his time with her when he isn't at the studio.

Speaking of Voices—

I HAVE been a reader of Picture Play for years, but this is the first time I have been impelled to write my views about the different voices in the films—Burt Lancaster and all because of Norbert Lusk,—to whom my salutations—praise of John Geilgud in "Secret Agent." But, Mr. Lusk, you forgot this great actor's finest attribute—his beautiful voice and perfect diction.

What so grand as an actor for a father? That's what Carol Ann thinks of her darling daddy, Robert Young, who spends all his time with her when he isn't at the studio.
What the Fans Think

And these are affected and artificial: Joan Crawford and Carole Lombard.
And these just frankly hideous: Jean Harlow, Toby Wing—worst of all—Jean Marsh, Ginger Rogers, and Paula Stone.

A Vogue With Men.

I THINK that Mary Edwards's letter in the November issue is rather absurd.
She says that men curling their hair is a feminine practice and curly-haired men of the movies make her sick. I wish to remind Miss Edwards that throughout the ages men of the artistic class have curled their hair. To-day the custom is no longer confined to the musician or the poet, but has become the vogue among truck-drivers, grocery salesmen and even cops. And why not? Since women have adopted cigarette smoking, why can't men curl their hair without criticism?

A Masterly Exposition.

ONE Aircraftsman Read, a recent contributor to "What the Fans Think," is a bloke I like. I hope he's got a good head with one of these days, should Dame Fortune favor our meetings. His exposition of my views of the Great Garbo was absolutely masterly.

But why did he not make a complete job of things by carrying the debunking process further? The microscopic business is superfluous when considering the disabilities of people like Marlene Dietrich, Ginger Rogers, (our own Jessie Matthews could dance her boots off), the Marx Brothers, Ann Harding, Katharine Hepburn, Shirley Temple, and a few thousand more. Were I to give a complete list of the people who give me a pain in the neck, I am afraid you would have to print a special edition, which would be at least one benefit I had conferred upon humanity.

While on the subject of moans, why can't some of the powers that be give Clark Gable a decent role?
And I really must add James Cagney to the list of definitely undesirables.
Three, or even more, cheers for Minnie Mouse!—RICHARD STANFORTH.

The Voice of Experience.

THERE are many ways in which Picture Play excels, but in nothing is this more evident than in the "What the Fans Think" department. The letters are real expressions of opinion—not press-agent blurs. I wish to protest against Miss Fielder's reference to inefficient secretaries.

The secretary of a celebrity must handle an amount of work that would be divided among four people in a business office. I know. I have tried both. You must be mail clerk, telephone operator, letter writer, etc. etc. I could go on and on and not tell the half of it. In my case, I also did some ghost writing. As any display of crudity would have been entirely out of keeping with the character I was impersonating, this was easy.

Nor was this all. I had to keep track of my employer's love affairs. The end of one usually dovetailed with the beginning of another, the result of fault less technique on the part of our hero. My job was to remember he was always available to the current heart interest and at the same time invent assorted excuses to stall off all others. With all these duties, would it be so very terrible if I occasionally missed a photo?

Although it has been some time since I moved on from this work to something better, it still irks me to read these everlasting complaints from fans about no

Garbo!

Her “Camille” is one of the great pictures, her performance one of the marvels of cinema acting that will live long in the rapidly moving panorama of screen achievement. Hers is the “Camille” that might end all “Camilles.” There seems nothing more for the famous character to say and do until she is brought to us by television. But who will play Marguerite Gautier more implicitly, more eloquently, more poetically? There is no answer from the living. Garbo is the last word, must, seems ever be the last word until a nameless atom, now unborn, rises years hence as the new queen of dramatic art. Garbo leaves nothing desired, nothing unsaid. She is perfection and beyond perfection. She is sublime. Her impersonation of the fated Lady of the Camillas is as surely a work of art as painting, sculpture, music, literature.

She takes a character worn threadbare through repetition and makes it new, fresh, vital, and important. Not by changing her outward self, for she still is the Garbo of old. Nor, so far as her screen roles go, is Marguerite different. Garbo has played other heroines whose tragic experience in love caused their undoing, others who sacrificed themselves for love and died in expiation of having loved too much. The Dumas heroine follows the Garbo formula. Why, then, is she different when she comes to life now? Why is Garbo’s incarnation the greatest of this generation, comparable only to those of the legendary Bernhardt and Duse? For one thing the character comes to us rewritten, the play set forth simply, humanly, the flourishes of sentimentality gone, consciousness of “big” scenes muted. The big scenes are more poignant in implication than in elocution. I think, too, that Garbo is grand because she doesn’t allow Marguerite to be sorry for herself. Instead, she allows us to discover that we are sorry for her. We know that she is fated, not because she has a cough, not that she is “immoral,” but because she is too beautiful to live.

The stage has given us scores of different interpretations, the rôle being capable of many variations. We have had Marguerites whose ready tears were the first concern of the actresses playing her: Marguerites of such advanced age that death in the last act seemed ready to catch up with them in the first; Marguerites too elegant to be promiscuous: Marguerites too physically frail ever to offer consolation to any man: some so statuesque as to suggest the obvious means of getting rid of Armand’s father by ejecting him bodily: others frenetic, coarse, or just melancholy; and a great many with nothing to offer except memorizing the lines, standing aside from the part to let the playwright tell the story.

Why Garbo is great, as I see the character, is that she is modern, forthright. She faces life bravely in the artificial half-world of Paris in the 1850s. She refuses to glorify the woman except by marvelous acting and inescapable glamour, but she is never sordid. She asks Armand, at their first meeting, to go out and buy her some marrons glacé. It is the petted darling, the favorite of rich men, who is speaking. She is spoiled, capricious, likes to be waited on and likes, too, to send a handsome young man on a trifling errand to show her power. And all this in Garbo’s smiling request for candied chestnuts!

However, it is not in any one scene that she shows her power to create a mood, convey a thought. It is not in trifles that Garbo is brilliant but in the sweep and completeness of her characterization. She creates drama when she turns her head or lowers her eyes. Her acting shimmers with infinite variety and she utter not a word that doesn’t say more than the word. In the three most important episodes in the play, always the test by which an actress rises or falls, Garbo is, of course, superb. These scenes are the encounter with Armand’s father, the moment when she pleads with Armand not to enter into a duel with De Lavalle, with his subsequent denunciation of her, and in her death scene. All three have been played in many ways, but I like Garbo’s best of any that I have seen. She is so reasonable in her reaction to the elder Duval’s plea that she give up his son. She distains him of the reproaches the character usually heaps upon Marguerite, which pave the way for the conventional “Never! I am sick.” in which old-time actresses used to exult when it came to the show-down, followed by the famous letter-writing scene with its torrent of tears. Garbo shows it all in her eyes as the old gentleman has gone and the camera gives us a memorable close-up. She is like nothing so much as a deer with a dagger piercing its heart—or a dying swan.

SINCE this cannot go on and on, let us consider the death scene. Without benefit of make-up to create the illusion of mortal sickness, Garbo nevertheless shows it in her face because it comes from within. She is dying and we know she knows that she is dying. Her face has the luminous beauty of utter spirituality, her voice reduced to a whisper that is not of this earth, her body miraculously light and flat, hardly a body at all, as we see when she is lifted and carried. Garbo is not a small woman nor a frail one, as we all know. How does she do it? But it is never the physical aspect alone of her acting that causes wonderment and awe. It is her inner understanding, her marvelous adaptability to the camera, the power of that instrument to penetrate her mind and soul and to bring forth rich treasure.

NOW for Robert Taylor. His Armand is amazingly fine, the only portrayal of the character that has reached me to the fullest extent. Forty-year-old stage stars have read the lines beautifully, simulating youthful fervor but never convincing any one. Talented juveniles, without number, have played the rôle opposite veteran Marguerites, and portly tenors with the front of ambassadors have sung the part, but no one has ever been sorry for any of them. Mr. Taylor makes one sorry for him because he stands for youth and all youth’s arders and perplexities in conflict with a conventional world. Swept off his feet by first love, he causes one to share his belief that because of that love every problem of life is solved and that the future will be one grand, sweet song. His is the most truly romantic Armand that I have seen because he, like Garbo, communicates the feeling that he is on fire. He is dignified, simple, direct, avoiding all the earmarks of that repugnant type, the professional lover, yet persuading you to believe that he does love greatly and with the gentleness of true passion. Mr. Taylor does not tear his hair and rend his cravat as I have seen some Armands in the stress of what passed for emotion, nor does he hurl money at Marguerite with the force of a load of brick in the gambling scene. I have seen them do that, too. He upbraids her for her perfidy tensely, but in an undertone, and thrusts the money at her as if he were heartbroken that their love had come to this. But he does not slight the drama of the scene. And, for the first time in my experience, he makes me as sorry for Armand as one expects to be for her when death finally separates them.

BECAUSE of Mr. Taylor’s meteoric rise to fame, and the exploitation and attention lavished on him, he was on the spot when cast opposite Garbo. Comparatively inexperience, he was given an assignment that would have frightened any actor of his age. But instead of relying on personality, popularity, charm, to carry him through in the face of the overwhelming performance expected of Garbo, he faced the task with courage, self-confidence and apparent study and concentration. The result is not only a tremendous increase in his popularity, but admiration and respect for him as an actor in quarters where they never existed before.

ROSS ALEXANDER is dead, a suicide at twenty-nine. Whatever the state of mind that causes a young man to end his life, we can only wonder in vain and sympathize. When he is on the crest of popularity in his chosen work, recognized by the public and encouraged by a dearly contract, we are doubly shocked and saddened by his will to step from his place in the sun and to draw a curtain between himself and those who liked and admired him. Of all the newcomers who came to the screen at the same time, Mr. Alexander most immediately became a favorite with Picture Play readers. Hardly a day has passed without comment and inquiries about him. He was so “alive,” our readers said, and “different.” Our sympathy to his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Ross Alexander Smith, and to his widow, the former Anne Nagel.
FRED MAC MURRAY and Carole Lombard, who set a new record for perfect teamwork, as well as laughter and fun, in "Hands Across the Table" and "The Princess Comes Across," promise to top everything in their new picture, "Swing High, Swing Low."

Mr. MacMurray is a trumpeter late of the army and Miss Lombard a dancer working as a manicurist. They meet in Panama.

always do well those things which we most wont to do. Don't you think so? Besides, I've really had lots of experience;" she went on solemnly.

"My first public appearance was at Blackheath, when I was five years old. It was an amateur production called 'Children of Laughter,' and my father directed it. He is Arnold Pilbeam, and is the only other member of our family who was ever connected with the theater in any way. He wasn't an actor; he was business manager for Sir Nigel Playfair for over fifteen years, so I heard lots of slap talk from my earliest days.

"I wanted to continue on the stage, but, of course, I had to go to school instead. Besides, in England a child can't work on the professional stage until she's at least twelve years old, so I killed time by learning all I could in the meanwhile.

Nova Pilbeam is sixteen, still goes to school, and encourages no beaux. A world-famous actress, she is as far removed from the usual Hollywood ingenue as if films didn't exist. Below, you see her in the memorable "Nine Days a Queen."

---

IN Barrie's whimsical "What Every Woman Knows," he says, in speaking of charm, "If a woman has it, she needn't have anything else. And if she doesn't have it, it doesn't much matter what else she has." Yet every now and then, as though to flout this popular opinion, fate gives a favored child not only the gift of compelling charm, but adds to it talent and fine intelligence as well.

Such a favored one is Nova Pilbeam, the very young actress whose exquisite portrayal of "Lady Jane Grey" in "Nine Days a Queen" caused such a flurry of admiration from critics and fans alike.

She isn't like any one else in the whole film firmament. At times she reminds one strongly of Vilma Banky when Banky was at her loveliest; yet the Nova of to-day is even younger, more naively sweet in her warmth and tenderness than was the Hungarian star. As a matter of fact, there is something so wholly different, a lyrical quality almost hysterical, about this sixteen-year-old girl that disarms comparison with other stars, whether of the past or present. She is like an aria by Pergolesi, delicate, serene, ingratiating.

This was my impression of Nova Pilbeam before I met her; to say that a lang, frequently interrupted chat in her dressing room confirmed my opinion instead of modifying it one whit is the highest compliment I can pay her.

I found her pleased, though not impressed, with her own success.

"Ever since babyhood I've wanted to act," she explains simply, "and we NELSON EDDY AND JEANETTE MACDONALD IN "MAYTIME."
In "Maytime," a once great opera star relates the story of her rise to fame and the lover she met when it was too late. Fading back to 1865, the young sweethearts are played by Jeanette MacDonald and Nelson Eddy. The great maestro who has brought her to stardom is John Barrymore, upper center. Virginia Reid and Tom Brown, above, are the quarreling lovers to whom this tale is unfolded.
"Top of the Town" is a musical extravaganza of Broadway and Hollywood talent. The scene is New York in 1960. Doris Nolan and George Murphy, right page, play the leads. The former is an heiress with lots of daffy ideas. The latter, a band leader in a night club. With them, right, is Hugh Herbert. The troubadours with Gertrude Niesen, above, are Russell Wade, Walter Coy, and Michael Fitzmaurice.
"Qualify Street" is the tale of a young girl who has waited ten years for a proposal from the man she loves, only to discover that he doesn't recognize her, due to her lost youth, when he finally returns from war. Then begins the gay deception as she sprouts out as her own niece. Katharine Hepburn and Franchot Tone head the cast. Left, Fay Bainter as the old maid sister, and Cora Witherspoon, a servant, watch the transformation. At top of the page is the famous street in Georgian England where the action of the story transpires.
MAE CLARKE AND JAMES CAGNEY IN "GREAT GUY" OCK POWELL AND MADELEINE CARROLL IN "ON THE AVENUE."
"History Is Made at Night" has Jean Arthur being compromised so that she cannot get a divorce from her husband, Colin Clive, both shown right. In the same Paris hotel is Charles Boyer, left, who overhears the threat, and by staging a fake robbery helps the woman to escape. They meet again in America where Mr. Boyer has fled to avoid the police. The chauffeur, upper left, is Ivan Lebedeff. Leo Carrillo is the chef.
"Women of Glamour" is the story of a wealthy young painter, Melvyn Douglas, who is aware of the falseness of his surroundings. He is engaged to Leona Maricle, below, at the time he meets Virginia Bruce, a night club entertainer. The latter he has given a job as a model. While attempting to transform her he doesn't realize he is falling in love. Pert Kelton, left page, bottom, a pal in the night club. Playboy Reginald Denny with Miss Bruce, right, is an ardent admirer.
GRETA GARBO IN "CAMILLE."
IF YOU ARE LOOKING FOR BACK-STAIRS GOS-SIP ABOUT THE SWEDISH GENIUS YOU WILL NOT FIND IT HERE. FOR IT IS ONLY THREE OF HER LEADING MEN WHO PAY TRIBUTE.

G RETA GARBO, the unapproachable mystery woman, has probably created more curiosity and interest than any star in Hollywood by her persistent silence, her life as a recluse from the moment she leaves the studio where she is working.
Little firsthand information can be obtained about the woman nobody knows.

Why is she so alone and lonely? Is it because she is still grief-stricken over her two tragic romances, Mauritz Stiller and John Gilbert? Why does she insist upon acting behind screens? Why are visitors excluded from her sets? What is she really like to meet, to know, to work with?

To find the answer to some of these questions, to discover the truth about Garbo, I have gone to those who know her best, probably the few who know her at all—three of her leading men. They have acted with her behind those impenetrable screens. They have seen her when she arrives on the set and when she leaves it. They have chatted with her between scenes.
They know her, at least during her working hours.

First I approached Robert Montgomery, shortly after he had played with her in "Inspiration." That part nearly ruined Bob professionally, but he admitted that acting with Garbo was "an experience."

"But I don't see why everybody is so excited about it," he told me at the time. "Garbo is no different from anybody else. She is a human being. She talks and jokes on the set. She is interested in the theater, in books and her work—principally her work. She is a grand actress and a great artist.

Rex O'Malley, seen here with Garbo in the death scene of "Camille," has most to say about her. He says she was ill throughout the picture.
Garbo

"But I will say that she's marvelous," he conceded.

Young Robert Taylor, the idol of everybody's cinema hours, was as excited as a schoolboy in anticipation of playing "Armand" to her "Camille." But I haven't seen Bob since, so don't know how he has survived the love scenes.

During the filming of "Camille," however, hints of a new Garbo romance began to issue from the set. It is far from just another Hollywood romance when the great Garbo is reported "interested" in somebody. And, to make these rumors more startling, they did not involve Bob Taylor, but a newcomer to Hollywood from London via the Broadway stage, Rex O'Malley, who plays "Gaston," a friend both to "Camille" and "Armand."

Rex made several silent films in England with Betty Balfour, but "Camille" is his first venture in talkies anywhere. His first, but not his last. Most of the major companies have been after him for several years, especially since his appearance on the Coast in a play. He always has consistently said "No" and remained on Broadway. Now that the ice is broken, he will return for another picture as soon as he completes his present stage engagement with Grace George in "Matrimony Ptd."

Rex's face lighten with a broad Irish grin when I asked him about these reports of romance with Garbo.

"Well," he admitted, "I've read that we're 'that way' about each other. Probably because she'd say 'good morning' to me when she came on the set. We chatted between scenes, too, and I usually had lunch with her at the studio.

"It's a funny thing," he confessed, "I'm probably the only person in the world who was not an ardent Garbo fan. Her work on the screen always left me cold. I never could understand what everybody raved about.

"I accepted the offer to play 'Gaston' with no eager anticipation of acting with Garbo. Of course, I considered it a lucky break to be in a Garbo picture first, but more because I knew it probably would

Garbo has liked Robert Montgomery and found him amusing ever since they acted in "Inspiration" together. Believe it or not, they've been seen playing handball on the studio lot together.

"But please don't quote me on Garbo," he begged. "A chap interviewing me happened to pick up a chocolate elephant on my table. I told him that Garbo had given it to me as a joke. Imagine my surprise to read in a magazine later that I had discovered Garbo's sense of humor!

"I didn't discover it," Bob protested. "Her sense of humor happens to differ from ours, that's all. The chocolate elephant was her idea of a grand prank."

And it henceforth occupied a prominent place in the collection of little animals of all kinds in his dressing room.

"Garbo isn't so different from anybody else," he pointed out. "She just happens not to like publicity, just as you and I don't care for certain foods. If she wants to walk alone in the rain, that's her privilege. If I wanted to walk in the rain, I'd walk in the rain. And if I happened to prefer walking alone, I'd do that, too.

"But please don't write what I've said about Garbo," he made me promise, "or she will be coming up to me on the set one day and asking, 'Vot do you mean by giffing out interviews about me?"

I've kept my word to Bob for nearly five years, and I'm sure he'll forgive me for breaking it now. It isn't quite fair to keep his impressions a secret any longer, do you think?

After taking to Bob, I went to Gavin Gordon, who was her leading man, you will recall, in "Romance." I found him almost as adamant as the star herself.

"If you don't mind," he apologized with a reverent smile, "I'd rather not talk about Garbo." So I didn't get very far with him on that score.

Do you remember Gavin Gordon? He was Garbo's hero in "Romance" and remains the most owed and reverent of her leading men. He is playing in British pictures now.
LOVELY Heather Angel is Ray Milland's heroine in "Bull-dog Drummond Escapes," latest chapter in the adventures of the ingratiating, witty English detective. Sir Guy Standing presides over the new romantic thrills.
WITH bewildering rapidity, Robert Taylor has become the outstanding male attraction on the screen.

In New York he was mobbed by frenzied fans. In San Francisco at the very theater where Janet Gaynor got her start, her picture with Bob Taylor was billed: "Robert Taylor in Small-town Girl," with no mention of Janet.

In Hollywood he is the most sought-after young man in town. All over the country, billboards emblazon the name of Robert Taylor in pictures with Loretta Young, Joan Crawford, Irene Dunne, and Greta Garbo.

And a few months past, as time goes, Bob was an unknown, getting his first break in "Society Doctor," a film featuring Chester Morris and Virginia Bruce.

His salary was too small to provide him with a suitable wardrobe, and one was given him by the studio. His advancement was so slow that he asked the studio to cancel his contract, and planned to go East and look for a job with some stock company. He was still known as "Doc" Brugh to his few pals; he seldom appeared in public, and never went to night clubs; and about the only girl he knew was Irene Hervey, another youngster with MGM.

So startling a transition as Bob has gone through cannot help but be overwhelming. Before all these things happened to him, life was a fairly simple matter. Now he finds himself in constant turmoil.

Of course, all these changes must have an effect on Bob. He talked it all out frankly, and with striking candor the other day, and for the first time revealed his reactions to fame.

"Put yourself in my shoes for a minute," he said. "I grew up in a small town. I liked music, liked to read, and had a lot of friends who liked me for myself alone. I'd got used to seeing my face in the mirror when I shaved, and I'd got used to my hair cut and the way I looked. I was used to being called 'Buddy' by my parents and 'Doc' by my friends. My name, Spangler Arlington Brugh, was too tough a combination for my pals; but, after all, it was my name, and I was proud of it.

"Then, all of a sudden, I'm somebody else entirely. I'm Robert Taylor. I see myself on the screen, and that guy up there is a stranger to me. I look at him with complete detachment. Usually I groan at what he does, because he has a lot to learn about acting. Bob Taylor, furthermore, is positively bedeviled by a lot of strange complications. He must worry about making a hit. He is surrounded by agents, producers, lawyers and gales of free advice. Yes, gales of it, and all absolutely free!

"If you think I'm kidding, let me tell you that in seven days I've lost twelve pounds.

"Because of Bob Taylor, Doc Brugh can't sleep and can't eat. It scares me. For the first time in my life I'm scared.

"I'm afraid of becoming Bob Taylor!"

It's the first time in his life that this sensation of being frightened has happened to Bob. I've never seen a fellow so devoid of all fear. Long ago I heard what happened to his schoolmates when they kidded him about his good looks. Physical fear isn't in him. And he has a fist as big and brawny as a prize fighter's.

When he was slated to be Garbo's leading man I asked him if the prospect didn't make him a trifle scared. He said no, and meant it. Yet the Garbo jinx is no laughing matter in Hollywood, and an actor or actress must also feel the constraint of acting with this legendary figure. Bob wasn’t worried then, nor did he express any fear at the aloof Garbo when he went to work in “Camille.” He has self-confidence, and is not afraid of people. But he is afraid of Bob Taylor.

“I’ve always been a skeptical sort of person,” he continued. “And as a skeptic, I can’t help but doubt motives. I make few friends because I’m forever doubting that they like me.

“Now, then, with that mental make-up, how am I going to believe that it isn’t Bob Taylor that people want to be seen with—not Doc Brugh? I have no illusions about the speed with which screen favorites topple from their pedestals. Fame is fleeting. Where would all those people go if Bob Taylor faded from view? Would they stick to the real Taylor, a chap named Arlington Brugh?

“I have no intention of marrying, but suppose I should some day, say in six or seven years. Would the girl be accepting me, or that fellow Taylor, who gets rafts of fan letters and all that goes with screen popularity?

“As a skeptic, I’d be tempted to doubt her. And that wouldn’t make for much happiness.

“But that’s all purely speculative. What is more to the point is that I’m afraid I’ll actually turn into Robert Taylor. And that would mean I must go on forever worrying about making a hit and keeping on hitting. I must be continually beset by agents and lawyers and advice and take it all to heart as Robert Taylor, the actor, rather than as Doc Brugh.

“Sometimes I get so scared of becoming Bob Taylor that I have to light out. Get away where nobody knows me and I can be my old self, wearing old pants and old sweaters.”

Here again the force of Bob Taylor’s arguments were borne out by an actual incident. I happened to know that he and his pal Spencer Tracy, were planning a fishing trip off the coast of Mexico. Yet life was so complicated for both of them that their plans were forever being disrupted.

THAT HARDY OLD SIREN, THE STAGE, LURES HOLLYWOOD STARS TO MANHATTAN. HERE YOU FIND AN UNCENSORED REPORT OF THEIR GOINGS-ON.

THE biggest moments of this, Broadway's most resplendent season, are unlikely ever to be filmed, so Hollywoodites are scurrying to town to enjoy them.

The big moments, need I add, are nine short plays by Noel Coward. It takes three evenings to see them, but most people want to go back at least twice more to chuckle and sigh, and marvel at the virtuosity of Noel Coward and Gertrude Lawrence.

To do honor to their infinite charm and sly malice, the local gentry put on their best sable and largest emeralds, making it possible for visiting stars to attend without being conspicuous.

Margo and Francis Lederer looked on in humble admiration. So have Ruth Chatterton, Erroll Flynn and Lili Damita, Gladys Swarthout, Gail Patrick, Melvyn Douglas, Gloria Swanson, Mary Pickford and Buddy Rogers, Spencer Tracy, Sylvia Sidney, Constance Bennett, and others much too numerous to mention.

Side Shows Have Their Moment.—Occasionally people stop marveling at Gertrude Lawrence long enough to notice that there are other notable personalities around town. A glimpse of Lily Pons and Lawrence Tibbett arriving at the opening of the Metropolitan Opera rewarded the film fans who had hung around the door for hours. Mary Pickford daily delivers Buddy Rogers to the stage door of Loew's State, where his orchestra is playing.

Bill Robinson's fiftieth anniversary as a tap dancer was duly celebrated at the Cotton Club amid whoops from world-famous film voices. Nightly the visiting stars crowd into the Club Bali to watch a troupe of voodoo dancers. Katharine Hepburn, striding along with the free-and-easy lope of a greyhound, pauses to watch the installation of pipes in Radio City Plaza that will make it the most talked of ice-skating rink in the country. Bobby Breen holds forth in person and on the screen at Radio City Music Hall. In person a pleasant and engaging little boy, he exhibits all the theatrical flourish of a pompous tenor when he starts to perform. Obviously no one read the reviews of his picture to him.

First Stop for Sight-seers.—Week in, week out, there is one theatrical attraction in New York that never fails to send an electric thrill through the audience. That's the Rockettes who dance at Radio City Music Hall. Visiting stars often go backstage to congratulate them on their uncanny precision and skill, and their idols at the moment are Irene Dunne, Robert Taylor, and Merle Oberon, recent visitors.

Stars who have fraternized with the Rockettes invariably leave vowing that they will never complain again about being overworked. These bright-eyed and cyclonic young girls actually work on the stage only sixteen or twenty minutes a day, four minutes at each performance. But they rehearse every day from nine to twelve, again after the early-afternoon and early-evening performances.

Before and after rehearsals and at odd moments throughout the day, they pose for photographs and have costume fittings. Sometimes one or two of the girls have difficulty learning a new routine, in which case any or all of the rest are apt to stay after the last evening show to coach them. Every Rockette must give to each week's new dance not only consummate skill, but joyousness and verve. You will never have any of them pointed out to you at night clubs.

The Disconcerting Sonja.—Sonja Henie, blond Norwegian who brings to figure skating the art and grace of a ballet dancer, likes her first film and doesn't care who knows it. Now, 20th Century-Fox showed 'One in a Million' to her on a Friday just before she left Hollywood. On Monday in New York she saw it twice. On Tuesday she was pretty busy being interviewed, but she managed to ask a few friends if they would like to see it with her the next day.

'Maybe I'll be like Charles Laughton,' she said with the air of one who would be very proud indeed to be like Charles Laughton in any way. 'Whenever any one says that they would like to see his 'Henry VIII' again, he says 'So would I.'

The Smiling Sphinx.—Miss Henie is one of those people who amiably but very definitely frustrates any attempts at a flow of conversation. She can answer almost any question with "Yes," "No," or a half-choked giggle that suggests that she finds answering questions about herself just too ridiculous for words. She seems a bit on the buxom side for the camera, or so she appeared with her five feet two mantled in bulky furs, her broad face surmounted with a bunched toque. But she has winning ways. I found her frankness particularly endearing the one time that she indulged in a whole sentence. "One doesn't make friends in the studio—every one thinks only of herself."

Unveiling a New Star, Perhaps.—Having signed a skater and found a promising actress in Miss Henie, 20th Century-Fox is now busily engaged in making tests of one Spencer Tracy’s severest critic is his young son John, whom he hopes some day to please. So far the boy prefers "Tarzan" Weismuller as an actor.

Lili Damita and Errol Flynn are disarming candid, taking no pains to conceal from the public what they think of each other at the moment.

Gloria Swanson, keen, alert and magnetic as ever, is considering a stage début.
Rosalind Russell is a lady of quality who makes no capital of it.

It was true. Rosalind Russell was in New York. Even her best friends told me. But it seems that she was incognito, fast becoming a favorite rôle of the transient stars of both sexes. They are not to be chided here, nor can they be blamed.

Manhattan represents Nirvana, surcease from their earthly cares, freedom from retakes, time clocks and other infernal machines; in a word, vacation.

However, by using my police card, my good-luck piece and my wishing lamp, I was led to believe that a dark woman was soon to cross my path.

First it was necessary to go to one of the upper Fifth Avenue caravansaries, knock twice at the door of a tower suite, and meet the lovely Metro-Goldwyn emissary, who blindfolded me, packed me into a moving van and had me delivered on Miss Russell’s doorstep.

Rosalind is a lady of quality who makes no capital of it. She is on the tall side, darkly attractive, with big brown eyes, a quizzical smile and extremely graceful hands. Her legs are models of symmetry, too, now that I think of it.

She is onourant with the world of politics, sports—field and stream included—and literature, in addition to the theater, legitimate and photographed.

It was to lunch that we were bound. She decided that “21” was too crowded, too noisy, too filled with people anxious to see and to be seen. “Besides,” she added with a practicality that won me, “the tables are set so cheek by jowl that I’m always afraid I’m eating some one else’s soup.”

You get along well with any girl who worries about getting herself into the wrong dish. It is a mark of complete sophis-
When not on call at the studio, and insists upon original models when selecting her wardrobe. She rides a horse better than most men, likes airplanes at a distance, and regrets "Lady Venita," that Edna Musée heroine of "Under Two Flags."

It was to be her big chance, until the temperamental Miss Simone was removed from the picture in favor of Miss Colbert, whose salary was so big that her rôle was built up to equal it, sadly deflating "Lady Venita," and reducing the Russell performance to two or three uninspired scenes.

She is wise beyond her twenty-seven years but not disillusioned, smart but not cynical. Her rise to acclaim in "Craig's Wife" came smoothly and without any visible effort. There was the not unusual sequence of dramatic school, summer stock, Broadway bits, and Hollywood, with the surprise centering upon her cometlike course in films.

"One of my favorite rôles will always be the first one I had—the diplomat's wife in 'The President Vanishes.' It was the sort of thing you could give hidden qualities. But soon after that they put me on the merry-go-round—done lady stuffed shirts, duchesses, bores. I'm not complaining, mind you. I'm just thinking aloud."

Miss Russell confessed that she had been actively reluctant about essaying the title rôle in "Craig's Wife." The MGM tycoons committed her to the part; that is, they promised Harry Cohn that Columbia could lease Miss Russell's services for the picture. Then Rosalind heard Rosalind Russell is wise beyond her twenty-seven years but not disillusioned, smart but not cynical. She likes to shoot craps, to visit shooting galleries, and she hates second-rate things and imitations, especially in clothes. And she rides a horse better than most men.

WHEN a man’s mother thinks her son is the most wonderful thing that ever happened, we sit back and smile indulgently—but when his mother-in-law thinks the same, that’s news!

Melvyn Douglas’s mother-in-law, Mrs. Walter Gahagan, thinks Melvyn’s just about tops in sons-in-law. And it was delightfully refreshing to ears that have heard nothing but complaints about daughters’ husbands and sons’ wives, to listen for once to a woman who regards her son-in-law as a son.

"Melvyn is one of the finest and most unselfish men I have ever known," said this charming, soft-spoken woman who, incidentally, has three boys of her very own, "and I don’t say it because it makes good publicity, but because I really mean it. He has always treated me with the same deference and affection he has shown his own mother, who just about adores him.

"I’ve just come from California where I stayed with them for two years." (Imagine living under the same roof with a son-in-law for two years and still speaking so highly of him! But pardon the interruption, Mrs. Gahagan, and please go on.) "He and my daughter, Helen, live in a beautiful place that has four gardens, one of them growing rambler roses that are as large as chrysanthemums. They live on ideal existence and I loved being with them. Helen told me how much Melvyn liked having me there.

"Mamma," she said, "Melvyn’s told me, time and time again he’d like to have you with us permanently." It was the nicest compliment I’ve ever received, but fond as I am of them and of my little grandson, Peter Gahagan Douglas, I think young people should live by themselves.

"What I like most about Melvyn is the intense interest he takes in my daughter’s career"—Helen Gahagan is a famous stage actress—"and though his own work means a great deal to him, he is still big enough to put it aside whenever Helen is doing a play and to devote all his time and attention to her. He hasn’t allowed his own growing prominence to make him forget that Helen has a career, too.

"Most Hollywood couples are jealous of each other’s success, but not my children. Helen is delighted at his rapid strides in pictures even though her own picture, ‘She,’ did not go over very well. She helps him with his enunciation and he helps her with production details."

The complimentary remarks that Mrs. Gahagan makes about her daughter’s husband are all the more remarkable, all the more surprising.

"Melvyn is one of the finest and most unselfish men I have ever known," says Mrs. Walter Gahagan, his mother-in-law—and after a two-year visit in his home, too!

LOVES HIM

GREATER GLORY THAN THIS HATH NO MAN!

BUT ADMIRERS OF MELVYN DOUGLAS AREN'T SURPRISED. THEY'LL BE INTERESTED, THOUGH, WHEN THEY READ THE REASONS.

not suspect that she was interested in him at all. He had never been to the house and so I was shocked when she said to me, 'Mamma, I think I'd like to marry Melvyn Douglas. I like him better than any one I've ever met.'

'I was heartbroken. First of all, Mr. Gahagan had just died and I was very much upset. Then—and you must pardon a fond mother's partiality to her child—I thought even a prince wasn't good enough for her. Melvyn wasn't wealthy, he had heavy responsibilities at home, and I had heard so much about the insecurity and infidelity of stage marriages. I confided my fears to Helen. She said, bless her, 'Mamma I always said I would never marry without your consent. I still mean it. If you don't approve of him, I won't marry him.'

'I wanted my child's happiness above everything else. Far nights in succession I couldn't sleep—I gave it so much thought. Then finally I came to a decision. I said to myself, 'Let her marry him. She loves him. Who am I to stand in her way?'

They've been married five years now and they still adore each other. I've never seen two people get along so well. They never squabble. If one gets angry, the other remains still. And now there's little Peter to add the last drop to my daughter's cup of happiness.'

Interviewing Mrs. Gahagan was as delightful an experience as interviewing her charming son-in-law would have been.

She lives in a large impressive-looking house in Brooklyn, right across from Prospect Park. Standing in a row of equally elegant mansions, it was built in generation that had plenty of room and plenty of time and seems to be quietly disdainful of the modern apartment houses that have been built around it since.

Mrs. Gahagan is a lovely, cheery little person who walks with a slight limp, the result of an automobile accident which happened on her way to visit the Douglases. It is small wonder that Melvyn loves her. Gracious, broadminded, she's the sort of mother-in-law that a man of his type should have. For Melvyn himself fairly exudes culture and refinement.

I asked her to tell me about Melvyn and she acquiesced immediately.

'You see The Gorgeous Hussy?' she asked. 'WASN'T he wonderful in it? It's really the first thing that has given him an opportunity to do, and incidentally, is the way he really gets the part of 'Senator Randolph' in MELVYN in mind.'

'Gahagan whether the Douglases were arriving scene.

She said, 'Their best friends are Dan O'Her and George O'Neil who adopted the part of 'Obsession' for the screen. Otherwise they don't see them. They like the atmosphere of Hollywood, the places they visited, they liked China...'

O you wonder what actors do when they have long, tiresome waits on the set? Well, one night recently when Joan Crawford, William Powell, Robert Montgomery, and Frank Morgan had to work late on "The Last of Mrs. Cheyney," they played a joke on some of their friends.

In turn, each one called some other star and, pretending to be a newspaper reporter, asked for a statement on the Duke of Windsor-Mrs. Wallis Simpson situation. It was great fun when some of the stars they called took it big and gave long, serious opinions on the subject.

Did some one say that all Hollywood was pixilated?

Finding herself in the happy position of one of filmdom's leading box-office ladies, Corole Lombard is having herself a time. Before signing a new contract, she rushed around the studio asking friends among employees, "Have you had a vacation this year? Do you want one—with pay? I'll put it in my contract!" She did insert several such clauses—and the studio signed without a murmur.

James Cagney had a place to go, but no one to go with him. He wanted to go East and see if his farm on Martha's Vineyard was still there, but when he suggested the trip to his wife he got only cold, forbidding looks. She said it was too cold to go East.

"But it's fifteen degrees warmer on the island than it is on the mainland," he argued.

"Yes," she replied with a withering look, "zero on the mainland and fifteen degrees above on the island. I'll stay here."
AT last something besides a "minks" coat has become important in the eyes of Simone Simon, and that is her role in "Seventh Heaven." Before the picture went into production, she could be found day after day in the projection room running the Janet Gaynor-Charles Farrell version of this picture over and over and over.

BELIEVE it or not, Nelson Eddy is studying tap dancing.

"Everywhere I go," he explained, "I'm asked to sing. I thought if I learned to do a little tap dance I could dance for people, too."

A NICE-LOOKING office boy at the MGM Studio is Jean Guglielma, nephew of the late Rudolph Valentino, who is learning the business from the ground up. The fact that he has changed his name to John Valentino may indicate that he has secret aspirations to follow in the footsteps of his famous uncle.

IN the United States, theater managers consider a picture or stage premiere a success if enough stars attend, because the presence of "big names" insures a big audience.

In England, however, theaters do everything to keep stars away from their openings. They say the stars only attend openings to attract attention and that their display on those nights is vulgar. Recently, one English manager complains, the presence of Marlene Dietrich at a London opening disturbed the audience so much that they forgot to pay attention to the show.

SIMONE SIMON is now living in the house occupied by Joan Blondell and Dick Powell immediately after their marriage. Simone looked at the place at least a dozen times before she decided to take it. Then, one evening she called up at dinner time and wanted to come out for another inspection. The two girls did not know each other.

"You've seen the house a dozen times," Joan informed her coldly, "and the servants are preparing dinner. You can come out tomorrow afternoon."
Next day Simone phoned again to inform Joan she had rented the house and would be ready to move in within three or four days.

"Well, that's tough," Joan snapped, "because my lease still has six weeks to run, and I'm not ready to move out yet!"

That's telling her, Joan!

H E R B E R T M U N D I N and his wife recently gave a demonstration of why picture people are commonly supposed to be boors. At a hotel in Detroit a guest was asking the doorman for some directions. Before either of them had finished, Mr. and Mrs. Mundin came out of the hotel, elbowed the guest aside without so much as an "excuse me" to ask the doorman if Mrs. Mundin could purchase some galoshes in the hotel.

A L A N M O W B R A Y, working on the set of "The King and the Chorus Girl," Warners' big special, was urging them to hurry up. "I've got to get through this picture," he argued, "because Trem Corr is waiting for me."

Trem Corr is the smaller of the independent producers. And they say the English have no sense of humor!

O T T O K R U G E R secretly entered a Los Angeles hospital to have his nose done over in the belief it would get him more screen work.

It is our belief that it is Mr. Kruger's smugness rather than his nose that keeps him out of rôles.

F R A N K A L B E R T S O N, one of our very best juveniles, after being kicked around Hollywood for years, is now scoring the hit of his life and one of the season's outstanding successes on Broadway in "Brother Rat." The chances are that by the time you read this, some picture company will have signed him to a contract—at three times what he was getting when he was in Hollywood begging for work.

W E were among those who scoffed at stories about Garbo shedding the rôle of recluse. That is, until we saw her shopping in a souvenir store at Palm Springs the other day. With us was a young man who had written several articles about her, so we dared him to introduce himself and claim credit for them. We wanted to see her run from him, as she had once done from us.
When he spoke to her, however, Greta, instead of dashing for the nearest exit, dazzled him with a smile and waited for further remarks. That proved too much for our young friend. He stood stammering for a moment, then fled in panic from the Presence.

Garbo looked bewildered, as if she couldn't understand such shyness.

Professional jealousy, the reported cause of a recent battle between one of our greater feminine stars and an important actress who supported her in a picture, was not the real reason for discord. Actually it started because of the star's distaste for the deckhand language and humor of the supporting actress.

The ironic part of it is that the star plays "unrefined" characters on the screen, and often puts on the same act in real life for its publicity value. The actress whose language shocked and offended her, on the contrary, is one of the more exclusive film colony socialites.

Surely Jean Harlow is one of the most easily recognized stars. Jean, however, didn't find this the case recently when purchasing lingerie at a new shop.

"May I pay by check?" she queried, adding as she saw the saleswoman's frightened look, "I'm Jean Harlow, you know." For identification she produced a platinum pin initialed J. H., a studio wardrobe memo, and a note starting "Dear Jeanie." Still the woman wasn't convinced.

Fortunately a fan with an account at the store came forward to vouch for Jean's identity.

We saw Gladys George the other day just after an interviewer had left her. Gladys was bubbling with enthusiasm.

"He's the most interesting person you can imagine—he's had such a colorful life!" she exclaimed. "I found out all about it, and guess I bored him to death with all my questions. But aren't people's lives fascinating when they really have been places, seen things, and accomplished something?"

We didn't ask, but we did wonder what the interviewer found out concerning Miss George. Seemingly, it was Gladys who did all the interviewing.

THE biggest shindig of recent days in Hollywood was the one celebrating the twenty-fifth anniversary of Adolph Zukor, president of Paramount, in the film business. It was amazing in showing the new good-fellowship in the studios. The high point was when Jack Benny, Bert Wheeler, and George Burns, of Burns and Allen, did a take-off on the honoree at the party, along with Darryl Zanuck and Louis B. Mayer. A few years ago no players would have dared to satirize the big executives of the films; but on this occasion it was quite "au fait." The evening rather ran to impersonations, for Larry Blake, who is soon to be seen in "The Road Back," and who is one of the cleverest mimics ever, gave his impressions of Lionel Barrymore, Wallace Beery and other prominent male stars. The peak of the evening was when Irving Berlin, the song writer, who is now producing pictures in Hollywood, sang one of his earliest hits, "Alexander's Ragtime Band," and everybody joined in the chorus. Marguerite Clark, one-time favorite of the films, came out of the obscurity of private life to take a bow at the function, and practically every bright star in pictures was present. Martha Raye and the Ritz Brothers were among those contributing to the wilder phases of the entertainment, while Gertrude Niesen appealed with her voice.

Grace Moore's Elegance.—Tops in home construction is apparently to be attained by Grace Moore, who has finally decided to settle in Hollywood, despite the numerous reports of friction between the picture magnates and herself. Interesting is the fact that she will domicile herself in a southern colonial type of house. That's fitting, since Grace was born south of the Mason-Dixon line. Specifications call for seventeen rooms and seven bathrooms, which is something of a record. It's one of the largest mansions proposed since stars suddenly began to take up the idea that big homes were the thing again. That idea, popular in the boom times of the silent films, recently suffered a falling off due to the depression, and the uncertainty attending success in the earlier talking pictures.

Mary Alice Rice, bottom, Lynn Gilbert, and Polly Rowles illustrate the variety of California's famed climate.
Barrymore Stage Tour.—Soon you may get a glimpse of John and Elaine Barrymore—Caliban and Ariel—together in a stage ployet. It's their intention to make a tour of the picture theaters. Elaine, of course, has done theater as well as radio work, and John believes his wife has marked talent. Incidentally, he's a very happy man, and is showing decided progress in the renewal of his career. Curiously, he seems to be putting his adventurous life of the sea behind him, for he is disposing of his cruiser, the "Infanta," and also of his Tower Road home, where he lived while married to Dolores Costello. John and Elaine have been occupying a less pretentious residence, which the colony calls their "love nest."

A Marital Uncertainty.—Nobody knows nowadays just what the situation will be between Errol Flynn and Lili Damita from one minute to the next. They reached the breaking point a while ago, and then become reconciled almost within a week. There were rumors at the time that Flynn's interests had centered elsewhere, in Eastern social circles to be exact. However, the reconciliation was then pronounced, and it looked as if Errol and Lili would be off to Europe. At this point the studio intruded on the serenity of events and hailed Flynn back to Hollywood for "The Prince and the Pauper." Lili went abroad. Now the old question is revived: "Will absence make the heart grow fonder?" Or "wiser-worse?"

Introducing Miss Griffin.—Meet Mary Frances Griffin. She's the little daughter of Irene Dunne. Just about a year old now, she was adopted by the star as a sort of Christmas gift for her husband and herself. Really, the adopting was done much earlier, though, as is generally the fashion, Irene kept it a secret. The child was under the care of Doctor Griffin, who still spends much of his time in New York. Bringing the child to Hollywood awaited the completion of Irene's new home. Regrettably, the star's happiness was blighted by the death of her mother just a week or so before Christmas.

Threats, Threats, Threats.—One extortion plot seems always to lead to another in Hollywood. For example, there was Freddie Bartholomew, who recently received a letter demanding fifty thousand dollars which stirred up excitement, and shortly after five thousand dollars was "requested" of Ginger Rogers and her mother under penalty of death. Along about that time, news was heard of some convicts attempting to intimidate Lily Pons. It turned out that the trouble-maker for Ginger was a twenty-year-old sailor who played a trombone!

A Potential Entrancer.—Beau de luxe of movieland during ensuing months, we prophesy, will be none other than Michael Brooke, the Earl of Warwick, who was signed at one thousand dollars a week by MGM not so many months ago. Brooke, for all practical purposes, is a bachelor acquisition in the colony, since he is instituting divorce proceedings against his wife. So far, however, he's not exclusive in his attentions, but that won't be for long in a town where handsome men are always at a premium, and foreign handsome men are even more so.

More Than Romantic Flame.—In the later stages of the filming of "Camille" the two bright stars of that picture nearly went up in flames. And it wasn't just on account of

GERTRUDE

IF GERTRUDE MICHAEL’S PLANE HADN’T BEEN FORCED DOWN, AND SHE HADN’T BEEN SENT TO THE HOSPITAL FOR THREE MONTHS, SHE WOULDN’T BE WEARING A TWENTY-CARAT DIAMOND TO-DAY. NOW READ ALL ABOUT HER ROMANCE!

As Gertrude Michael poured tea I almost choked on a chocolate cookie. There on the third finger of her left hand was a diamond the size of—well, to be exact, it was a twenty-carat stone. It hadn’t been there when I saw her a few days before.

"Soy, what’s all this? Does that ring mean business, or have you fallen heir to the crown jewels?" I asked.

The lovely color that surged over Becky Michelle’s face told me that I had been right the first time.

"Rouben Mamoulian!" I shrieked.

She shook her head, eyes sparkling.

"What, not Mamoulian?" Somebody must have done some pretty fast work to change that verdict.

And then I beheld now of a certain gentleman whose name had cropped up frequently in previous conversations.

"So that’s who it is," I said accusingly. She laughed and blushed again, but she didn’t shake her head.

It just shows that you can’t escape destiny. Had Becky gone to England last October when she was scheduled for a picture there, this might not have happened.

Fate took all the trouble to make that plane from Los Angeles go into a forced landing, delay it seven hours in the rain so that our fair passenger could catch a cold, and fix it so that instead of being on every day, self-respecting cold, it wondered down and settled in her kidneys and then caused complications, so that instead of boarding the "Queen Mary" she was rushed to the hospital.

And the same Fate—or Cupid, maybe he had a hand in this, I wouldn’t put it past him—kept her in the hospital for three months. That’s what Fate can do when she is in a determined mood.

Rouben Mamoulian, the director, had been Miss Michael’s most persistent suitor until a man she’d met eight years ago popped up and crowded him out.
At first Becky felt pretty sorry for herself. Equal to her disappointment at losing the London engagement was her regret that she also missed being there during the most thrilling period in centuries, when the love story that rocked the world was unfolding.

Then an old friend called, and I guess no other person’s love story is half as thrilling and as sweet as one’s own, and Becky forgot her disappointment. But I’ll have to go back about eight years to give you the full picture of this romance.

When Becky was sixteen she spent a few weeks in Atlantic City with her mother. One morning she took her usual dip, pleased to find that she had the beach to herself except for a lane bather. After she had dispersed herself to her heart’s content, she started home. There was the lane bather on the beach evidently in acute distress.

“What’s the matter? Have you same seaweed in your eye?” asked the mermaid in an executive tone.

Well, it seems it was seaweed or something peculiar which the tall, slender youngster promptly removed from the outraged optic and, that being that, she started for her hotel.

But the lane bather had taken care to get her name, and next day invited her and her mother to tea. The Michaels were leaving and did not accept, and the incident went out of the girl’s mind—almost.

Shortly after her return to the Alabama town in which she lived she was astonished to hear the telephone operator say that New York was calling her. She was so excited she could hardly hear his voice or what he said or who he was—for, of course, it was the lane bather in distress, Mr. E. F. Jeffe, vice president of the New York Edison Company to you.

After that there were repeated conversations which so interested the town that the operator opened all the wires and let every one listen in to Becky Michael’s New York call!

She lost touch with him during the years she was in the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music and starting her career on the stage. Those were lean and shabby years in New York. The family fortunes had collapsed after her father’s death and Becky, who was as proud as Lucifer and went through life with her chin to the moon, would not look up any one she had known in the old days as grand as Mr. Jeffe.

What would she do if he asked her to lunch at the Crillon or to dance at the Ritz?

One particular instance stands out in her memory, and while it has nothing to do with Mr. Jeffe, it is a part of what she calls those “starvation days.” This happened about the time she was cast in a Rachel Crathers play, “Caught Wet.”

In most theatrical companies the girls gang up and lunch together Dutch treat. While Becky was always invited to join the crowd, she could never accept because she had no money, sometimes not even for car fare. So she had to invent imaginary glamorous lunch dates. One day it was at the Astor, another at the Ritz, and then she would go to the library or walk around the block trying to forget her hunger until she could decently return to the theater.

One noon she sat in the corner drug store drinking water—she didn’t have to pay for that—when Douglas Blackley, who had played in a stock company with her, walked in. He changed his name to Robert Kent, and is now going places with 20th Century-Fox. He invited Becky to have a sandwich, but the Alabama pride was too strong. She had just had lunch, thank you.

Meanwhile, our Mr. Jeffe didn’t forget his mermaid, for

It is hard to believe that the glamorous actress of today was once so hard up that she refused invitations for lack of clothes, and from the man she is engaged to marry now.

Gertrude Michael will be the bride of E. F. Jeffe, vice president of the New York Edison Company, if Cupid continues to shoo away Mr. Mamoulian now that she is in Hollywood.
Glamour

IS NOT ALL

BY HELEN LOUISE WALKER

Dolores Del Rio is one of the most vivid, interesting and arresting figures in Hollywood. One who has known her from the first tells how she manages to be more than that.
"All husbands, friends and families should be shocked from time to time. It is good for them!" says Dolores del Rio, who shocked her husband, friends and family when she enrolled for courses in the University of Mexico.

She thinks that it is wrong to get too close to anything, too engrossed. Boredom will surely follow, she says. Her husband taught her to laugh at herself.

The most important thing in life is to refuse to become bored! Dolores del Rio was speaking, and I gazed at her in amazement. Bored?

Now, I have known Dolores for a long, long time. I have seen her at the peak of triumph and I have seen her pale with despair. I have seen her when she was trying bravely, jauntily, to disguise heartbreak, and I have seen her when she was almost smug with content, with peace. But I could never have associated the word "boredom" with that vivid, tempestuous figure.

It took a deal of conversation before I understood what she meant by that remark. I think it explains, in part, the new Dolores with whom we are just becoming acquainted.

I used to think that no one in Hollywood would ever really know Dolores. I went on location trips with her, and those are occasions to establish an intimacy which compares with that engendered by attending boarding school or going camping together.

I attended parties at her home. I devoured made-in-a-hurry spaghetti with her at midnight.

Once we went shopping together, and she induced me to buy the dog-gondest pair of scarlet beach socks you ever saw. They were "more cute," she opined, than the conservative numbers a wise sateswoman was showing me. Those beach socks! Well, I'll tell you that story sometime. I'll titivate you right now by confiding that a prominent star borrowed them!

I sat, enthralled, watching her play ping-pong. You know how beautifully she dances. You should watch her at sports! She moves like a lovely flame. I sympathized when she gathered a fascinating bouquet of poison ivy. I commiserated when her tiny and odored griffon mode on unfortunate alliance with an elderly and rheumatic Airedale.

These episodes are offered merely as samples of friendly and informal relations between two women. Despite them, I didn't know Dolores del Rio until comparatively recently. Neither, I think, did any one else in Hollywood. Dolores, you see, has been working out a new pattern of life. I think it is an interesting pattern and I'll try to tell you about it. To explain, I shall have to go back a bit.

Dolores's life has divided itself, strongly, definitely, into four separate and distinct parts.

Of the first part, she told me, "I think that I resent, more than anything else in my life, the nine years I spent in a convent. They tried, sincerely, to protect us, to shield us from the unpleasant knowledge of what life was about. That, I am sure, was wrong.

"One's early education should equip him to meet life, teach him something of how to meet it eagerly and with courage. It isn't fair to send a girl into the world, allow her to undertake marriage when she is so woefully un-equipped as I was."

That was the first section of Dolores's life. The second began when she, at sixteen, married Jaime del Rio and attempted, for two years, to live up to, to measure the ideals of what a model Mexican wife should be. Housewife, hostess, possibly a mother.

This sort of existence was not for Dolores. She shocked her husband, her friends, her family, by enrolling for courses in languages and history at the University of Mexico.

Reminiscing about this event, she remarked, ploidy, "All husbands, friends and families should be shocked from time to time. It is good for them!" (Continued on page 63)

MAKING

MORE THAN A LOCATION STORY, HERE WE LEARN THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN BRITISH AND AMERICAN METHODS OF PICTURE-MAKING. PUNGENT, AMUSING, INFORMATIVE.

G AUMONT-BRITISH have company on location at Lake Louise, Canada, starring Richard Arlen in “The Great Barrier.” Curious to know difference in British production methods and ours. Go up and write a story about it.

That was the wire I received from the editor of Picture Play. A three-thousand-mile trip to satisfy curiosity seemed like a big order, but Mook never yet turned down an assignment. So off I went.

My first glimpse of British production methods came the morning after my arrival. The entire company was gathered in the lobby of the hotel. A pleasant little chop with a black mustache and dressed to kill was bustling busily about. He was George Busby, the company manager.

“Why aren’t you people out on location?” he demanded of Arlen.

“Our call was for nine o’clock on the set,” Dick explained. “It’s only eight now, and that gives us plenty of time to get there.”

I reflected that with an American company, nobody would have had to tell the business manager anything. If he was on the job he would have made it his business to find out the night before what time they were called for. The chances are if the sun rose in one place at seven he would have assumed it would rise in another at the same hour and have had the company there on the chance they might get in an extra hour of shooting.

The British, I was to discover, have their own method of making pictures, and hell or high water will not change them. There are certain economies that must be observed, let come what may. They were already weeks behind schedule, and the picture had cost almost twice what the original budget called for. Cars cost fifty dollars a day at Lake Louise. As a result, they were cutting down on transportation, and although fifty dollars a day seemed a small item to me when a million-dollar production was involved, they were always short of transportation.

We finally started forty miles across country through some of the most gorgeous scenery one ever looked upon.

ground and is several thousand feet higher when it comes out in the open again. That's in the picture, too.

I neglected to mention, this picture is the history of the Canadian Pacific Railway with all the romance and difficulties that attended its building. A group of men tried to have it run down through St. Paul and across the United States, only going back into Canada at the western terminus. This would have completely cut off the eastern part of the dominion from the western and left them with absolutely no means of transportation.

By the time all this had been explained to me, we had reached our destination. We got out of the cars and started climbing down the side of a mountain. Dawn, down, we climbed. Finally, in a valley between two mountains, we reached some rapids rushing madly along. The cameras and sound equipment were set up. The action was rehearsed again and again. And then we waited—but for hours.

"What's wrong?" I whispered to Dick. "Why don't they shoot?"

"But they've lights and reflectors enough to light up this shot," I said. "It seems to me they're wasting an awful lot of time."

"They want the sunlight on the water in the background over there," he explained, painting across the rapids.

"But they can get the effect of sunlight with lights and reflectors," I insisted. "I've often seen it done in Hollywood."

"They haven't enough lights and reflectors with them for that," Dick said wearily.

"You mean," I gasped, "they'd send a company the size of this one on a location trip thousands of miles from the studio with insufficient equipment?"

"Oh, no," he grinned. "There's plenty of equipment—but it's at Revelstoke. You see, that's where we went when we first landed in Canada. We worked there a while, then we left about two thirds of the company there and the other third is here. The business manager wouldn't let the electrician bring along what he termed a 'proper amount of men,' so the head electrician wouldn't bring any more equipment than the crew he has with him can conveniently handle—regardless of what we need." "But what's the rest of the company doing at Revelstoke when the principals are all here?" I wondered.

"Waiting for us to finish these shots here. Then we all go back to Revelstoke and finish the picture there."

"Look here, Dick," I began, "I know I'm dumb. You and my family have impressed it on me often enough. But why didn't they bring the whole company here at first, do what they have to do here, and then go to Revelstoke, get through with you and finish the picture? What's the use of having two thirds of the company idle at Revelstoke while they're insufficiently manned here?"

"Ask me another," Dick suggested.

Time was on. I figured the overhead must be seven or eight hundred dollars an hour. One hour's delay would have paid the expenses of a lot of electricians. We had already waited three hours, and delays like this, I discovered, were an everyday occurrence.

I recalled how, on the call sheets in Hollywood studios, they always provide "cover" shots whenever a location trip is ordered. "Company ready to leave the studio at 7:00 a.m. for .......... In case of bad weather, report .........."

"Why don't they shoot some other scene where they don't need sunlight?" I asked next.

My inquiry was answered with shrugs. No one said anything. I was to discover later that the British are methodical. They set out to make a certain shot one day. If they don't get that shot, they get nothing. They haven't yet acquired the American way of quickly adapting shooting schedules to meet changing conditions. When Claudette Colbert hurt her head in an accident during the filming of "Maid of Salem," the company shut scenes for a week or ten days in which she didn't work. The whole schedule was rearranged overnight.

Dick and I returned to the set. It was almost one o'clock. We had been there since eight forty-five, and not a shot had been made. The fog had long since lifted, but there was no sun.

"Do we have to have sun for this shot?" Dick asked Milton Rosmer, the director.

"No-o," Mr. Rosmer admitted, "but it would be prettier if we did!"

At one thirty the sky began to lighten. Excitement filled the company.

"Get ready," called the director. And then, "Shoot!" as the sun came out strongly.

J. Forrell MacDonald, Dick, and Berry MacKay stepped out from behind a rock, waded through water, paused on a little rise of ground and took cognizance of their surroundings. They were followed by a number of Indians carrying their packs and supplies.

"Cut!" Rosmer ordered.

The sun had disappeared again.

"That wasn't quite right," Rosmer said regretfully. "We'll have to wait until the sun comes out again and shoot it over."

Three times they shot that relatively unimportant scene. It took another hour to get those three shots. After the third shot Rosmer and the cameraman held a conference. They decided it would have been better if it had been photographed from a different angle.

An American director would have rehearsed the company from every conceivable angle during those long hours of waiting, but, apparently, it had never occurred to Rosmer that the first angle he had selected would not be the best. Nor did it seem to bother him that he hadn't made this discovery after the first shot.

At two o'clock the sun peeped through and the scene was photographed from the old angle, only to discover the old one was better after all!

"Lunch!" called the assistant director. "Back on the set in an hour."

"Wait!" yelled the property man. "The principals will eat at Field (a little town about seven miles away). The rest of the company will have box lunches here."

"There's that class distinction again," one of the grips laughed.

When we returned from lunch we discovered the crew had moved over to another location about three or four miles away. Only that one shot had been needed in the old location, and from nine until two had been spent in getting it. An American company manager would have been tearing his hair out over the mounting costs. If the director couldn't have got it the way he wanted it at the end of the hour, he would have had to get it as best he could. But the Gaumont-British manager was back at the hotel in Lake Louise, swimming in the glass-inclosed pool.

The new location consisted of more mountains with a ravine between them this time instead of rapids. The three principals were to walk along a narrow path, still followed by the Indians. The remainder of the afternoon was spent in getting two more shots.

We drove back to the hotel in darkness. I was silent, exhausted mentally from the strain of watching so much time wasted in getting two inconsequential shots—from thinking of the money that had been frittered away. The others, evidently, were used to it. They laughed and chatted, kidding each other, and had a fine time on the ride home.

"Tired?" Dick inquired solicitously when we were in his room at the hotel.

I grabbed a Scotch and soda. "How in hell," I demanded,

"Camille."—MGM. For little short of a hundred years the famous old story of the Parisian courtesan who lived and died for love has received representation in every language, has been played by actresses of almost every race and color, to the glory of some and the defeat of many. Never, however, has the story been so sumptuously produced and very rarely indeed has it been as well acted by every one concerned, while only two of the great names of the drama may be compared to Greta Garbo's conception of Marguerite Gautier. They are Sarah Bernhardt and Eleonora Duse. It is doubtful, too, if either could have brought to the screen the same values that they gave their acting on the stage. Garbo, then, cancels memory of every one that has attempted the character in films, including the most illustruous Alla Nazimova and Norma Talmadge. If you think the story is hackneyed, as it is through familiarity, then see the picture to marvel at the intelligent treatment given it and the strong emotional response it stirs. If you by any chance do not list Garbo among your favorite stars, then see the performance of Robert Taylor. If you have been skeptical of Mr. Taylor's ability as an actor, you will change your mind. I think, and applaud him for a sincere, manly performance instead of being, as many Armands have been, just a pillow for the Lady of the Camellias to weep upon. More extended comment on page 13.

"The Plainsman."—Paramount. In this sweeping melodrama of the West, Cecil DeMille forsakes that artificiality for which he has often been criticized. He concerns himself with frontier life, human, exciting, thrilling, a picture that takes its place beside "The Covered Wagon," spectacular and elemental. It is done with splendid authority and meticulous regard for detail but never at the expense of intimacy and the development of character. Mr. DeMille's mass effect here consists of a magnificent charge of mounted Indians against the white survivors of a battle, a spectacle in which the director lets himself go with terrific impact. The story is fictionized history, with characters such as Wild Bill Hickok, Calamity Jane, Buffalo Bill, General Custer and the Indian chiefs Yellow Hand and Painted Horse. Villainy and heroism, treachery and sacrifice are uncolored by compromise. In this bold saga of the fabulous West excellent acting is found, with, of course, emphasis on Gary Cooper who finds congenial background for his forthright presence and laconic speech. He makes Hickok credible and winning. Jean Arthur is fine as Calamity Jane. So, too, is Charles Bickford's villainy, and brilliant moments come from every one in the impressive cast. This is a thriller de luxe.

"Beloved Enemy."—United Artists. The furious Irish Rebellion of 1921 becomes the background of a tragic romance between its leader and an aristocratic English girl. Set forth with dignity and restraint, it doesn't achieve the perfect conviction expected of a picture produced with such rich intelligence and taste. It seems to me that Dennis Riordan wouldn't have time or conscience for dalliance and dreams, even with Merle Oberon to tempt him, or that we should be expected to become absorbed in the love of two individuals when the welfare and the lives of so many are trembling in the balance. Or, still more, to accept the turbulent background as a secondary consideration.
Perhaps I am captious. However, I still think "The Informant" had the last grim word to say on the subject of Ireland in the early '20s. On the score of a perfect production this justifies unstinted applause. It is distinguished and beautiful in every detail except the attempt to dovetail romance with a background of seething hatred. Brian Aherne is fine as Dennis Riordan and Miss Oberon is a miracle of gentle, sensitive eloquence as the British emissary's daughter. Jerome Cowan is a memorable figure who avenges what he believes is the betrayal of his people.

"One in a Million."—20th Century-Fox. Sonja Henie, Norwegian ice-skating champion, proves to be a winsome little actress in a showy picture designed to introduce her as a star. Her maneuvers on the ice are dazzling, incredible, and the novelty of a skating star is enough to put the picture over with lovers of popular entertainment. More than this, however, is the brilliant company of expert players surrounding her and the high percentage of hearty laughs that make the picture above the average. The Ritz Brothers, daffy comedians beyond compare, are in top form. Extraordinarily resourceful in their clowning, they are never tiresome because they never seem to reach the end of their rope.
Their burlesque of a bullfighter is masterly, their number called "The Horror Boys of Hollywood"—Karloff, Laughton, and Lorre—hilarious mockery. The unpretentious story has Adolphe Menjou, impresario of a girls' band stranded at the Swiss hotel discovering what he thinks will be a gold mine in the skating of Miss Henie, the innkeeper's daughter. Of course there are complications before Miss Henie comes into her own at New York's Madison Square Garden. Mr. Menjou is especially fine, Arline Judge pungently amusing as his wife, and Don Ameche and Jean Hersholt are attractively sincere.

"Great Guy."—Grand National. With James Cagney freed from the domination of Warner Brothers, what do we get when the rebel has his own way? A run of the mill photoplay. Even though we are told that the maestro will not budge from his study into the re-numerate bedlam of a studio till every word, every implication and every thought and feeling are "right," we are given nothing more than an ordinary picture.
Remember when Ruth Chatterton would not emerge from seclusion till the mood, the tide and the seismoggraph were "right"? She gave us "Lady of Secrets," in which even the furniture was clumsily arranged. I don't know why these gifted children try to buck the "machine." It does much better for them than when they are independently on the loose. Now, there isn't anything wrong with Mr. Cagney's picture. The plot is right, his part is right and the people surrounding him are right. It is significant, perhaps, that no one has much to do except Mr. Cagney and no one has a chance to shine. Even Mae Clarke, splendid actress of "Waterloo Bridge" and other films, her heroine in past successes, does scarcely more than promenade. The picture's hero is employed in the bureau of weights and measures, his object to detect dishonest shopkeepers, but what he does with the privilege is only tolerably interesting. The success of this picture depends on how much you have missed Mr. Cagney during his fight for independence.

"Banjo on My Knee."—20th Century-Fox. A modest and engaging picture, this is original, too. Considering how precious originality is in pictures, you shouldn't overlook this example of it. The river-bank riffraff along the Mississippi are its people, their rowdy carefree existence the picture's chief concern. There is music, notably "With a Banjo on My Knee" and "There's Something in the Air," and selections by the invaluable Hall Johnson Choir. Romantic interest, such as it is, centers on Joel McCrea and Barbara Stanwyck whose characterizations are appealing. But it is Walter Brennan, as Mr. McCrea's father, who contributes the richest and most characterful study. He is star of the proceedings if not their hero. Buddy Ebsen "belongs" and so do Helen Westley and Walter Catlett. This is not a pretty picture nor a strong one, but it is free and easy and friendly.

"Gold Diggers of 1937."—Warner. This annual musical is an institution now. Popular demand via the box office is the reason, in case some of us may wonder. This has more of a story than its predecessors, being based on a stage comedy dealing with a hypochondriac who is insured for a million dollars by Dick Powell. While the ailing man's villainous partners do all they can to hasten his death, Mr. Powell works hard to keep him alive in order to enjoy his agent's commission. Glenda Farrell, hired to destroy the victim with her love, marries him instead and he takes on new life. All this is broadly funny, of course, and the picture ends with a great big Busby Berkeley splurge of girls. Lee Dixon, a whirlwind dancer, is a hit.

"Born to Dance."—MGM. Lively, entertaining, a hodgepodge rather than a unified piece, Eleanor Powell is put forth as a tap-dancing star who, for all her supremacy in her field, cannot act and therefore has difficulty in maintaining her stellar position. But she is pleasant. Because of the prominence given her one is inclined to get a little tired of her tapping, too, for it is repetitious, as any dancer's would be under similar circumstances. However, so many people and so much glib, glittering nonsense have been put into this showy musical that there is little cause for complaint. Only it could have been better than it is. Offer to introduce me to Garbo and I couldn't tell you the story. The incidentals seem much more important, the people more interesting than the parts they play. James Stewart in especial brings conviction to the part of a routine hero, making it stand out, and Anna Merkel, Virginia Bruce, and the others count. You will not pass by without a laugh Reginald Gardiner's burlesque of a policeman trying to be an orchestra leader.

"After the Thin Man."—MGM. Brilliantly following the memorable "Thin Man," this sequel is one of the best pictures in recent months whether one saw its predecessor or not. It is gay, glib comedy combined with murder mystery in a pattern that every studio has imitated and no one has equaled. More than glitter and excitement, though, is its likableness. Those ut-
Glamour Is Not All

Came the day when Edwin Carewe saw her at a party (Dolores was not yet eighteen) and recognized the compelling personal quality which she possessed. The result of that meeting you all know. Dolores and Jaime went to Hollywood. Dolores zoomed to spectacular heights. The marriage crashed and Jaime died, tragically, abroad, while Dolores lay, sobbing, in Hollywood. The third period of Dolores's life came to an agonizing finish.

"Everything happened to me," she told me. "Things seemed to crash all about me, things of which the public knew nothing and of which Hollywood guessed only vaguely. Tragic, terrifying things. I was in the midst of intrigue, tossed by cross-currents of human purposes, pursued by malice, the center of sordid situations. I was hurt, bewildered, afraid to express myself, I became terribly afraid of people. "I used to feel as if I were choking. I still feel it sometimes." She put her hand to her throat. "I shall never quite recover from it."

And we used to wonder why we did not quite know Dolores, why we never really felt acquainted with her! Now we are beginning to know.

There was her illness which lasted two years, the result, really, of the strain to which she had been subjected. She emerged, married Cedric Gibbons, and then an astonishing thing happened. Dolores came alive.

The first picture she made after her marriage and her return to the screen was an extremely bad one. She was unfortunately cast, unfortunately exploited, the whole set-up was disappointing.

"Four years ago I should have been devastated," Dolores told me. "Now this fiasco seems almost funny."

Then she made "Rolling Down to Rio," and on the evening it was previewed she declined to attend the performance. "It doesn't matter," she remarked. She stayed at home, reading a book on travel in the Orient, while Cedric went to the preview.

When Dolores told me these things I could not believe her. The anxiously ambitious girl I had known, the girl who agonized over each scene in a picture, who pored over press notices, who wept when those notices were not favorable.

She tried to explain. "I have gained perspective. Cedric has done that for me. I shall never know that seeming troubled ambition again. It is gone. I have done, I think, my best work in pictures since I ceased to be so anxious about it. I can stand now, at some mental distance from my job and view it dispassionately."

She went on, quietly, "I was always too close to things. First I was too close to my family, then to my first husband and our home. Then I was too close to my job in pictures, too engrossed. That is what I mean by being bored. You mustn't let yourself be too close to anything! You will be bored if you do. You will grow stereotyped and stale."

"In the first place, I think that I felt young too long. All that sheltering, that protecting of me was wrong. I was treated, even in my professional days on the screen, as a chit, a schoolgirl who could not be expected to know what anything was about. I thought of myself in that fashion."

Then she said a thing which I think is one of the most important, one of the most interesting things that any woman in pictures has said to me.

"It is a fine thing to be mature. It is lovely to realize that you are a grown woman, with a woman's responsibilities, her obligations and her privileges. It is fine to realize that you are answerable for your own actions, dependent upon your own decisions."

"I don't mean that you do not take advice and seek counsel. I mean that you are a rounded, complete individual, old enough, as our grandmothers used to put it, to know your own mind. This is the beginning of freedom."

The first thing that Dolores had to learn in this new phase was to laugh at herself a little, sometimes. She had been so serious, so intense. But Cedric, who loved her, helped her to gain the perspective which led her to chuckle (to her own enormous astonishment) at her own extravagant reactions. He began by smiling at her, and she ended by smiling with him at herself. That was extremely healthy.

"Cedric made me see that most actors are children, that few of us are really quite sane. We make such large mountains of such small molehills. He made me see that I was funny—almost ridiculous—sometimes. But he never embarrassed me or made me really ashamed."

With this growing perspective her interests suddenly widened. She began to learn tennis, golf, to take swimming lessons. She plans a kennel where she will breed fine bull terriers. She became interested in books of travel, in the study of languages. She pores for hours over maps.

"Cedric and I plan to travel. I want to go everywhere, see everything, learn about everything. I've just found out how small my world has been."

Dolores is animated now, whereas she used to be feverish. She has regained poise, and one used to feel always that she was merely on the defensive. She is prettier than she was in those early, troubled days. Happiness has done that for her.

Perhaps she is not a great actress. But she remains one of the most vivid, the most interesting, the most arresting figures in Hollywood.
be a success rather than from any excitement.

"When I first went to Hollywood," he continued, "I waited around for about three weeks before anything happened. They weren't ready for me at the studio yet. I nearly lost my mind trying to find something to do.

My chief diversion was getting into my car and driving down Hollywood Boulevard and back. And then maybe doing it again.

"Having friends in Hollywood means very little. They're all too busy, working all day and going to bed at nine o'clock so that they can be up at six and on the set again next morning. That, I think, is why there is little night life there.

"When I did start working," he went on, "I realized what a strenuous life it is. You're just too weary after a day at the studio to do anything at night except learn your lines for the next day and sink into bed.

"Make-up proved my first major problem. What looked well on Robert Taylor made me look like a painted doll in the first tests. His is very high coloring that must be toned down. I have no natural color, and we finally discovered that I photographed better with no make-up at all.

"When I first met Garbo, I thought that I'd never be able to work with her," Rex explained.

"The only films I had made before came into the picture were in the days when acting before the camera consisted mostly of mugging all over the place, expressing everything with exaggerated grimaces and gestures. Much as you must do on the stage to project yourself to an audience.

"I found Garbo quiet, subtle, suppressed, underacting. She didn't 'give' me anything. I found it difficult to respond, until I learned to tone down my performance, too.

"I soon learned the fascination of Garbo," he confessed. "She doesn't act. She lives her rôles. She was 'Camille' during the entire filming of the picture.

"She is marvelous to work with. Inspiring. A truly great artist. And beautiful. Beautiful beyond words of description.

"The stories of her aloofness are greatly exaggerated," Rex insists. "She isn't haughty or cold. She is shy. Very shy. She is still afraid of people.

"She has tried to overcome that fear. Sometimes, when there were visitors on the set, she would try to talk to them, ignore them and go ahead with a scene. But she couldn't. They invariably would send her all to pieces. And she'd have to ask to have the screens put up.

"I can understand that," Rex explained. "It isn't easy to play an intimate love scene with what seems like the entire world looking on. It is almost impossible. It affects her work. She knows it. She is extremely sensitive as well as incredibly shy.

"Besides," he pointed out, "she is a very sick woman. She suffers constantly from pains in her tummy.

"We got on, I think, because I was very ill, too, shortly after I started working, and had to have an operation. That delayed production three weeks. When I returned, she always came over to ask how I was feeling. We had lots of fun discussing our aches, pains and symptoms together.

"I never saw her outside the studio," he replied to my question. "She was much too ill to go anywhere, and I didn't go out at all while I was working. I didn't attend a single Hollywood party. I was too tired, and, besides, what fun would it be spending the evening meeting the same people you had been working with all day?

"When the picture was finished, I hated to say good-bye to her," Rex related. "I suppose Garbo says 'good-by' to a new leading man in every picture, but saying that final 'good-by' to her was something else again."

A bona-fide British nobleman enters upon a picture career. One of the oldest titles in England, he is the Earl of Warwick who chooses to be known on the screen as Michael Brooke.
To keep skin young looking — learn how to invigorate your UNDER SKIN

Hard to believe—but those little lines that look as if they'd been creased into your skin from the outside, actually begin underneath!

First, hundreds of little cells, fibres and blood vessels underneath begin to function poorly. Then, the under tissues sag. That's what makes your outside skin fall into creases.

The same way with dull, dry skin!
It's little oil glands underneath that function faultily—and rob your outside skin of the oil it needs to keep it supple, young looking.

But think!—You can invigorate those failing under tissues! You can start those faulty oil glands functioning busily again. That's why you need not be discouraged when lines and skin dryness begin.

Start to rouse your underskin with Pond's "deep-skin" treatments. Soon you'll see lines smoothing out, skin getting supple, young looking again.

Every night, pat Pond's Cold Cream into your skin. Its specially processed fine oils go deep, loosen dirt and make-up. Wipe it all off. Now the rousing treatment—more Pond's Cold Cream briskly patted in. Feel the blood tingling! Your skin is glowing ... softer. Feels toned already!
You are waking up that underskin.

Every morning, and during the day, repeat. Your skin is smooth for powder.

Do this regularly. Soon tissues grow firm again. Lines fade out. Your skin is smooth—supple. It looks years younger!

the hot love scene between Greta Garbo and Robert Taylor that happened to be in progress at the time. It was really no joking matter. Somebody had carelessly thrown a cigarette in the vicinity of Garbo's billowy white gown in a garden scene, and the garment caught on fire. The blaze also spread to Taylor's trousers. However, he played the hero and beat out the smoldering flame. It was enough of a catastrophe to cause the suspension of all work that day.

Gala Desert Premiere.—Also anent "Camille"—it had its grand première at a new theater at Palm Springs, with a lot of stars attending at ten dollars a seat and quite a to-do in the little desert resort. Some of the film was even buried in stone to commemorate the celebration. Ralph Bellamy, who is a leading civic figure in Palm Springs, because of his Racquet Club, was master of ceremonies. Wild rumors were spread that Garbo herself was resting at the desert resort and would attend, but these, as usual, came to naught.

Fleet to the Rescue.—The navy to the rescue! And maybe it should be the inspiration for a picture plot for Bing Crosby. He found that the gobs were all on his side during a little argument in a San Diego café, when some customer heckled him for being a crooner. Crosby was pretty irritated by the incident, and for a moment it looked like fistic conflict, but then the sailors lined up on Bing's side, and the customer decided to call it quits. Oh, by the way, Bing misses no bets in protecting his financial and business interests these days. He recently sued a radio station for broadcasting his records without permission. Bing's shown skill in the management of his era of success, which appears to go on in an amazingly bright way. Certainly "Pennies from Heaven" should prove an especial boost.

Hollywood High Lights

Too Strenuous Life.—Deanna Durbin has been such a hard-working little girl that she may have to take a long rest. It's fairly strenuous, the professional life of a youngster like herself, particularly when she combines radio and pictures. She had a touch of the "flu" around Christmas time, but, then, who in Hollywood didn't? Irene Dunne, Una Merkell, and Grace Moore were among the sufferers. Miriam Hopkins was also laid up, but for a different cause. Her automobile collided with Fred Astaire's and she bruised her nose very badly and wrenched her shoulder. She was only laid up for a day or two during the filming of "Escadrille," though.

Power-Henie Twosome.—It really looks like love between Tyrone Power and Sonja Henie, and we'll know probably by spring whether it's to be marriage or not. Power is rated the most important discovery of 1936 among leading men. Bob Taylor, naturally, was the most important during 1935. We'll wager that Jimmy Stewart, who is already popular, will win out in a big way in "Seventh Heaven," and believe us when we say that Simone Simon is going to be a revelation in that picture.

Marian's Wedding Plans.—No question about the marriage of Marian Marsh and Al Scott. Marian's square-cut diamond engagement ring is just about proof positive. And the attractive young actress was planning quite a sojourn in New York just about this time. Marian's contract with Columbia recently lapsed, but that didn't mean anything, because she was engaged as leading woman for Joe E. Brown in "When's Your Birthday?" almost immediately. And all her interest these days is in her marriage. Scott, as you remember, was formerly the husband of Calleen Moore. He's a New York broker.

Assurance Doubly Sure.—Two marriage ceremonies were required to seal the knot for Gail Patrick and Robert Cobb, the brown derby owner. The couple, who first eloped to Mexico, weren't quite satisfied with the legality of that procedure, so they had a second wedding in Hollywood. A Billie Burke plucks one of the roses that has been named in her honor. It is a pale-pink bloom, almost white in color.

No Ties That Bind.—At long last, or something, Mae West is a free woman. She heard word that the New York court ruled Frank Wallace was not her husband—not at the present time, anyway. There is naturally still an air of mystery about the matter, because of Wallace's persistence in endeavoring to prove his claim, which has repeatedly been denied by the c'mon-up-and-see-me-sometime star. Mae is flourishing right smartly in a financial way, for she has recently made plans for the building of a second apartment house. She owns one already, where she resides.

Gail Patrick has been chosen to glorify our fashions this month with a sumptuous collection of gowns and ensembles. The smart attire above is suitable for dinner and the theater. The high neck line and modified train are important details. The fabric is gold-and-black lamé. The cape is of sable-dyed fox.
- The regal gown to the left is of platinum satin trimmed with platinum fox. The long, circular cape may be worn in a variety of ways.

- The costume above is of black velvet. An interesting touch is the panel in front. Around the neck line is a heavy black silk cord.

- The newest velvet is a shimmering, transparent material which resembles a cellophane fabric. As a wrap with this gown, Miss Patrick wears a scarf of the same fabric bordered with black fox.

- You'll recognize the outer gown as the one on the opposite page, minus the wrap.

JOHN HOWARD
“Can they ever get their returns back on a picture when they waste so much time and money?”

“Listen, pal,” Dick said, “we don’t know that our way is better—we only know it’s different. That’s why so many Americans who go to England to make pictures go nuts. We work at high speed, they work in low gear. They know exactly what they want, and they accept no substitutes. And that’s why their pictures show a finish and perfection of detail that ours never do—except our very biggest productions, and they cost just as much as the British super-specials.”

I digested that. It still seemed to me they wasted an appalling amount of money. I recalled having seen the property man with thirty men, trying unsuccessfully for a half hour to load a wagon. The Canadians, local laborers the company had engaged, used to conditions there, tried to tell him how it should be done. He refused to listen. “Gorblime,” he shouted, “I’ve been loading wagons for twenty years without any help from a lot of Canucks. I guess I can still do it.”

At the end of half an hour the harassed Canucks took matters in their own hands, refused to listen to him, backed the wagon up to the platform, and three of them loaded it in twenty minutes. But all the same, the salaries of thirty men had to be paid for fifty minutes on a job that actually took three men twenty!

There was the little matter of the railroad they had built at a trifling cost of twenty-five thousand dollars—and which they had later been unable to use. The location scout for the company had seen the site in winter, all covered with snow and glistening in the sunlight. He had ordered the railroad constructed there. When the company arrived it was discovered the road was built on such a steep grade the engines of that period couldn’t climb it!

In a confidential chat with several English members of the company I learned that their method of picture-making is a strenuous, nerve-rocking business—even to native Englishmen. It is a nightmare to Americans unused to their methods of production.

The script of “The Great Barrier” was rewritten twice after it went into production. The director, Jeff Borkus, had a nervous breakdown after working a month and a half. It was his first big production, and he was unable to cope with it. He was replaced by Milton Rosmer. Barbara Green, the leading lady, was taken out of the cast at the same time and replaced by Antoinette Cellier. All the scenes with Miss Green had to be reshot.

But then I recalled our own pictures are not always made without difficulties. When Lowell Sherman died, Rouben Mamoulian reshot all he had done on “Becky Sharp.”

When Lucille Powers had been fourteen weeks on “Billy, the Kid” as leading lady, it was suddenly discovered she was not the right type and she was replaced. Fourteen weeks to discover a girl was not the type for a rôle! Could anything be more ridiculous?

When it was found that “Torzan Escapes” did not measure up to the MGM standard, almost nine hundred thousand dollars’ worth of film was scrapped and the picture reshot almost from scratch.

If the English waste money, it is in a conscientious effort to make fine pictures or to cut down expenses in a legitimate way. I have seen Americans waste just as much by playing jokes on the set, willfully spoiling takes for loughs and otherwise holding up production.

“Let’s go down and eat,” Dick interrupted my reflections.

As we left the dining room later we met Mr. Rosmer tearing around like one possessed. “Have you seen my script?” he demanded wildly. “I’ve lost it.” Neither of us had seen it. “How can I make a picture if I haven’t a script?” he demanded distractedly.

And then it developed that in all this company, four thousand miles from home, there were only two scripts—Mr. Rosmer’s and the script girl’s. An American company would have had scripts for every one from the third assistant prop man to the lowest extra.

Dick read my thoughts. “We don’t know that our way is better,” he mocked. “We only know it’s different.”
"Young Grown-up"

"My debut on the stage was made on my twelfth birthday, in Toad of Toad's Hall. 'Little Friend' was my first film, and after that came 'The Man Who Knew Too Much,' with Peter Lorre, and now 'Nine Days a Queen.' Between film engagements I've done a lot of radio broadcasting. I loved playing 'Lady Jane Grey' because I adore history, and 'Lady Jane' has always been one of my favorite characters. I'd like some day to do 'Joan of Arc.'"

Despite her meteoric rise she is a wholly unspoiled little girl. She still goes to school at Wimbledon Common, lives with her parents and an adored younger brother, and encourages no beaux.

As to Hollywood, she's undecided. "I'd love to see it, of course. Wouldn't I? But I don't know, really. My ambition is to become a really fine actress, a star, and to divide my time between stage and screen. That sounds dreadfully trite, I know, yet I mean it so sincerely!"

And just because one realizes her intense sincerity one wonders what she considers her present status? Why speak in the future tense of what is already an accomplished fact?

Henry Wilcoxen, whose hobby is building ship models, carves a miniature craft aboard the bark "Star of Finland" between scenes of his latest picture, "Souls at Sea."

"For a long time I studied dancing and thought of it as a career. Then I took up elocution with Miss Gertrude Burnett at the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art, and won a scholarship. I can never be sufficiently grateful to Miss Burnett; she was such an inspiration to me!"

"But so often we hear of young women who say that they went on the stage or screen as a lark, or as a mere whim," I interrupted. "They just 'happened' to be at a studio or casting office by accident, and next thing they knew they awake and found they were 'famous.' How about that?"

"Well," she said slowly, "I really can't say. It sounds delightful, if true. To me it seems that there is at all times such terrific competition, so much disappointment and heartache, that only a person thoroughly prepared can hope to succeed. After all, getting one's chance is only half the battle; being able to make the most of it is the other, and more important half, isn't it?"

"I am naturally studious, but even if I weren't, if I wanted to succeed in the theater, I would study as much as possible. In addition to my dramatic training I've learned French and German, and I've studied music for years. I don't pretend to be proficient in these things, and I don't mean to be vain about them, but I do feel that a thorough education is as necessary to an actress as hands or feet."

he sent a Christmas card, which was forwarded to her. But she didn’t look him up, for the Crothers play only lasted two weeks; pretty dresses were still lacking from her wardrobe, and again several years passed.

Come September, 1936, and Fate decided to take a hand in the matter. Passing a news stand, Mr. Jeffe saw a familiar face on the front page of a paper. Gertrude Michael was stopping in New York, and at his hotel!

He thought eight o’clock in the morning a reasonable hour to call a mermaid, but it seems it wasn’t.

Becky answered the phone with one eye still closed in sleep, and she wanted to know who it was that called her at the break of dawn. Mr. Jeffe? What Jeffe—E. F.? Oh, well, would he please call again, because she was very tired?

Then Mr. Mamoulian came to town and monopolized all of Becky’s time.

But Mr. Mamoulian’s work is in Hollywood, and Miss Michael went to the hospital. When Mr. Jeffe heard that he asked to be of service, and somehow or other discovered that he wasn’t at all unwelcome.

Cupid Corners Gertrude

Now, one reason why I’m sure it’s Fate is that Becky loses nothing by her illness. She had a splendid and much-needed rest; the picture in London, postponed from one month to the next, was then set several months ahead, and she will be in England for the coronation.

In the meantime, Becky is in Hollywood. The tables are now turned, for Mr. Jeffe is in New York and Mr. Ma-moulian is in Hollywood. Becky will have an excellent chance to try the strength of her love.

While I’m an impersonal observer, I have a hunch that Cupid is rooting for Mr. Jeffe. Otherwise why should he and Fate have gone to the trouble of forcing that airplane down, putting two film companies to such inconvenience, and giving Becky that cold and all?

PIMPLES

CLEAR Up ADOLESCENT PIMPLES

AFTER the start of adolescence, from about 13 to 25, or even longer, impotent glands develop and final growth takes place. The entire body is disturbed. The skin, especially, gets oversensitive. Waste poisons in the blood irritate this sensitive skin. Pimples break out.

Fleischmann’s fresh Yeast clears these skin irritants out of the blood. Then—with the cause removed—the pimples go!

Just eat 3 cakes daily—a cake about ½ hour before each meal—plain, or in a little water, until your skin clears. Start now!
JAMES STEWART was having trouble with his love-making in a test rehearsal opposite Simone Simon. Every one began noticing that his eyes, seemingly focused on mid-air instead of on the fascinating orbs of Miss Simon, rolled up and down and from side to side.

"Try looking at Simanze, Jimmie!" same one suggested.

"Can't—when I'm fascinated by a fly!" cried Jimmie. Abruptly releasing Simane, he grabbed a fly swatter from the prop man. The offending insect was vanquished. And Jimmie, relieved, was free to concentrate on Simane.

BETWEEN the initial scenes at Bette Davis's "Marked Woman," the star was chatting with friends who were there to welcome her back from England, and reporters who were there to interview her. Since Bette was starting a new phase of her career, one might have expected the conversation to be centered on her.

Instead, visitors, press, and Bette were talking about Mae West! They spoke of Mae's marble statue at herself, her walk, her voice, her late monkey. That Bette wasn't jealous; that she, in fact, started the discussion and continued it, is typical of her attitude toward fellow stars.

IN the holiday news and gossip one notes that Barbara Stanwyck has bought fifteen race horses and is erecting stables and a ranch house for their comfort and convenience; that Dorothy Arzner, the director, owns two hundred pairs of jeweled or engraved cuff links; that Jack Benny has bought his wife, Mary Livingstone, a pair of emerald and diamond clips and a silver-fat cape, and that he has promised her a trip abroad; that Elinor Faire, triumphant screen beauty at an earlier day, was picked up on the street, wandering in a daze induced by worry because she could not pay her rent.

OVERHEARD on leaving a Hollywood party which had not jelled: "It must be an awful feeling to give a party which turns into a general calamity!"

THE newest parlour game in Hollywood—or should one say black-and-red-lacquered-bar-and-playroom game?—is "Testing Your Artistic Ability." Whoever is "it" must draw a picture which represents a current event or a song, and then everybody must guess what the picture means. Chester Morris won himself an elegant box of chocolate tobaccos the other evening with a drawing of two battles, each marked XXX. Between them was an almost recognizable caricature of himself. After every one had guessed and guessed, Chet announced that the title of the picture was "Comin' Through the Rye."

But we are afraid that we liked better the drawing which one actor made of a rival and pantomime player, standing in his conservatory. He gave it the name of a dish which is featured at a local expensive restaurant—"Ham under Glass."

NOW, it all comes out. Brian Donlevy is a thief. In his first picture, "Barbary Coast," he was given a somewhat tattered and very cheap black shirt to wear in a certain scene. The wardrobe told him that Clark Gable had worn this very same shirt in "Call of the Wild." Now, it so happened that Clark was Brian's particular hero, and it so happened that that scene brought Donlevy to fame and potential fortune. Being a supersitious gent, he wiped the shirt, which was by this time a mere wispy. But he wears what there is left of it to the studio whenever he has an important scene to do.

Mr. Donlevy says the studia may send him a bill for the shirt. He can't send it back to them—there's nothing left of it.

THE sudden rush on Hollywood ray shops was not due entirely to this holiday season. Clark Gable started it when he began buying dolls and sending them to people—Carole Lombard and Madeline Fields were the first recipients—with the announcement, "This is the way you looked when you were young!" The shops were practically sold out of funny-looking baby dolls in no time.

But smart buyers are looking ahead. One of them told us, "We are ordering a stock of grotesque and astonishing old lady and old gentlemen dolls—caricature dolls—because actors are already trying to order insulting ones to send to other actors with the message, 'This is how you will look when you are old!"'

Such fun!

CRAZY, naive Hollywood is still the world's most colorful town. We saw Glenda Farrell shopping on Hollywood Boulevard, entranced by a man walking with a small black pig named Barbara on a leash. Mae West steps out of her limousine and hurries into a shop. Ginger Rogers, shopping in noontday crowds, wears dark glasses and a wide-brimmed hat to escape attention. Fans recognize her, but completely overlook Warren Hull, young leading man, whose protection lies in his three small sons, all dressed alike in sailor suits.

YOU'LL never realize how much Alice Brady laves dogs until you visit her home. All the curtains are measured a certain distance from the floor, and the floors themselves are marble and rugless—so the mutts may feel perfectly Beautiful California landscape meets the eye from the patio of Director Clarence Brown's home.

Free to act as they choose whenever the notion strikes them. Adrian, who decorated the house, was asked to measure the tallest dog before making the drapes.

A NITA LOUISE'S mother may be married to Irene Rich's ex-husband, David Blankenhorn, by the time you read this. Anita is delighted at the idea of having a stepfather and already consults him about business matters and calls him "David."

THE screen's most forward sophisti-cate has evidently learned that last-ter year's reticence is best for a fine romance. At Paramount there is just no such person as Clark Gable. Carole Lombard is aghast at any suggestion that she be linked in print with Clark. However, at MGM he admits his fondness for her. Carole's friends say that she's too much in love to risk any blunders, and silence is her best bet.

What a girl does before she's twenty-three isn't ever a very important thing in her life. But if she hasn't made something of herself by the time she is thirty it's just too bad! So says Bette Davis, who is honest about being twenty-eight herself. She doesn't believe in the popular consolation line about one's vital moments starting at forty, you see.

Buddy Ebsen has been given the title of "the dancing comic" by his fans.

UNBELIEVABLE are the restrictions placed upon the actions and speech of stars. Recently Gorbo was chided for becoming sunburned—and difficult to photograph. Jean Harlow, Joan Crawford and other stars are forbidden to speak of Mrs. Simpson for publication. Whatever they said might antagonize British fans. Politics, religion, divorce are all banned subjects.

MEXICAN elopements now have church-wedding follow-ups at home. With Mexican divorces being called rather doubtful, the Hollywood girls and boys are circling their elopements across the border by repeat ceremonies. Gail Patrick and Brian Donlevy are the latest to make certain their respective marriages are quite legal.

If John Beal's complexion looks a tri-ple less than perfect in his portraits—there's a reason. It's John himself. It seems he has gone to bat with RKO about retouching his photographs. He declares that it would rob him of his true character and that people shouldn't be fooled by skilled touching up. This stand of his is unique, for the other stars possess normal vanity.

"Outdoor Skin"

SMOOTH IN A SECOND

...Then Make-up's Smart

A SWELL TIME in the out of doors is no reason for a skin all scuffed and flaky looking for your swanky evening date.

There's a simple way popular girls know—to get rid of all those little flaky bits that spoil skin for make-up. A special kind of cream that actually melts off horrid "powder catchers"—in just one application!

Here's how a distinguished der-matologist explains it.

"Exposure hastens the drying out of sur-face skin cells. They shrink, swell loose. The skin feels harsh. These particles can be melted away instantly with a keratolytic cream (Vanishing Cream). Then the smooth, underlying cells appear."

See this for yourself—with Pond's Vanishing Cream.

Before make-up—Right after cleansing put on a film of Pond's Vanishing Cream. It smooths away every flaky bit. Now power and rouge go on evenly. Stay for hours.

Overnight—Apply Pond's Vanishing Cream after your nightly cleansing. Leave it on. As you sleep, your skin gets softer.

Mrs. William L. Mellon, Jr. says: "After Pond's Vanishing Cream, powder goes on evenly and stays looking fresh. I use it over-night, too, after cleansing."

Lovely glamour of luxuriant, dark, silky lashes—swift beauty of brow line—soft shaded color of lids! These can all be yours—instantly, easily—with a few simple touches of Maybelline Eye Beauty Aids. Then your eyes speak the language of beauty—more truly, more clearly than words themselves!

But beware of bold, theatrical mascaras that shout "too much makeup," that overload lashes, and make them sticky, lumpy, dry, or brittle. Many women have entirely denied themselves the use of mascara rather than fall into the "too much makeup" error. But colorless, neglected, scanty lashes deny the all-important eyes their glorious powers.

Maybelline has changed all this. And now more than 10,000,000 modern, style-conscious women solve this problem perfectly by using Maybelline's new Cream-form or popular Solid-form Mascara—for the charming, natural appearance of beautiful eyes. Non-smarting, tearproof, absolutely harmless. Reasonably priced at leading toilet goods counters.

The other Maybelline Eye Beauty Aids are just as delightful to use. Form your brows into graceful, expressive curves—with the smooth marking Maybelline Eyebrow Pencil. worth commenting upon. They first met at the Tracadero, and they clicked instantly—the tough mug and the movie idol. On the surface it is an odd combination, but actually it is easy to understand. They both like to knock around in the out of doors, they dislike social affairs, and both are completely unaffected. They don't care a rap for the usual Hollywood idea of putting up an imposing front.

The spell Bob has woven about the fans is easy to understand. He projects on the screen the same fellow you meet in real life. His eyes are wide-spaced and of a startling blue, as if composed of glinting crystals that strike off many tiny lights.

His hair is black, wavy, and comes to a widow's peak. His eyebrows are unusually thick and heavy, so that in making up for the screen he has to lighten them a little by shaving the facial grease paint into the edges of the brows.

I don't think he looks as muscular on the screen as he does off, probably because in an ordinary gathering he stands out as taller and broader of shoulder than the average man. Bob has a full lower lip, indicative of a generous, affable nature.

That is Robert Taylor, the star.

But the thoughts behind his condid eyes are the thoughts of Doc Brugh. And Doc does some pretty straight thinking. "When I first started up the ladder, Louis B. Mayer of MGM told me two things," he said, "the first was—never get a big head; and second, save my money."

Bob wants to follow that advice. Part of his fear of becoming Bob Taylor is that he might forget what Mr. Mayer told him. That's easy to do in Hollywood. But for two years now Bob has not changed one iota in his self-esteem. He isn't high-hat and won't be. And he's saving his money. The only difference in him is the natural increase in poise that comes with success, and the polishing of technique in acting that is bought and paid for only through experience on the screen. His eyes are as clear and free from guile as when I first met him.

Because of his fear of becoming Bob Taylor, he has formed only few new friendships. One is Barbara Stanwyck. They became acquainted making a picture together and discovered that they got along very well. Borbara is regarded as "swell" by publicity writers and photographers, and if you can please them you've passed the high court. She has common sense, balance, and knows her business. She has been a steadying influence on Bob, and he appreciates her friendship.

Among the men he has only four intimates. Spencer Tracy is one. The others are his pals from the days before his screen success—Don Miloe, Redmond Doms, and Doctor Robert T. Ross. Doctor Ross is about the same age as Bob, and they have been close friends since Pomona College days. At present Doctor Ross is professor of psychology at Stanford, and is known as a man of striking brilliance.

I don't think Bob's fans need to worry as Bob does. If he were turning into a shadow on the screen, the signs would be clear enough—a noticeable swelling of the head, a veneer of indifference, a secret self-satisfaction. All telltale signs, and not one of them to be found in Taylor or Doc Brugh, in the shadow or in the substance.

"You can quit worrying and forget that fear," I told him. "Your skepticism will protect you if nothing else will. You'll never believe in posing or artifice or false praise."

And he need never worry that a girl wouldn't love him for himself alone. Certainly on that point he can dismiss all fear. But being a skeptic, he probably won't!

Melvyn, like his wife, was not born to the theater. Neither did he have it thrust upon him. He followed it because he felt it was his bent and because he loved it.

"Melvyn became an actor after the War. He had served for a while and then he seemed to drift toward the stage. His father was a musician so that he has some artistic blood in his veins," continued Mrs. Cahagan. "Incidentally, Melvyn takes after his father in other ways; the senior Mr. Douglas, who died a few years ago, loved nothing better than to give his money away to the poor and Melvyn is exactly the same. He's always for the under dog. Even when he was earning very little, he gave away more than he could afford. He likes to dress well, too, and spends a great deal on his clothes. He always says he'd like to take his family to a desert island where there'd be no shops to tempt him. I only hope that continued success in Hollywood won't spoil him. Hollywood is a dangerous place," she said with a twinkle in her eye, "and men are susceptible, you know. But I don't think it will. He's much too sane and Helen is a marvelous balance for him."

On the way home I thought to myself, "Some day, when Melvyn Douglas dies, his epitaph should read, 'Even his mother-in-law loved him,' for greater glory than this hath no man."

How do you like Joan Crawford's new hair style? You'll get a better view of it in "The Last of Mrs. Cheyney."

about it, reread the play to be sure it was the same 'Mrs. Craig,' she was thinking of, and called the deal off in no uncertain terms.

"I wasn't afraid to tackle the part on the grounds that it was unsympathetic," she said. "I'm used to them. That's what I always have to play, Prud, hauty wenches who would sell out to Japan or Dutch Guiana for one battleship more or less. The part didn't scare me. But I was afraid that the Pulitzer Prize drama of 1924 would seem a trifle dated.

"You know how I felt, I thought some supervisor might inject a radio, to bring it up to the minute. Then the picture script was handed me and it was really beautifully handled. My advisory board sat on me firmly, and said: Roz, do the part. It's good for you,' And I did and it was."

She looked serious for a moment.

"I wish you could know how much acting I had to do in that picture. 'Mrs. Craig' represented everything I detest. I had to wear a mental toupee to play her."

But play her she did, not only to the overalving delight of the critics, but with such spirited co-operation as to cause her director to present her with a cigarette case inscribed 'To a Swell Trauer, from Dorothy Armer.'

Our table could have been in the center of Times Square, judging from the traffic the Russell presence inspired. Cole Porter came over to tell about a new song he had just written for "Red, Hot and Blue! Mrs. James Melton, the sangbird's bride, reported to Rosalind how well her Beverly Hills garden was flourishing; one of her sisters stopped long enough to remind the cinematic member of the family that she was expected at the madam's for a sitting.

Rosalind confessed to a passion for clothes, horses, Chanel's Number 5, and shooting.

"Whenever I'm in town I go to a little place on Sixth Avenue and bang away at the traveling ducks and clay pipes. Always have done it. Guess I always will. When I was in the theater here—trying to be, that is—they used to send to the shooting gallery for that Russell girl—maybe she would do for this bit. Then they'd do an hour later I'd be back at the clay pipes without the part."

"You like orses and cunds and pretty smells and Gielgud's 'Hamlet,'" Miss Russell was reminded. "But what don't you like? That gives the true index to character."

"I hate second-rate things," said Rosalind deliberately. "I hate imitations, especially in clothes, because they are usually on women 108 years old. That brings me to age.

"Here's where I make a break for it," said Rosalind. "I hope he'll let us have our honeydew next time," and she was out of the cab, streaking across Fifth Avenue in a sensational spurt.

The taxi-driver, whom I had not noticed up to this point, tacked after her with admiration illuminating his rugged face.

"Now, that's quite a gal," he said judicially.

He summed it up as only a man of the world could.

WORTH TRYING, ANYWAY.—Broadway, that bedizened old siren, has lured several film players to New York to try acting on the stage. Frank Albertson has scored a big hit in a military-school play called "Dr. Rait"; Florence Eldridge came East to play in "Days Without End" by the abovenmentioned Lillian Hellman. It wasn't good enough to last more than a few days, and more's the pity, because Miss Eldridge gave a brilliant performance and the play had elements of greatness. Alice White, Lucille Ball, and Conway Tearle are rehearsal something called "Hey Diddle Diddle." And Katharine Hepburn will open in "Jane Eyre"...any day now.

Patient, Thy Name Is———Gloria Swanson, too, has half promised to appear on the stage shortly in a play called "Lovers Meeting." It is only a half promise, because upcropped Frances Marian with a screen play she had written for Gloria. And Gloria wants to make the right decision this time. Her career has been a shambles for so long. It has been a dead lull for too long. (And, Gloria, thousands of others, I am sure, as well as myself, have missed you something fierce.) At the height of her popularity, Gloria Swanson was the gayest, most friendly, and most ingratiating person I have ever known. Since her eclipse, her spirit has been the same. Call it gallantry, if you will, or call it guts. It's a fine example of the resiliency of the human spirit, no matter what you

A Son for Ballast.—For a long time
I've drowned out all near-by discussions about who is the best screen actor with persistent cries of "Spencer Tracy." But I've just learned what a really grand person he is. He'll sit there and tell you that it is suicidal

Alice Faye and Michael Whalen do a little rope-skipping after lunch for the good of the old waistline.
Nothing to Hide.—New Yorkers simply adore Errol Flynn and Lili Damita. They are so refreshing. After a long parade of film couples who turn on beaming smiles and who hold hands whenever any one seems to be watching, the disarming candor of the venemous looks these two toss at each other is a relief. They make me suspect that they are really ideally suited to each other, and don't care what conclusions the public may draw.

Soon you will be able to get a copy of the long-heralded book that Flynn wrote about his adventures in New Guinea. It is called "Beam Ends" and will be published by Longmans, Green.

All Around Town.—At last Dorothy Mackaill is to make a picture—but in England. Josephine Hutchinson's mother, Leona Roberts, has signed a contract with RKO. She prefers the stage, but she gets awfully lonely for Jo. B. P. Schulberg says she will probably deny it, but he expects to marry Sylvia Sidney. The world is still waiting, and impatiently, for a glimpse of the picture "Lost Horizon," but meanwhile New York bars are offering the "Lost Horizon" cocktail, guaranteed to put you to sleep until the picture is released. An entirely unauthenticated rumor has it that Leopold Stokowski steals into a theater daily to laugh hystereically at Reginald Gardiner's leading number in "Born to Dance." Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., is a close friend of the new English king, so probably he won't come back here to make a picture after all.

Charles Laughton, of all people, is responsible for the reigning fashion in women's hats. The beret he wears in "Rembrandt" was the inspiration. In the new Lily Pons picture, one Frank Jenks, previously unknown to me to my great sorrow, steps into the ranks of immortal lunatics. Heretofore only Harpo Marx, Buddy Ebsen, Mischa Auer, and Eric Blore were eligible. Humphrey Bogart's wife, Mary Phillips, will be in "Robber Barons," with Edward Arnold and Frances Farmer. She's a grand actress.

The prettiest girls around town are Marsha Hunt and Arline Judge.

The Search Goes On.—This town is practically knee-deep in studio scouts scurrying around trying to find the ideal players for "Stella Dallas" and "Wings." Tallulah Bankhead closed her play for a few days to fly out to the Coast to make Technicolor tests for "Scarlett O'Hara." Mae Murray was in the running for "Stella Dallas" until the Goldwyn scout found an unknown he thought was better. Sam Goldwyn would kinda like to have Ann Harding play "Stella," but she seems a bit too refined.

"... I Can Tell You HOW to CHANGE YOUR FACIAL APPEARANCE"

Dr. James Stotter

In confidence, what would YOU say is your worst facial defect? Have you a distempering, lumped nose? Or noticeable wrinkles and lines of age? Or protruding ears? Or puffy pouches under your eyes? Perhaps you're grown used to your own disfigurement... But don't see it anymore! Yes, you may not notice it... but others do... they notice facial defects first of all! Maybe that's why happiness and business chances pass you by and even to someone else... someone whose facial appearance is more pleasing.

HOW SCIENCE CAN HELP YOU!

To almost every human being, young or old, an opportunity exists to change and improve their appearance. If Nature hasn't been kind to you... if you're discouraged about your appearance, let us hold out a helping hand. Let me tell you about FACIAL RECONSTRUCTION, the marvelous plastic surgery that has made it possible to change and improve your appearance.

Hard on Our Critic.

So Picture Play dislikes Fredric March's "bluff heartiness," as Bothwell in "Married," and concludes from it that Mr. March cannot act! Teck! Teck! And Well? Well! Picture Play's critic feels like this because, he says, he has seen the play and, as a playgoer, he is simply too superior to movie actors—especially Mr. March.

Now if Picture Play's critic had really seen the play, he would know that Max- well Anderson made Bothwell a "bluff" and "forthright" lover so attractive (in funks) that every time Philip McKi- nval, as Bothwell, made an entrance he was greeted with rounds of applause. That the real Bothwell (your critic apparently really had read a history book) was far different is something here for you; an act- tor must play a part as it is written. Therefore, if Fredric March has created Mr. Anderson's Bothwell on the screen, he has had a triumph, as the genuine states think.

From the similar carping spirit dis- played toward Mr. March in the note on "Anthony Adverse," it appears that Picture Play is allowing some member of its staff to gratify a personal dislike for Mr. March in its pages—a very unethical proceeding and one which Mr. March's numerous fans will resent very strongly.

For my part, I assure you that I shall never buy Picture Play again, and I am calling these two articles to the attention of my friends, whom I confidently expect to adopt the same plan of reprisal.

Foils to Agree.

Who does Henry Weiss think he is? anyway? He certainly shows a de- cided lack of intelligence. He says that Robert Taylor is a "fine and intense" actor. Mr. Weiss, if you'll pardon my saying so, you are either a liar or don't know good acting when you see it. I have seen all Mr. Taylor's films to date, and he has only done real acting in one: "Magnificent Obsession." In "His Father's Wife" he murdered till black in the face. Incidentally, in case you didn't catch it, he was rotten.

He also states that Franchot Tone should "come off his high horse, or he'll wake up and find himself minus a great many fans." That is also a falsehood. Mr. Tone is a great favorite at the box office. He is one of the finest actors on the screen (wouldn't you like to see Robert Taylor equal his acting in "Mu- tiney in May" and "The Lives of a Bengal Lancer"?)

But now comes my biggest peeve of all. Mr. Weiss states that Gary Cooper's simpering and idiotic) the perfect team is formed. If you saw "To Mary—With Love," you cannot doubt that she is a real actress.

And still another thing! Jean Arthur is nasal-toned to the exceedingly dumb Mr. Weiss. I'll admit that Miss Ar- thur hasn't the loveliest voice on the screen, but when any one has as mag- netic a personality as Miss Arthur's, one can overlook her voice. She has made the most sensational come-back in re- cent years.

And now, lest you think that all I have to do is disagree with Henry Weiss I'll give some other opinions: To me the three loveliest women on the screen are Norma Shearer, Claudette Colbert and, above all, the gorgeous Madeleine Carroll. She is too beautiful to be real.

Learn to Talk with Charm
A NEW COURSE

by MARGERY WILSON

You "place" yourself every time you open your mouth to speak. The quality of your voice be-speaks your breeding—or lack of it. Your accent indicates your advantages—or limitations. Your manner of speaking shows your poise—or self-consciousness. What you say marks you as an interesting person—or a bore.

In preparing and preparatory schools, pupils are taught how to stand and breathe and pitch their voices; how to pronounce words with a distinguished accent; how to overcome shyness; how to make and acknowledge introductions and compliments; how to talk with strangers, dinner and dancing partners, with small and large groups.

But finishing schools are expensive. Margery Wilson has developed finishing schools that come to you by mail at very slight cost. This new course, "How to Talk with Charm" was prepared at the request of countless pupils who wanted a complete course devoted exclusively to conversation. It has opened for them the doors into exclusive social groups. It has won for them professional and social success, admiration, romance.

This instruction comes to you in your own home in unidentified envelopes.

terly charming people, Nick and Nora Charles, as brought to life by William Powell and Myrna Loy, are one's friends even though it is asking too much of life to give one friends like them. It must be a satisfaction to a screen criminal to be run down by a team, a joy for a actor to play among their company. Never mind who kills whom in this case; it matters not at all except as they serve these fascinating characters to function. Fans will be surprised at James Stewart's serious acting and the direct and honest manner in which he does it; in the strong impression made by Dorothy McNulty, a newcomer, and the further return of Elissa Landi to the screen. Her beautiful voice, exquisite diction and refinement must never be lost to us again.

"Stowaway"—20th Century-Fox. Is Shirley Temple or Garbo the greater actress? I know there are many who will insist that the tot is but I prefer the native screen joy that holds to place both in the niche of genius. Star Temple's picture is one of her best, some say the best of all, though they perhaps the Little Rebel." Anyway, she's concerned in a plot more than a series of songs and dances and she is a skillful and touchably unusual plot, too. She is the orphaned daughter of missionaries in China who is shipped down the river to escape being friended by an American playboy and takes a successful hand in his love affair. Shirley sings, dances, does imitations, speaks Chinese, quotes proverbs in the manner of Charlie Chan, but more rigorously, and shows herself to be an amazing, compelling actress and not the fresh-faced prodigy her detractors call her.

"That Girl from Paris."—RKO. Lily Pons may be too cute and her new picture too childish to suit you and me, but we must bow to the fact that others will find it a big winner. Of course Miss Pons is a great coloratura singer—her press agents insist that she is the world's greatest. Be that as it may, there are always ones and twos and threes whom coloratura is just melodious garring, though not every possessor of such proficiency could qualify as a screen heroine as pleasantly as Miss Pons does. It seems to me she would be helped by an adult story, though. Certainly her singing is marvelous, sophisticated, the musical high lights of the present venture being the "Blu Danube" waltz and "Una Voce Poco Fa." The Baritono, as the inevitable debut at the Metropolitan which must conclude the film o every singer. Otherwise the picture, which has a runaway hit, a songbird attaching herself to a jazz band, following them to America and getting rid of the wife and finally marrying Gene Raymond, Love will find a way.

"Sing Me a Love Song."—Warner. If you think that James Melton ha what it takes to be a screen star, you will find him giving his all here. He leaves something wanting in you demand for acting, you will find Hug Herbert as the hilariously comic star. Between their two widely divergent efforts a pretty good picture come through. Mr. Melton sings and Mr. Herbert cuts up in the best chance he can to be funny in his peculiarity. He plays four parts at that, four members of the Hammerschla family, each an eccentric, through that he falls in with the kleptomaniacs of the group. Mr. Melton has the more comic of the four and perhaps more romantic of all. As far as I could tell, later the proprietor of a department store, with Patricia Ellis the plump object of his musical affections. His songs are tuneful, the picture attrac-

Barbara L.—Stills of "The Charge of the Light Brigade" may be had by writing to the Publicity Dept., Warner Brothers, 324 West 41st Street, New York City. They sell for ten cents each.

B. V.—Perhaps Metro-Goldwyn may supply a supply of Don Alvarado since he recently made "Nobody's Baby" for that studio.

Wintered Gregory.—Marlene Dietrich is married to Rudolph Sieber since 1911. They have a daughter, Maria. Miss Dietrich was born in Berlin, Germany, December 27, 1905.

Norma Sallander.—For stills of any Robert Taylor, Clark Gable, or Nelson Eddy film, address the Publicity Dept., MGM, 1510 Broadway, New York. Each still costs ten cents.

Shannon B.—Columbia is to produce "The Life of Frederic Chopin," and it is quite likely that Francis Lederer will be cast. The script was written by the last. You might address the United Artists Studio for his photo. He is six feet.

M. C. P.—Gene Autry was born in Tioga, Texas, September 29, 1926. He is making "The Big Show," with Kay Hughes, for Republic. Married.

Pearl Nathan.—Ginger Rogers is five feet five and weighs 115. Madeleine Carroll is five feet five and weighs 122.

Pat Palm.—Richard Arlen made "The Great Gatsby," and in England, while he was born in Charlotteville, Virginia, September 1, 1898, is about five feet eleven and a half, weighs 155, has brown hair and blue-gray eyes.

S. E. B.—It is quite true that Dick Powell almost lost his voice, but I am happy to report that he is in perfect form again and has recently completed "Gold Diggers of 1937."

Ruth Winstead.—John Barrymore was confined to a sanitarium after completing "Nowo and Juliet," but he is very much alive, having married Elaine Barry on November 8th.

Marmola's Freedom Tablets: a reliable diet for the skin.

Kay Korte.—Nils Asther has been skipping all over Europe so that it is impossible to keep track of his address. You might write to a trade paper like the Motion Picture Herald, 1250 Sixth Avenue, New York and inquire if "Abdul the Damned" will be shown in Los Angeles.

Martha Shields.—Melynn Douglas was born in Macon, Georgia, on April 5, 1901. Clark Gable was born William Gable, but all the other players you mention use their right names.

Now, without any risk, you can eliminate streaks or patches of gray or faded hair to hundreds of shades of blonde, brown or black. A small brush and BROWNATONE does it. Prove it—by applying a little of this famous tint to a lock of your own hair.

GRACE MOORE
Heads Hit List in New Song-Filled Triumph, “When You’re In Love”

Two thousand dollars for a husband! That’s the fee Louise Fuller, famed opera star, paid a total stranger to marry her. And that’s the start of one of the most scintillating, side-splitting romances I’ve ever laughed through—Grace Moore’s stunning new hit, “When You’re In Love”, with Cary Grant. Of course, any film of Grace’s is aces with me. But “When You’re In Love” is even several notches better, to my way of thinking, than “One Night of Love” or “The King Steps Out”.

The star who started a new style in song films hits some new vocal highs in music numbers by Jerome Kern and Dorothy Fields, which include the soon-to-be-famous “Our Song”.

The cast is loaded for comedy with such notables as Cary Grant, Aline MacMahon, Luis Alberni, Henry Stephen-

THE MOST EXCITING PICTURE SINCE "MUTINY ON THE BOUNTY"

Again—as in the stirring "Mutiny"—you live the roaring drama of men against the sea. You share the struggles, the heartaches, the laughter of courageous souls who leave the women they love to dare the wrath of the angry waves...men in conflict with their destiny enacting the most thrilling story the screen could offer. A brilliant triumph that takes rank with the greatest pictures M-G-M has given you!

They met at a dance. She thought he was the best-looking man she had ever seen. They danced together several times, and she enjoyed his visits when he asked permission to call at her home. She gladly gave him a date.

When he arrived, a few evenings later, she was thrilled beyond words. For a while they sat and talked, but the usual stock of small talk was soon exhausted. Then his eyes turned to the piano in the corner.

"Do you play?"

"A little," she admitted, and hung over the piano, fascinated, while she played for him.

"You play beautifully!" he exclaimed, "it's wonderful to find a girl with an accomplishment like that!"

Under the warming influence of music, friendship blossomed rapidly; they laughed and chatted gaily until, before they knew it, the evening was gone.

He begged for another date and she felt that she must be the happiest girl in the world. As yet, she thought, how different it might have been! Only a few short months ago, men seldom asked her for a second date. For she did not know a note of music then, and had no accomplishment to offer. She could only sit tongue-tied and embarrassed, making feeble attempts to entertain her guests until interludes drove them to find an excuse and leave.

It Seemed Too Good To Be True

But now! She blessed the day when she had written to the U. S. School of Music to inquire about their easy, modern method of learning music at home. Learn to play without instruction! Without any previous knowledge of music or special talent! Without any long tedious practice! It hadn't seemed possible.

Look at the notes above. They are E-A-B-C. Could anything be simpler to remember? It's easy to read music by this double-quick method—easy to play, too, for a remarkable invention, the "Note-Finder," shows where each note is located on the piano.

"But how thankful I am that I decided to try," she thought. "It was so surprisingly easy. Why, I started reading music and playing real tunes almost from the start. And now everybody admires my playing. I'm invited everywhere. I have lots of friends and best of all, HE'S coming to see me again!"

He came to see her many times after that. And one evening, when he called, he had a beautiful solitaire ring in his pocket.

Here's Proof You Can Learn Any Instrument

WHAT THE FANS THINK

Praise for the Editor.

FOR the past four years I have been a steady reader of Picture Play, never missing an issue and always awaiting eagerly the following month's copy. I genuinely enjoy the magazine because it is the only intelligent and honest publication of its kind. The rest are what is commonly known as trash and belong in the wastebasket. I fail to see how any intellectual movie fan can tolerate them. However, the purpose of this letter is not to praise Picture Play to the skies but to say a few words about a man who has been sorely neglected in "What the Fans Think." I refer, of course, to Norbert Lusk.

From the time I first picked up an issue of this magazine to the present day, I do not recall ever seeing or reading any article of praise concerning Mr. Lusk. Yet it is his editorials and Thumbnail Reviews that cement me and Picture Play. His miniature reviews of current pictures are truly brilliant. They are brief, to the point and always clear, actually telling more in a few words than others do in hundreds. He makes every word count and his criticisms are intelligent and free from prejudice. Really, they are magnificent and should positively not be overlooked by any one interested in films. My only regret is his limited space.

It is unnecessary to add that as long as Norbert Lusk remains editor, Picture Play will be assured of my enthusiasm.

The Trail-blazers.

THERE is no doubt about the movie industry deserving a great portion of the praise it receives. That goes for actors, too. I never see a film, regardless of its weaknesses, but what I am left in a state of thrilled wonderment at the vast resources used in its production.

But there is another organization that moves hand in hand with the movies, and seldom gets a fraction of the credit due it—the fan magazine.

To have an appreciation of films we must have knowledge of them. The film magazine has carved for itself the niche of informer to fans the world over.

Where else could we learn of the struggles, hurts, and hopes of our favorite stars; or gain that delightfully intimate feeling of knowing personally each individual actor? Where else could we meet the picture crew—all those who cooperate to evolve that breathless silver miracle we see from the comfortable depths of a theater chair?

No place but in our film magazine—the trail-blazers of the motion-picture industry.

A Voice from England.

CAN you spare a line or two for an English fan to pass some opinions? It's more than three years since I wrote and I feel it's time I poked my nose in again.

Firstly, I'm so glad Norbert Lusk took notice of our John Gielgud in the September issue. Mr. Lusk, you ain't seen nuthin' yet. Wait till you see him as "Hamlet." He's marvelous! (Continued on page 9)

Secondly, as one of Jesse Matthews's ardent admirers, I'm so pleased that America likes her as much as we do. She's about the only one of our British actresses who can dance, sing, and act. One unceasing combination.

It's refreshing to see that our pictures are making good progress in America, films like "Nine Days a Queen," "Secret Agent," and "Rhodes." They're all supers and our producers are here and there making up more and more pictures like them. The trouble is we've got the directors and the actors, but our actresses—ouch! You have one of them now trying to make an actress out of her—Madeleine Carroll. You'll never do it, Hollywood. She's cultured, she's lovely, but that's about all.

And as a final plea, will some kind American come and take Dietrich away from here? She's nothing more than publicity-crazy. She's even taken to visiting hospitals now. This morning's paper quotes her as saying "I was born to be a nurse." Now laugh that one off!—Betty M. Swallow.

Jane Wonders Why.

ERROL FLYNN proclaims in every interview that he must have privacy and be free from intruding fans. As far as I can see, all he would have to do to this would be to withdraw. As is, he is hardly known outside of the articles written about him—"the-man" quality and his desire to be left alone. Take a few months off, Mr. Flynn, and get mixed up with the Spanish situation—you can be a brave hombre without getting your name in the paper.

Why does Freddie Bartholomew's accent get thicker and thicker with every picture? Born of poor simple folk, he is headed for oblivion if the "ultra-ultra" English accent is not toned down and Freddie becomes a human being.

Is Robert Montgomery the moron he is alleged to be in a recent article wherein it is stated that he wanted his telephone number to match his car number so he kept on annoying the owner of the telephone number at all hours of the night until he, the owner, finally became disgusted and gave up the number so that "cute" Mr. Montgomery could have it? What an ambition—what a man—what a life!

Isn't it strange that out of all the English actors who are with us the only two who have absorbed any naturalness in speech are Cary Grant and Reginald Denny? All the others have the Freddie Bartholomew habit of thickeening up the accent until the old folks at home wouldn't recognize their dear sons. Then Hollywood also seems to bring out a curiosity of restraint in them. They become so retiring that eventually they "die" as did Clive Brook. He became more English with each passing month until I am sure when he arrived in England he found it fearfully vulgar and slangy.

On the other hand, the English girls resemble the American speech. and taking the best from both English and American come out with jolly nice voices. Who, after all but Ruth Chatterton could live with a "deah, deah" consciousness long? Can you imagine how blath it would be to sit across the room and talk with some one who was so word-conscious that they forgot what they were saying? Speech after all is for the conveying of an idea. When the attention is so drawn to the manner or intonation of the speech, it (the art of speech) has lost its importance.

Well, that's all. No, I'm not an American cribbing the English—I'm English, too—only I just can't understand why Hollywood does that to them. —Jane Doolery.

Beauty Unadorned.

The editorials in Picture Play are interesting and instructive. "Amen" to the one regarding freakish make-ups either wished on or adopted by the stars. Alas! Simone Simon has fallen victim to those horrible false eyelashes. They are truly an abomination and detract from the appearance of any one wearing them, as all extreme make-up does. A good actress should depend on her art and ability to entertain by personal appeal. Extremely freakish make-up diverts attention from acting.

"an Crawford, in "The Gorgeous Hussy," a glorious example of the improvement in appearance given by really artistic and dignified make-up, her whole performance stood out, an inspired piece of superb acting by a capable and beautiful actress, un-poised by meretricious make-up.

Keep up the crusade. Let us have natural actresses with beauty unadorned, except for necessary results entailed by studio lighting. Mary Battscbome, 1907 Delaware Street, Berkeley, California.

Not Exactly an Actor.

JOSEPH W. Pucci, in the January issue of the incomparable Picture Play, describes Robert Taylor as being putrid, as an actor.

May I add that he also is boring, insipid, colorless, only a glorified "American Beauty," placed on his high horse by gaga girls who seek beauty? There are some of us who go to the cinema to be entertained by acting.

As much as I admire Garbo, I find it impossible even to consider sitting through Mr. Taylor's Armada, watching him posing and making funny faces.

Thank you, Mr. Pucci, for representing the fans who like acting ability. The screen is a long way from its goal if such an actor as Mr. Taylor can be such a favorite, when many others in Hollywood can act rings around him.

Personally, I have no fault to find with Mr. Taylor, but as an actor—well, could you in your wildest stretches of imagination call him one?

AN ADULT FAN.

St. Louis, Missouri.

"Alfalfa" Switzer, of Hal Roach's "Our Gang," who was born on a farm, is shown with a collection of the pets he brought with him to Hollywood.
No Fop or Fool.

LIKE all male stars who become great favorites, Robert Taylor now faces the sarcastic attacks that inevitably follow, especially in his case because he possesses more than the average good looks. I disagree with anybody who credits his remarkable popularity to just good looks. I refuse to believe that all the people who have caused him to be elevated to stardom picked him out, among all the others who could have been chosen, merely because they like his profile or the way his hair grows, or any other such reason. They play a large part, yes, but not all. There are plenty of hand-some boys in Hollywood who could probably fill his shoes, and who might be better actors. There have been, and are, striking-looking men on the screen who have not achieved the place that Bob has reached. I might mention Robert Young, Tom Brown, Don Alvarado, Joel McCrea, and Philip Reed as a few examples of good-looking young men with acting ability who have had plenty of chance to capture the public's fancy—and yet they have never succeeded to an amazing degree. So the fact that Robert Taylor is in the same class, so far as physical attractiveness is concerned, can be discounted as the main reason why he has been nominated for stardom in a year.

What the Fans Think

It isn't only handsomeness, then, that has lifted this Taylor boy out from the mob. What is it? May I use the old expression "it" or "personality" or whatever it is that has marked the ones who have reached the top? And, besides, Bob has character, sincerity and intelligence, and I'll wager they have played no small part in his case. The fans like him for what he is. He has not lost his head, nor displayed any signs of doing so. He seems to be trying hard to stay normal—in a very abnormal atmosphere—and I give him credit. He is the fancy of the women fans at present, but he is wholly masculine and in no way a top or fool. He will stay at the top. ELLen W. BARKDILL.

King and Queen of the Screen.

AFTER reading all the interesting letters by enthusiastic fans in the November issue of Picture Play, I decided that I, too, would like to give my opinions. I want to express my appreciation to the movies for producing as handsome a gentleman, fine actor and genuine personality as Clark Gable. I never miss a picture in which Mr. Gable appears, and he has been my favorite ever since "Susan Lenox," because to me he typifies everything that I like in a man. He's not enameled-looking and languid, but strong and full of vitality. He's not artificial in his acting, but human and sincere, and he's not puffed up by his stupendous success and popularity, but takes it gracefully, and in return gives a better performance than his last, if that is possible. His grin, disarming manner, gallantry and rich voice are only a few of Mr. Gable's attributes which I admire.

If Mr. Gable should read this, I want him to know that his millions of fans join with me in wishing him happiness and good luck, which he certainly deserves for being "the tops."

I also wish to extol the countless charms of my feminine favorite—Joan Crawford. She is beautiful, glamorous, sophisticated and thoroughly modern. Her figure is perfect, she dresses exquisitely and is always faultlessly groomed off screen and on. Miss Crawford's voice is lovely to hear, and her radiant smile and sparkling eyes are lovely to see. I consider it one of my greatest pleasures to see her on the screen.

Long live the king and queen of the screen! RUTH E. BEEKMANN.

150 Moffat Street, Brooklyn, New York.

To-morrow's Star.

WE of the rising generation take particular delight in following the careers of the younger players—leaving memories of Novarro, Swanson, et cetera, to those who saw them when they were the screen's greatest. The name of Anne Nagel, for instance, means more to me than that of any star of the silent or early talkie era, because she is to-morrow's star! Not only is she beautiful and charming in her first picture, "Here Comes Carter," but she also shows definite promise as an actress. C'mon, fans, let's hear more about the talented newcomers who need support and a little less about those who are beyond that need. E. ERNEST MIRKIAN.

Enough of Shirley! Never!

IN December Picture Play, a grave injustice was done to Shirley Temple by Carlton Lehndor of Hazleton, Pennsylvania, who wrote a letter bearing the caption, "Enough of Shirley."

I was greatly disturbed by that audacious letter which probably was inspired by indig- tion, or worse still, a natural selfishness. I can't believe that anybody with a little human feeling would attack the reputation of any innocent person, especially that of a sweet child such as our Shirley.

Mr. Lehndor in his letter stated that he couldn't understand why the universe had gone Shirley Temple wild. In other words, something must be wrong with people who love Shirley! Are we crazy? Or just what is the matter with us, anyway?

Mr. Lehndor says, "Take away, the publicity given her, stop the manufacture of Shirley Temple dresses and dolls, deprive her of curling irons, and what
What the Fans Think

I HAVE men on my mind this afternoon—movie men. For a long while there has been such a dearth of masculinity in Hollywood that I wondered what we were going to be asked to accept next. The popularity of James Cagney was the last straw. That we should be led to admire such a character! Then think of all the vanilla ice cream Franchot Tone, Richard Cromwell, Douglass Montgomery, John Beals, Donald Cook, and Philip Reed, and the squall, such as Leslie Howard, Spencer Tracy, Robert Donat, and Clive Brook.

Even the old reliables like Fredric March, Gary Cooper, and the notorious Mr. Gable have become so over-publicized and sex-appealed, that they are actually sissies. No other word for it. And as for the crooners, well, I think Nelson Eddy has laid the final wraith on the graves of those mushrooms. Just as Fred Astaire has drawn the curtain for the hoofers who were getting by with clumsy antics that passed for dancing.

Perhaps this is the New Deal, after all. In the world of education it has been some years since any degree short of a Ph. D., was considered in employing professors for the universities. Possibly the movies may wake up to the fact that modern America wants and is hungry for good rich cream after being so long undernourished on skimmed milk. Hope Herself.

Houston, Texas.

More of Ian Hunter.

WILL some one please write a feature story about Ian Hunter? Search as I may, through many fan magazines, I cannot find any reference to him except in casts of pictures.

And what, may I ask, has become of Anna Sten?

Born in Hollywood, I have been a constant movie-goer since playing hide and seek, as a kid, around the old Griffith lot on Sunset Boulevard. And I seem to be one of many who is getting a little weary of this "search for new talent" idea. Why not let us have more of our old favorites? They worked for the places we gave them, and it seems to me only fair that they should remain there until box-office returns prove them to be no longer popular.

As far as new talent is concerned—with the exception of Shirley Temple—all that we've had in the past two or three years have come from abroad, All that is worth while, at least.

Most of the magazines are filled with photographs of these new-found sweet young things bolling about the sands in a one-piece bathing suit, or mixing salad while they stand in a kitchen, in which they probably don't know the location of the stove.

This letter has deviated somewhat from the charming English Mr. Hunter. I apologize, but I had to get it off my chest.

The Parnassus Club, 612 West 113th Street, New York, N. Y.

Can't Hurt Gable.

AFTER reading the insulting letters by R. L. Shumate of Atlanta, Georgia, and Isabelle Jaros, of Texas, about Clark Gable, I want to say it's a shame these two can't meet for they seem to have so much in common. What a swell time they could have consoling each other. That Texas and Georgia sun is pretty hot, I've heard, but I don't think it affected people like that. Mr. Shumate.

Skimmed-milk Entertainment.

Margot Grahame, currently appearing in "Michael Strogoff," poses with Russian wolfhounds whose strain reaches back into the kennels of the late Tsar Nicholas of Russia. Her personality is an outward expression of one's inner self. Believe it or not, Mrs. Lehnnard, Shirley's got it.

I love and admire Shirley Temple very much for the sweet child she is, and personally wish that I never have enough of Shirley in pictures, for she has spread happiness to boys and girls, men and women all over the world, and for this may God bless this little girl who personifies youth in all its glory.

The Al Jolson are happy in bringing up Al, Jr., and the younger seems to have as sparkling a personality as his mother and daddy.
mate’s girl friend must have admired Clark out loud and hurt his feelings.

As for you, Miss Jarak, who asked you for your two cents’ worth of insults? Where there’s a half dozen against Gable, there are a hundred for him.

I’ll say one thing. He is one hundred per cent man and actor, and all the hateful things you say will certainly not hurt him. Dramatic schools, my eye! That’s how much you know about acting. You really sound pathetic. His ability to act comes from downright actual experience on the stage, plenty of hard work and effort on his part, and the natural talent he had has developed him into the fine actor he is to-day.

Furthermore, I think it’s going to extremes, to say the least, when a person goes as far as to criticize a star’s appearance and private life, which I consider his own affairs and none of the public’s business.

Clark Gable has a fine physique, perfect in every way. Yes, even the hair on you speak of—that denotes a man of strength, my dear. He is to be greatly admired as an actor and a man. He is popular everywhere.

So Texas and Georgia, stop and think before you insult any one else.

What the Fans Think

Likes and Dislikes.

All me! My only hope is that I may live to see the day when I’ll realize the superb beauty Virginia Bruce possesses. I can’t for the life of me see the beauty in a high cheek-boned, dream-eyed creature who can’t act. Maybe I’m wrong, but if that’s beauty, I’ll take vanilla.

The next victim of my criticism is Jean Harlow, who disgusts me beyond words with the cheap roles she enacts and the stupid expression on her face when she attempts to look pretty.

Why, may I ask, is Alice Faye receiving a salary for painting herself like a rag doll and scaring the public when she appears on the screen? She takes the cake for wearing the most make-up on the screen. I also dislike Fay Wray’s face-twitching; Maureen O’Sullivan’s silly floating about the screen; Ann Sothern’s singing and acting, and last, but not least, everything about Kay Francis.

Of course, I must mention the so-called handsome actors on the screen for whom, by the way, I wouldn’t give you two snips of my fingers.

First under this classification comes Dick Powell; who, they tell me, has millions of fans. He is, perhaps, the most stupid-looking male on the screen. He certainly isn’t good looking, and he certainly cannot act, so why the big fuss over him? I’m of the same mind about Gene Raymond who will find himself without an eye one of these days if he doesn’t stop popping them; George Brent, the possessor of the dumbest grin on the screen; John Beul and Brian Aherne, too, who should be informed this is the Twentieth Century, and last, but not least, John Boles who annoys me to tears when he attempts to be serious.

Marsha Hunt introduces her dog, Judge, to the Paramount lot where she is making “Murder Goes to College.”

After getting the above off my chest, I now submit the screen’s five best leading men.

1. Clark Gable, the screen’s only human and greatest lover.
2. Robert Taylor, the handsomest man in Hollywood.
3. Ronald Colman, the screen’s best character actor.
4. Leslie Howard, a splendid actor and a gentleman.
5. Charles Laughton, the screen’s best musician.

My five favorite leading ladies are:

1. Joan Crawford, the best dresser on the screen.
2. Bette Davis, the best actress.
3. Loretta Young, the most beautiful on the screen.
4. Claudette Colbert, one of the best actresses.
5. Marlene Dietrich, the best figure in Hollywood. Marie O’Neill.

SOFT AND SHARP FOCUS

BY NORBERT LUSK, EDITOR

GLORIA SWANSON is returning to the screen! There is nothing in the news of the day calculated to bring more jubilation to the majority of picture-goers. Her sponsors are Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, which means that her picture will be produced in a manner befitting her reputation, talent and preëminence. Its title need not be mentioned for most names are subject to change, but the author, Bayard Veiller, is noted for strong, ingeniously plotted drama, and it is safe to say that Miss Swanson will see to it that the story is "right."

Here is proof that the interest and loyalty of fans do influence the career of a player. Some months ago Picture Play published an article entitled, "Do You Want Swanson Back?" It discussed the "case" of Gloria Swanson, reviewing her career and analyzing her character, and asking the question contained in the title. We were swamped with letters in reply, some fans pointing out that Miss Swanson had had her day of glory, but the majority of writers championed her. They declared that she was one of the great figures in motion pictures, one of the superlatively gifted actresses, and one of the most colorful and exciting characters ever developed by the screen. They did want her back. These letters were published in "What the Fans Think." To say that they were ignored by Hollywood as the enthusiastic outpourings of fans is absurd. Every intelligent opinion expressed in "What the Fans Think" is read by Hollywood and often is heeded. Therefore, when Miss Swanson, with her customary graciousness and intelligent evaluation of public opinion, tells me that the article and the letters in Picture Play helped to bring her back, I feel in duty bound to pass on this cheering news to fans. Too often we think we are but a voice in the wilderness while stars are concerned, and Hollywood's policies are inscrutable and unalterable. Now we know that such is not the case and we have Miss Swanson's word for it.

If you could meet Jane Withers you would love her as I do. You would love her for the natural, wholesome and unspoiled child she is. You would look in vain for self-conscious cuteness or politeness in her. She is a whirlwind of spontaneous speech and action, a chubby, eager, normal ten-year-old who was far more interested in the live turtle some one had given her than she was in making an impression on the editor of a magazine. But she made a strong and lasting impression by being herself.

Her great charm lies in her capacity for friendliness. Here is a child who really loves people because that feeling comes from her heart, her inner self. She bubbles with kindness, generosity and thoughtfulness. Her eyes have a beauty that is not seen in photographs or on the screen. They are deep, clear eyes and they reflect such trust and unmarred sincerity that when Jane turns them on you with an eager inquiry about your opinion of turtles as pets, you're sunk! I know I was. Considering that she has been a professional practically all her life, her simplicity and artlessness are extraordinary. Even adults succumb to the blandishments of fame, but not this star. My tribute is not alone to the child but to her mother who, refusing to bask in the reflected glory of her star-child—as mothers often do in Hollywood—has seen to it that intelligent training and supervision have kept Jane sweet and fine.

Some of the most important producers, the shrewdest and most far-sighted, are planning remakes of former successes. Just why this should be I am in no position to say, but I wonder if the public is ready to welcome past successes with new casts. "The Last of Mrs. Cheyney" must be tolerably familiar to the world in general by now. It was highly successful as a stage play and appeared on the screen in the early years of talking pictures. Radio has done its share to popularize it, too. Now it is Joan Crawford's current vehicle, and undoubtedly it will be one of her best, especially with Robert Montgomery and William Powell as her aids; but it is not new. “The Man in Possession” has become “Personal Property” for Jean Harlow and Robert Taylor. “The Girl of the Golden West” is to serve Nelson Eddy and Jeanette MacDonald—with music, of course—and “Madame X” and “All the Brothers Were Valiant” are included in Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer’s schedule. The oldest picture announced for immediate refilming is “Stella Dallas.” Twelve years ago it was a sensational silent picture. Samuel Goldwyn’s revival of it is more logical than other contemplated remakes. A new generation of picture-goers has developed since 1925. It is conceivable that those who saw it then may have forgotten the details of it. Others, hearing of it for the first time, will respond to the unusual to which the name of Goldwyns works for. If any revival is justified, it is “Stella Dallas.” Barbara Stanwyck, John Boles, and Anne Shirley will play leading roles.

FOR the second successive year Shirley Temple leads all stars at the box office, according to the indisputable survey of Motion Picture Herald. This means that she attracts more money to the majority of theaters than any other star, day in and day out. She tops two hundred and seven principal players, exceeding in popularity the following whose rating as money-making stars is in the order mentioned: Clark Gable, Fred Astaire-Ginger Rogers, Robert Taylor, Joe E. Brown, Dick Powell, Joan Crawford, Claudette Colbert, Jeanette MacDonald, Gary Cooper.

LAST year I pointed out the reasons for Shirley’s popularity, as I saw them, and there is no need to repeat. It is significant, however, that the appeal of a child to the imagination of the public should be greater than that of any adult; that the simplicity of a little girl should exert more powerful effect upon picture-goers than the mature, polished talent of some of her seniors. Every fan should be grateful to her. So should every star. For it is a fact that any personal popularity enriches the entire picture industry, profiting us all.

THE most colorful story ever written about Errol Flynn will appear in next month’s Picture Play. All his admirers know him to be a dashing adventurer, but they have never read his adventures more richly described than they will read in Herbert Crane’s article. More than an adventure tale, though, is the author’s analysis of Mr. Flynn as a man. The story is written in such an unusual style, and is so packed with atmosphere, that we are proud to offer it to our readers. It sets a new pace in fan-magazine writing, we think.

THE GOOD EARTH” is not only the finest picture of the month; it is one of the few really great pictures of our time. Every picture-goer should see it and many who ignore the usual films will make an exception of this. And well they should. Apart from every point included in the limited review on page 60 is the marvelously produced production that has been given the Pearl B. Buck novel of peasant life in China. For once the advance publicity given a picture is exceeded by the wonder of the film itself. We know, of course, that Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer sent a staff of technicians to China to photograph backgrounds and collect costumes and properties for the film, instinctively we know that every detail in the picture is correct. But this was only the preliminary work. Consider the enormous task of reproducing on Hollywood land the extensive Chinese farm that serves as background for most of the picture. This meant planting and cultivating acres of Chinese trees, plants and vegetables. Not only that but nurturing them to just the right maturity, and keeping them at that stage of growth for the moment when they should be needed for the camera work. Even the hills overlooking the farm were planted, and made to order, for the occasion. We take for granted the exquisite arrangement of the courtyards and interiors of the houses shown. For nothing is impossible to Cedric Gibbons and his associates in building and decoration. But what of the onslaught of thelocusts, millions of them in desolate swarms and clouds? This is no illusion even though it may be a trick of the camera. But what of the time, the work, the ingenuity in creating this sequence? Nothing like it has ever been seen in pictures. Its menace and terror are unparalleled, the hideousness of the winged hordes more terrifying than anything in horror films. This is but one of the marvels of a great picture, another proof that pictures are the supreme art form today, yet another testimony to the genius that makes the screen possible to all.
ROBERT TAYLOR and Jean Harlow are teamed for the first time in "Personal Property," well known on the stage, radio and screen as "The Man in Possession." Robert Montgomery and Irene Purcell played it in 1931. Now it is freshly written, dashingly directed by W. S. Van Dyke, gorgeously costumed for a new cast and a newer, more exacting public. Worth attention.
ACCLAIMED THE IDEAL MARITAL PARTNER ON THE SCREEN, MYRNA LOY LIVES UP TO THAT PERFECTION IN THIS GLIMPSE OF HER OWN MARRIED LIFE.

MYRNA LOY did a poised "double take"—(i.e., listened again). Her fancy butler was politely, but none the less firmly, correcting Hollywood's leading producer!

"I know you'll excuse me," said Franz, suddenly erect and with a military click of his heels, "but the 1909 vintage was much superior to this wine of 1905. Of course, this was a particularly bad year."

Blandly Franz, hitherto apparently the impeccable major-domo, continued to serve the soup.

Myrna was astounded but she was game. Here she was throwing her first swanky dinner party as Mrs. Arthur Hornblow, Jr. This was what you'd call getting your just deserts for trying to be so darned elegant!

But the worst was yet to come.

Very distinctly the imperial voice of Franz was shortly heard in the pantry. "Eight salads, oap?" he cried at the cook. The guttural "oap," in the tone he used, had an emphatic "or else" command to it.

The distinguished guests grinned at Myrno. "Well," she explained, "I had to have a butler. So this is high life at the Hornblows!"

With the entrée, Franz once more joined in the conversation. He was respectful, but he couldn't subdue his passion for accuracy.

"I'm certain you'll forgive me," he declared to the host and a noted star at his left, "but that play was not originally presented in New York. It was in Vienna, in March of 1923."

Myrna half murmured, half chuckled, "How'm I dain'?"

She was doing great, in spite of these extraordinary interruptions. Her début as the missus was a success because every one present had instantly fallen into the merry mood that's contagious in her household. Myrna's superb sense of humor was as tops as usual. And as to this series of faux pas, no one was bothered for it was plain that Myrna wasn't flustered. She took it on the chin, as all a joke on herself.
A butler had been her secret ambition. Not so she could turn snob, but simply because she'd lived with her family in a small, average home until Arthur persuaded her to stop attempting to be the ever-independent miss. Anyway, there was something about having a butler that sounded fine.

So early last summer when she hopped into a plane and flew to Ensenada to be married, she didn't mind that they wouldn't have time for a real honeymoon trip. Instead they returned to one of the beautiful guest houses on the Vanderlip estate at handy Palos Verdes by the sea. There she put Franz to officiating.

Myrna was delighted with the discreet flourish with which he opened the front door. She figured that his manner with the meals was one up on the Waldorf Astoria. It was fascinating to learn casually of his exciting yester-years; in Austria he had been in the emperor's corps, a man of position.

On the screen she has captured all honors as the 'ideal modern young matron'. Off it, as a private wife, she is the same kind of gayly tolerant person. She has a beguiling reserve, but she's definitely a regular fellow. She searches constantly for laughs and absolutely refuses to be depressed.

Yet she isn't a determined practical joker. Myrna is too lazy to fuss with gags, to be a splashy show-off. She has a quiet perception that teams with a twinkle in her wide blue eyes, and I can assure you that it's always jolly at her home. Because she won't tolerate bores. Habitually she chooses amusing folk as her companions, people who are bright and sophisticated and charming.

At noon her first action, when she returns to her dressing room from the stages, is to dial Arthur across town. They generally chat for a full five minutes. Myrna sparkles with Myrna Loy, in white, is much more sociable and spontaneous since her marriage. She is surrounded at a party by a gay group consisting of Eddie Sutherland, left, Loretta Young, Buddy Rogers, Harry Lachman, Mary Pickford, Grace Moore, Robert Riskin, Arthur Hornblow, Jr., and Tai Lachman.

She appreciated his obligingly acting as chauffeur, too, because she was accustomed to steering her own car. But his impetuosity soon scared her silly. He'd relapse into the notion that she was charging down the Ringstrasse when they were on crowded Wilshire Boulevard. An important feeling was likely to seize him and his arms would stiffen on the wheel, his face grow stern, and his foot press down on the gas. Without pausing to think, he'd surge forward vehemently. Myrna, bent on being a lady regardless of her hunch that there'd be an accident any moment, sat tight.

But in September when she and Arthur moved into his house in the exclusive Bel-Air district, she finally decided that what she needed most was a new butler, a less eccentric aide-de-camp. And so she acquired her current gentleman-in-waiting. He has been a ship's steward for the past ten years, so now she's picking up nautical information instead of Continental titbits.

You don't find a squadron of servants about her, though. There is just the butler, the cook, and Teresa, her personal maid who trips along to the studio to maid it there, too. All three on her staff are noticeably cheerful and quick-witted, as well as efficient. Myrna can't stand stuffy individuals around in any capacity.

The tie that binds Mr. Hornblow and Miss Loy as husband and wife is the light touch. They are serious only when it is necessary. Myrna can't stand stuffy people around her in any capacity.

IN "LOVE IS NEWS"
"SEVENTH HEAVEN" has Simone Simon and James Stewart in the leading roles. She as "Diane," the abused waif who is saved from a cruel sister, and he as "Chico," the Parisian sewer man, who dreamed of becoming a street washer. The story tells of their affection and their separation by war. In the sewer with Mr. Stewart, below, is John Qualen.
ROMANCE AND WAR
DOWN IN FLAMES
"ANOTHER DAWN" has Ian Hunter returning to an English military outpost with his bride, Kay Francis. There she meets and is captivated by her husband's closest friend, Errol Flynn. Frieda Inescort, who has loved Mr. Hunter for a long time, is aware of the situation. The four seek a way out, but there seems no escape. The toss of a coin decides.

CONVENIENCE
GRACE MOORE is an Australian opera star in "When You're in Love," who is in America under a limited immigration passport. She overstays her visit, goes to Mexico where she meets Cary Grant, an American artist, and marries him simply to be able to return to the States. With her and the children, above, is Henry Stephenson. Next, Emma Dunn is an interested spectator. Above, Aline MacMahon is the diva's secretary.
CAPTAINS COURAGEOUS" is the story of a spoiled boy, Freddie Bartholomew, who is rescued from the ocean by fisherman Spencer Tracy. It is three months before he can return to England and his father, Melvyn Douglas, right, during which time he has grown fond of the kindly fisherfolk and especially his rescuer. With Mickey Rooney, lower right, sighting a rival schooner, left, are Mr. Tracy, Freddie, Christian Rub, Lionel Barrymore, and Rogers Gray.
IRISH

CLARK GABLE plays the title rôle in "Parnell," and Myrna Loy that of "Katie O'Shea." Fighting for Home Rule, he has denied himself all social life, until he meets the glamorous wife of "Captain O'Shea." The divorce suit provokes a scandal, and with his lifelong goal in sight, "Parnell" is forced to resign as head of the Party. Edna May Oliver is "Aunt Ben."
Exiled in SIBERIA

MARLENE DIETRICH and Robert Donat play the leads in "Knight Without Armor." The former, a relative of the imperial family of Russia, is taken prisoner by the revolutionaries and is sent to Siberia. Intrusted to the commissar, Donat, who is in reality an agent of the British secret service, they both escape. It is love alone which supports their spirits in the hardships of their long journey.
"SOULS AT SEA" opens with the trial of a ship captain, Gary Cooper, for manslaughter on the high seas. The scene dissolves and we see the events which led up to the disaster aboard the clipper "William Brown." Below, Cooper and George Raft, as skipper and mate. Bottom, left, Virginia Weidler, then Frances Dee, and with her and Raft, next, is Olympe Bradna. Upper left, Robert Cummings and Luana Walters. Left, Henry Wilcoxon with Cecil Cunningham.
JOHN BOLES IN "RIVIERA."
W HAT'S all this I hear about you? I asked John Boles during the few hectic moments he recently spent in New York.

His eyelids quivered for a second. To himself he was probably saying, "What next!" Any one is apt to hear anything about anybody these days, and celebrities are used to all sorts of enormities being laid at their door. John smiled in a brave way, as if expecting to be accused of several major crimes, and said "Lady, please translate."

"I hear that you refuse to sing again."

"Oh, that!" he laughed. "It isn't quite like that. You see——"

And then he went on to explain, and during the explanation all the theories I had about this soft-voiced Southerner with the dreamy eyes and gentle manner went up in smoke. And to think that I have been deceived all these years! I met him when he played in "The Loves of Sonya" and that was—heavens and earth, that was eleven years ago!—and I've caught up with him several times since then.

Who would think that John Boles is first and foremost a business man? Art is all right and has a definite place, but if it can't be appreciated by the public to the extent of their financial support, then there is something wrong somewhere.

I took another look at those blue-gray eyes. Whatever made me think they were dreamy? They were two points of clear blue fire.

The splendid thing about this is that John is a business man with ideals, and those ideals are as bright to-day as they were that far-away time on the set of Gloria Swanson's first fling as a producer when his enthusiasm was an exhilarating thing to see.

A résumé of his career will show just how business and art have run

John Boles says that his most successful pictures were "Back Street" and "Seed," in which he didn't sing a note. That is why he may continue to be silent unless the public won't let him.
a race to see which would get him and how he has managed to kid them both along and keep them working together.

It started back in his early school days when he went in for athletics. He made the mistake of joining the glee club also, and the first thing he knew he was the white-headed boy on entertainment nights. The same thing followed in college, where he tried to fulfill his father’s wish that he become a physician. He went in for athletics here, too, but this time he shunned the glee club.

When the War came John enlisted, joined the intelligence department and thought now he really could do something useful. I don’t know how it came about, but I’m willing to bet that one night when the boys were blue and homesick John started a song to cheer them up. That finished him in the intelligence department; he was bonged right into the entertainment department.

John gave in after that and decided to let his voice earn his living for him. There he showed his business acumen. No use swimming against the tide. The smart man swims with it if he wants to survive.

You all know how he was in “Little Jesse James” in New York and that Gloria Swanson, searching for a new face and personality, picked him for her lead in “Sunyo.” And you know that shortly after that, “The Desert Song” put him on the top where he has remained, without fireworks or publicity. To-day he is one of the strongest box-office draws and his popularity floats steadily along, comfort to his producers. No skyrocketing, up to-day and gone to-morrow, when the none of John Boles appears.

But after all these years of having music pursue him, why this right about face and refusal to sing? “Well, you see—” said John.

It seems that the two most successful pictures that he made in the past were dramatic stories in which he didn’t sing a note. “Back Street” is one of them, “Seed” the other. John likes to sing, but if Mr. and Mrs. and junior America like him better in straight dramatic roles, that settles it.

You control the professional life and career of John Boles. Just as he turned from medicine to singing because it seemed that the cosmic force was pushing him into it, so he turns away from it now when that same force seems to turn his work into a different channel.

If “Seed” and “Back Street” didn’t seal his fate I imagine “Craig’s Wife” should. It is by far the strongest rôle I have seen him play—and did he handle it to us! A character such as “Walter Craig” is a ticklish one to portray. The audience, knowing the inner workings of his wife’s mind, wonders how he can be so blind to her nature and so amenable to her selfishness. He might almost be thought something of a sap for putting up with it, but not as John Boles plays the part.

In this picture John showed an unexpected versatility; the ability to get underneath the skin of these tricky, intellectual characters which are so fascinating and so poignant.

After this I fancy John will have to stick to the radio for singing. By the way, he was in Montreal last summer and gave his program entirely in French, songs, patter, announcing, and everything. He had a time of it last summer and fall, living in suitcases and on trains and planes, with lunch in one city and dinner in another.

And what a memory he has! About seven years ago he costarred in “Río Rita” with Bebe Daniels. Most of the work was done at Torzana, the estate of Edgar Rice B.roughs whose brain child “Torzan” is, and a hotter spot I have never found. A Spanish hacienda had been built about two miles back from the main road so that no noise or traffic would conflict with the sound mechanism.

But it certainly was hot. So many of the chorus girls fainted that they had to improvise a hospital ward and send for a doctor and two nurses. John’s face was streaming with perspiration and had to be patted with a damp sponge after each scene. On the set he was full of pep, even his eyes sparkled; I wondered how he managed it.

But when lunch was called I saw that it was just a case of mind over matter. Instantly the need for keeping up appearances was over he relaxed and told the world that he was dying. Lunch didn’t help, either. We had jellied soup and salad but such was the temperature that before the salad could be served it was limp and the ice cream was soup in no time. John wearily rose from a meal he did not finish and walked to his tent.

The other day at the Hotel Plaza he revived all these memories, not even forgetting the limp salad and the write-up afterward, and of how he harnessed in on Bebe’s publicity.

“What do you mean, harnessed in?” I said indignantly. “I couldn’t get a word out of you and had to write from observation of what you did.”

It was with the utmost difficulty that I was able to get him to appear in off-stage pictures that day. I realized why. I had gone to interview Bebe and being one of the very nice people in this world, John wanted to keep out of the way entirely. What he didn’t know was that my editor had said, “Get as much as you can on John Boles. Readers are taking notice of this handsome newcomer.”

But I remember something that he had forgotten. One evening I stopped in a drug store in Hollywood. I heard some one say, “A limeade, please, with fresh fruit.” Something in the eagerness of the voice made me turn, and there sat John Boles!

CURRENTLY, you are seeing "The Last of Mrs. Cheyney," with Robert Montgomery, Joan Crawford, and William Powell. Or, if you’ve not seen it, don’t fail to do so. For it is sophisticated comedy at its best, combining sparkling dialogue with the excitement of well-bred crook melodrama.
MORE a personality than an actor... he does more to suggest and convey a mood than many practiced mimes. He does it with his voice.

Those few words culled from a review of "Romany" marked the emergence from babyhood of the motion picture's baby sister of the entertainment world—the radio. They marked something new in Hollywood. They explained an enigma that Don Ameche, a somewhat baffling young man, had presented to the film capital. Ameche, radio actor, has made good on the screen. He is, to date, radio's one gift to Hollywood.

Dissenters will paint ta the Eddie Cantors, the Jack Bennys, the Bab Busseys, the Gracie Alens; the Martha Rayes, the Nelson Eddys. They came from radio ta the screen, true enough, but far them radio was a way station an success raad. Ameche alone is of and from the air waves. That is why "he does it with his voice."

So to-day this young Italian stands alone in Hollywood. Radio, which has taken so much, finally has given something in return.

It is a coincidence that Ameche played a dual rôle in his first picture, "Sins of Man." It is a coincidence because the young man himself is a dual personality. Gregarious to an extraordinary degree, even far Hollywood, yet one must know Ameche long ta know him well. Restless, ill at ease unless his home is noisy with laughter and gay with friends, few but his family and his old friends know him understandingly.

In the midst of the carnivall crowds with which he surrounds himself he can be, seemingly, alone. Let us go back ta the beginning, so that you may know him.

Dan—Domenica, he was then—was the first of the Amici brand of eight ta be born in America. The Italian Amici had changed ta the phonetic Ameche. Papa Ameche had drifted West to Kenasha, Wisconsin, bought a saloon, and paid off the last cent of debt for it just about the time little Domenico loosed his first lusty wail.

This bambina would become a great man, a lawyer. A lawyer, then maybe a governor, maybe—well, Papa Ameche had high hopes. Mamma Ameche, too, had high hopes, but she nursed them silently. No, not a lawyer. Of course, she did not dare tell Papa Ameche that. But this baby she would give to the church. Little Domenico did not know, of course, that the two conflicting hopes, envisioned over his cradle, were to sway his whole later life.

Even before he became Dan he was different from his seven brothers and sisters. There was a far-off look in his dreamy brown eyes, a salt slowness in his measured tones. Mamma Ameche smiled to herself knowingly. She was, she thought, ta see her hope come true.

Domenica's teachers, though, shook their heads despairingly. How could such an angelic face mask such rowdy antics? The boy smoked surreptitious cigarettes, he shot craps, he played hoaky, and then caught, his mother's tearful remonstrances and his father's more robust displeasure went unheeded.

Dan—he became Dan in boarding school—was discreetly silent when Papa Ameche mentioned the law, or when Mamma Ameche, drawing her son quietly aside, diffidently broached the subject of the church. He had other plans.

There was, for instance, Father Sheehy, his friend and mentor. Don idolized the wise and understanding cleric. Father Sheehy knew with what manner of youth he had to deal. He warned the lad that to take vows would mean renunciation of earthly pleasures. Father Sheehy knew that beneath the spirituality in the boy was a light-hearted gayety he had inherited from his Italian ancestors. Then he introduced Don to Honore.

Honore was attending St. Joseph's, a neighboring academy for girls. She had beautiful strawberry-blond hair. It was love at first sight—although, strangely, she heard from Don but twice in the ensuing six years. Even those two times were more or less accidental—but that comes later.

Don was invited to leave three different institutions of learning before he finally got started on his way toward the bar, at the University of Wisconsin. Between all-night poker sessions and study, he chose poker unhesitatingly. He'd left the study of law flat had not prohibition, taking away his father's business, caused the family fortunes to shrink alarmingly. His father was too old to learn another business. All his hopes and ambitions centered upon Don.

You see Don Ameche, above, with his wife. It took him six years to propose but they were married five days afterward. They have two children and hope for ten more.

"Fifty Roads to Town" is Don's next picture, in which he has Ann Sothern as his heroine.

His remarkably expressive voice, one of the finest heard on the screen, is the direct result of his radio experience and training.

The Drama Club at Wisconsin put on "The Devil's Disciple." As often happens in fiction, the leading man become ill at the lost moment and Don got the part. From that night on, low was forgotten. He left college and joined a small stock company. Lightning defied tradition and struck twice in the same place. The character man was injured in an automobile accident—and no one was able to memorize the role he was to have played. Don mastered the twenty sides in five hours.

Love for the theater and wanderlust often go hand in hand. The erstwhile law student went to New York. Now and then he played bits, but the bits were few and far between. He landed a minor part in "Illegal Practice," starring Bernadine Flynn, but it soon closed. During its brief life, however, Father Sheehy visited Don—and brought Honore. It was their first meeting in four years. Their evening together was not a success. Don was uncomfortable because he had another girl; Honore because the boy had shelved their three-year-old adolescent romance so lightly.

Known as the best all around actress in Hollywood, Bette Davis is the last to admit it. But this interview gives a clear picture of the girl behind the parts she plays on the screen.

Ask any group in Hollywood to name the best actor in pictures and they’ll unhesitatingly tell you “Spencer Tracy.” Ask any group who is the best actress and, with equal promptness, they’ll say “Bette Davis.” I know because I tried it.

I wasn’t surprised in the case of Spencer. But I was when Bette’s name was mentioned. That is, I was surprised until I took issue with them. “All right, smart guy,” one of them said, “name a better one. Maybe this one can play this type of part a little better or that one can play another type a little better, but name one all around actress as good as Bette.”

I thought a while and could find no answer. I went home and thought some more. The more I thought the more astonished I became. I began mentally casting pictures. It was nothing short of a revelation to discover how many roles Bette fitted into and which few other actresses could fill.

Her portrayal of “Mildred” in “Of Human Bondage” was a performance I don’t believe another actress in Hollywood could even remotely have approached. It was so outstanding that when it came time to make the award for the best performance of the year, although the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences had chosen to ignore it, the members wrote her name in in such numbers she almost won it without even being nominated.

The following year she did win the award for her work in “Dangerous.” And she almost did it again the next year for her performance in “The Petrified Forest.”

On tap of all that comes her recognition among the actors, themselves, as the best actress.

What’s behind it all?

It’s partly Bette, herself. With the possible exception of Barbara Stanwyck, Bette is the most forthright person I know.

There are so many things that have contributed to her success—to the position she occupies today—it is hard to know where to begin in attempting an analysis of this success.

I mentioned she had a tremendous “write-in” vote for her work in “Of Human Bondage.” The next year she actually won the award, and, on being asked how it felt, said, “Every day is a new day, every picture a new picture. There can be no resting on oars, no basking in the sunlight of any honor or praise or achievement, no matter how much it may thrill me. Any one who thinks he or she
Bette Underrates Herself

She and Warren William were in New York making personal appearances. At the time his was the bigger name of the two. Warners took some of the press to their hotel. Appointments had been made for William for the following day. He put on the big actor act. "My God, can't I have a little time to myself? Must I always be bothered with the press? I won't see them!"

On the way dawn in the elevator Bette turned to the publicity man. "I know you're in a spat. I realize I'm not as big a name as Mr. William, but since he won't see the press and, if it would make it any easier for you, I'll be glad to talk to any of them who care to listen."

As a result of that gesture—and whatever motivated it, she was a smart girl—Bette got a publicity splurge such as few actors have received. And it paid off. Dividends, besides the publicity. She returned from that trip to New York with confidence in herself—and poise.

"Hollywood did that for me," she explained. "Before I came out here and even before this trip to New York, I was frightened to death to even enter a room full of people. When I reached there and people began asking me what I thought of this and how I regarded that, it gave me confidence in myself. I thought I must be some one. Now I go into a gathering with a feeling of 'Take me or leave me, whichever you please.'"

She is one star who doesn't moan about what Hollywood has deprived her of. Asked to do an article on the subject, "What Hollywood has given me and what it has taken away," she gave up.

"I got along fine on the part about what it has done."

The only rôle Bette is afraid of is one where people might say, when they see the picture, "She wasn't acting—she was playing herself."

She finds that people who only know her on the screen expect to find her disagreeable when they meet her.
THE REPORTORIAL SEARCHLIGHT IS TURNED THIS WAY AND THAT, IN AND OUT OF THE STUDIOS, WITH MANY NEW SURPRISING DISCOVERIES.

ROCHELLE HUDSON can't seem to resist a uniform until it gets headed for the altar and then her powers of resistance are positively amazing. Her first serious romance was with an aviation officer, Monty McCauley, but that cooled when she met Lieutenant Bob Love at March Field. Just before Christmas Rochelle and her mother took a motor trip through the desert, and at Furnace Creek Inn they met an old friend, Lieutenant Juel Smith, who is in the navy. They dined, danced, lunches horseback and played tennis together all through the holidays and it looks serious. But you never can tell when Rochelle will see another uniform.

WHEN Shirley Temple was told that she would be twenty-five days on location for her next picture, "Wee Willie Winkle," her reaction was joyfully enthusiastic. "Oh, goody!" she exclaimed. "Twenty-five box lunches!"

ROBERT YOUNG went to Palm Springs recently for a rest. Instead of hanging around the hotels and the Racquet Club with the other stars, he stayed down at the corral with the cowboys. He let his beard grow to hide his peaches-and-cream complexion and made himself a regular fellow. The cowboys discovered that he had a heart of gold, and when he left, their unanimous opinion of Bob was that, to quote them: "He may be pretty but he's all right!"

VIRGINIA FIELD, the pretty barmid in "Lloyds of London," is doing all right for a newcomer. Between her first and second pictures she visited England, her home, and broke her engagement to a Austrian prince. Now she is startling Hollywood by introducing her latest escort as her guardian. That has been done before, of course, but the point is that her guardian is the son of a titled Englishman and is just twenty-four years old.
WORK was considerably interrupted on "Mamma Steps Out" when Alice Brady's favorite dog, Nina, passed away. Alice was inconsolable and a steady stream of tears rolled down her cheeks, making new make-up necessary before each scene. She had the dog's body embalmed, bought her a casket, and she was buried with a funeral service in the Hollywood Pet Cemetery at a cost of $300.

The next week her dachshund, the latest addition to her kennels, died of distemper. Now Alice has only four dogs, and MGM hopes they are in the best of health.

ON a visit to Palm Springs recently Joan Blondell took her small son, Norman Barnes, to Sunday school for the first time. He was very attentive but slightly bewildered by what went on, yet willing to do his part. During the quiet moment following the singing of a hymn by the other little children, he burst out enthusiastically singing "Thanks a Million."

STARS must be able to take insults as gracefully as adulation. We saw John Boles standing on a corner of Hollywood Boulevard, and smiling indulgently at a horrified mother whose child had just exclaimed: "Why, mom, he's a fat man!" John's few extra pounds certainly didn't justify that description.

On another occasion Myrna Loy pleasantly gave autographs to a group of signature seekers after overhearing them discuss her disparagingly and debate on whether or not her autograph was worth getting. And Nelson Eddy managed to look nonchalant when one of a group of schoolgirls, inspecting him shamelessly, cried aloud: "Gee, he's sorta blah off screen!"

DON'T expect this sort of treatment from your favorite actor, unless he happens to be Henry Fonda:

"Met some people who remembered you in school, Hank," a friend told the actor one day. "They're here visiting, but they'll not bother you, I guess; said now you're a star there's no use trying to see you."

Hank asked how to get in touch with them. Next day the tourists were surprised by a telephone call from him, and an invitation to visit him at his home. They spent the rest of their stay touring studios and night spots with the Fondas.
DURING a lull on the set of “Sails at Sea,” Gary Cooper sketched a sombrero-topped cowpboy caricature. Harry Carey of the supporting cast stared at the drawing.

“Say, that’s funny, Gary!” he exclaimed. “When I was a cowboy star, some puncher in one of my pictures drew a caricature just like that. He gave me one; I think I have it still.”

Gory grinned. “I was the puncher, Harry,” he said. “I always draw ‘em just like this. Glad you kept it, but I can’t say it speaks much for your judgment of art!”

NOT long ago a group of women-wise clubmen from New York, Chicago and other big Eastern cities toured the studios and met practically every one of the movie queens. At a stag dinner tendered them on the eve of their departure, each was asked to name the film lady he considered most alluring.

The vote was almost unanimous. The lady they elected as Queen of Sex Appeal in Person was Margot Grahame.

JEANETTE MacDONALD and her secretary were glancing through the star’s press clippings the other day. Picking up a long newspaper article, Jeanette started reading it in the middle.

“Say, here’s a brickbat!” she exclaimed, pointing out a particular paragraph. “Whoever wrote this doesn’t like me.”

“You ought to know, Miss MacDonal!” the secretary retorted. “You wrote that yourself. This is your signed article—remember?”

Jeanette remembered, and began laughing. “So it is—here’s my by-line,” she said. “Just the same, I ought to write myself a letter of protest!”

A PAIR of film celebrities were arguing about Errol Flynn, once Hollywood’s hail-fellow-well-met young world adventurer, but now reputedly going high hot.

“Oh, he isn’t bad,” said one. “Just a typical young Englishman, that’s all.”

“Well,” the other replied. “I once knew another typical young Englishman who didn’t put on half the side Flynn does. He was then Prince of Wales.”
BILLIE BURKE does things right or not at all. This is the explanation of the miniature ivory elephants grouped on shelves, table tops, and mantels in her home. Elephants, to be lucky, should face west. Billie’s living room faces east. So all the puzzled guest can see is a lot of elephants’ posteriors!

We have just discovered, through the Hays office, one of the oddest bits of censorship of American pictures. In England, no scenes displaying the American flag are allowed to be shown.

LORETTA YOUNG is one star who will never be embarrassed—as Joan Crawford was recently—by magazines digging up old pictures of her and reprinting them. Loretta is very cautious about how she poses. Asked for a cooking picture of the star, her press agent flatly refused. “Miss Young won’t pose,” she said dramatically, “because some one might find the picture years from now and say she once earned her living as a cook!”

For days Lee Tracy broke dentist appointments, and Lee, ordinarily, is not like that. Now the secret is out. Bracing himself for the ordeal, Lee stops at a near-by drug store for a milk shake, thinks of the agony in store for him, and promptly goes back home. The cavity never would have been filled if the dentist hadn’t come into the drug store by chance, and cornered him.

ERROL FLYNN and Lili Damita find themselves in a predicament. Recently reunited after a lot of divorce rumors, they’re pretty anxious to tell the world about their new-found happiness, but the studio won’t permit it. “Wouldn’t the billing and cooing sound silly,” it is asked, “if they split up again in another month?” Sounds like exaggerated caution, but Hollywood learns its lessons by experience.

WILLIAM POWELL just gave Jean Harlow a ring—a big, flashy, perfectly gorgeous ring such as any woman would give her teeth to own. It boosts one 152-carat star sapphire, not to mention a few husky little diamonds. “And that,” said Bill, as he presented it, “settles once and for all the question of who owns the biggest star sapphire in Hollywood!” (But they still don’t admit being engaged.)

NO CHUMS

FEW CLOSE FRIENDSHIPS EXIST AMONG THE WOMEN STARS, NO MATTER WHAT YOU MAY READ TO THE CONTRARY. THIS ARTICLE EXPLAINS WHY CHUMMY RELATIONSHIPS ARE IMPOSSIBLE FOR THE MOVIE GREAT.

THIS is addressed to girls who would love to be stars wealthy, popular, and happy. Do you know that they envy you one precious relationship which Hollywood conditions make almost impossible for them—your confidential chumming?

Men pal around, playing sports and lunching together, but the feminine players seldom have girl chums and often remark how they miss those giggling, gossipy sessions of their pre-movie days: lingering over sodas in the drug store, raiding the ice box at midnight for cold chicken and salad.

Lack of time, principally, is responsible for this sacrifice of a relationship dear to the feminine soul. The women stars must be more alert than the men, as their reign in the spotlight usually is briefer, the competition greater. They must see too many more chores of career, such as beauty care and costuming.

They have no leisure for lunches, no time for teas. A secondary factor preventing many long and close friendships is competition. Each star is busy polishing her own glow.

And Hollywood girls who became actresses lose touch with former chums, meeting them occasionally but under a certain strain, as they no longer have common interests.

"Lack!" One day I followed Jeanette MacDonald's gesture and saw two girls, their arms linked, strolling along the sidewalk and talking excitedly. "I miss that sort of thing so much." Her voice was underlined with a wistful note.

"I don't know any girl well enough to drop in unexpectedly and watch her wash her hair, or mend her lingerie, gossiping all the while. I would like some one I could phone and say, 'I'm coming over.' But I have no intimate women friends.

"Every minute has its duty. Even between pictures I have singing, French, and tennis lessons every day, give interviews, read stories, fit costumes, preparing for the next film.

"When you become more important in pictures, the others in the company draw away, erect indefinable barriers. If you try to make friends with the chorus girls, many of them think you are 'putting on a democratic act.'

"There is a silly, but definite, caste in the movies. It is hard to step from one level to another without having your sincerity questioned. Besides, when you rate leads or stellar billing, there are seldom other girls of your age in the company.

"In Hollywood, friendship between women is formal. We meet each other only at dinner parties, always a crowd around. And whenever men are present," she laughed, "do you see two women getting together in a corner for a chat?"
Her comments so interested me that I thought more about the subject, wondering why we seldom see the frilly Jean Harlow lunching with another girl, why Joan Crawford's feminine friendships never last long. Joan and Marlene Dietrich were attracted to each other by their mutual interest in art and in dancing. Joan admired Ann Harding's soldierly, frank attitude toward life tremendously.

But they are all so busy, always. If one has a free day unexpectedly, the other is working. Shopping sprees don't dovetail. Asking each other's advice about clothes is impossible, as each has her wardrobe designed to express her individuality.

"Margaret Lindsay and I enjoy talking over books and shawls, and we walk or play tennis, on the rare occasions when our brief vacations between pictures coincide," Janet Gaynor replied to my question. "For weeks ahead, we look forward to our larks together."

"I have no special friend other than my stand-in," Rachelle Hudson said, "I don't know whether or not I miss chumming. It requires time to be lonesome, you know. And I have so little time. Rush, rush, rush, from this appointment to the next one!"

Ruby Keeler is occupied with her husband, their adopted baby, home, her own career, and her relatives. She has no intimate woman friend. Nor has Bette Davis, who frankly admits a preference for masculine society. Besides her mother and sister, Bette has two girl friends, one a writer and the other a nonprofessional. But their association is casual, limited to lunches now and then. Bette once said to me that she rarely gets much of value from companionship with her own sex.

"Whenever I have admitted a woman to close friendship, it has ended badly," Joan Blondell was equally honest. "Each time I have felt so let down, so disillusioned, that now when I need advice I go to men, because they are never petty."

Joan mentioned Glenda Farrell as the only feminine pal for whom she cares very much. However, their visiting is done mostly on the set and at lunch in the studio café.

"Women don't band together to help each other, in Hollywood," Myrna Loy once observed to me. "In all of my years in pictures, Natascha Rambava was the only woman who ever gave me sensible, constructive advice and real assistance.

"Actresses probably don't mean to be critical of each other. Outstanding roles are scarce, therefore the competition is keen. Youth and charm fade so quickly. It is natural that each makes the most of her opportunities. Each is too preoccupied to give another more than casual suggestions.

"The movies tend to make one insular, involved in problems not easily comprehended by the nonprofessional. There isn't much common ground; we live in different worlds.

"Though I may be glad about Joe's five-dollar raise, for his sake, I can't work up a tremendous thrill over it. Sympathetic though I may be over Susie's pimple, I dare not distress myself unduly, for I have so many problems on my mind. A misstep, accepting a poor rôle, for example, might set back my career seriously.

"It is all a matter of values. It's not that we are no longer interested in old friends. In proportion, our problems seem bigger, because our decisions so often involve not only ourselves but also other players, the company cost of production, and so on. We have responsibilities that, indirectly, affect so many people.

"Another thing," Myrna pointed out, "is that we cease to be just persons, we are regarded as movie stars. Suppose we do live in gaudy surroundings, with so many activities revolving around ourselves, what of it? But old school friends are apt to be owed, to act embarrassed, which makes us ill at ease. There can be no mutual exchange of confidence unless both feel completely relaxed and 'at home.'

"And little, individual traits of ours that were considered amusing, perhaps endearing, become 'eccentricities of ego,' as we rise in pictures."

Pondering these thoughts, I realized that Garbo is one of the few stars to maintain a friendship of years with a nonprofessional—in her case, with the wife of a Swedish consul.

Eleonore Whitney's chum is a debutante from Cleveland who now lives in Los Angeles, but between career and society they haven't much time to devote to each other.

Each actress must follow some sort of a time budget. Plenty of sleep is stipulated. Between pictures there are lessons and parties. On Sundays crowds gather at some one's "open house" or at the beach clubs or week-end resorts. Week-day lunches are hurried, conferences with directors or interviewers, or sandwich snacks between fittings and photos.

So even such close friends as Ruth Chatterton and Kay Francis see each other mostly at parties. Marian Davies, Bebe Daniels, and Constance Talmadge manage gab-fests as often as possible. Anne Shirley and June Long, chums since childhood, occasionally have a "gal evening" of fudge, showing off new clothes, and chatter. Most of their visiting, however, is done over the phone.

Though Jean Muir and her best friend, Linda Leath, a writer, work at the same studio, theirs also is largely a telephone friendship. Each is too rushed during the day for more than a quick "hello." So they talk every evening over the wire, though their homes are twenty miles apart.

Joan Crawford frequently invites Jean to her home, but both make it a practice to refrain from discussing personalities. As the Muir maiden pointed out, you can't really churn without a bit of personal gossip.

Writers, like Frances Morion and Dorothy Parker, form friendships with some of the stars. But they can only get together every few weeks for chats.

Marlene Dietrich believes that it is impossible to know and understand another person in five years. Foreigners are more thorough, you know—slower in giving their confidence. Luise Rainer has no close feminine friend in Hollywood.

Curiously, Olivia de Havilland mentioned the same period of time as did the deliberate Dietrich, remarking that it takes her at least five years to make a dear friendship. That, she said, is due to her own reserve when among strangers. She envies the jolly, easy-going type.

Though Carole Lombard entertains in gay and novel ways, her only chum is her secretary, "Fieldsie," who manages her business affairs and her home. They even vacation together.

Claudette Colbert has time only for the friends of her husband, Doctor Joel Pressman, receiving them in the evening.

The young newcomers, many of them still in their teens and vibrantly energetic, manage to keep up friendships zestfully—for a while. Usually they invite the boys to their parties and skating shindigs. But a few two-somes—such as Patricia Ellis and Paula Stone, or Beverly Roberts and Isabel Jewell—find time for occasional lunches.

At Mary Treen's hen party the girls smeared their faces with cold cream, sat on the floor, and talked excitedly of men, new clothes, and their favorite stars, acting like young girls at sorority parties.

The higher they climb their ladders of career, however, the more numerous their duties and the greater their responsibilities—and sacrifices. While you gossip over your bridge games, or your work at the office, remember that many stars envy you that one thing, at least, Miss Average Girl!
BARBARA STANWYCK, who is soon to play "Stella Dallas," is here with Joel McCrea, who shares with her the excitement of "Internes Can't Take Money." They are mixed up with crooks because of Miss Stanwyck's desire to find her child. It is Lloyd Nolan who comes to the rescue, finding the lost child and uniting hero and heroine.
Maybe that's as appropriate a verse as any to quote from "The Tempest" as a description of events in the ex-mortal life of "Caliban" and "Ariel." "X," "X," "X," "X" goes for this strange interlude in the life and adventures of the prince of the Royal Family of Broadway.

Whether John Barrymore went into a revolt, or Elaine Barrie just decided it was better to call it quits on her short matrimonial cruise will never be known. But piquently enough it was when the New Year's bells rung that the smash-up occurred, and like the preliminaries to the wedding the ultimate quartet was visible to the world, or at least to part of the world which happened to be at the Trocadero Café, when John and Elaine had their differences.

Will Barrymore ever marry again? No telling about that. This was his briefest union. Perhaps the most joyous was with Dolores Costello, although, curiously enough, John and Elaine at one time seemed magically happy. But then bewitchment must necessarily be associated with "Caliban" and "Ariel."

Barrymore has now had four marriages. The initial one was to Katherine Carrie Harris, the second to Blanche Oelrichs, known under the pen name of Michael Strange—then Dohares, then Elaine. He's not the type to spend his life in utter solitude and loneliness. So we predict a fifth spouse. Elaine charged her difficulties up to jealousy of the part of Barrymore, while he remained enigmatically silent.

Separation Ghost Exorcised.—Joan Crawford and Franchot Tane have been fighting off rumors of their separation. It was just about time for these to be heard, and the presence of Franchot at the Bollet Russe performances alone on several occasions gave color to the reports. Finally, practically out of a sick bed, Joan herself appeared at the dance events, accompanying Franchot, and it seemed to lay the ghosts at threatened marital disaster. Joan didn't look "up to it" at all the evening we saw her, far she was still very pale. But she wasn't going to permit these rumors to get anywhere. Franchot and Joan are very much at the dance.

Time Treads On.—The death of Marie Prevost is singular testimony of the way life proceeds in Hollywood. Imagine, her body was not found for two days after her passing. Pitiful evidence of the way on erstwhile popular star con sink into oblivion in the movie calamy. Marie's fate must have been bitter, because apparently she sought release through stimulants.

She had secured very small parts in the later pictures, one of the lost being "Coin and Mabel," with Marian Davies. She had tried to carry on and support herself, but it had become exceedingly difficult, and on occasion she had to borrow money. Curiously, the vanishing of her success was due chiefly to a physical circumstance—the fact that she gained considerable weight, and did not seem to be able to overcome the handicap.

One needs hardly be told that Joan Fontaine is a sister to Olivia de Havilland, despite the blond tresses. Joan is appearing in "Quality Street."

Frances Langford introduces a novel coiffure. Sculptured curls completely cover the head, while sprays of Lily of the Valley form bangs, held in place by the leaves placed crosswise on the crown of the head.

Marie was one of the bright stars of silent pictures, but never enjoyed much popularity in the talkies. One of the saddest ventures in which she embarked was "Keystone Hotel," an attempt to revive the spirit of the old Sennett days, with which she was so closely identified during her early career as one of the prettiest of the bathing girls.

There was no bringing back that dead past, which perhaps comparatively few people remember, or care to remember to-day. Marie, when she played under Ernst Lubitsch's direction in "The Marriage Circle" and "Kiss Me Again," as well as later films, was one of the screen's most delightful comediennes—provocative, pretty, and zestful. Sad, her solitary death.

Oo-la-la—Fifi!—We gave considerable of a "Hooray" at the thought of Fifi Dorsay returning to pictures. You may see her in the very near future—Fifi, who was so very clever when she appeared with Will Rogers in that singing scene in "They Had to See Paris." For Fifi's husband, especially, are bright things predicted, since he's to shine forth shortly in "Twenty-three-and-a-Hal- lous' Leave." His screen name is Morgan Hill, altered from Maurice Hill. Hill preceded Fifi to Hollywood, and when she arrived, and after an outburst of kisses, she exclaimed "Ooh-la-la! Look at Fifi's beeg handsome leading man!!" Hill, to whom she has been married for three years, studied to be a doctor at one time.

Statuette Prophecies.—See how near we're right on our guesses on Academy winners who will be elected just about the time this issue of Picture Play comes out. This is our prediction from the vantage point of the moment, covering the winners-to-be of statuettes:

Actor—Gary Cooper for "Mr. Deeds Goes to Town."
Actress—Irene Dunne for "Magnificent Obsession."
Production—"The Great Ziegfeld."

Bangtails Bring Bums.—Lots of trouble about the races. And aren't these film folk the wild gamblers! Nine out of ten are losers, too.

Studios felt the interest in the following of the bangtails was all too keen, and one or two talked diligently about putting the ban on week-day attendance. But that didn't prevent the "hired help," including stars, directors, and scenarists, from placing bets with the bookmakers. Then the police buzzed after the bookies, and the movie-ites had to submit to questioning regarding so-called racketts. It was, therefore, just one thing after another during the racing season.

However, the tension was somewhat relieved when a lagging nag of Bing Crosby's upset the dopesters by coming in first, and paying off fifty or sixty to one or thereabouts. Only a comparatively few stars had loyally bet on Bing's steed, and he didn't have much money on the THINK only one thing had to do with my entry into pictures—fate."

Frances Farmer did not attempt to look mysterious as she said this in a casual way. Indeed, she is not exotic. As she spoke to me she remained indifferent to reportorial presence. Dressed in a blue serge tailored suit—which gave her very blond hair and hazel eyes a brighter glow—she appeared to be a very matter-of-fact young business woman.

Of course no business girl could have the glowing flame possessed by Miss Farmer beneath her icelike exterior. Occasionally, tones in her voice betray the fact that this newcomer is no vapid inconsequential.

Her excellent work in "Come and Get It" easily proved this. Negotiating a loan for her services from Paramount, Samuel Goldwyn evidently knew what he was doing. It was, however, Howard Hawks, the director, who was mainly responsible in suggesting her for the rôle of "Lotta."

"Mr. Hawks had seen a test of mine," Miss Farmer said. "At first, it was decided that I play the rôle of the millionaire's daughter. However, I took a test for the other part and got it, too."

Perhaps this was late again. But I am dubious. Having been an admirer of the Farmer talent since her first appearance on the screen, I can only trace her lucky break to her own acting ability.

Miss Farmer is not unaware of her talent. She does not refer to it as something far beyond the average. She does not praise herself at all. Yet, all the same, you feel aware of her consciousness of her acting power.

The strongest fact is that she, a newcomer, has placed many a professional in a bock seat. Her ability makes it seem that in her we find a personification of the girl of the new age into which we are entering.

Born in Seattle, Washington, Miss Farmer lived on ordinary existence. Her father, an attorney, evidently did not object to his daughter's self-expression.

"I have been many things," she told me. "An usher in a movie house; a waitress in a cafè; a teacher of backward students. Everything has helped me. Maybe not directly, but indirectly."  (Continued on page 92)
RIGHT

I've never sailed before the mast, or rescued a faithful old retainer, or put down a native uprising single-handed—at the risk of life, limb, and reputation—so I probably am not very good copy.

Despite his lack of swashbuckling activity Humphrey Bogart is good copy. He is also an extremely good actor. That is why I am writing about him. It is why fans are writing to him. Some of them, confusing his screen bad men with his real self, have been trying to save his soul—to Humphrey's great embarrassment.

To all such I can only say that the Bogart soul is in excellent condition. I have never met an actor whose innate kindliness and integrity are more apparent.

If this sounds alarming I may add, by way of extenuation, that his manner is brash, his witticisms pointed, and his thought processes original and penetrating.

"Making pictures is as hard as working in a jute mill," said he, as we sat down to lunch, "but I like them. Now that I've become at home here I want to continue acting in them until I've learned enough to direct. Have some beer?"

Having completed nine pictures thus far, Bogart speaks with the voice of experience. His film career follows many years of stage work, seven of the plays in which he appeared having been hits. The least successful of these ran twenty-five weeks. Although he recalls those earlier days with affection and gratitude, he has said farewell to the stage.

"I carried the torch for dramatic art for nearly twenty years," he told me (he was born on the first Christmas Day of this century), "but even during my most successful periods I never had more than three hundred dollars ahead. Now I have had to become practical, having my mother and two sisters to care for, and I want to lay by something for my old age—even if I do have to make an occasional second-rate picture."

"The Petrified Forest" is his favorite of those he has made, as well as being his pet stage play. How audiences chuckled over and remembered the terse, habitual rejoinder of "Duke Mantee": "I wouldn't know, pal."

When he and Leslie Howard came from New York at the close of the play to enact their original roles in the film they found that the line had not been included in the scenario. Without bothering to obtain official sanction the two actors, who are close friends, put the line back where it belonged.

Humphrey Bogart wants to continue acting in pictures until he has learned enough to become a director.

His next rôle is in the Bette Davis-Edward G. Robinson film, "Kid Galahad."

GUY

HUMPHREY BOGART MAY BE AN EXPONENT OF BAD MEN ON THE SCREEN, BUT IN REAL LIFE HE IS A DARN NICE FELLOW TO MEET.
THE SECRET OF GAIL PATRICK'S SUCCESS IS TOLD IN THE TITLE OF THIS STORY THOUGH SHE INSISTS THAT SHE REALLY ISN'T SUCCESSFUL AT ALL.

Although one's instinct is to discount the recommendations of a friend as being overland and favorable, an introduction to the Patrick girl soon changes that idea.

She came forward, a warm, gracious person, wrapped in sleek, silky black caracul and wearing a pill box hat of grosgrain in the same color, jauntily slanted over one eye. Far from being one of the bird-in-a-gilded-cage type of movie ladies, she is truly natural, lively and aware.

After clasping my hand in a firm, hearty grasp, she stooped to pick up the glasses that dropped to the floor when I arose to greet her.

Gail Patrick has one of the loveliest of voices: rich, mellow, vibrant, it lingers in the memory. Her hair is dark brown, her ankles are slim and her feet long and narrow. Altogether, she presents an arresting ensemble which does not overawe but, rather, invites closer acquaintance.

She had been traveling in the interests of Adolph Zukor's Silver Jubilee. Though the territory in her good-will tour included only the Southern States, she had made the trip to New York as a favor to friends. The Maharajah and the Maharani of Indore, no less.

Wealthy Indian rulers though they were, with all the royal trappings an income of $70,000,000 a year can bestow, Gail, upon meeting them in Hollywood, had treated the two in just the way they wished to be Whenever the studio wants something done, Gail Patrick is called upon. She obliges by doing everything from laying a cornerstone to presiding at the opening of a market.

She is very much the country girl—that is part of her charm," enthused Margaret Fitzpatrick's companion and secretary.

We were waiting in one of Paramount's New York offices for the appearance of the topic of our discussion, who had been excitedly seeing Manhattan for the first time in her life.

"She adapts herself to everything," went on her friend. "Whatever you want to do, she wants to do.

"Whenever the studio wants something done, they call upon her. And she obliges by doing everything from laying a cornerstone to presiding at the opening of a market.

"She is always anxious to learn—anxious for criticism."

These good words were in reference to a tall, lithe, handsome young woman from Birmingham, Alabama. A former Southern belle with a sparkling smile and dark, deep, humorous eyes. A Bachelor of Arts who studied to be a lawyer. An ex-panther girl who entered the contest mainly because the prize was a plane ride to Los Angeles—and she loves to fly. A featured actress with personality and many interesting possibilities. In other words: Gail Patrick, who has become the theme of frequent conversations since her vivid portrayal in "My Man Godfrey" made the picture hers as much as Carole Lombard's or William Powell's.

ANYTHING TO OBLIGE

THE SECRET OF GAIL PATRICK'S SUCCESS IS TOLD IN THE TITLE OF THIS STORY THOUGH SHE INSISTS THAT SHE REALLY ISN'T SUCCESSFUL AT ALL.

Although one's instinct is to discount the recommendations of a friend as being overland and favor-treated. Merely as a normal young man and his wife who were on a trip around the world.

Inasmuch as the three-year-old daughter of the couple was expected on an incoming liner and the Maharajah, being ill, was unable to make the cross-country trip, Gail had been delegated to meet the child and be a responsible companion for the twenty-year-old matter.

Thus, far the sake of all concerned, she had traveled ten thousand miles in eight days. Quite an achievement! And apt to make most of us a little tired and irritable. Particularly, since, in making connections along her Southern route, Gail had not only to dash around like mad but also miss meals when she was hungry. However, her disposition was apparently not affected.

Nor is she a frail flower who rates her beauty sleep at first importance. Far, after flying all night, she and her friend arrived in New York at five thirty a'clock at a bleak winter morning. And instead of tumbling into bed, they at once began their sightseeing. After all, it seemed, they had made a list of places they must visit and down or thereabouts was as good a time as any to start.

So the two girls were driven around Central Park in a taxi; gazed at the grandeur that was Radio City in the early-morning light; rode down to Wall Street in the subway, saw the Stock Exchange; visited Trinity Church; even went to the automat.

And having gat that much off their chests, ran to an airport to meet the later arriving Maharanees. However, there was Brooklyn Bridge, the Empire State Building and the new Triboro Bridge still to be covered. A list which came under the heading of business that had to be finished.

"We are like the typical American tourists," smilingly announced Gail, "the only thing we lack is a trailer.

She relaxed in a swivel chair and confided: "A trip like this can either make you feel awfully cocky or depress you. As a matter of fact, I was very depressed in Jacksonville, Florida. The way the people down there adore one just because you happen to be a movie actress! They acted as if I were a star," she spoke in wonder, adding in quick self-depreciation, "and all the while I was embarrassed because I know I haven't made a success; nor done anything to be particularly proud of."

This unpretentious lass thought that she had surely left homage far behind her when she came to the Big Town. But she doesn't know her fans. Invited to the French Casino for dinner, a little cigarette girl paused, stared at her for a long minute, and queried: "Aren't you Carole Lombard's sister?"

"Surprised that she should be recognized at all, Gail shook her head and explained that the relationship had existed only in the picture."

"Well, you should wear dark glasses," the other advised, "because all the Hollywood actresses who come to New York wear dark glasses so that they won't be recognized."

"Slightly pink-laced, Miss Patrick apologized: "I didn't think I had a public in New York."

"There is a reason for that recurrent twinkle in this girl's eye. She can tell a joke on herself."

"The other evening I was invited to El Morocco," she related. "I went dressed up in all my finery. And I was very much impressed when the waiter bowed us to a ringside table. I thought, 'Hm-m-m'-she raised her eyebrows in demonstration—" my escort must be very important."

It never occurred to me that it might be on my account. However, I began to feel pretty big when photgraphers came up and asked me to pose this way and that. After I'd been smiling from ear to ear, one of the cameramen said, 'Now come on, Miss Drake, let's have that million-dollar smile again.'"

She must have told that story in unconscious defense of her refusal to accept any commendation for her work. When same was offered she turned it down and with quick honesty pointed out:

"I'm not satisfied with the progress I've made at all. I don't think I've made any progress—and I grow very impatient about it. There can only be a turning point when one has reached a place in one's career where you really feel that you have accomplished something. I haven't reached that as yet."

"As to what such an accomplishment would be, Miss Patrick revealed that she would like to do the type of roles formerly played by Kay Francis.

No sooner was this interview written than Miss Patrick obliged Robert Gobb, manager of Hollywood's Brown Derby, by marrying him with an obliging smile.
Sonja Henie is the sports reporters' dream girl just as she is the star who is making loads of money for 20th Century-Fox just now.

Kitty Carlisle, who blossoms amazingly in "White Horse Inn" on the stage, will return to pictures when the Tyrolean extravaganza is filmed.

Mutterings of discontent have been seething among audiences at radio broadcasts here. Hollywood is taking all our free shows away, just because they need the comedians to brighten their pictures.

Burns and Allen brought their amiable lunacies to our local broadcasting studios for only a few weeks before they strayed to Hollywood and Paramount. Fred Allen is packing up his troupe to join 20th Century-Fox for "Sally, Irene, and Mary." Ozzie Nelson's orchestra has relinquished Harriet Hilliard, who skipped off to Hollywood to appear in "Stepping Toes" for RKO. And Milton Berle, newly elected king of night life by one newspaper columnist, goes to join RKO in a revue type of picture called "New Faces."

It's an outrage! New York lads on just-out-of-college earnings can give a girl quite a whirl of entertainment when tickets to these broadcasts are to be had for nothing. But Hollywood took them away. And what did we get in return? Our stage got Morgo, Marguerite Churchill, Brian Aherne, Kitty Carlisle, Frank Albertsone, Walter Huston, Pauline Frederick, Katharine Hepburn. But—at $4.40 a ticket!

Not New, Just Grown-up—Smiling, wavy-haired, trigger-witted Milton Berle, whose radio program has been on outstanding success—it comes late enough on Sunday night so that even motion-picture exhibitors can get home to hear it—is really a screen veteran. At the ripe age of six he appeared in Pearl White serials.

BY KAREN HOLLIS
Fernand Gravet, veteran of twenty-six pictures in Europe, has made his first in Hollywood, "The King and the Chorus Girl."

Luise Rainer and her playwright husband, Clifford Odets, are prepared for a descent of visiting friends from Broadway.

Margo’s stage and screen future is all settled between the Theater Guild and Samuel Goldwyn.

Let the Studios Try to Top This One.—Elsa Maxwell, whose life work seems to be thinking up parties for the international social set, gave a barnyard party in a ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria, and in the midst of all the whoops and screaming Kay Francis managed to distinguish herself. She called the square dances in a hearty manner that even Bob Burns—had he been there—might have been proud of.

Some of the dowagers were pretty cay trying to establish that square dances were before their time or outside the interests of their set, but Constance Bennett—looking like a French designer’s dream of a pastel milkmaid—stepped right up, bowed, and swung and sashayed with the best of them, including the bag-calling champion of Ohio who was sought for the occasion.

Kay wore an Alpine peasant dress, somewhat startlingly garlanded with a necklace of carved emeralds and diamonds. Ethel Merman was hilarious as a Keystone cap with pink chin whiskers, her one regret being that there were no custard pies to throw. Mr. and Mrs. Douglas Fairbants managed to look sleek and urbane in truly rural dress, and the Fredric Marches might have stepped right out of a county fair poster.

All was merriment, except for those sensitive souls who are belligerent advocates of the S. P. C. A. Real, live pigs, terrified by the bright lights and slippery floor, skidded around helplessly. And Constance Bennett, suddenly ashen pale, vanished.

Aimed at Your Hearts.—The new matinée idol, or at least the young man Warners hope will become your undisputed favorite, is Fernand Gravet, who hustled through New York recently on his way to Paris from Hollywood. He had just finished "The King and the Chorus Girl" under Mervyn Le Roy’s direction, and his main concern was to get back home and renew his accent. Without it, he fears he would be just one more actor in Hollywood. And young Fernand, whose profile is so like the Duke of Windsor’s, is accustomed to being the actor wherever he is.

Veteran of twenty-six pictures made on the Continent, he is a great European favorite. Somewhat calm and reserved in manner, he speaks with Gallic swiftness a patter made up of all the current bywords. He loves this, adores that. He is fascinated by American motion pictures. Hollywood, he thinks, is wonderful. So wonderful that he could hardly wait to get back to Paris.

Once a Guest, Forever a Hostess.—When Luise Rainer married Clifford Odets she succeeded in shutting the world outside, just as she had hoped. Only two close friends were present. But hardly were they married, when his old pals, members of the Group Theater in New York, entrained for Hollywood en masse. A few of them had been promised jobs; others went out on speculation. Miss Rainer had called them at their rehearsal farm at Nichols, Connecticut, last summer. They were grimly intent on returning the visit.

The Hero Behind the Camera.—Many a reporter who looks on players as people to be met in line of duty, cheers when hearing that George Cukor, the director, is in town. He’ll argue with you, disagree with you, hoot at you. On his last trip, he took the trouble to lug along a large painting of "Juliet’s" tomb, done by an eminent Italian artist, from which the MGM set was copied. That was the answer to reviewers who said that the set looked like mail-order catalogue modernistic.

We have his hearty assurance that the search for a leading woman for "Gone with the Wind" from among the ranks of unknowns is genuine. He wants to find a girl for the part who is not now on the screen. There has been widespread suspicion that talk of giving the rôle to a newcomer was just a bid for publicity, that in the end it would be given to some star.

EVERY TRUE FAN KNOWS, OF COURSE, THAT BORIS KARLOFF ISN'T A MONSTER IN REAL LIFE, AND THAT HE IS A MASTER OF DISGUISE. BUT HERE IS INTIMATE INSIGHT INTO HIS INNER SELF—NEW, UNUSUAL, FRIENDLY.

HE'S an Indian prince. He's an exiled member of the Russian royal family! He's an operative of Scotland Yard. Without his dread make-up, he's handsome and dashing. He's deformed and grotesque. He's pale and emaciated. He's really horrifically mysterious.

These were only some of the legends floating around about Boris Karloff after his rise to stardom in "Frankenstein." I could laugh at them, because I had known the man intimately for years; in fact, I lived with him for a few months when times were somewhat lean for him—and leaner for me.

His studio apparently thought that it would be good publicity to enshroud the man himself in mystery-cum-secrecy.

Mr. Karloff lives very much like a modest English country squire in a quiet, well-ordered home. He likes his dogs, birds and roses.

The three pictures he recently made in England are not horror films as we know them. Such stories are barred in Great Britain. So you will see Karloff practically as he is in real life.

"I'm utterly content with life," says Boris, thereby setting a precedent in Hollywood.
They ignored his first name and billed him simply as Karloff. He was not allowed to see an interviewer except in make-up, and was never photographed except in character. His progress from dressing room to sound stage was guarded with gauze, masks, and screens, lest somebody might penetrate the secrets of those frightening faces. He rarely appeared in public, and his address and telephone number were deep secrets.

This couldn’t last forever, of course, and today Boris is permitted to lead a normal life, play cricket, feed his ducks, play with his dogs, and exhibit to the outside world the face that God gave him. And, when all’s said and done, it isn’t such a bad face at that!

Boris was one of my first intimates after I landed in Hollywood fresh from England. He was playing a most villainous heavy in a “quickie.” He was busy being horse-whipped by Evelyn Brent.

He had been fifteen years away from home, and was homesick. We would go to the coffee stand, and Boris would drink gallons of poisonous black coffee, and would ask me if the Pall Mall restaurant on Haymarket was still serving such excellent food, and if Regent Street still ran into Piccadilly Circus.

His few intimates in those early days knew that Boris was a good actor. Directors would say: “Boris Karloff? Oh, yes. Fine actor. Nice fellow.” But that was all. Nothing was done about it.

The few parts that came his way were mostly bits in horse operas and the like, but this notwithstanding, I never heard one bitter word from him in regard to his lot. He took every bit that came his way, and was thankful for what he could get.

I used to go, during the motion-picture industry’s annual summer slump, and watch him being dramatic under a green spotlight in one of Dostoevski’s morbid ditties, or something equally turgid. Sometimes he was paid for it, meagerly; more often he was not. There would be a number of his friends in the audience, on passes, and pathetically often we would make up the majority of the house. As I say, we always knew when he was good, and would go away protesting that if Boris could only get a break —— Well, he got it at long last.

He was always inordinately interested in make-up. I recall his putting walnut shells into his nostrils to make them spread for the rôle of a native in “Tarzan of the Golden

"The Good Earth."—MGM. One of the great achievements of the screen is this flawless adaptation of a wonderful book. Nothing even faintly like it has been seen before. The subject is new, the production astonishing and the acting is grand. It is a long picture and often moves slowly, but there are episodes of excitement so intense that they are almost unbearable. One cannot doubt that two years of preparation preceded actual filming. While the story deals with Chinese peasants who wrest a meager living from the soil, it is a profound study of man and civilization everywhere. The film stirs not alone because it acquaints us with unfamiliar viewpoints and customs, doing more to bring Chinese character and psychology close to us than anything hitherto written or screened, but because it reveals human nature with truth and compassion. We see Wang Lung, tiller of the soil, marrying O-Lan, kitchen slave in a great house, that she may bear him sons to help maintain his land. Patient, plodding, doing a man's work in the fields, she fulfills her destiny. Famine descends upon the farm and the children are fed dirt until a better day comes. O-Lan causes prosperity to return, the land yields rich harvest and Wang Lung is wealthy. Softened, demoralized, he falls into evil ways until brought to his senses by disaster—a plague of destroying locusts. His fight to prevent destruction of his crops is the climaxing marvel of the picture, the horde of locusts the most horrible villains the screen has ever portrayed. Paul Muni is superb as Wang Lung, Luise Rainer moving beyond words as stiff, stupid O-Lan, her exquisite expressiveness disguised by disfiguring make-up but the soul of a great actress shining in breath-taking beauty.

"You Only Live Once."—United Artists. The terror of stark realism is here, plus adroitly arranged suspense.

"Fire Over England."—Magnificently eye-filling describes this British picture directed by one of Hollywood's aces, William K. Howard. It dazzles the eye, stimulates the mind and imagination with its intelligence, but lacks that emotional appeal necessary to make a great picture of a serious subject superbly produced. I might qualify this and say that it has moments of glowing intensity and excitement, but they are quenched by periods when one does not quite know what is happening: when the story and its motives subside and are obscured. The picture is more than a spectacle, though. It is rich in character studies and the authentic pomp of royal courts. Chiefly the result is a disturbing, depressing picture finely directed by Fritz Lang, who made much of " Fury," and splendidly acted by Henry Fonda and Sylvia Sidney. It is a burning indictment of our criminal code, or rather our refusal to permit an ex-convict to become a law-abiding citizen. At the same time it does not glorify the jailbird nor does it plead for him. It simply states facts, shocking by the simplicity of their exposition, depressing by man's injustice to man. We are asked to contemplate the hopelessness of a young fellow on his release from prison. Finding a girl who is willing to marry him in spite of his record, their honeymoon is cut short when the proprietor of a country hotel recognizes his picture in a detective magazine. Then begins the struggle to find a job and hold on to it until his record causes him to be arrested for a crime he did not commit and he is sentenced to die. Finally, he shoots down a priest who tries to convince him that he has been pardoned. In a wild attempt to elude pursuit, he and his wife are killed after she has given birth to a baby. All this makes for more than a run-of-the-mill crook melodrama. It has depth and compassion, tensity and horror.

"The Plough and the Stars."
it concerns Queen Elizabeth, Philip of Spain and the defeat of the Armada, with the likable figure of a brave English youth serving his sovereign and winning her lady-in-waiting. All this makes a literary, scholarly picture, the artistic panorama of a colorful period. First acting honors go to Flora Robson who brings to life an Elisabeth imperious but human, a queen who admits remorse for the death of Mary of Scotland, instead of the monster usually described. The entire cast is representative of the finest talent in England.

"The Plough and the Stars."—RKO. If you are still interested in the Irish uprising in 1916, or are hopeful of another "Informers," then you should see this. But if you are tired of the subject and consider everything said, as I do, this will strike you as unnecessary and perhaps boring. Of course it is splendidly acted, especially by members of the famous Abbey Theater in Dublin. Their ability to depict the strange Irish character is equaled by no one in Hollywood for they have done nothing else all their professional lives. However, they are incidental here to Preston Foster and Barbara Stanwyck, the latter screaming and agonizing without ever seeming to belong to the scene or the authentic portrayals of the Dubliners. Mr. Foster is excellent, however, even going so far as to alter his speech, something Miss Stanwyck fails to do. They are concerned in that phase of fighting in Ireland known as the Easter Week Rebellion in which the Republican volunteers captured the post office from British officials. The most interesting characters are the non-combatants, the most illuminating acting coming from them, too.

"Stolen Holiday."—Warners. Kay Francis lends her presence, which means her charm and style, to a curiously unreal, synthetic picture. It does not draw on her ability to do anything but wear clothes. As there are plenty of these, there can be no complaint on that score. But Miss Francis will get nowhere as an actress in pictures such as this. It happens in Paris and Miss Francis listens to an odd proposal from Claude Rains, who describes himself as a financier. If she will pose as Mr. Rains's hostess at his parties he will set her up as head of lavish dress shops in Paris, London, and New York. Miss Francis does and they both profit enormously. Then she falls in love with Ian Hunter, but there can be no happiness for her because of her obligation to Mr. Rains. Tricked into a marriage with him, she discovers that he is a master crook. Never fear, everything comes out right in the end. Mr. Rains's performance is extraordinary. He suggests evil and perversity as no other actor can. Alison Skipworth contributes a realistic note, too, but neither escapes the artificiality of the picture as a whole.

"The Black Legion."—Warners. Better than that critics' favorite, "Fury," is this grim, terrifying study of organized mob violence. Not a pretty picture, it is ruthless in depicting the brutal tyranny of the lawless when dealing with the individual—and the helplessness of the latter. Obviously inspired by the exposure of floggings and killings by a secret society in Michigan, it has more than local significance. It enlightens the general public and warns those who may incline toward organizations similar to that pictured on the screen. Their propaganda is insidious, their hold on members relentless, their dictates fiendishly destructive. Here we have a factory mechanic who, failing to be appointed foreman, is embittered. He listens to the propagandist of the hooded legion who points out that foreigners are taking jobs away from

Radio's One Gift

With the closing of "Illegal Practice" Don fortune seemed to snow Don under. The theater was in the dol-

New York. His father's little fortune had Drums. He returned to Madison, went upon helping out. He worked in an automobile factory. He toiled in a mattress manufactory. He even wore huge callouses on his hands working with a road construction gang.

Bitterness engulfed him. He had failed.

Perhaps, he felt, it was a judgment.

Perhaps his mother was right; maybe he belonged to the church to which she had pledged him as a child. He was about to enter a religious order when, one night, the telephone rang.

It was Bernadine Flynn, calling from Chicago. Would Don come to the city and try out for a new radio series? Would he? He scoured totgether the tore—on three days later was in the cast of "The Empire Builders." He brought the voice that had won him out of schoolboy scraping for radio—and radio loved it! More and better parts followed. And Honore was visiting 'n Chicago.

She had graduated from a course in nursing, and landed a job in a hospital there. When she returned home for a vacation he followed her and proposed. It had taken him six years —but they were married in five days!

Don's radio success is history. He climbed rapidly to the top. He sent his younger brothers and sisters to school, provided a home in Chicago for his parents. But the restlessness that always had consumed him beset him once more.

Even the advent of little Ronnie didn't calm the surging flame. He gloried, though, in parenthood. He wants to have an even dozen children, and Honore shares the wish.

Don, Jr., came after Ronnie—but Don.

Sr., and Honore look forward eagerly to the remaining ten of their quote.

Then came a movie test. There was jubilation. Honore was opportune, but to Don it meant going places and seeing things. Joyfully he entained for glamorous Hollywood, of which he'd heard so much, but never seen. The return trip was doleful. He hadn't made the grade.

Back to radio—and restlessness. It was that restlessness to which he owes his present success. If he hadn't been restless, unsatisfied, he would have refused to make the second movie test.

That came a year later. A screen executive, in Chicago, met Don at a party, and urged him to come to New York for a screen test.

Don's impulse was to refuse. He'd gone to Hollywood—and come back.

That had wounded his vanity. But

New York wasn't Hollywood. What if the new test did flop, too? It was something to do, wasn't it? He went —and the rest is not too ancient history.

Dorothy Lamour, former radio singer, plays the role of a Panama cafe

The Man Behind the Make-up

Lion." He had a very sore nose, but was very pleased with himself, and looked sufficiently awful on the screen to win a small modicum of acclaim. This self-torture in the interests of his art was, I believe, his own idea.

We lived together for a time, after his divorce from the vividly interesting young woman to whom he had been married.

She was a dancer by profession, but by talent and inclination she should have been an important artist of design. Apart, they were two of the most charming people any one could wish to meet. Together, they were match and gunpowder. Their occasional meetings always ended in drama. Afterward, Boris would pace the floor, declaiming against all women and the institution of marriage.

I used to be convinced that he felt the boards beneath his feet, and sensed the footlights and the audience beyond. Suddenly, his emotions satisfied, he would sit down, light his pipe, whistle for his dog, and relax for a session with his literary god, Conrad, as cool as a cucumber, where another man would have been a nervous wreck.

I thought at the time that if only I could succumb to good old dramatic outbursts of that sort, forget my British reserve, I might be able to achieve the customary unworried calm of a Karloff. I envied him. That, I used to think, is what it means to be an actor. To be able to dramatize your moods, act them out, and forget them as you forget last night's performance.

Whatever his secret, whatever the resources of strength or of the power to relax upon which he drew, they stood him in good stead in his fight with Hollywood. For it was a long, hard-fought battle of endurance. A battle of years. Perhaps that knack of blowing off and then forgetting it is the essence of his present success.

In the days of our early friendship I used to wonder about him a great deal. I did not know then that he was born Charles Pratt, of a British clergyman father, with numerous brothers in the civil service. All I saw was a tall man with very dark skin; straight, coarse, slightly graying hair; opaque, black eyes, with curiously tinted whites. And bearing a Russian name.

This last puzzled me most, for I could not see a vestige of Russian ancestry in him. His whole background, as he revealed it in conversation, was unmistakably British. He couldn't have been anything else. I believe his swarthiness can be traced to the thousands of gallons of strong black coffee that he has consumed!

The last time I saw him, we were drawn up before a blazing fire in his study. He had been to England; visited the spots for which he had longed; tasted triumph in his native land. With a Scottie restively dreaming at our feet, we talked of the old days and the somewhat hectic struggle for existence we had known.

Opposite us sat the present Mrs. Karloff, a lady of sweet dignity and serenity, reading a story which had been suggested for Boris's next starring vehicle, and which she discussed later with a shrewd, critical sense of dramatic values. She afterward trounced me unmercifully at ping-pong.

"Wouldn't you like to do some other kind of rôles?" I asked him.

"Why should I? So long as there is a box office for so-called horror pictures, I'll gladly be the bogy man. These rôles of mine have provided me with peace and happiness; given me practically everything I have ever hoped for. I'm utterly content with life."

Horror pictures are barred in England, and they cast him in straight parts in the three pictures he made over there. We, who believed in him so strongly in the early days, and who never imagined for one moment that he would become Hollywood's ace frightener, will be very interested to see what they have done with him. The man is capable of sensitive, finished performances, without benefit of bizarre make-up. One of these days some one will recognize that fact. Perhaps it has been the British!

He lives very much like a modest English country squire. He has a miniature estate where he may putter with various rural pursuits; may entertain quietly and with dignity; may be his own self. A Scotch soda, a brace of dogs, a pipe, and a pile of phonograph records. Boris is content. There is your spine-chilling bogy man!

No temperament; no glitter; no practical jokes or other Hollywood diet does for Boris. I'm willing to bet that he'll never succumb to those things.

One of Picture Play's writers, Helen Pade, enjoys a pleasant chat with the up-and-coming Craig Reynolds on the set of "The Go-Getter."
Don’t let Blackheads...Large Pores. Blemishes spoil your looks!

Fight them with rousing UNDER SKIN treatment

Miss Virginia Harris says: “I’ve learned to fight hateful blackheads and blemishes with Pond’s Cold Cream. It keeps pores fine, too!”

Mrs. Arthur Richardson, granddaughter of the late C. OLIVER ISELIN: “I depend entirely upon Pond’s Cold Cream to keep my skin clean, smooth, and free from skin faults. I use it night and day. It’s indispensable.”

Do this regularly. As blackheads soften, take a clean tissue and press them out. Now blemishes will stop coming. And the places where pores showed largest will be finer textured.

SPECIAL 9-TREATMENT TUBE and 3 other Pond’s Beauty Aids

POND’S, Dept. 14CD, Clinton, Conn.

Each special tube of Pond’s Cold Cream, enough for 9 treatments, with generous samples of 2 other Pond’s Oreams and 2 different shades of Pond’s Face Powder. I enclose 10c for postage and packing.

Bette Underrates Herself

Speaking of diversity, I interjected. 'What kind of parts do you want to play?'

'Any kind where the girl has character,' she rejoined promptly. 'On the stage I toured a year with Blanche Yurka in 'The Wild Duck.' I played 'Hedvig,' which is God's gift to every ingénue. That's tops for young girls on the stage. In pictures, of course, there was 'Mildred' but I doubt that another part like that will ever be written. I can't hope for more parts like those two but as long as the girls are interesting I don't care what they are or what they're like. The only part I'm deathly afraid of is one where people might say, when they see the picture, 'She wasn't acting—she was playing herself.'

'What kind of part would that be?' I asked.

'I can't imagine any one bothering to write such an uninteresting part,' she grinned, 'so my tears are probably groundless. When I think of myself at all it is as a person with a fair sense of humor, a fair amount of intelligence, no particular charm or glamour and rather colorless. You can see a person like that would have no place in a picture.'

Bette underrates herself. She has a terrific sense of humor and one of the most electric personalities imaginable.

'Bette,' I queried once, rather curiously, 'what is there left for you to go on to? You're famous, you're making a lot of money, you've won the highest honor in your profession. You might win it again but it would only be a repetition. What are you looking forward to?'

Bette never batted an eyelash before replying: 'Ambitions are like tires—I always carry a few spares. The chase is generally more interesting and more important than the goal. Fulfilled ambitions bring smugness, stagnation, and failure in the midst of success. It is only by continually seeking new accomplishments a person can keep mentally fit. That's why every one should have more than one aim in life. Then it's impossible to pat oneself on the back as being a complete success.'

I've tried to show you Bette Davis as I see her. And when you see her that way—see the girl behind the screen—it isn't so hard to understand the qualities she brings to her work—the qualities that have earned her the title of 'The best actress in Hollywood.'

Jean Arthur offers some striking creations this month. Beginning on the left page, one is designed for grace, having a softly draped shoulder line and skirt.

- Next is a coat dress of heavy smooth-surfaced wool, trimmed with military braid.
- The beige-gray gown of slipper satin has crisscross shoulder straps of crystal and turquoise beads.
- The pajama ensemble is made of cloth of gold. The harem trousers are finely pleated.
- The formal gown, above, is of jet-black bugle beads.
- A fitted peplum jacket, trimmed with sable, accompanies the slipper satin gown which you see on the opposite page.

Why Is She the Perfect Wife?
CLARK GABLE believes in preparedness. His new station wagon, for use on hunting trips, contains an artfully concealed bed, lots of room for provisions, and even a short-wave radio set for sending messages as well as receiving them. So he can get away from it all, Clark insists. But not too far away!

FRIENDS of Pat O'Brien notified him that they were going to Hollywood and would be at a certain apartment house after January 1st. On January 2nd Pat hid himself to greet them, walked into a comfortable and lavishly furnished reception hall where a lady was busy at the telephone. Pat waited politely until the lady finished her conversation and turned to him, inquiring, "What can I do for you?"

"I'd like to speak to the manager or the reception clerk. Some friends have on apartment here."

The lady surveyed him with calm amusement. "There is no manager, nor is there a reception clerk," she informed him. "Moreover, there are no apartments. This is a private residence; it belongs to me and I am very busy. Will you please go away now?"

The crimson O'Brien, overwhelming with apologies as well as with gratitude because she had not called the police, went away.

It was Fred Keating who remarked, during the recent "unusual" electric storm: "You can't fool me. That's not lightning. It's a publicity stunt.

Jean Harlow is flashing that star sapphire that Bill Powell gave her.

We don't know whether or not this is a libel on Carole Lombard, but, s'help us, it happened. A blond young thing, carrying a Pekingese dog, encountered a friend in the Roosevelt Hotel lobby. "My gosh! What have you done to him?" shrieked the friend. "Red nail polish on its toes and—" and is that rouge on its nose?"

The blonde tilted her chin. "And why not?" she inquired belligerently. "Carole Lombard does it to her Pekingese, Push-face, and that dog gets its pictures in all the papers!"

We were disturbed over the sad plight of Dolores del Rio's press agents when, after arranging for her to indorse a nationally advertised den-tifrice, they discovered that never, in her professional life, had Dolores had a photograph taken smiling! Not a tooth in a cor load of Del Rio pictures. A deal of high-powered and expensive persuasion was required before the Mexican beauty consented to unveil her pearly teeth for the gentleman who told her to watch for the birdie. The reasons for this reticence are beyond us. Dolores has nice teeth.

PRODUCERS certainly are having their troubles, despite the encouraging reports from the box office for the past year. As if it weren't bad enough for a round two dozen of Hollywood's most promising young actors to be laid low with influenza, the industry last one of its oldest and most trusted troopers. Jenny, the four-ton elephant you have seen in practically every animal picture which has been released in the past twenty-two years, succumbed to pneumonia the other day. Jenny was a distinct loss.

And that's not all. Five trained lions, whose faces and roars are familiar to every picture-goer, found themselves strike-bound in Honolulu for several weeks. As this is written, production is being delayed on several pictures until the lions can be rescued. The crew of the Chino Clipper declined regretfully, but politely, to transport these important actors across the intervening stretch of Pacific Ocean.

YOU'D be scared to death if you were colling on Irene Dunne and some one tried to reach you by telephone. There you'd be, sitting quietly, and a wall panel would swing out just back of your neck, or the arm of a chair would lift with a horrid sort of silence. Just as you shrieked, "Eeek!" and started to run, you would be informed that you were wanted on the phone, and there would be the phone, peering eerily out of whatever had opened. She has 'em hidden in statues and in bookshelves. Nine of them. We don't know what Irene does with such mundane objects as waffle irons and toothbrushes, but we'll bet it's something fancy and spooky.

MADGE EVANS is one player—probably the only one—who doesn't keep a scrapbook. "Who'd look at it but me?" she demurred. "I've never done anything worth remembering. If I ever got the Academy award, that would be something worth preserving, I don't even keep stills of the pictures I've been in."

Which is just another evidence of Madge's sane outlook on life.

You might try Robert Montgomery's sure-fire retort to angry speed cops. He was overtaken on Wilshire Boulevard the other day and again his three little words did the trick. "Where's the fire?" shouted the irate officer in the unoriginal manner the law likes. Bob smiled sweetly. "In your eye," he murmured. This modest witicism invariably results in no ticket.

TWO years ago Ann Satheren spent all her money on clothes, boasting the most varied and stylish wardrobe in the younger set. Now she braggs about not buying a thing to wear: instead she purchases china. It all goes to show what love and a wedding ceremony will do.

JEAN HARLOW undoubtedly has a sense of humor for she can kid herself. When she heard the report that the scenes for her lastest epic were being acclaimed as superbly beautiful in the cutting room she exclaimed, "I photograph so well it looks as though some one stood in for me."

A HOLLYWOOD separation is the latest modern convenience. You fight and live apart, but you make no move for a divorce. Consequently, no one can romantically entangle you.

Ginger Rogers and Lew Ayres are sponsoring the new idea.

HERBERT MARSHALL’s new heart that she looks enough like Gloria Swanson to be her younger sister.

THOSE Hollywood escorts always do things up dashingly. Rochelle Hudson went out with Austin Parker, suave scenarist, on an unusually cold evening.

Billy and Bobby Mauch, the twelve-year-old twins in "The Prince and the SKIN DRY AND "TIGHT" POWDER "CATCHES"

AFTER A DAY in the open—how does your skin feel when you start to freshen up for the evening?

All dry and "tight"—Your powder catches ... looks splotchy ... meven.

There’s a quick answer to that. A special cream melts all that harsh surface roughness into suppl smoothness. Does it in just one application.

How melting softens ... A distinguished dermatologist explains:—"Exposure hastens the natural drying out of cells on the surface of the skin, causing the familiar dry and "tight" feeling. A keratolytic cream (Vanishing Cream) melts off these dead cells—reveals the soft, young cells beneath. Then skin feels soft and smooth instantly."

That is why Pond’s Vanishing Cream is so popular now with all active outdoor girls.

For powder base—A film of Pond’s Vanishing Cream smooths flakiness away. Make-up goes on perfectly. Stays.

For overnight—Apply Pond’s Vanishing Cream after cleansing. Not greasy. It won’t smear. In the morning your skin is soft, fresh.

For protection—Before long hours out of doors, put on Pond’s Vanishing Cream.
Your skin won’t rough up!

on Jackie's side at a party given by Ida Koveman. The young man was all nerves and restlessness until Judy arrived on the scene, and as soon as possible he captured her for a tête-à-tête which went on and on. We hear that Mickey Rooney would like to be a rival, but Jackie seems to have the inside track.

Miriam Buys Gilbert House.—Memories of other years will be completely eradicated from Jack Gilbert's home before Miriam Hopkins becomes its inmate, for she will do it over completely. She purchased the show place recently for $42,500, endeavoring at the outset to keep the matter a secret, for the buyer's name was given as Louis M. Childs. Miriam is smart enough to know that a film name generally means a rise in price. So she concluded the deal through a substitute. That means, doubtless, that Miriam will spend more of her time in Hollywood. She has always divided her allegiance between New York and the Coast. Can it, by any chance, portend a marriage? Of course, there's Anatol Litvak.

Swiftly to the Altar.—Hollywood has had its share of swift marriages lately. No surprise, the wedding of Luise Rainer and Clifford Odets did occur with suddenness, and they are "oh, so very, very happy," despite that Miss Rainer worries continually because she isn't acting in more pictures, working in a real habit with her. Astrid Allwyn and Robert Kent chose Mexico as the goal for an elopement. Same for Gail Patrick and Bob Cobb. While Brian Donlevy and Marjorie Lane decided to go through with a second ceremony in Los Angeles, following their below-the-border flight. Then didn't Ann Harding's sudden marriage to Werner Janssen sort of take you by storm? Jubilation over that was only marred by the fact that Harry Bannister initiated new proceedings for more of his daughter, Jane's, time.

The Swarthout Raiment.—Prize award for most amazing dress in Hollywood should go to Gladys Swarthout. At the Adolph Zukor jubilee dinner and broadcast she appeared on the scene in ecclesiastical attire, no less. Which is certainly recognizing the formality of such an occasion. Her gown was a modified cardinal's robe with gold girdle and tassels, and her head was crowned with a red cardinal's cap.

When she first arrived in Hollywood the motif of her dress was mandarin, and she became well-known for that. Unluckiest of stars in respect to the pictures that are made with her, Miss Swarthout invariably wins her public by her voice and distinctive beauty, as well as perhaps also her striking costuming. She was the hit of the evening at the Zukor celebration.

Loved by the Stars.—Best job discovered in the vicinity of the movies in a long time is that of the marrying justice at Yuma, Arizona. There are rewards for this work of both a financial and sentimental nature.

One judge recently retired with a fortune, it is said, and that wasn't all. He was kissed by Claudette Colbert right on the mouth, by Jean Harlow on the cheek, and by various other stars, including Loretta Young, Heather Angel, Gloria Swanson, and Lili Damita.

This always happened in that moment of exuberance which followed having the knot tied—evidence of the stars' appreciation of his courtesy when, in several instances, he rose out of bed at odd hours to perform a ceremony.

Elaine Barrie is one bride who is supposed not to have bussed the judicial gentleman, but think of all the other tributes! Who wouldn't want to run for judge in Yuma?

Government Reaps Harvest.—If you're curious to know how much stars receive after their taxes, both Federal and State, are deducted in California, here are some interesting figures:

Mae West got about $170,000 out of $480,000 which she received for her pictures in 1935; Marlene Dietrich, $140,000 out of $345,000; Bing Crosby, $130,000 out of $320,000; Gary Cooper, about $115,000 out of $260,000; Charles Chaplin, $90,000 out of $216,000; Warner Baxter, about $85,000 out of $203,000; Joe E. Brown and Janet Gaynor, $80,000 out of $170,000, and so on.

Players in the so-called lower brackets kept a much tidier sum, amounting to about two thirds of what they were paid. That goes for most of those who were above $50,000, but not $100,000, like Ann Harding, George Raft, Ruby Keeler, Edmund Lowe, W. C. Fields, Ginger Rogers, Joan Bennett—and can you imagine Shirley Temple being in that level? Still, that was in 1935. She's getting much more now.

Two Hardy Adventurers.—Frances Farmer and Leif Erikson have lost their boat, which was the pride of their lives during the past summer and fall months. Erikson hasn't the name of a famous maritime explorer, who was supposed to have discovered America before Columbus, for nothing. He likes sea-roving immensely. But the sailing craft of the two, which had an auxiliary outboard motor, was wrecked during the Pacific winter storms, and so in its place Mr. and Mrs. Erikson secured a kind of land yacht, in which they will live themselves about the State of California. It's a sort of truck with built-in sleeping accommodations.

Frances is practically as rugged a person as her husband, for she slept on hard boards when she took her trip into Russia and has no aversion to making her bed right on the ground when she goes into the desert or the high mountains. She once helped to take charge of a girl's summer camp, you see.

That Dangerous Man, Taylor.—The gardenias that William Powell sent Jean Harlow constantly during the filming of "Man in Her Hause" caused no end of a stir. They were a daily reminder while Jean was working in this feature with Robert Taylor. Proof, also, that Bill still retains his ardor after a full two years, which is really something.

Right on the heels of the film Jean and Bob went to Washington to attend the President's Ball, and we wonder whether Bill wasn't a bit worried during that interim.

Curious about Taylor—he and Clark Gable are quite good friends, and yet they're terrific rivals these days at the box office. Maybe Clark is going to try to prevail on Bob to slow down his wild rush a little.

Extras See Hopes Glimmer.—Life of extras isn't a joy any more, if it ever was, regardless of the number of spectacular productions made in 1936. Fewer of these supernumeraries were placed in films than during 1935, and the total amount of money paid them, $2,420,000, was $150,000 less than the preceding year.

Martha O'Driscoll, rising young star, is pictured in a lovely play suit of gay printed cretonne with a bonnet to match.

We'll find just the right person when the time comes," he remarks philosophically. "After all, we found Freddie Bartholomew, didn't we?"

Fun for the Film Scouts.—Burlesque is the newest field to be raided by picture companies. Gypsy Rose Lee, most eminent of the statuesque beauties who has made an art of taking off her clothes and waving them at the audience, has been signed by 20th Century-Fox. And now Ann Corio, a close second in popularity with burlesque audiences, has been offered the role of "Belle Watling" in "Gone With the Wind."

She isn't keen about taking it. After all, she makes fifteen hundred to two thousand a week in her own field, and she doesn't want to go into pictures if she is to be typed as a player of the wrong kind of women.

Starred in Baedeker.—First on the list of every tourist's sight-seeing trip to New York is "White Horse Inn" at Radio City's Center Theater. And the leading woman of the show is Kitty Carlisle. She is having a grand time. Her voice has increased in tone and volume; she has lost the reserve and self-consciousness that hampered her in pictures, and the easy camaraderie of the big company has swept away her rather aloof manner. She will be in the film version of "White Horse Inn" when Warners finally get around to filming this massive Tyrolean extravaganza, and you probably won't recognize her as the same girl who froze up every time the camera came near her in "A Night at the Opera."

Sonja and the Silver Skates.—All over the country Sonja Henie's first picture is breaking records, and already 20th Century-Fox is clamoring for her to call off her skating tour and come back to the cameras. As each box-office report comes in, Sonja grins that engaging, childlike way that you saw in "One in a Million."

There isn't the slightest danger of her developing a swelled head, because making successful pictures doesn't mean nearly as much to her as winning her first skating exhibition did. And she has been winning steadily all over the world for eight years.

As I left her apartment at the Wal- nort-Astoria one afternoon, I ran into a sports writer whose manner is usually sarcastic and scornful.

"Isn't she wonderful?" he cooed in the balmiest way imaginable. "Isn't she exquisite, isn't she——" Veddy, veddy nice, I agreed. At which I thought he was going to haul off and hit me. But he didn't.

He merely took out of his pocket a collection of pictures of women champions in sports, all a bit on the plain and massive side. "If you had to look at them every day," he growled, "you'd appreciate a glorious creature like Sonja Henie."

They Say in New York——

New Title for Bojangles.—All the stage and screen celebrities in town and as many more people as could be crowded into the Cotton Club paid tribute to Negro Bill Robinson the night before he left for Hollywood and 20th Century-Fox's "Café Metropole. And there some one conferred on him the title 'Beloved Ebony.'"

Worth Waiting For.—Two years ago when I first met Margo, she said a little wishfully, "Ever since I danced for a theatrical producer when I was seven or eight, people have been telling me that I had a brilliant future ahead of me. But I wish it would hurry up and start. The present is so much waiting."

Well, her future has started with a rush. Late this spring she will go to Hollywood to play in "Hurricane" for Samuel Goldwyn and meanwhile she is playing one of the most glamorous heroines in history, the "Baroness Vetsera," in the Theater Guild's "The Masque of Kings."

Excitement is rife in her personal, as well as professional, life, too. Francis Lederer is always showing up with flowers, or books, or music, or even a perfect three-carat blue diamond. He even cancelled part of his personal-appearance tour so as to attend her first out-of-town tryout.

All Around Town.—George O'Brien flew East, and in the very worst weather, too, to see his wife, Marguerite Churchill, open in a play called "And Now Good-bye." The play wasn't very good. But he had eyes only for her, and she was charming.

Ann Harding may not come back only from England for a long time, as her recently acquired husband, Werner Janssen, has commitments to lead symphony orchestras all over Europe.

Walter Huston never used to like Hollywood; he preferred Broadway. But since he played "Othello" to a grim and hostile first-night audience, he's grown homesick for the studios.

Wini Shaw, torch singer of Warners pictures, is singing at one of New York’s most high-hat night clubs with great success.

Helen Jepson, outstanding favorite of radio and the only Metropolitan opera diva who rivals Gladys Swarthout in beauty and smartness, is to make pictures for Grand National. She will have Victor Schertzinger direct her, he being the one who rescued Grace Moore from the film doldrums and made her a big hit.

"Although," she explained in frank indication of the doubt she had in her own judgment, "I never can tell about my career. And I don't know enough about acting to decide. Movies are like horse racing. You never know where you stand until the race is over. But you want to keep on betting."

Generous in her acknowledgment of the assistance of others, Gail unhasingly disclosed: "There's a little guy on the Coast who has helped me more than any one I know. His name is Johnny Engstead and he's helped me work out my problems around the studio." She paused in criticism of her phraseology and commented, "To say that he has helped me with my problems sounds Y, W, C, A-Ish, but it's true."

Even within the confines of her own company the popularity of this Southern girl, who possesses all the attractions of the traditional belle without exerting any of the artificialities, was evidenced. An increasing number of staff members filed into the small office in order to bask, as it were, in her friendly presence. Inherently considerate and wishing to make them feel at home—although they really didn't need that encouragement—Gail cordially swung around in her chair, including them in her conversation.

Courtesy like that was, na doubt, acquired in the pre-Hollywood days. When she was known solely as Margaret Fitzpatrick, who was working her way through college as a field manager. And was also active as president of the women's student body—without a thought in the world for acting, or the movies.

At present her mother is living in Birmingham, where her Irish father died a year and a half ago.

Gail Patrick has intelligence, determination, and spirit. She is of that new species of film actresses. You would never call her a "movie queen." But she does command respect as a hard-working actress with no pases. One who deserves the better opportunities which must inevitably come her way.

"Well, well," I said, "this is dissipation." He laughed and reddened. "You writers are everywhere," and then he explained that his family wanted to go to the movies and he had remained at home to read.

He lives in Beverly Hills now. He used to have two dogs but something happened to them so now his only pet is a canary. There is a question as to which likes the other better. John has trained it to light on his head as soon as he lets it out of the cage and it sings for dear life. John didn't train it to sing when it sat there—that was the bird's idea.

Several times during the interview there came a knock at the door and there would be a child or a young girl, embarrassed, but resolute. How they ever found out the number of his suite is a miracle, but they did and stood with palpitating hearts awaiting admission. John sent them happily away, personally inscribed photographs tucked securely under their arms.

A thoroughly nice person, this Mr. Boles.
A couple of years ago, Miss Farmer got a chance to go to Russia. A radical newspaper ran a contest. The one to get the greatest number of votes earned a trip to Europe and back.

"No, I'm not a radical insular as I belong to any definite association," my subject stated, when I asked if she had radical tendencies. "I think that all the recent and present upheavals mean something for us all. Nothing new could occur without the pulling down of previous wrong beliefs. Our own country has undergone a revolution within the past four years, though few people seem to realize it. Of course it has been a bloody revolution, bringing with it many new forms. People now have a keener idea of their own responsibilities as citizens. They feel closer to their country's ideals and progress."

From this you can see that Miss Farmer is no soap-box orator. She is merely a girl of the new age, ready for the new existence that seems imminent.

To hear this calm newcomer talk of things not of Hollywood makes her one alone in all cinematic annals.

Frankly, she gives you the idea of being alone in most things. I thought more of what she said, during her conversation, that few knew one another.

"After all," she remarked, "we are always alone—regardless of those who know us best."

I quite agree that very few people, even intimates, could ever get to know this girl well. There is a masculine reticence in her manner that keeps her apart from the crowd, also apart from acquaintances.

Naturally, I suppose this does not go for her husband, Leif Erikson, that young blond giant in Paramount's historic class. They were married a year ago last November. And once again, fate seemed to be the instigator.

The two of them met casually at the studio. Love seized them, for it has no regard for modern Russia or reticence.

"Naturally, I never expected to marry," my reticent radical confessed. "I came to Hollywood for a career."

Back in America, after her trip, Miss Farmer took a letter of introduction to a theatrical producer, Shepard Traube. Producer Traube took Miss Farmer to Paramount executives in New York, and a test was arranged.

Sent to Hollywood, she was placed in several inconsequential pictures, playing inconsequential parts. Yet to see her even in such light fare as "Too Many Parents," "Border Flight," and "Rhythm on the Range," was to see obvious talent.

"I object to being called by my first name by people I've never met before," Miss Farmer bluntly stated. "I don't know what it does. It makes you feel rather as one without any individuality. Hollywood strikes me as peopled by a crowd individually undifferentiated.

"That is why, I believe, that so many blame Hollywood for their mistakes. Marriages are said to be spoiled by Hollywood. I fail to see why this should be so. If two people really and truly love one another, nothing should separate them—least of all the demands of the town they live in."

"I trust my marriage will be successful. We both act for a living, and because we love the work. It gives us..."
mony interests in common. I don't see why such a profession should break up our home.'

This, of course, relies solely on the two blond lovers. Right at the present, the young wife is the celebrity. Her work in 'Come and Get It' causes Poromount to regard her as star material. Hollywood has turned its eyes on her. So far, the young husband is virtually unknown. His work with little Virginia Weidler, in 'Girl of the Ozarks,' proved that he has likable personality, and the necessary ability to forge ahead in acting. His crooning in 'College Holiday' was ingrating.

His wife thinks so, anyway.

As to what the movie world thinks of Miss Former—well, ecstatic remarks seem tame. She admits that her rôle in the Edna Ferber story was the first good part to come her way. "And what an excellent part it was!" she adds.

It remains to be seen whether Hollywood will offer further prizes of this kind. The movie Mecca frequently sees newcomers arrive, shouting high and mighty what they have to give. Frances Former let Hollywood do the shouting, for the cinema capital incessantly yells about its gifts to talented youth. Come and get it, says Hollywood to the striving aspirant.

Miss Former is here to get it—all that Hollywood has to offer. And she must see by reading this article that Hollywood has exceptions. Not once have I called her by her first name!

Right Guy

Although capable and self-confident in modern rôles, Bogart is stricken with doubt as to his qualifications for historical ones.

"There is talk of putting me into the cost of 'Don Juan,'" he said, "but I hope nothing comes of it. I've never done costume rôles and I don't think I would be successful in them."

I don't know where he gets this notion and I told him so. If worst comes to worst he can leave the mothe up to inscrutable late, which he feels is the final orbiter in human affairs.

As he explains it: "A seemingly unimportant event was responsible for my becoming an actor—the moving of William A. Brody and his family into a house across the street from where I lived in New York. It was expected that I would become a surgeon, since my father was one. Through the Brodys, however, I became interested in things theatrical, and after a taste of backstage life I was unable to show much more in proscia study. Had it not been for that chance association I doubtless would have been living in some small town to-day with a wife and six children, busily engaged in setting broken bones and removing spare parts from human bodies."

As it is, he has a wife, Mary Phillip, but no children. Miss Phillips is on a stage and screen. She and Humphrey have been married ten years.

We hear a great deal about the "tolerance" of various people, a word that has lost its meaning through misuse. Many who consider themselves nobly tolerant are merely indifferent or lacking in discrimination. Bogart doesn't profess wholesale tolerance. He is definitely intolerant of such things as war, ignorance, dishonesty, and irresponsibility. Moreover, he is none too tolerant of classical music when he is compelled to listen to it.

What the Fans Think

Young beautiful, or even attractive, is beyond us. She is undoubtedly the ugliest and least talented woman who has ever "graced" the screen. Her lips should be a joy to cosmetic salesmen since, judging by her photographs and pictures, she uses approximately a tube of lipstick per day; and as for her eyes, they are too hideous for description.

To that exotic German actress, Marlene Dietrich goes another genuine American Brux cher. Her penciled eyebrows, if they go much farther up her forehead, will be lost in her peroxide hair.

Personal to Fat Girls! — Now you can slim down your face and figure without strict dieting or back-breaking exercises. Just eat sensibly and take 1 Morphina Prescription Tablets a day until you have lost enough fat—then stop.

Morphina Prescription Tablets contain the same elements prescribed by most doctors in treating their fat patients. Millions of people are using them with success. Don't let others think you have no spine and that your will-power is as flabby as your flesh. Start with Morphina today and win the slender lovely figure rightfully yours.
How could such a poor excuse of an actress as Katharine Hepburn receive the Academy award? Instead of acting, she spends her time posing and emoting, widening her nostrils to unheard-of extents, applying excess amounts of lipstick to her shapeless mouth, and lapsing into temperamental fits in an effort to gain publicity which she could not otherwise receive.

And now for the biggest and best—or should we say worst—birdie of them all, which we send with our condolences to Robert Taylor. Undoubtedly the most conceited person in the movie colony, he is idolized by hundreds of adoring feminine fans who consider him most handsome, and are so absorbed in his so-called good looks that they overlook his poor performances. Even his photographs reflect his over-developed egotism. We have serious doubts as to whether he can buy a hat large enough to fit his head.

If any readers disagree with us in our opinions of these stellar Hollywood attractions, we would like them to let us know.

Think Before You Pan Stars.

How can people be so narrow-minded as to think a thing has no merit just because they themselves don’t like it? No intelligent person could object to another person’s saying he didn’t care for this star or that one—opinions differ—but to come right out and say an established star is lousy, patrid, and such adjectives, simply don’t make sense.

Olivia de Havilland and Bonita Granville study their lines together on the set of "Call It a Day," in which they appear as sisters.

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE—
Without a Calomel,—And you’ll Jump Out of Bed in the Morning Rarin’ to Go

The liver should pour out two pounds of liquid bile into your bowels daily. If this bile is not flowing freely, your food doesn’t digest, it just sits there in the bowels. You may catch it there yourself, get constipated. Your whole system is poisoned

Laxatives are only makeshifts.

A mere bowel movement doesn’t get at the cause. It takes those good, old Carter’s Little Liver Pills to get those two pounds of bile flowing freely and make you feel “up and up.” Harmless, gentle yet amazing in making bile flow freely. Ask for Carter’s Little Liver Pills by name. Stubbornly refuse anything else. S. C. A. C.

MASSACHUSETTS WRITERS INSTITUTE, GRANTON, MASS.

It stands to reason that the star wouldn’t be popular if she or he didn’t appeal to the great many people. There are few players I really dislike. Oh, there are many whose films I seldom bother to see, but I can see something good in all of them. I have studied drama for years, and observation of the movie people has been valuable to me.

One of the outstanding letters for its lack of thought is the one which devoted itself to panning Frances Langford. Miss Langford’s voice thrills a very, very large number of the movie-going public. Even people who, as rule, dislike popular singers, love to listen to her. Yet this fan wants the lovely lady to “keep her mouth closed” just because she doesn’t like to hear her sing. What about the other 98½ per cent who can’t get enough of Frances?

Then there is the letter which calls “Love Me Tonight” the greatest film ever made. Now, really! There is no denying that it was a charming picture, but to class it above the screen’s dramatic masterpieces?

I personally enjoy Jeanette MacDonald more than Grace Moore, but I am certainly not going to take my wrath out on the latter, who is a very fine artist indeed. The fact that she is introduced on the screen as “Miss Grace Moore” is definitely not due to any conceit on her part. She had nothing to do with it. It is customary for lady opera stars, and Gladys Swarthout was introduced in the same manner.

I quite agree that Douglass Montgomery is one young actor who deserves much more than he has been getting from the screen. He has contributed many very beautiful performances. Perhaps his work in England will help. I understand that he is now working on a picture with Constance Bennett, and that he has co-authored a play with a young English playwright.

And of the younger actresses, Evelyn Venable is my favorite. She is much more versatile than she has been given a chance to show, and I am most anxious to see her in some really fine roles. Miss Venable is the friendliest person imaginable to her fans, too. She received teems of praise for her beautiful per-real Americans. Presently the mechanic has taken the vows and is swept into a midnight raid on the home of the new foreman who, with his old father, is in the house burning. One atrocity leads to another, the worst when the unwilling member of the Black Legion kills his friend. No, there is not a happy ending. The entire gang is sentenced to life imprisonment, leaving us to ask if the legion is really crushed by extermination through and through. The picture is splendidly acted, directed, staged, and Humphrey Bogart is magnificent as the principal victim.

“Three Smart Girls.”—Universal.

Deanna Durbin is this year’s most important discovery so far. Hardly a stranger to radio audiences, she is a newcomer to the screen and in her first picture is a full-fledged star by virtue of a unique combination of personality and talent. She has the charm of a natural fifteen-year-old girl, which her sponsors wisely refrain from altering, while her singing is sweet and fresh, remarkable for her years and wonderfully promising. Her starring picture is pleasant entertainment carefully planned to make Miss Durbin the central character, but relieving her of too much responsibility; consequently we find such accomplished veterans as Charles Winninger, Alice Brady, Lucille Watson, and Mischa Auer supporting the star with adroit acting while Ray Milland, Bingie Barnes, Nan Gray, Barbara Read, and John King lend youthful talent to the amusing proceedings. The story has Miss Durbin coming from Switzerland to New York with her sisters to break up the affair of her father with an adventuress and restore him to their mother. You ought to see this.

"Men Are Not Gods,"—United Artists. Like the majority of British pictures this is intelligent but unsatisfying. It is very, very good up to the dividing line and then it is very, very bad. I don't know why except that our English cousins approach a story in a different way and tell it less directly than we do. This is brilliant comedy, unless it goes melodramatic, the two extremes refusing to meet on the common ground of sincerity and credibility. Miriam Hopkins is the secretary of a London drama critic who loses her job when she changes his criticism in favor of an actor playing Othello. She meets the great Othello, falls in love with him and gives him her "all." His wife appeals to Miss Hopkins to give him up and she consents. Then follows a scene in the theater which is a little too much for any one to take seriously. Miss Hopkins faints from emotion in the gallery and, through some strange procedure, is taken backstage to recover in the dressing room of Othello's wife. This is a picture I couldn't understand, perhaps because I lost its fine points while dozing. Anyway, Miss Hopkins is good and so, too, is A. E. Matthews—superlatively so—as the critic.

Directed by W. S. VAN DYKE

The Hit-Director of "After the Thin Man" and "San Francisco" and others
When Betty first laid eyes on Bill at Alice’s party she knew he was the one man for her. He was tall, ^me and five other boys in the room, but when she learned about him told her he was one man in a million.

When Betty found how simple the instructions were, the soul for the course, it was half of her burden and a start on a musical career. She didn’t tell a soul.

Later, glancing through a magazine, the read how a lonely girl became popular by learning to play through the U. S. School of Music. Soon Betty was invited to party after party. She always has friends—friends who are music lovers.

You Can Learn Music—Be the Life of the Party this easy way

ANYONE who can entertain is always in demand—and music is one of the most desirable methods of entertainment that anyone can offer. In the past only a fortunate few had the means and opportunity to learn music. But all that is changed now. Today anyone can learn to play his or her favorite instrument.

No longer need you envy others who are invited everywhere—always in demand, because of their ability to play. Right in your own home, without a teacher, at a fraction of the ordinary cost, you can quickly become an accomplished musician, and win new friends—good times—popularity!

Through the simplified U. S. School of Music method, learning to play is like a fascinating game. First you are told how to do a thing, then a picture shows you how, and then you do it yourself and hear it! No private teacher could explain it more clearly, and there’s no time wasted in theory. You learn real tunes from the start! In almost no time, after you’ve started your lessons, you will be playing your favorite pieces—classical music, popular songs, and dance numbers, by actual note.

No Talent Needed

With this simplified shortcut system you don’t need any special talent. Many of our 700,000 students never thought they had any special ability. They wanted to play—like you—and they found that they could learn to play easily and quickly this simple as A, B, C way.

Think what music can bring into your life. What fun it will be to entertain your friends—to be invited everywhere—always the center of attraction at every party.

You’ll find that music will open the door to a popularity you never dreamed could be yours.

KING EDWARD gave up the throne for an American girl. Why can't the picture companies give up foreign actresses and actors and give our own boys and girls a chance? We have so many who can act and speak English.

I am particularly referring to Simone Simon. For me, she has ruined every picture I have seen her in. I feel that we Americans can't appreciate Simone, Greta Garbo, Luise Rainer, and a few more. I wish Garbo would go home and take the rest of those foreigners with her. I think they would be appreciated more in their own country.

Why, oh why, let Robert Taylor play with Greta Garbo when we have so many beautiful actresses who can talk so you can understand them? I don't think there are any better actresses and actors than our own Norma Shearer, Robert Taylor, Irene Dunne, Clark Gable, William Powell, Carole Lombard. I could go on naming hundreds who have it all over these foreigners.

My opinion may not mean anything, but it is folks like me that keep our shows going, so I only ask that Hollywood give our own girls and boys a chance.

IN the February issue a young lady wrote how disappointed she was in the screen version of "Anthony Adverse." She then proceeds to throw the blame primarily on the acting of Fredric March.

I, too, was disappointed in the picture, and thought that the characterization of "Anthony," banning the African scenes when the slave trading was going on, was lifeless. But I do not think that the fault was due to Mr. March's acting. I don't think that any one could have done any differently.

It seemed to me that in the book "Anthony," except in his amorous adventures, was inclined to be rather a quiet person much given to introspection, and that most of the vivid colorfulness was supplied by people and events with which he come in contact and which were made so real by the marvelous descriptive powers of the author rather than by anything which "Anthony" did himself.

I don't believe that any one who saw Fredric March in "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," "Les Miserables," or "The Dark Angel" could call him colorless.

Mariella Chandler.—Ruby Keeler is under contract to Warners. The players listed on page 98 have contracts with the studios under which they appear. Greta Garbo has been announced for "They Gave Him a Gun," "Mother and Daughter," and "Madame X," all for Metro-Goldwyn. Gertrude Niesen is appearing in "Top of the Town." Ramon Novarro has made no definite plans to return to the screen. Eric Linden was born July 12, 1911.

Jackie Cooper Fan.—There have been several general stories which included Jackie, but no interview with him since October, 1931. I doubt if he will make any more pictures until he finishes college.

A Fan.—Their birthdays are Rosalind Russell, June 1, 1909; Gladys Swarthout, December 25, 1904; Barbara Stanwyck, July 16, 1907; Anne Shirley, April 17, 1918; Grace Moore, December 5, 1901; Maureen O'Sullivan, May 17, 1911; Madeleine Carroll, February 26, 1906; Irene Dunne, July 11, 1904; Nelson Eddy, June 29, 1901; Dolores Costello, September 17, 1906.

S. O. S.—The leading players in "A Connecticut Yankee" were Will Rogers, Myrna Loy, Maureen O'Sullivan, Frank Albertson, and William Farnum. Marion Davies has never married.

L. C. G.—Anita Louise was twenty-one on January 9th. Her real name is Anita Louise Fremont. She is still single. Perhaps if you write to the Chicago broadcasting station you mention they will be able to supply photos of the radio stars you have heard on their programs, or you might inquire of a radio magazine. We do not print pictures of radio stars unless they are screen personalities also.

S. P.—When sending for photographs of the stars it is customary to enclose twenty-five cents to cover the cost. You will find a list of addresses where to send for them on page 98.

When writing to The Oracle, please include your full name and address. If requesting casts, a list of fan clubs, the names of all of a star's films, a half-scrap of information about how to obtain stills, a stamped envelope should be inclosed. We regret that we cannot undertake to answer any contest questions.

Anne A. B.—Jane Withers has played in "Bright Eyes," "Ginger," "The Farmer Takes a Wife," "This Is the Life," "Paddy O'Day," "George Clinton," "Little Miss Nobody," "Pepper," "Can This Be Dixie?," "The Holy Terror." George Ernest was born on November 20, 1921. Jackie Cooper was born in Los Angeles, California. He was not quite six when he made his initial appearance on the screen in the "Fox Movietone Follies of 1929.

Shirley.—Nelson Eddy was born in Providence, Rhode Island, June 29, 1901; six feet, weighs 173, blue eyes, blond hair. Ginger Rogers, Independence, Missouri, June 16, 1911; five feet, weighs 115, reddish-blonde hair, blue eyes. Loretta Young, Salt Lake City, Utah, January 6, 1913; five feet three and a half, weighs 100, light-brown hair, blue eyes. R. M. P.—Their real names are: Clark Gable, William Galley; Robert Kent, Dick Tracy; Tony Martin, Al Morris. The other players you mention use their right names.

C. J. M. D.—James Stewart was born on May 20, about 1912; Melvyn Douglas, April 5, 1901. [Continued on page 97]
What the Fans Think

A Fredric March Stand-by.

BEING a devoted admirer of Fredric March, I cannot take lightly the remarks made against him by E. N. and A. G. in the February issue. The former is quoted as saying that Freddie is "a thoroughly colorless personality. He has a few studied gestures and a limited number of facial expressions—including a mirthless laugh. He never changes his style and should not have been chosen to play 'Anthony Adverse.'"

In my opinion, Mr. March is not only the best actor on the screen, but is, without a doubt, the finest actor the world has ever known. His deeply moving portrayal of Jean Valjean in "Les Miserables" completely overshadowed even Charles Laughton's magnificent Javert, and his blind Alon Trent in "The Dark Angel" was handled with beautiful restraint. As Fronske, in "Anna Karenina," he gave the great Garbo her first really hilarious competition, and his dashing, vigorous Boothwell saved "Mary of Scotland" from being the biggest flop of the year.

His dual role of the kindly Dr. Jekyll in direct contrast to the terrifying Mr. Hyde merited him the Academy award. And who but Fredric March was capable of playing the title role in "Death Takes a Holiday"?

Although I have not yet seen "Anthony Adverse," I can faithfully say he must be excellent as Anthony because experienced showmen like Warner Brothers are making a cool million into screening a best seller just to star a "typed" ham.

As for his so-called mirthless laugh, I like it. It's refreshingly different. As are his gestures and facial expressions. If every man of forty years can remain as handsome as Mr. March and play a young, exciting Cellini the way he did, they'd deserve a medal.

So much for E. N., and in conclusion, may I suggest to A. G. a view of the more the performance of Norma Shearer in "The Barretts of Wimpole Street" and discover for himself that it was she who ruined it and not Fredric March.

Not To Be Overlooked.

DO you suppose, Mr. and Mrs. Sophisticated Picture-goer, that you could forget what post-depression and endure one horse opera? This is a Western that's not really a Western featuring a cowboy who is a cowboy only by choice. The Western is "The Big Show," and the cowboy is Gene Autry.

The picture, with the Texas Centennial as a background, is tuneful, gay, and funny. The direction is excellent and the photography is splendid. And Gene, as ever, is simply dripping with charm. That kid could make a Texas hog sit up and beg. It's merely fate that he happens to be a cowboy. However, that does not lessen the charm of his witching smile, his hand-ome mug, and his platinum-lined vocal cords.

So sneak into the nearest Horse Opera House, see "The Big Show" and get a pleasant surprise. Leave the kids home, however. They like anything with a horse under it, and Gene deserves a more appreciative audience.

Each Star Has His Day.

THE letter by Henry Weis in the November issue was aptly dubbed "Don't Blame Us." Of course, the editors of Picture Play cannot be blamed for the numerous essays about Ramon Novarro, Joan Crawford, and Greta Garbo. The fact that there are so many letters dedicated to them is evidence that they are great stars. And when an actor arouses controversy in a column such as this, it means that he is progressing. I recall a minister's saying that a person who has not an enemy for each friend has no personality.

And if Novarro, Crawford, and Garbo
What the Fans Think

actor should be a tragedian as well as a comedian. And here is where Novarro enters. He is a paradox within himself—the most devout, yet the most fun-loving mortal I've met. And by the way, if William Powell is a simpering idiot, I could think of a whole line of such adjectives for Bob Montgomery.

When I sat down to write this, I did not do so with the idea of de-bunking any one. But how Clark Gable rates "tops" with many movie-goers is beyond me. All he has is a winning smile and a sparkling personality.

And so, Mr. Weiss, just remember that a star's popularity can be judged by the number and frequency of essays written by the public. Give credit where it is due, and don't yield to unfair criticism.

Shabby-looking Stars.

I HAVE to take up the cudgels in defense of Karen Holli's, who said Ann Harding's wardrobe in private life was a disgrace, and who received a verbal spanking in "What the Fans Think" in the January issue.

And I don't mean maybe, and I don't mean only Ann Harding. Last week I went to my first All Film-Star Show. It was a midnight performance for King George's Memorial Fund. I was never so happy in all my life as a movie fan! I saw about fifty stars, and I agree with all who say stars should not make personal appearances on the stage unless they were originally stage artists.

I agree with Miss Holli's regarding Miss Harding's dress. She wears that one black dress ad nauseam, and it was by way of a slight to a fashionable British audience for her to wear it again that night. To me she isn't at all a sweet and attractive personality, either. She seemed as hard as nails or "hard as Harding"—just as she is on the screen, bossing every one and telling them this and that.

Jean Webster Brough, being herself of the stage, may like her stars shabby and anyhow-looking. I don't. The only stars really troubling to make up for the stage-lighting that night were the Ben Lyons, Kay Francis, Laura La Plante, Zelma O'Neill, and June Knight.

Marlene Dietrich looked as if she'd tumbled out of bed, red-eyed, tongs-hairied, even red-nosed, and her once white dress looked crushed and dirty. Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., and Phillips Holmes talked to themselves rather than to the audience. Edward G. Robinson recited "Mandaly" exceedingly badly and simply oozed self-satisfaction. All the men stars are too fat and except Kay Francis and Dietrich, none of the women stars are as pretty as their pictures, though Bebe Daniels looked delightful in her mauve organdie.

Diane Kane, may I tell you that Marlene Dietrich is the one and only star who is really beautiful even without make-up and with a crushed dress and unlit hair? She has a really heavenly expression at times and walks beautifully and has lovely extremities as well as a tall graceful figure and beautiful face. She got the biggest hand of the show and the audience had her out again and again to take a bow. Here's one fan who won't forget the look of her and the sound of her and the head-bake of her as she said that self-chiding "Gar nichts" for a long while. Joan Drummond.

A Matter of Opinion.

ALTHOUGH the crudities of Norbert Lusk's style (his "I cannot see the unscrupulous Boothwell of history, or can I accept the current conventionalizing of Mary" fairly glares from the page) demonstrate that his opinions on any subject are hardly worth notice, I must protest vigorously against his dictum on Fredric March's performance in "Anthony Adverse."

Every one who has seen the film has gone to see Mr. March, and while his impersonation of Anthony cannot equal his achievement in "Doctor Jekyl and Mr. Hyde," or his superb performance in "Death Takes a Holiday," every one has come away praising Mr. March. The other characters are simply a procession. of faces and voices: Freddie is the picture. Where he falls below levels reached in other films it is because of the nature of the picture. "Anthony Adverse" is a spectacle rather than a drama; it gives an actor little scope for the exercise of his talents.

Mr. Lusk is as unfortunate in his selection of the objects of his praise as of his blame. Anita Louise is breathtakingly beautiful and delightfully youthful; some day she may be an actress, but she is not now. Claude Rains is excellent, but he does not surpass Fredric March, and the same is true of the other performers. Mr. Lusk, evidently, to quote Mr. Brumle, in English on a par with Mr. Lusk's son, is "a ass."

Candid Shots.

Dolores Costello Barry-More gives Virginia Bruce a good run for beauty. Dolores is gorgeous! Betty Furness, Phil Regan, Ann Lor-ing, June Lang, Margo, Margaret Callahan, and Robert Kent are sure bets for stardom within a year.

Thanks to Margaret Sullivan that "The Moon's Our Home" was the most delightful comedy-romance of the year. Margaret is a real down-to-earth human being, not another one of these painted dolls. I like Margaret best when she lets her almost straight hair toss and dangle.

Jane Withers had better watch her waistline. She's getting a bit too plump. Shirley Temple is a regular streamlined doll. She's a darling. And how she can dance!

Myrna Loy and Joan Crawford, two of my favorites, up and marry two of my favorite male personalities. Frances Tom and Arthur Hornblow, Jr. I sincerely wish these two charming couples oodles of happiness.

In closing, let me say that Picture Play is the swellest fan magazine on the news stand. One particular thing I like about it is the equal share it gives every star and starlet in Hollywood in photos and interviews. Nell Lutte.

Forced Popularity.

There is a vast difference between the press-agented popularity of screen players and the actual existence of that popularity. That's why I enjoy Picture Play's big, interesting letter department. It reflects the uncensored opinions of the lowly privates in the army of movie-goers.

If a nation-wide poll of these fans, exclusive of all others, were conducted, I imagine we should find:

That two of the most greatly overrated actresses of all times would undoubtedly be Greta Garbo and Marlene Dietrich.

That Katharine Hepburn and Margaret Sullivan were only flashes in the pan.

That Clark Gable falls far short of being the great feminine idol, or any idol, for that matter.

That Fredric March hasn't measured up to the heroic roles he has been given, particularly "Anthony Adverse."

That many people wonder how Barbara Stanwyck, Anita Louise, Patrice Garbo's Depth and Beauty.

So C. R. Read wants to know what we Garbo fans see to admire in our favorite. Well, C. R., I will try to tell you.

We admire her courage in living her own life in her own way, even at the risk of hazarding her popularity. We admire her for confining her acting to the screen, instead of displaying it for the benefit of inquisitive columnists, habitudes of the night spots, etc.

We admire her conscientious attitude toward her work. Her insistence upon giving it all her concentration, so that we are never short-changed when viewing a Garbo performance. She was a glamorous, effective actress at the start of her career. She is now and much more than these, that even we, her staunch admirers, are surprised. Surprised at her depth and beauty of interpretation. Garbo's acting has become sheer artistry — each word, intonation, glance, movement significant and true — and instilled with a rare magic. We sense greatness in all she does.

Finally, we admire Garbo for the same reason we admire the poetry of Keats and Shelley. For inspiration and beauty. Or don't you like poetry. C. R.? "Chico."

Knocks the Fans.

EVEN after reading Richard Griffith's article on whether the average movie fan thinks or not, I am not entirely convinced that they do. It seems to me that quite a few of the writers in this forum do not, or worse yet, cannot.

For instance, one young lady in Canada intimates that Margaret Sullivan has not the pleasant, good-natured expression of Warren William. What a comparison! I agree with you, Miss Allen. I cannot see the faintest resemblance between them.

Miss Sullivan is that rare combination of beauty and brains that is not too rare on the screen to-day. Hepburn is a marvelous actress, but she has not the appealing, heart-warming beauty that is Margaret's; Norma Shearer is beautiful, yes, and is certainly a first-rate actress, but her beauty does not touch the heart, as the Sullivan girl's does. Possibly because she is not as youthful.

Jean Harlow is pretty in a young Mae West fashion, but also like Miss West, she is far from being an actress. Carol Lombard, Joan Bennett, Anita Louise, and Joan Crawford fall under the same heading, pretty in a papier-mâché way, but never, never are they actresses in the real sense of the word. When Miss Bennett plays a part, one is always conscious that she is doing just that, for below the surface she is the brittle, pseudo-sophisticated Joan.

However, getting back to the controversy as to whether the fans think or not, let's take the other side of the question. Do the fan writers think? Or can they? Of Karen Hollis I'm sure. She most certainly cannot. Her little postscript, mentioning the writer of this epistle a few months back, proves my statement. I'm not sure of what "They Say in New York," but I have a pretty good idea.

What the Fans Think

I HAVE not long gone to the cinema nor read motion-picture publications. I had contempt for the former and was in ignorance of the latter. Then, wholly by accident, I witnessed a performance by a beautiful young woman and a superb actress. Since then I have attended the theater many, many times, and have read a great number of fan magazines.

By the latter I have been amazed. Almost without exception they have attacked with unbelievable ferocity this great actress who, as a girl of nineteen, came from Sweden to America to make pictures—to a strange land and strange people of whose language she knew nothing. And how was this young girl received? As Dietrich was? Harvey? Steen? Rainer? Simon? Ah, no!

Katharine Albert, her arch enemy, it seems, writes time and time again how the members of the publicity department, of which she was one, laughed themselves sick at the shy but friendly girl. Even after "The Torrent" and "The Temptress," the women at the studio still made a laughingstock of this girl.

Do you wonder that she withdrew into herself? What would Joan Crawford who weeps at the slightest criticism, have done had she been set down in a strange land where people who spoke a strange tongue openly derided her? One can imagine!

This derision has gone on and on. Any other actress may do as she chooses about her clothes, her private life, her temperament, and we are hastily assured that she, and sometimes he, is not "doing a Garbo." Oh, no! It is merely their nature. But Garbo? Such a row went up when she didn't give interviews and such howls of glees when she did grant a few short ones! "She's slipping! She's slipping! Garbo is on the skids!" they cried in malicious accord.

In the October issue Elsie J. Kimball asks, as she says, a simple question. She wants to know if anybody in the world likes Garbo. She states that she moves in business, social and university circles, and never once has she heard the name of Garbo mentioned but that every one did not burst into giggles. I should have answered her direct, but she gave no local address. I am going to ask that you print this letter where it will likely meet her eye. Then, if she will write to me, I shall give her many instances of persons who do not giggle when Garbo's name is mentioned, I suppose Elsie Kimball knows who Max Reinhardt is. He says Garbo is the most intelligent woman in Hollywood and most nearly approaches genius of any screen actress. Laughton declares that, given time, she will be another Duse. Rathbone says she is the greatest of them all. Jim Tully says she runs neck and neck with Bergner. Noel Coward says she ranks second. John Barrymore says she is a second Ellen Terry. Clark Gable, Chevalier, et cetera, declare her to be one of the most fascinating women in the world. She is the favorite of Eva Le Gallicienne, Katherine Cornell, et cetera, and of thousands of others.

Stars Should Aid Fan Clubs.

THERE has been much talk lately about fan clubs, and I'd like to give my opinion of them, as I am a member of a good many, and at one time had two clubs of my own.

Many fans don't know just what a fan club is. The purpose of such an organization is to gather all the stars'...
CENSORSHIP of pictures is sometimes amusing, often puzzling and frequently intolerable. Occasionally it is wise. Always it is interesting to the picture-goer to contemplate examples of censorship that disturb those who write stories for the screen and those who produce them.

The demon rum is the latest monster to rear its ugly head in the problems that absorb Hollywood. It seems there is too much drinking in pictures nowadays to suit certain women's clubs and temperance groups. Their protests have been so frequent and so vehement that Will H. Hays has issued an ultimatum. Highballs and cocktails are permissible on the screen only when they are needed to further a story and possibly to create necessary atmosphere. Used indiscriminately, or to give the characters something to do, they are "out."

Censors of pictures are notoriously without a sense of humor, so it is hardly surprising to find them protesting scenes of drinking on moral grounds and overlooking the fact that much of the excessive drinking on the screen is opposed to realism and frequently is a humorous distortion of it.

For example, we all have seen the debonair detective and his girl friend go through an entire picture with highball glasses hardly ever out of their hands, meanwhile quipping brightly, retaining their equilibrium, keeping up their appearance and, last but not least, discovering the thief or murderer with unfailing intelligence. In short, never a false move, never a glassy eye, never a snore. Now, such poised infallibility never could accompany alcoholic potations in quantity. A succession of drinks at modernistic bars may prove the smartness of the characters, but the practice is incompatible with mental efficiency, as every experienced adult knows the morning after. It is the inexperienced young who do not know. It is they who are misled and perhaps tempted to be as "smart" as their favorite stars on the screen. In short, I think it a good thing for Hollywood to be cautioned against the deceptive use of alcohol in pictures.

The power of the medium lies largely in its honesty. The gangster and the lady of easy virtue have been shorn of their allure to a large extent, so why should excessive consumption of highballs and cocktails continue to masquerade as the harmless, casual accompaniment of civilized behavior?

At this writing the annual awards of the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences have not been made. Nominations are generally known, however, and it is with amazement that admirers of Garbo learn that her sublime performance in "Camille" stands no chance of recognition by this body. She is not included among the possible winners of the metal statuette coveted by screen actors. She never has been. Not for "Anna Christie"—Marie Dressler having won the award for that film; not for "Romance," "Queen Christina," "Anna Karenina" did Garbo qualify. The press cheers her, world celebrities acclaim her acting, her long career is now in its eleventh year, with twenty-one films her unusual record of achievement, yet she never has been singled out by any of the numerous critical groups for public honor. The Academy has never even considered her for one of its benefactions.

One naturally asks what must an artist possess to pass muster with the instructors and judges in this seat of learning? What does it teach that Garbo cannot master? Why are her marks repeatedly negative, below par?
SHE must find consolation, if that is what she desires, in a gold medal recently given her by the king of her native Sweden, not for specific achievement in the cinema, unfortunately, but for her contribution to "art." This lone honor is all that Garbo has won in eleven years! Of course, there is hope that the Academy may recognize her—in time. Perhaps next year. Actually, this year's bestowals are based on pictures released in 1936. "Camille" is not included among eligible films because its release date was January 1, 1937. It may be that Garbo misses her chance for consideration by twenty-four hours! It may be that "Camille" will be too long dead for resurrection when the awards of March, 1938, are made. Perhaps it will be damned and outlawed as "an old-fashioned picture" by then.

As matters stand, the scales of justice are askew when the finest actress in the world—the phrase is not mine—is deprived of the recognition that is accorded her superiors. Of course, her temperament may stand in the way of public acknowledgment of her preëminence by the Academy. It is inconceivable that she be photographed at the jollification banquet rapturously contemplating the statuette. Better far to remain at home and cherish the King of Sweden's medal than step out of character as a divinity of myth and legend.

PICTURE PLAY lifts its hat to Deanna Durbin as the most important of recent discoveries. No, we are not forgetting Tyrone Power, Sonja Henie, John Trent and the most accomplished artist of them all, Francine Larinnore. But the little Durbin is different, is in a class by herself, and is known to a larger audience because of her radio activities than any of the others. Her youth, too, makes her more of a phenomenon for she is only fourteen and a full-fledged star, the only one of that age in pictures.

We shall honor her next month by offering her likeness on our cover, the first time we have so recognized a star on the strength of a single film, and she will be the subject of a story, too, the intimate, revealing narrative of her life, telling you exactly what she is like to-day. She's shy, a trifle awkward at times and is interested only in what a girl of her age should be interested in. Her two favorite expressions are "Bunk!" and "Swell!" Everything tells us that she is a normal fourteen-year-old in every respect but one—her vocal cords. They are mature beyond her years and she must grow up to them. You will like our cover of Deanna Durbin and you will like the story about her.

THE lure of motion pictures as entertainment for children makes us doubly aware of the limitless power of the screen to educate and inform, to mold character and conduct. Consider this: A questionnaire circulated among 10,000 boys and girls in New York between the ages of ten and sixteen revealed that twelve boys and girls are passing three hours a week seeing pictures while only one is at home getting the same things from books.

Forty-seven per cent said they attended twice a week, and forty-nine per cent said they attended once a week. Two per cent said they went every day, and less than two per cent said they seldom went at all. The questionnaire was circulated in the most congested districts of the city, where children of foreign birth or parentage predominate.

Pictures as they are to-day cannot harm any one of these ten thousand juveniles. There is no need even to consider that. But I doubt if any of us realize—and this means the actors, especially—the power of the screen to teach correct speech to foreigners. Many of the children embraced in this survey do not hear English at all except at public school. The language of their parents is spoken at home. Only when seeing movies have they a chance to hear careful English, with the correct intonation, accent and pronunciation.

The responsibility vested in the screen to set a good example to these citizens of to-morrow is great and wonderful. When the language is heard from the lips of favorite stars it is immeasurably more eloquent than when heard in a classroom. The imitiveness of children is well known. Often it is unconscious. Consider, then, you idols of youth, what a privilege is yours to inspire and teach perfect speech with none of the drudgery that usually accompanies instruction, but only by setting a shining example! You are equipping every one of these ten thousand children with a lever to raise himself out of his environment, if he cares to use it.

IN HIS FATHER'S FOOTSTEPS

FOR THE FIRST TIME YOU FIND HERE THE STORY OF TYRONE POWER, AND YOU WILL LIKE HIM ALL THE MORE FOR BEING TENDER, GENEROUS AND UNASSUMING.

THE setting was perfect. When I entered the great Starlight Roof of the Waldorf-Astoria, hundreds of blinking candles and lights greeted me. Overhead, thousands of little gleaming stars, set against a deep cobalt background, seemed to wink a salutation.

New York was out to out-Hollywood itself and every one of its special resources had been called forth to welcome a son come home in victory.

A young man whom the gods are pleased to bless after a long, hard fight. Tyrone Power, the new romantic star whose role of "Jonathan Blake" in "Lloyds of London" brought him into the front rank of leading young men of the screen. It wasn't difficult to find Tyrone even in this large gathering. In a far corner, where the new photographers were taking one picture after another and lovely ladies were standing in beautiful attention, I knew he must be.

I approached wondering if in this scene of adulation and hand-shaking it would be possible to see him far more than a second.

He is tall; six feet as a matter of fact. His soft, luminous brown eyes

Tyrone Power is tall—six feet—and his soft, luminous brown eyes are kind and smiling. His hair is dark brown, too, and his smile is warm and captivating, says the writer of this story. At twenty-three he has five years of hardship and experience behind him.

Below, as he appears in "Café Metropole," his next film.
are kind and smiling. His hair is a dark brown, almost black at times, and his smile, one of his greatest charms, is warm and captivating.

We were introduced and he was at once cordial and interested. His rare faculty of sincerity being interested in others makes conversation with him pleasant and easy. His eagerness to please is disarming, a gallant quality.

With all this ease of manner and graciousness, he seemed detached, a bit preoccupied. I thought then that the strain of meeting so many people and long hours of handshaking—the party lasted four hours—was telling on him.

Suddenly he interrupted our conversation in his quick, direct way.

"Won't you," he said, "come to see me to-morrow morning? I have a story to tell you. This day is something more than just coming back to New York a celebrity."

The next morning in his suite at the hotel his greeting was as fresh and vigorous as though the hectic afternoon and evening of the day before had never happened.

I questioned his ability to look so fresh early in the morning.

"Oh," he said, "Miss Henie and I had an hour's horseback riding this morning! I feel much better than last night."

His mood of the night before was returning. Rather sad, I thought, and I knew if I didn't interrupt that he would tell me why. We were both silent for a moment. Then he spoke in a swift, sure and almost trembling voice.

"I'll tell you the story right straight through, if you'd like to hear it." He turned away from me to look out the window, his face marked in pained remembrance as he started to unfold his story.

"Five years ago last night my father died in Hollywood. He was the one person missing at the reception yesterday. The one person I wanted to be with me when success came. We were always close to each other. After I left school I trouped with him. Wherever he played, so did I. Sometimes it was New York, sometimes Cincinnati, sometimes Chicago or any of the stock theatrical towns. Then father was offered a season of Shakespearean repertories in Chicago.

"After we played together in 'The Merchant of Venice,' Paramount brought him to Hollywood for the spoken production of 'The Miracle Man.' As always, I went with him. A small part had been promised me and my father, anxious to see me make my way, saw a great future for me.

"Work on 'The Miracle Man' had been under way a week when late one night—it was after twelve—the studio called to say father was ill and wanted me to help him home. When I reached the studio they informed me that father had collapsed on the set but, trouper that he was, worked through until after midnight without complaining.

"No one suspected he was ill, least of all me. The doctor told me there wasn't any hope. On December 30th he died in my arms. His last wish was that I work hard and follow in his footsteps and be a success. It would have made yesterday mean so much more to me had he lived. He must know," he ended, almost as a prayer.

This, then, was the tragedy. I, of course, knew that his father was one of the great actors of his day.

I sought to break the tension of his sad memory by asking why, with such a background of training and tradition, he had had such a struggle.

"But that was five years ago," I said, "and I can't remember you in 'The Miracle Man' or any other picture until this year."

That brought a smile to his face.

"Would you," he asked, "like to hear what happened in those five years?"

I did. I wanted to know why he didn't get on in Hollywood, what he had been doing in the obscure years since his father's death.

"When father died," he began, "mother and my sister came on from Ohio to be with me. The small part I was to play in 'The Miracle Man' did not materialize. I began to look for other work. I did the usual thing of making the rounds of the casting offices and the agents. All turned me down. No one would give me a chance. If I was given an appointment, it was because some old-timer wished to reminisce about my father." He smiled and laughed lightly at the memory of it.

"You see," he went on, "it was then I realized I was up against what was to be the biggest obstacle in my career—my father's name.

THE birth of an heir is celebrated by "Henry VIII," right, played by Montagu Love, in "The Prince and the Pauper." Beneath him is Errol Flynn, a swashbuckling soldier of fortune who befriends the prince and assists him in regaining the throne. Bottom, the prince looks in awe at Claude Rains, the shrewd "Earl of Hertford."
THE ORIGIN OF STAR NAMES

BY BORIS RANDOLPH

EDNA MAY OLIVER means the peaceful pleasure of a beloved daughter of the gods, under an olive tree. Edna is from the Hebrew for pleasure. May is either from the month of that name, or it is a contraction of Mary which in turn is from a Greek form of the Hebrew Miriam. If derived from the month, May is from the Latin Maja who was the daughter of Atlas and the mather of Mercury. If from Mary, then it goes as far back as the Egyptian “mer Amon,” meaning the beloved of Amon. Oliver is from the French for olive tree, a branch of which has always been symbolic of peace.

BERT WHEELER means a bright wagonmaker. Bert is short for Bertram which in old high German stood for bright raven. In the abbreviation however, the syllable which stood for raven has been dropped, leaving only the meaning of bright. Wheeler is originally from the Anglo-Saxon and in comparatively recent times meant a wheelwright.

FRANK McHUGH means a free son of the mind. A Frank was originally one of a Germanic tribe who in time founded the Frankish Empire at the Middle Ages out of which modern France, Germany, and Italy have sprung. France alone, however, retains the old name for its nation and there the word is traced to “franc,” originally meaning free. Freedom, however, is frequently measured by strength, and it is therefore not surprising to find that in Anglo-Saxon the word “franca” meant a javelin. McHugh is from Gaelic “Mac” meaning the son of, and old high German “hug,” meaning the mind. Hugh and Hugo have identical origins in this respect.

WINIFRED SHAW means a great display of tailing and striving for peace. Winifred is from two Anglo-Saxon words, the first meaning to tail and strive, and the second associated with old high German and standing for the idea of peace. Shaw is from the Scotch “schaw” and is akin to our word “shaw” with the meaning of a grand display or demonstration.

JEAN ARTHUR is indicative of a high tribute of the Lord. Jean is feminine for John and conveys the idea of a tribute from the Lord, or gift of God. Arthur is a Welsh name which comes from the Celtic meaning high.

ALICE BRADY gives us a paradox inasmuch as it means both truthful and misleading. Alice is Greek for truth and it is interesting to note Lewis Carroll’s choice of this name for the little girl he sent through Wonderland; for Carroll was a great mathematician and in his famous book.

SIMONE SIMON may be said to mean the flat-nosed listener. The first name is a feminization of the second. Simon has two possible origins. Spelled as it is and derived from the Greek it literally means flat-nosed. But in this form it is also a frequent variation of the name Simeon, which comes from the Hebrew “Shimon,” meaning hearing, or one who hears or listens.

FREDDIE BARTHOLOMEW is suggestive of the mission of Christ on earth. It means the rich peace brought by the son of the spirit. Freddie is of course short for Frederick, which comes from old high German and means a rich or powerful peace. Bartholomew comes to us through the Greek from the Aramaic where it meant the son of Talmay, Talmay being a Hebrew name and meaning spirit.

CHARLES BOYER conveys the idea of a strong archer or a manly maker of bows. Charles is from the German “Karl,” meaning strong or manly. Boyer is from old English bowyer, one who makes or sells bows and by association it also used to designate an archer.

HEATHER ANGEL implies a messenger of the wasteland flowers. The heather is a flowering shrub which gets its name from a Middle English ward meaning of the wasteland, with the idea of flowers understood. Angel is from the Greek “anggelos,” which originally meant simply messenger, but which has now exclusively acquired the meaning of a messenger of God.

Bette Davis's contract provides for $3,000 weekly in 1942.

Bing Crosby is holding out for a mere $16,000 a week.

Carole Lombard has raised her wages to $150,000 a film.

Robert Taylor's salary was $35 a week for "Society Doctor."

Who Fixes Star Salaries?

By Helen Pade

Read this and wonder at the terrific disparity between the pay of some luminaries and others.

Of all Hollywood's lunacies, the most insane and unfathomable is its star salary list.

Nowhere is the fact better known nor more freely admitted than in Hollywood, and at last something is being done about it. The movement to rationalize salaries has developed from a passive resistance to an unheralded but active campaign.

It is easy for stars to shaw by expense accounts, taxation wars, and the "short earning time" argument that they are not overpaid; even to make us weep in pity for their lot. It is equally easy for studios to prove that stars are not cruelly exploited slaves.

What no one explains is the terrific disparity between the pay of some stars and others.

Let us take as examples Irene Dunne and Bette Davis, because whatever their respective fans think, these two rank as nearly as possible equal in value to the screen.

Irene drew $8,500 a week for the first ten weeks of "Magnificent Obsession," and $10,000 a week thereafter. For filming "Dangerous," Bette got a straight $1,600 a week—and the Academy award for the best per-
Who Fixes Star Salaries?

That the salary-rationalizing campaign in most of its many phases is being kept as quiet as possible, is apparent in such incidents as the announcement that Irene Dunne refused the tap rôle in "Volunt Is the Word for Carrie." Naturally, no actress of Miss Dunne's versatility, no artist who could portray so ably the mistress in "Back Street," would shy at "Carrie." What actually happened was that it was decided the "Carrie" rôle could be portrayed as effectively by Gladys George, a stoge star whose salary was $400 a week.

Every time a Gladys George makes good, it helps the cause of the producers. Their new procedure in such cases is to make a prompt adjustment of the salary, elevat-prospects, Wayne Morris and Gordon Oliver, are being groomed on the same pay roll.

A similar process is going on at all the film lats. Universal recently had on contract as "prospects" forty-three young players, thirty-five of whom had had no previous film experience. Their salaries averaged $100 weekly, and expensive dramatic coaching was lavished on them. Yet they were not directly as valuable to the studio as bit players who could have been hired for smaller amounts, to do the parts given the newcomers for experience.
Where the producer expects to reap his reward—and there is little doubt he will—is in discovering among them the Bing Crasbys and Claudette Colberts at a year or so hence, at salaries which will never mount to lantastic heights.

The replacement of higher-salaried oldsters by newcomers is not always fair, or indicative of anything but unlucky breaks or bad handling of the victims, who often start anew at other studios and win fresh laurels.
Elisso Landi is a fine example. Unfortunate in her stellar career, she made an intelligent arrangement to take less salary and play second leads for MGM.

So we need not feel too sorry for those who are momentarily displaced in the adjustment process; they will find their proper niches. Nor need we worry because our new favorites will have to struggle along on salaries of from $2,000 to $3,000 a week.

Part of it goes to the income-tax collector, but not such a proportion of ing it at once and without argument to a reasonable figure. They do not, however, mortgage their future profits via contracts calling for fantastic raises year after year.

The reform policy is apparent in all salary deals with newer favorites.
Nelson Eddy has just been raised to $2,000 a week. Approximately in the same pay roll bracket with Eddy and Taylor are Errol Flynn, Fred Mac-Murray, and quite a few new romantic heroes. Anne Shirley's new contract begins at $500 weekly, raising to $2,000 during a six-year period. That should partially console Anne's employers for the $250,000 a picture they pay the Ginger Rogers-Fred Astaire team.

The basic weapon in the producers' campaign, therefore, is the discovery and development of talented newcomers. Deanna Durbin was paid $150 a week to star in "Three Smart Girls." Olivia de Havilland, Luise Rainer, Madeleine Carroll, and Frances Farmer are immediate threats to the dramatic actresses. Tyrone Power, Craig Reynolds, Dan Ameche, Andrea Leeds, Patric Knowles, and others, still in a sub-star salary bracket, already are definitely displacing older players whose popularity has failed to keep pace with the upward salary tilts provided for in their contracts.

At Warners, for example, as this is written our spies report that Donald Woods, Jean Muir, and Ann Dvorak are about to be released. While not high-salaried stars, neither Miss Dvorak at her $1,500 a week, nor Miss Muir at almost the same figure, has the box-office pull of Miss de Havilland, the newcomer. Craig Reynolds, at a few hundred a week, leads the $1,750-a-week Woods in fan following, while at least two other fine masculine
"THE HIT PARADE" stars Frances Langford and Phil Regan with a galaxy of radio and night-club stars, several orchestras, and a number of new songs. Mr. Regan is a radio publicity man who persuades an unknown, Miss Langford, to substitute for the temperamental singing star, Louise Henry. Of course, she is a hit but strikes a snag when her "past" as an inmate of a reform school crops up. Everything is smoothed out.
Lola Lane, Mayo Methot, Bette Davis, Isabel Jewell, and Rosalind Marquis are hard-boiled hostesses at a tough night spot in "Marked Woman."

HIGHLIGHTS

BY EDWIN AND ELZA SCHALLERT

THE loneliest bride in the history of Hollywood was Mary Astor, following her elopement with Manuel del Campo. How would you figure it otherwise?

A midnight trip to Yuma, an hour’s ride by auto to Mexicali, then farewell to the man she married, and a solitary trip back to Hollywood, where a throng of reporters and photographers awaited her. Then, too, the return of the bridegroom—so indefinite.

What inspired that sudden wedding? Impulse, with a capital "I." Mary determined almost during the course of her flight that she loved Manuel.

Surely there ought to be happiness somewhere for this child of misfortune. Far it was misfortune, certainly, that beset her when her first husband was killed in an accident at sea, and surely all the publicity concerning her difficulties with her second husband. Doctor Franklyn Thorpe cannot be counted on the joyous side. Then her curious struggle for concealment of her marriage to Del Campo—so futile. Brought about, we understand, by his father’s recent death—that and the fact that Manuel’s family are Catholics, and a marriage outside the church was disturbing to them. It’s quite a litany when you take full account of it.

Merle’s Real Romance.—Merle Oberon and Brion Aherne? What do you think of that for a marital alliance? Looks bright, we’d say, and pretty much one of those glamorous matches. We know there's a romance. It began on the set of "Beloved Enemy." What correspondence was there between these two, and what romantic exchanges across the sea while Marle was in England and Brian in New York? So at least the little birds tell us.
Hollywood High Lights

The David Niven "engagement" is off, naturally. It was more or less a publicity stunt, as we advised you months ago.

More Romantic Gleamings.—Do you want an interesting forecast? If Errol Flynn and Lili Damita finally divorce, as we surmise they will, we'll venture a prophecy. The new Mrs. Flynn will be Olivia de Havilland! Also why shouldn't we guess twice. Within the year Beverly Roberts will be married to the director, William Keighley. And that will mean two romances that developed right on the Warn lot.

Barrymore Rift Past Mending.—Stand by for a John Barrymore announcement! No matter how many rumors of reconciliation you hear, that marriage is not going on for any definite period. And as soon as the final word is said, we prophesy that John the Magnificent will return zealously to the screen. And that's no disparagement of a very charming woman, Elaine Barrymore. It simply wasn't in the cards for their match to be a success.

Wife and Mother First.—Two stork visits at the home of Evelyn Venable ought to be convincing testimony that she takes her obligations as a wife and mother more than seriously, and rates them much more important than her career.

Evelyn plays in pictures, but she isn't urging the fulfillment of her career. What's more, her husband is properly benedictioned, because he now directs in addition to assuming charge of the camera work on pictures. Some day, too, Evelyn, who is a girl of rare ambition and real talent, will also realize her dreams.

Arlene Much Triangled.—Old loves are not so easily thrust away. That was proved in the pitched battle between Dan Topping and Pat di Cicco over Arlene Judge in a night club in Hollywood. There was a brief strange interlude in Arline's life, after her break-up with Wesley Ruggles, the director, when she and Di Cicco were devoted.
That was the lurking reason for his encounter with Topping, who will be the husband of Arline in perhaps a week or two.

Dietrich Paid More than Garbo.—Progressive revelations of star's incomes are interesting. The government is telling tales out of school, much to the consternation of movie luminaries. Of course, it all dates back to 1935, but it was something to note that during that year Greta Garbo was rewarded with some $330,000; Wallace Beery more than $275,000; Joan Crawford, $240,000 plus; William Powell nearly that amount, and Clark Gable $210,000.
Garbo is still paid huge rewards, as you note. That was the year in which she made "The Painted Veil" and "Anna Karenina." Gloria Swanson received $53,000 during the same annum, the one she was under contract to MGM, but made nary a picture for that company.

And by the way Marlene Dietrich topped Greta during 1935 with $368,000.

Eddie Spring Dancer.—The most important thing divulged by the Screen Actors' Guild ball, which slipped a little as a bright colony function, is that Edward G. Robinson can be as gay as anybody, despite all his collecting of art works.

You know, of course, that he has gathered together the most amazing assortment of fine paintings ever accumulated by an actor in Hollywood. But at the Guild ball Eddie was the individual who out-stayed everybody, and then to close the evening did a spring dance in the esplanade leading from the ballroom to the broad open spaces. His coriige furnished the attendant harmony. So there is both a serious and a lighter side to this actor.

ALL THE WORLD LOVES A

BY HERBERT CRUIKSHANK

THIS MOST COLORFUL DESCRIPTION OF ERROL FLYNN'S BACKGROUND INCLUDES A CLOSE-UP OF HIS CHARACTER THAT IS NEW AND AUTHENTIC.

THERE are two types of Irish. And you'll find them the world over. One is the begorrah-bejabbbers variety. The other is Errol Flynn. One is the peasant. The other is the prince.

And the family of Flynn thronged Tara's palaces when the others were trotting the bags with blue paint on their bodies and divvил garment to cover their nakedness save maybe a bit of a goatskin or the like of that.

It's a long way, maybe, to Tipperary. But farther still is it from that Holywood which nestles on the Belfast Lough to the Hollywood slumbering in the Southern sunshine of California. Flynn has covered the trail following devious paths. He knows the stink of copra rotting near a tropic sea. He knows the perfume of the pearl fisheries and the miasmic menace of jungle paths where death flutters ceaselessly as a humming-bird's wings.

But he knows, too, the bistros and boulevards of Paris. The bodega of "The Merry Widow" in Belfast. Piccadilly and the Strand. The bar at Usher's Hotel in New South Wales, where the buxom barmaid, Yolande, will whisper of new gold in Morobe while she serves a gin and tonic. He knows New York's "21" club. Hollywood's Trocadero. That joint in New Guinea where

The upper picture shows Errol Flynn as "Miles Hendon," in "The Prince and the Pauper," in which he good-naturedly side-steps stardom so that the twins, Bobby and Billy Mauch, may have the spotlight.

He is a man's man—the kind women adore. Fight or frolic—he enjoys either. He hates swank and stuffiness and well nigh strangles in the close-ness of a formal drawing-room. His tweeds don't fit him very well. He's not too perfectly dressed. He will be twenty-eight on June twentieth.
white men gather—if they escape the Gal- aribari warriors' poisoned arrows.

Clean and fresh in memory are the bitter odor of bilge in the scuppers of a sea-going tub, and the biting tang of a brine-soaked breeze tussing spray to the sky. He remembers dawn on high hills in far places, and nights filled with tragic mystery when a man felt near to God and could reach a handful of stars from a class-domed sky. In a ward, Errol Flynn has been around. He's gone places and seen things.

He's seen, for instance, his own blood run red and hot from a leg raked to the bone by the piousous fangs of Sepik River crocodile. He's seen the inside of the taboo Lati-Lati house surrounded by the scowling tribesmen of remote Dampier Island. He's seen a bhang-crazed native run murderously amuck. And he's seen him drop dead in his tracks while he, Flynn, stood with a smoking Luger in his hand. He's seen a head-hunting savage look enviously at him as a potential trophy. He's seen the whistling spear of a cannibal came carrying death to him. He's lived through jungle gorgone from festering wounds. He's killed a Koku poult with the mightier magic of a Colt automatic. All in all, quite an interesting guy. A bit unusual to us armchair adventurers who get our thrills safely from motion-picture screens.

Once he woke up in an Austrian port, with an awful head, to come to the dim, disturbing consciousness that five grand in quick gold had vanished and in its place he was the owner of a boat. But without a vain regret or an idle tear, indeed with nothing but an eye-opener, he set sail for new adventures in greener pastures, over three thousand miles of open Pacific waters. It may have been a hangover, too, that brought him from a pastorling expedition in Tahiti to the English stage and the American movies.

You see, in Papeete the bays make holiday each month when the boat comes in from home with the mail. On bicycles—what ho, romancer!—they troop in from the other side of the island, and gather at the bar for conversation and companionship. The conversation creates a thirst. The companionship quenches it. Then they're back where they started. So—set 'em up again, will you, boy? And, Gawd, how I wish I were back in (a) The States, (b) Blighty, (c) Australia, (d) Dear, dirty Dublin, (e) well, name your own old, home town! You know how it is. There was a film company on location. When Flynn woke up he was on his way to stardom.

A laugh guy, this hombre. Tough in a steelike way. Nothing at the swaggerer about him. Life didn't cast him in the mold that Victor McLaglen portrays in pictures. He's more the Guardsman sort, if you know what I mean. The sort who led the Irish regiments in the War—all wars. He might say: "My word, boys, it's the zero hour! Well, over we go, came along!" And swing off into the mouth of hell with a cigarette between his lips, a gun dangling from a cord, and a swagger stick in his hand. He's a coal proposition. He has blue-gray eyes. You'll find 'em in...
RECENTLY saw Sonja Henie in 'One in a Million,' and while I sat in the theater watching her, it was hard for me to believe that this enchanting creature was the little daughter of 'Papa' Henie whom I knew back home in Oslo, Norway.

The speaker was Knut Vang, a hearty Scandinavian photographer who now makes his home in the United States and who has known the Henies. Papa, Mamma, Brother Lief, and Sonja since 1919, when the famous skating queen was only six years old.

"I first met the Henies at the Christiana Skating Klub in Oslo. Almost all of Oslo knew each other and came to the club to skate. And when I think of all the people who went there regularly and who have since become great—Kirsten Flagstad, Bernt Balchen, Roald Amundsen, Malla Bjurstedt Mallory, and Sonja Henie, I blush with shame when I think that I cannot count myself among them; but I am proud that I am a countryman.

"The Nordics are very clannish, you know, and whenever we can get together, we sit and discuss the good old days back in Oslo. It isn't very often that we meet now. It is seldom that all of us are here at one time. Amundsen is gone forever; Balchen I see occasionally. Flagstad comes to see me when the opera season is on. Mrs. Mallory comes often, and Sonja," Mr. Vang paused and smiled, "Sonja is the truest friend of all.

"I was invited to a cocktail party the press gave her when she was here a while ago. I could not go—this business of mine keeps me here always, but Sonja missed me and called up to find out why I was not there. She has her picture taken at my studio whenever she is in town. I am sure she knows of better photographers but I am a countryman of hers and that is enough for her.

"I remember Sonja as a little girl," Mr. Vang continued musingly. "Even then she was a wonderful skater, much better than the rest of us who were so much older. When she skated, we would leave the ice and stand around and watch her. We Scandinavians take our sports very seriand when it came time for us to go home, we would jump into a huge sleigh and discuss the finer points of skating. We did not go into a restaurant or a saloon and cut up as you Americans do. The sleigh would drop each one of us at our homes so that we could go to bed early and keep in fine fettle for our outdoor activities.

“Could you get back to the Henies,” said Mr. Vang. “They were considered among the richest people in town. They had a large fur shop on Königsgatan and lived in an elegant house in one of the most fashionable sections of Oslo. But to the Scandinavian that means little.

It was not the Henies’ wealth that marked them for favor. It was the athletic prowess of father and daughter. I saw very little of Mrs. Henie before I came to America. She is a shy, retiring little woman who always struck me as being afraid of her own shadow. Certainly she was never a sportswoman. But Papa Henie”—Mr. Vang kissed his fingers as a mark of respect to the absent Mr. Henie—“there is a character! He deserves a story on his own account.

“Sonja gets all her love and genius for sports from him, as Papa Henie was once bicycle champion of Norway. This was years before Sonja was born and before Popo had added weight to his figure. He, too, loved to skate.

“I can see them now. Sonja, a trim little figure in a red sweater and cap, is running up to the pond, her small feet trying hard to keep in step with the broad strides of her Popo. Her hand is confidently placed in his. There are shouts of welcome and Papa and Sonja are gliding over the ice with the rest of us. Soon Sonja is alone; the little figure is now a swift, fairylike creature who does things on skates that the rest of us would like to do and can’t. Sonja is neither self-conscious nor embarrassed. To her skating comes as natural as walking does to most of us.

“Yes, I can see it all again and it does not seem so very long ago, either. She was never a conceited child, despite her genius. She was always a happy-go-lucky, carefree little girl who was very fond of her Papa and very obedient to him.

“Years later, an one of her trips to America, I asked her, ‘Sonja, do you still do what your father tells you?’ and she answered, ‘Yes, Vang, I think he is the smartest man in the world.’

“She was always carefully guarded. Scandinavian girls usually are tended like hothouse plants but Sonja was brought up even more carefully than most girls. The Henies realized that they had a genius in the family and they felt they must be extremely careful of the people who surrounded her.

“For that reason she had few boy friends, if any, and only once do I remember her name being linked romantically with a young man’s. That was the year of the 1932 Olympics when she met Gail Barden, a great skater himself. People commented on the attention Barden was paying her and his feeling was returned. When the Olympics were over, her friends expected an announcement at her engagement but none was forthcoming. We knew the reason. Popo Henie had said, ‘No!’”

KEEN OBSERVERS OF THE HOLLYWOOD SCENE FLIT HERE, THERE AND EVERYWHERE. THEIR NOTES ARE HERE FOR YOU TO PIECE TOGETHER INTO A COMPLETE WHOLE.

Among Claudette Colbert’s best friends is a woman who doesn’t like the star on the screen and doesn’t think she’s much of an actress. This opinion is not generally broadcast, but she makes no secret of it in talking with Claudette, who calls her “My severest critic—and how!”

It’s a valuable index to Claudette’s character that after quite a few years of this the woman is still one of her best friends. Not many stars we know could “take it” thus and like it.

It was on the set of “Stepping Toes” that Ginger Rogers got a message which sent her into a dither of enthusiasm. “I’ve won! The horse I bet on came in first!” she squealed.

There was excitement and congratulations. Someone facetiously suggested that Ginger throw a party to celebrate and spend her winnings. The star agreed, and invited all present, from Fred Astaire and Edward Everett Horton to the prop boys.

“But tell us how much you won?” Horton suggested, noting the growing proportions of the threatened party.

“How much? Oh, three dollars and something!” Ginger replied.

In so-sensitive Hollywood, stars are seldom willing to name their own screen favorites for fear of hurting various egos. Yet most of them are just as ardent fans as the rest of us.

Janet Gaynor, however, revealed her choice the other day while we were eavesdropping. To a group of friends she was taking around the studio she whispered: “Now I’ll introduce you to the actress who has always been my favorite.”

The woman to whom she presented them was Gloria Swanson.
A RADIO broadcaster who peddles movie gossip thought he had rival dirt-diggers of the ether lanes scooped on a Marlene Dietrich morsel the other day. As it had to do with the star's table manners, the chatterer's stooges trailed her for several days to confirm the shocking rumor that Marlene, a supposedly "sophisticated and cultured Continental," was so ignorant of etiquette that she actually ate with her fork in her left hand!

Fortunately, before the item was read over the air same one informed the gossip that on the Continent eating with the left hand is the correct form.

A NOTE of pathos is struck by "Little Ida," wardrobe woman at Kay Francis's studio, when those who know she is one of the star's favorites speak to her about Kay.

Short, elderly, apple-cheeked, and bespectacled, Ida is utterly loyal. She pretends to be blind to the fact that Kay, despite many a fine unpublicized deed of charity or kindness, is feared and disliked by numerous coworkers. So whenever Ida talks about Kay, she tries to start an admiration club. With those who have smarted from the star's temperamental outbursts, it seldom works.

SOBBING, a young Paramount actress rushed into the office of a studio friend for comfort and advice. Margaret Fitzpatrick's plaint was that the problems of her budding career had frightened and bewildered her. She didn't know how to meet them.

What a difference a four-year course in one of these coeducational institutions called film studios can make!

To-day, we can't think of any more poised, polished, confident, and sophisticated actress than the girl who was Margaret Fitzpatrick four years ago. And she's one of our most capable actresses, too—is Gail Patrick.

POOR Greta Garbo! She likes to window shop as well as any girl, but if she dared attempt such a thing she would be mobbed by her admirers. So she must content herself with riding up and down Wilshire
On and Off the Set

Boulevard with George Brent in a Ford coupé and looking at the windows from the curb. Of course there are a lot of girls who would consider that adequate compensation.

When the stars finish a radio broadcast, they rush across the street to a little building, which has a sign painted on the window reading "Electro-Vox—Air-chek." There they know they can hear a record of their performance, which was made from the broadcast, and after hearing it they know the worst. Sometimes they buy a dozen copies of the record, which they send as gifts to their friends, and without asking, Bert Gottschalk, the proprietor, sends Carole Lombard's records to Clark Gable and Clark's to Carole.

Hollywood's favorite pastime of casting "Gone With the Wind" has had a temporary setback. Janet Gaynor, who every one agreed was perfect for "Melanie," refused the part because it isn't the starring rôle.

Since the English color picture, "Wings of the Morning," has been shown in Hollywood, there is considerable interest among producers as well as audiences over Annabella, the little star of the picture. Her case is typical of Hollywood. Two years ago when she was making foreign versions at the Fox Studio, no one paid the slightest attention to her. Her contract was not renewed and she returned to Europe. Now she can come here if and when she likes at her own price.

Mrs. Randolph Scott continues to reside away from Hollywood, and Randy and his pal, Cary Grant, continue to occupy the same house where they have kept bachelor quarters for so long in Hollywood.

"Mrs. Scott hasn't come between us at all," Cary laughed. "We're as comfortable as ever."

Joan Blondell was in a hurry recently to get to the studio. In backing her car out of the driveway she crashed into another car parked across the street. Hurriedly taking the car's number she dashed into the house and gave it to her chauffeur. "Find out whose car this is and tell him I have it fixed and send me the bill," she ordered. The chauffeur gave her a peculiar look but said nothing.
Next morning Joan gave instructions to have her car taken to the garage and serviced. Dick had already left. "I'll use the Ford to-day," she announced.

"Why, Miss Blandell," the chauffeur exclaimed, "that was your Ford you backed into yesterday!"

WALLACE BEERY, tough guy of the screen, has never smoked a pipe. In "The Old Soak" he has to smoke a pipe. So he bought one. He took his new plane up by himself and started to break in the pipe. The plane is a cabin cruiser, all enclosed. Wally became very, very ill.

ROUCHO MARX was introduced to a certain columnist for the twentieth time and acknowledged the introduction.

"This is the tenth time we've met," the columnist complained, "and you never remember me."

"That's right," Groucho agreed promptly. "You see," he went on, "I never forget a face—but I've made an exception of yours."

ANENT Elaine "Ariel" Barrie Barrymore's stage début in "The Return of Hannibal," one critic wrote, "She looks like Salome, acts like salami!"

MARLA SHELTON, a newcomer at MGM, is distinctly a "lacker." Robert Taylor surveyed her admiringly. "Now, there," he opined, "is a dish. Bay, would I like to be snowbound at Arrowhead with her!"

MARTHA RAYE is one girl who isn't sensitive. Bob Burns was ribbing her about the size of her mouth. "Say," Martha exclaimed, "you can't kid me about that! My mouth is so big I have to use catsup for lipstick. Why, do you know," she rushed on, "I yawned once in 'The Big Broadcast' and you couldn't see Burns and Allen."

"Well, quit yawning now, will you?" Bob grumbled. "I'm just getting over the flu and every time you open your mouth it makes a draft."

FOR "Personal Property" Jean Harlow wore the most daringly cut evening gown ever seen. Hays executives nearly fainted when they saw her love scenes with Bob Taylor. We asked Jean paint-blank how she Brian Aherne had to run like hell to get his first job on the London stage. Ever since then he has progressed in easy strides. Here are impressions of him as he is to-day.

Brian Aherne resembles Gary Cooper, says Mr. Oettinger. His face is lean and ascetic, his eyes impersonal in gaze, his jaw determined. Like many Englishmen, he is chary about friendships. Meeting him once you will not know him. But meeting him only once you will see enough reasons for his quick ascent to the dizzier heights of celebrity.
BRIAN AHERNE might never have been an actor if he hadn't been able to run!

When, as a youth of twenty, he was waiting hopefully in the office of one Mr. Brownside, a London agent, that worthy stuck his bald head out of his cubby-hole, asked him if he was an actor—to which the ambitious and confident Brian replied affirmatively—then surprisingly snapped "How fast can you run?"

This time young Aherne's answer was more honest. He could run like a deer, he said.

"Well, then, m'lad," said Mr. Brownside, "run like hell to the Savoy Theater and say I sent you.

Thus was the career of one actor launched.

This bit of a success story came from Mr. Aherne's smiling lips as he sat brooding in his suite at the Gotham, that renovated caravansary that has taken its place as an informal and strictly unofficial adjutant of the British Embassy in New York.

You are likely to trip over Noel Coward in the foyer; John Gielgud is your traveling companion in the lift; Sir Cedric Hardwicke passes you on the eighteenth floor as you make for the Aherne apartment.

Abandoning this bit of Britannia, however, we find Mr. Aherne brooding over the failure of "Othello" to run more than a fortnight, the injustice of two income taxes on one income, and sordid things like that. Stars don't have troubles like yours and mine.

Mr. Aherne's man, Moulton, helped him on with his coat while a portable radio hummed a tune. A newspaper lay on the sofa, opened to the theatrical page. A few informal snapshots of friends were scattered about the room.

Walter Huston as "Othello" was the recipient of very sour notices and Brian Aherne as Iago enjoyed what is known in some quarters as raves. Mr. Aherne stole the show, so to speak. His was dynamic ("Sun"), magnetic ("Herald-Tribune"), and hot ("Variety"), yet the play closed after two weeks of meager audiences.

Mr. Aherne didn't like the idea of rehearsing for four weeks, touring three, then opening and closing in Manhattan like an accordion. The artist in him cried out, and the business man moaned. To-day even Shakespearean stars are practical fellows and doubtless the cinema has made them so.

"It's all very well to speak of the fine theater," he said, puffing on a meditative pipe, "but you do something on the screen and you know you'll be paid for it, whether it's good or bad, whether people go to see it or not. On the other hand, we've just worked two months for virtually no reward. Is it any wonder the screen is popular with actors?"

Not only had Mr. Aherne a flashing "Iago" to his credit; he received critical kudos for his performance in "Beloved Enemy."

He thinks Merle Oberon a lovely lady—this in a detached manner that betrayed nothing by overtone, sigh, or gesture—and rates Samuel Goldwyn at the top as a producer who knows exactly what he wants and employs the people who are able to give it to him. "He is not only shrewd and canny; he is artistic and courageous," said Aherne, summing it up in a forthright way as convincing as it was complimentary.

This British star is a tall young man in his thirties, resembling Gary Cooper. His face is lean and ascetic, his eyes impersonal in gaze, his jaw determined. He affects tweeds, dresses with studied carelessness, prefers New York to Hollywood and London to both, reads little, plays handball for exercise rather than pleasure, accepts fan hysteria as a necessary evil, and worries about his health.

He started out in a children's school for acting in London presided over by Italia Conti, whose reputation was sufficient to attract such promising striplings as Reginald Owen, Noel Coward, and Frank Lawton. They appeared in Christmas plays, received approving pats from loving parents, and returned to school. Mr. Coward started writing plays at sixteen, but he was precocious.

Brian Aherne fully intended to spend his life in business, until at the age of twenty he found that progress was at a standstill and pin money at a premium.

"There I was," he says, smiling at the memory. "I lost a job after job—had no aptitude for that sort of thing, you know. Till one day I was down to a couple of shillings, and I thought 'Well, I can always act if I have to, until the next business opportunity presents.' I always thought I was a good actor. Of course, confidence is a prime asset.

"You see I had no stomach for acting. It seemed a little degrading to me—for man's work. I disliked the artificiality of it—the fusion. But I was willing to act a short while, stop gap sort of thing. So I went to Mr. Brownside's agency and got a job."

Once started at the sum of eight pounds a week, young Aherne found engagements easy. He knocked around in provincial companies, he tried pictures, he understudied Herbert Marshall.

REPUTATIONS

BELIEVE ALL YOU HEAR AND NO STAR IS WITHOUT BLEMISH—OR WORSE. THIS STORY EXPLAINS THE GRAVE PERIL OF DAMAGING REPORTS AND HOW THEY BEGIN.

If you ever visit a Hollywood movie lot and catch a star shooting sus- picious glances at you, don't think you're being mistaken for an old enemy or a bill collector.

On the contrary, this is almost a sure sign the star would like to meet you and have a nice chat.

In fact, such stars would like to talk at length with every stranger, every coworker they see; with any one who so much as glimpses them in person. The motive behind this social urge is self-protection.

If the hundreds of people who see stars during their working days could be made to understand them as fellow humans, a grove peril to their careers might be avoided.

People who get brief glimpses of stars are dangerous because they carry away incomplete impressions. Some of these impressions may, through a slip on the star's part or a misunderstanding on the observer's, be very damaging. And for some perverse reason, it is the derogatory ones which are passed along, credited most widely, and presently re-bound against the star's popularity at the box office.

Many stars are far more vulnerable than others. A vilifying yarn about Dick Powell, for example, is not likely to be credited. Pinned on Marlene Dietrich, it might be accepted as gospel and spread by word of mouth throughout Hollywood, creating prejudice wholesale.

Marlene's vulnerability was created chiefly through the misunderstandings of strangers and coworkers. If I knew her only through im- pressions of those who contacted her fleetingly, doubtless I would hate her and be ready to believe any damaging stories I heard about her.

As it happens, countless personal observations made since the first day Marlene appeared on the Paramount lot have revealed to me no shred of evidence that she is other than a likable woman. Her seeming vagaries are satisfactorily explained when you know her.

For similar reasons, I'm ready to join the defenders of Kay Francis, Miriam Hopkins, Jeanette MacDonald, George Raft, Margaret Sullavan, and Barbara Stanwyck. They are among the stars who seem fated to give unlucky impressions.

Just how are such impressions gleaned? Often in the manner illus- trated by an incident which occurred recently on the set of a Kay Francis picture.

A visitor approached unnoticed during the filming of a scene, and stood in the darkness outside the camera lines. When the scene was completed, Kay began scolding her colored maid for misplacing a hole on an assistant director. Every one on the set except the victim had been in on it. Ida most of all, for she had suggested it.

Damaging reports about a star exert a cumulative force. Confined to Hollywood for a time, at last they overflow and spread prejudice throughout the world via ether waves and printing presses. That prejudice may be strong enough to constitute a cinematic death warrant. Most people stop paying to see stars for whom they acquire a dislike. Several once-great favorites found that out at the cost of their careers.

The prejudice created in Hollywood by derogatory rumors is hard to counteract, however false those rumors may be. For instance, so far as I am able to learn from seeing a good deal of Jeanette MacDonald, the only foundation for a belief that she has “gone grand” is her alleged failure to remember names and faces.

On one occasion I sat in the same office with her for more than two hours. She was waiting for an interviewer who did not take the trouble to phone an explanation of his tardiness. In reply to some comment on the situation Jeanette said, “Oh, I suppose he was unavoidably delayed. You know, he’s a very busy man.”

When he finally arrived she did not utter a word of reproach. Is that, I ask you, the conduct of a high-hat star? Yet this anecdote and others Jeanette’s well-wishers have cited are often received with an incredulous lift of the eyebrows, because many people prefer to believe the worst.

One Hollywood tale-bearer which gets only the briefest and often the most misleading glimpses into stellar life is almost invariably believed. It is called the candid camera—but, oh, how it lies!

For the same reason that damaging verbal rumors about some stars spread more rapidly than constructive reports, so disparaging photos of them attract more attention than complimentary ones.

Once a male star, when cold sober, put on a drunk act for the amusement of friends. A snooping photographer caught it. The eloquent picture was published, and what a time that star had, living down the impression created! At other times the damage is done simply by bad photography, the freaks of which any one who has seen himself in amateur snapshots can appreciate.

A tale about Myrna Loy came to my attention shortly before her marriage. It did not travel far or do much harm, fortunately, because it was so ridiculously at odds with her well-known Girl Scout reputation in Hollywood. But it illustrates the traps into which the most innocent may fall.

This report said that the star showed the effects of dispensation.

It was discovered that the story had originated when an elevator boy repeated a facetious remark of Myrna’s, who had described in his hearing how she thought she looked when suffering from a cold in the head.

“Whoever passed it on must have got off before I finished telling my girl friend about it,” explained the elevator boy. “You see, I added that I personally thought Myrna looked mighty fine, and that was the truth. She did, in spite of her cold."

A similar rumor was pinned on Kay Francis not long ago. For scenes of a recent picture, Kay wore a make-up intended to suggest illness. Some one unfamiliar with movie make-up saw her and was deceived by it. Soon after we heard that Kay was skipping a nervous breakdown.

Most stars belong to one or the other of two groups: those about whom disparaging rumors are circulated and believed, and those who so far have escaped this fate because of a widespread understanding that they are “regular.” The newcomer, on the other hand, belongs in a third group. His fate at the hands of the look-and-run observers is in suspense. He has not yet had time to acquire the hard-won “good scout” label. Lacking it, he is defenseless against the perils of misinterpretation.

Typical of the vast confusion of opinion about newcomers until they are definitely catalogued, favorably or unfavorably, is the current Hollywood impression of Luise indulging in pranks or assuming attitudes that invite misinterpretation.

There are certain other methods of dodging injurious criticism. Stars who amaze, awe, or amuse Hollywood usually avoid incurring dislike, resentment, or envy. Katharine Hepburn amazed Hollywood by her daring, amused it by her eccentricities, awed it by her rages and unique brand of genius, so her career has not suffered.

Bing Crosby affords another example of protective technique. Things for which same stars are adversely criticized go unnoticed when he does them; that absent-mindedness about having met you before, for instance. How, argues Hollywood, could a person possibly be high-hat when he shoots a fine game of golf, dresses more comically than Jack Oakie, and boasts about being the father of twins?

However, while same may fall a time ward off the menace we have outlined, it hangs over them despite all they can do. Threatening cinematic death, this Damocles sword is one of the terrors of stardom and part of the stuff of which stellar nightmares are made.

Rainer. She has been branded high-hat, democratic; sophisticated, naive; hot-tempered, easy-going; a fashion plate, a tramp. And even a user of profanity.

The last-named accusation came about in this manner: A woman saw Luise catch and tear an evening wrap in the door of a car from which it was emerging. The star's outburst, spoken entirely in German, was to assure her escort that the accident wasn't his fault. The witness, unable to understand German, doubtless put herself in Luise's place and imagined what she'd have said under similar circumstances.

Because Luise is enthusiastic over America in general, Hollywood in particular, and even over her electric refrigerator, she has been called naïve. Sophisticated, because she speaks several languages and has traveled. A fashion plate because those who so designate her see her when she is tastefully gowned for some fitting occasion. A tramp? Ah, that's the harsh verdict against all attractive wearers of slacks when seen by ladies whose curves forbid such casual attire.

The accusation that a star is dull is decidedly defamatory, because to call an entertainer dull is to assail the very foundation of his professional worth. Yet it is a favorite rumor, and often arises from a cause of misunderstanding other than brevity of contact. Even in a lengthy interview an erroneous impression of dullness may be given. The star may not be talkative, by nature or at the moment. He may have little or no interest in the subjects discussed, or be suspicious of the person who is attempting to draw him out.

That explains the mystery of accusations that Irene Dunne, Gary Cooper, George Brent, Warren William, and several others are dull.

There are also many stars who suffer at the gossips' hands because they refuse to wear a smiling mask in private life. They will not keep up an act calculated to give a favorable impression. Others do wear such a mask and keep up such an act even, we fancy, when they are alone—for fear some one with a spyglass is watching them from yonder distant hill. Naturally, these cautious ones are rarely caught in a burst of profanity.
UNITED after a long spell of playing separately, James Dunn and Sally Eilers come to you again in "We Have Our Moments," a melodramatic comedy. Miss Eilers is a school-teacher bound for Europe, Mr. Dunn a detective trailing a gang of thieves aboard ship who victimize Miss Eilers by concealing their loot in her trunk. It's all straightened out at Monte Carlo by Mischa Auer, prefect of police.
THEY SAY IN

BY KAREN HOLLIS

MOST OF THE STARS NEED DIRECTORS FOR THEIR PRIVATE LIVES.

With one accord, the glamour girls of the screen seem to be staging a rebellion. What credit is it to them as actresses, the sly ones maintain, if their charm on the screen is a mere reflection of their natural, everyday manner?

Grace Moore thinks that the adoring public puts too great a strain on its favorites. No one, she maintains, should be expected to be glamorous twenty-four hours a day.

Luise Rainer defied the traditional hoopla of sabled and spotlighted arrivals in New York by getting off the train in rumpled sweater, battered felt hat, and drooping skirt.

Marlene Dietrich was a rasping virago as she defied ship news reporters on her return from London. Jean Arthur repelled friendly advances from her old home town, Manhattan, and startled coworkers on a radio program by her swift changes of mood. She was cordial one minute, belligerent the next, malleable, patronizing, helplessly appealing, frightened, and frigidly remote in quick succession.

But Grace Moore is almost always glittering to the casual bystander whether she works at it or not, a little like a sparkling spring day with a hint of returning chill in the air. Gladys Swarthout could not be ungracious if she tried. And Arline Judge has an appreciative, warm smile for all who take an interest in her.

Marlene As Mother Wolf.—The reason for Dietrich's rage as her ship docked was that she did not want the public to know that her daughter, Maria, had returned to this country with her. She is obsessed with a terror of kidnappers, and thought that by announcing that she had left Maria in school in Europe, she could enjoy some peace of mind.

Maria's name appeared on the passenger list, of course, so a diplomat from Paramount suggested that Marlene explain the situation to reporters and throw herself on their mercy. But with a few caustic words, she told just how much she thinks they are to be trusted. Which is not at all. Just one flutter of her seductive eyelids and they would have fought on her side to the last man.

Florists' Boom Day.—Incidentally, if Marlene likes you, or if she sees an actress give a grand performance on the stage, she sends flowers—lots of flowers. Helen Hayes, who has received everything from portraits of Queen Victoria to rare antique jewelry, was so touched by Dietrich's floral offering that she rushed right out to a florist's and returned the compliment.

Dry Wine, Not Soothing Sirup.—Really, you never can tell what the players will be like just from seeing them on the screen. I would have wagered that Dorothy Peterson, screen nurse of the Dionne Quintuplets, was an amiable and wholesome sort, not cloying, but a little on the sweet side.

When I burst into her apartment in a New York hotel, I walked right into high comedy in the worldly drawing-room manner. She is breezy and crisp and a little cynical. With detached amusement she answered the continuously ringing telephone.

Ann Courtney, right, sings at a New York hotel and is forever being advised by Hollywood stars to take a test for pictures. "But I have a contract with Warner Brothers," she says.

Gladys Swarthout, next, is a continuous fashion show but her clothes never dominate her and few can describe exactly what she wears.
This one wanted her to rush right over to "21"; some one else was inquiring how about cocktails at the Ritz. "All Hollywood people," she told me. "And just why should I want to see them here? I've just left there. I dimly recall having some nice, sane friends in New York, but where are they?" Smart, well-groomed, she should be a distinct addition to the Kay Francis picture "Mazurka," for which she hurried back to Hollywood.

Slowing Down to a Gallop.—I bet no one could figure out what the Ritz Brothers, those comic tornadoes of 20th Century-Fox musicals, are like, judging from their loony antics in "On the Avenue." Well, they're delightful. Rather nice-looking, completely unpretentious, eager to please. They don't talk much, just act everything out, and in two minutes they have you hysterical. They are endlessly inventive, as they proved by making three pictures in five months.

They are such boons to box offices that an old short they made five years ago has been taken off the shelf and released. And Palm Beach society, which discovered them a year ago, is crying for the boys to come down and enliven their parties.

They Knew Her When.—The most discovered young hopeful for pictures is Ann Courtney, blond singer who tosses a few operatic flourishes into popular numbers. You'll see her in the next edition of "Gold Diggers." For the past few months she has been singing at the Hotel Montclair Casino in New York, where the Fredric Marches, Eddie Sutherland, Major Bowes, Noel Coward, Margaret Sullivan, among others, have told her she ought to make a test for pictures.

"But I have a contract with Warners," she says, blighting their hopes of showing scouting ability. As a matter of record, you've had glimpses of Ann Courtney on the screen for years. Seven years ago she posed as the Miss Columbia who flashes the introduction of all Columbia pictures on the screen.

Big Business in Gigolos.—Paramount has decided that the whole world may be entertained by seeing the inside workings of a hired escort.

JOAN catches up with TO-DAY JOAN BENNETT IS TOPS WHILE CONSTANCE HAS HIT BOTTOM WITH A BUMP. THIS IS THE WARMLY HUMAN STORY BEHIND THEIR REVERSED POSITIONS AND THE UNDERSTANDING THAT EXISTS BETWEEN THE FAMOUS SISTERS.

BY JACK SMALLEY

A few years ago, Joan Bennett was a little foundling left on Hollywood’s doorstep, with no one to take her in, while sister Constance received the highest salary ever paid a star, was the toast of the town and one of the most dominant figures in the industry.

Up one minute and down the next—that’s the way it goes in Hollywood.

Now the capricious teeter-tatter of fame has reversed the positions of these remarkable sisters, Joan and Constance Bennett.

Here is a situation as dramatic as any make-believe you’ve seen on the screen, a play of conflicting emotions that has gone on, unnoticed, behind the scenes in Hollywood.

A few years ago, Joan was a little foundling left on Hollywood’s doorstep, with no one to take her in. And Connie, that hard-hitting package of blond dynamite, who had received the highest salary ever paid a star, was the toast of the town and one of the most dominant film figures.

To-day Joan is tops, while Connie has made only two American pictures in two years, and one abroad. She has hit bottom with a bump.

I’m not going to try to explain what caused this unpredictable reversal; my story has to do with its striking effect on the relationship of the sisters.

Richard Bennett and Adrienne Morrison had three lovely daughters, and each was given the best education money could buy. Each of the three girls was different: Connie had the square jaw of forceful, domineering Dick Bennett; Barbara was a blend, while baby Joan had the calm, quiet spirit of her mother. And the theater was in all of them.

You could find the counterpart of these three sisters in many an average American home, and their individual reactions to each other were what you might expect.

Connie, the eldest, did the bossing. And baby Joan was, as may be expected, the victim.

In consequence, she thoroughly disliked her elder sister. I don’t blame Connie, and you wouldn’t, either. When you’re young, a few years difference in ages creates a gulf hard to bridge with understanding. As time went on the difference between Connie and Joan forced them farther and farther apart, until they were virtual strangers.

Connie was very bright in school; too clever, in fact, for she learned her lessons without effort.

No one could figure out why Joan was so backward. It was making her shy, giving her an inferiority complex. Naturally, she didn’t think it fair that Connie should breeze along while she had to plod.

And then the reason came out.

Joan couldn’t answer teacher’s questions because she couldn’t see what was written on the blackboard!

No one had suspected her eyesight was below normal; Joan just thought that things at a distance were supposed to be hazy. It was all another cross to bear for pretty little Joan of the baby blue eyes.

But that wasn’t all.

“When we went shopping, Connie would buy slinky satin dresses while picking out little girls’ things for me,” Joan recalled. She smiles at the recollection, but at the time it seemed the most unjust thing in the world. “Of course they were the right thing for me to wear at my age, but after all Connie was not so much older and I resented it all.”

Barbara was sympathetic, but a lot of good that did. Connie had the sophisticated wardrobe and the bright-cheeked beaux, while Joan had to wear ribbons.

She still was the baby of the family when she was sent to France, to enter l’Hermitage, a finishing school for girls at Versailles. But Joan, at fifteen, considered herself grown up.

And what’s more, she was in love! She had met the most fascinating man, much older but so handsome, on the ship. At l’Hermitage she wove a bright romance into her daydreams.

The school wouldn’t permit her to go to Paris to see the man who had captured her young heart, which made it even more romantic. Joan thrilled to the most dramatic situation in her life. She was separated from the man she loved, and she’d do something about it that would make them all sit up and take notice. So she slipped away from school and went to Paris.

Constance Bennett bossed Joan when they were children and Joan was the baby of the family. But when Joan met with an accident, Connie began to realize that blood is thicker than water. That was the beginning of their understanding.

It wasn’t so very exciting after all, as there was no place to go except her aunt’s house, and once there they promptly cabled her mother.

Adrienne caught the next boat. She heard the whole story. His name was John Martin Fox, and he was in Landon, and Joan’s heart would break unless she could see him.

Adrienne didn’t laugh and call it puppy love, for she had a great deal of understanding for this shy daughter of hers. At sixteen Joan married John Fox, and her mother attended the wedding.

But it all wasn’t quite as Joan had expected. She learned to get a meal out of a potato and a bit of beef, and she tried to believe that all this was what she wanted. Poor, tender Joan!

The couple went to Los Angeles, where Joan’s baby, Diana, was born. The disparity in the ages of Joan and her husband and the chronic lack of funds could have but one ending, and that was separation. Joan tried hard enough, but it was all too discouraging. She knocked at studio doors for extra work, and got a little. But a director told her bluntly: “You have no talent for pictures.” She tried to get her mother to back her in an interior decorating shop, but it was no go.

Lost Horizon."—Columbia. Last month brought "The Good Earth" and, before that, "Camille" stirred and lifted us to the realms of pure romance. Now we have another cinematic milestone to pass and to ponder over, Frank Capra's picturization of James Hilton's novel. A brilliant, compelling work, it is far off the beaten track and for this reason alone should be seen by everyone. It is a "must" with a capital "M." However it may be classified as a story, I describe it as a philosophic fantasy. But don't let that chill your desire to see it. First of all, it is rousing entertainment; the philosophic undertones are never permitted to get out of hand and become highbrow. Mr. Capra is too shrewd in achieving positive successes to be diverted toward a dim horizon. His new picture has the required dynamics as well as spiritual ideals. He takes us to Forbidden Tibet and into the hidden lamasery of Shangri-La ruled by a High Lama three hundred years old. We follow the arrival of five strangers from the outer world, one of them, Ronald Colman, being our chief concern. The absorbing interest we experience thereafter comes not only from the strange world we have entered, but from watching its effect upon the outsiders. The ageless peace and serenity, the harmony and beauty of the retreat, bring contentment and happiness to all but one of the Anglo-Saxons. The deep appeal of this is based on every man's dream of an ideal civilization where strife is unknown and in-harmony impossible, where beautiful surroundings and beautiful relationships shall inspire us to live fully and exquisitely. There is more, much more, to the story than this, but you have the kernel here. It is splendidly acted, of course, not one player falling short. I think, however, that besides Mr. Colman's sensitive acting, I was most impressed by Sam Jaffe as the High Lama and H. B. Warner as Chang, his deputy. Their repose and wisdom, not overlooking marvelous make-ups, transported me spiritually to the Orient while visually I dwelt within the strangely beautiful and remote lamasery.

"The Last of Mrs. Cheyney."—MGM. We who admire Joan Crawford are quick to applaud another step in her advancement as an actress. We find her more poised, her animation coming from within instead of being on the surface merely, and her acting has a gracious dignity that is new and significant. Even her costumes reflect the change. Gone are those exaggerations and eccentricities which made the judicious grieve. Now her clothes are smartly becoming but they don't hit the eye: they harmonize. Although "Mrs. Cheyney" is familiar material, the new version is graced with freshened dialogue, a new approach to the situations and, of course, a new cast. Time has failed to strengthen the play, nor do the improvements disguise the old story to the majority, but it holds up as entertaining comedy, its witty conversation and portrayal of character still evoking chuckles and laughter. Mrs. Cheyney, in case you've forgotten, is a crook whose charm opens aristocratic drawing-rooms to her and whose nobility of character is greater than that of the swells with whom she mingles. William Powell is, of course, capital as her confederate in thievery who masquerades as her butler, while Robert Montgomery is restrained as the ignoble British peer who wins her. The entire cast is fine and the picture is beautifully mounted. An interesting detail is the return of Aileen Pringle.
“The Woman Alone.”—Gaumont-British. The best aspects of British direction, story-telling and acting are here for us to admire and compare with our own. When reticence, understatement and evasion of main issues, all characteristic of English pictures, are without the supervision of dramatic intelligence, the result is maddeningly unsatisfying. And too many films that come from England are just that. But this is different, obviously because Alfred Hitchcock directed it. Deliberate but tense, low-keyed, it plays down the horrible goings on and implies more than it tells. Always the imagination of the spectator is kept alive, with the result that one listens and watches intently lest he miss the secret key to the whole. The characters arrest from the start. Sylvia Sidney is the American wife of Oscar Homolka, the Dutch actor we grandly remembered for his Paul Kruger in “Rhodes.” As Mr. and Mrs. Verloc, they run a little movie theater in London. It is a blind for Verloc’s secret activities as a member of a gang determined to panic the city by acts of homicidal violence. The powerful climax comes when Miss Sidney’s young brother, Desmond Tester, is sent by Verloc to check a package containing a bomb in the subway station, timed to blow up Piccadilly Circus as a procession is passing. What happens when the boy delays is even more terrible. This is a brooding, tragic story and you are not likely to be cheered by it; but it is stirring and original.

“Maid of Salem.”—Paramount. Not since Lillian Gish’s “The Scarlet Letter” in 1926 has there been a picture dealing with the early Puritans of Massachusetts. It is a period neglected by the screen. This picture proves it to be one of the most dramatic, its importance in the history of this country not to be overlooked, either, though historical significance often makes dull entertainment. But not here. The period is meticulously recreated and we have one of the strongest dramatic themes—witchcraft hysteria in the Massachusetts Bay Colony, Salem Village, in 1642. Life in the colony is fascinatingly portrayed, the characters and customs vividly revealing, quaint, amusing, and sometimes sinister. Bonita Granville, chilling fiend of “These Three,” spills a lie that spreads until it has Claudette Colbert accused of witchcraft. She does not know that her mother was burned as a witch in England until it is brought out at her trial, and for a breathless moment the heroine of the picture seems doomed. Her stirring defense is the high light of the story and Miss Colbert is surpassingly eloquent and deeply moving in this dramatic sequence. The picture shines with splendid performances, it has breadth and depth, and is important.

“Michael Strogoff.”—RKO. Are you ready for an old-fashioned thriller about Russia in 1870 and a czar’s messenger who underwent hideous mental and physical torture for his sovereign? Or are you so modern that you can’t imagine adult intelligence so fiercely worshipful of a crown? Well, anyway, this was a famous stage play in the ’80s and citizens of the United States were petrified in their seats when it swept the country season after season. On the screen it is colorful, active, picturesque and, to me, unstimulating. However, everything happens that could happen to a patriotic adventurer on a long and dangerous mission, so there is no lack of melodramatic action. A beautiful spy attempts Continued on page 95

The cinema was just gaining headway in England. Aherne photographed even better than he looked on the stage, and before he knew it he was on his way to being an impressive figure in British pictures.

He played leads in seventy-odd films, none of which ever achieved transatlantic showing except "The Constant Nymph," and that only in films, on every morning at eleven for tea, then lunch at one, then another with a sense of the static "Romeo."

The lords of Hollywood spied him, and before long Irving Thalberg had signed him for "What Every Woman Knows."

"I liked that tremendously," he said. "Helen Hayes is such an artist, and Madge Evans was charming in it—a delightful girl. It was my first taste of American picture-making, and quite different from London. You see, over there everything was very leisurely; on interval every morning at eleven for tea, then lunch at one, then another rest at four. Sometimes, as a matter of fact, we would wait whole days for money to be dug up to enable production to proceed."

He enjoyed making "Sylvia Scarlett," that monumentally bad picture in which Katharine Hepburn capered, ranted and outdid herself. "No one knows why that wasn't good," said Brion. "We howled at the rushes every day. We all had a marvelous time making it, with George Cukor directing. It was a circus."

For every one but the audience.

His favorite director is Woody Von Dyke.

"He's so informal and sloppily dressed that he infuses his actors with a spontaneity that makes the picture a success. He doesn't bother with countless retakes. He just lets you run through a scene once, then says 'Turn 'em over,' and before you can object the scene is in the box. It keeps you on your toes but it is a bit nerve-rocking until you understand the system."

Mr. Aherne is smooth as a conversationalist, makes little or no effort to be ingrating, feels fairly well pleased with himself, and unquestionably commands a dominant position among the men of the screen. He is vital yet charming, virile without being McGee about it. He is so equipped to play swashbuckling fellows as to make them believable. He not only has the proper façade for derring-do; he also has the rare inner spark that makes his characterizations real.

Like many Englishmen, he is chary about friendships. Meeting him once you will not know him. But meeting him once only you will see apparent enough reasons for his quick ascent to the dizzier heights of cinema celebrity. He is the 1937 version of motley idol, with all the virtues ond, one suspects, some of the weaknesses.

Jane Hamilton offers this delightfully youthful trick of navy and white-dotted silk, with a pleated ruffle edging.

New York and a few of the metropoli-ton centers. But he was well remuerated and he was in demand, which made life very pleasant.

He established a record of some sort, probably sheer endurance, by performing for two years in the London production of a tripe-strung play of the tropics called "White Cargo."

He tried to pass over the incident by averring it was artifical as presented there, but one harbors doubts.

Then Katherine Cornell imported him to play "Browning" in her memorable production of "The Barretts of Wimpole Street." Then Miss Cornell also chose to play "Juliet," and lucky Aherne, instead of being cast as the lovelorn hero, was assigned "Mercutio," a rôle to which he is admirably suited, and, incidentally, a golden opportunity for any brovuro actor.

Poor Basil Rathbone was woefully neglected in the reviews and Aherne acclaimed. Thus fortune has smiled on him twice in Shakespearean endeavors, giving him "Iago" to play against the hapless Moor and "Mercutio" to dance around the static "Romeo."

"The cinema was just gaining headway in England. Mr. Vang sat back in his chair and laughed.

"Don't get the impression that Papa Henie is a cruel, hard-hearted man. On the contrary, he's a big, fat, good-natured guy, a genuine sportsman and sports lover with a keen eye for business. Sonja was supposed to have performed in Toronto several years ago, and suddenly her name was withdrawn from the program. Every one wondered about it. But her countrymen who knew the Henies also knew the reason. It was simply that Papa Henie thought Sonja wasn't being paid enough and he had said, 'No.'"

"But Sonja realizes her father has her interests at heart and for this reason she does as he tells her. Certainly she has him to thank for everything she has become. Papa took her in her hand and made her the artistic and financial success she is to-day. Sonja never forgets that. She is one of the finest, sweetest, nicest girls it has been my privilege to know. She never fails to look me up when she is in New York.

Papa's Little Girl Sonja

"She is remarkably good-natured and easy-going with a sweet, pliable disposition. I know most of the people who surround her, sportsmen, publicity men, officials on Olympic committees, et cetera, and not one of them has anything but praise for her.

"Between skating engagements she has found time to go to college and get her B. A. degree. She speaks French, German, and English fluently. Besides her skating, she skis marvelously, dances, swims, and plays tennis well. It was our good friend, Malla Mallory, who coached Sonja and prepared her for a match in Prospect Park in Brooklyn, New York.

"Her success hasn't changed her at all. I don't think Hollywood will, either. Don't forget that that kid has been used to all kinds of publicity since she was practically an infant. People have always made a great deal of fuss over her, I being among them. Many and many a time, I would take Sonja on my lap after the night's skating was over, and tell her stories like 'The Ugly Duckling,' meanwhile slipping an apple into her little hand. She has never forgotten that.

"I came to America in 1923 and through I corresponded with the Henies and followed Sonja's career with interest, I did not see them again until 1930 when she paid her first visit to America. I thought she had forgotten all about the lowly Knut Vang when one day the phone rang. It was Sonja.

James Ellison has proved himself a favorite of the fans. This is as he appears in '231/2 Hours Leave.'

"I've been trying to get you for days. I can't get used to these American telephone books. 'The Norwegian Daily News' wants to take some pictures of me and I told them there was only one photographer who could do it. That is you, Vang. So please come down to the 'News' office and I'll be there dying to see you again.

"Sanja was there, all right. So were Papa and Mamma Henie. You can imagine how glad I was to see them again and how proud I was that she had remembered me. And now, if you'll excuse me, I must go back to my work."

"Yes, of course," I said, rising reluctantly and wandering whether while I was at it, I might as well have my picture taken, too, then deciding it was a waste of time and money, to try to compete with Sonja, added "but I just want to ask you one question."

"Yes? And what is that?"

"What do you think of this romance between Sanja and Tyrone Power?"

Knut Vang laughed his hearty Scandinavian laugh. "It's probably some publicity stunt. But even if it isn't, I'll wager everything I own that Papa Henie will say 'No.'

Patsy Lee Parsons visits Ginger Rogers on the set of "Stepping Toes." Patsy Lee will soon be seen in "New Faces of 1937."
When Britain's great pageant takes place, the beauty of her high-born women will play no small part in that pageantry.

Over and above their beauty of line and feature, the world will pay tribute to the fragile, transparent beauty of their exquisitely cared for skins.

Could you ask these high-born beauties how they care for their delicate skins, you would be impressed by the number who simply answer—"Pond's."

Duchesses, Countesses, Viscountesses, Ladies are among those who say they guard their skins' beauty with Pond's. Pond's is the largest selling cream in England and in all the dominions!

Here is the method English and American beauties use:

_Every night_, smooth on Pond's Cold Cream. As it softens and releases dirt, stale make-up and skin secretions—wipe them all off. Now pat in more Pond's Cold Cream—_briskly_, till the circulation stirs. Your skin feels invigorated and freshened.

_Every morning_—(and before make-up) repeat... Your skin is smooth for powder—fresh, vital looking!

Send for SPECIAL 9-TREATMENT TUBE and 2 other Pond's Beauty Aids

_Pond's_, Dept. 14-C, Clinton, Conn.

_Rush special tube of Pond's Cold Cream, enough for 9 treatments, with generous sample of 2 other Pond's Creams and 3 different shades of Pond's Face Powder._ I enclose 10¢ to cover postage and packing.

It was a dismal contrast to Connie's exciting career and tremendous success. She was a great star, while Joan couldn't even get a bit part.

I think Connie would have helped if she had realized what was going on in the mind of her baby sister. But in the mad whirlpool of Hollywood you lose track of such things, and besides, it might be true that Joan wasn't cut out for picture work.

"Quit knocking at Hollywood's back door," truculent Dick Bennett growled at his daughter. "Come on to New York. I'll put you in 'Jamegian.'"

When Joan protested her inability as an actress, Dick said: "I can do enough acting for both of us, can't I?"

He gave Joan what she craved—action, not sympathy. She made a fine impression in the play. She was cuddlesome, adorable, attributes which Joan regards more as epithets. The critics forgave her inexperience and applauded. Playwright Gene Markey came backstage to compliment her, but couldn't get through the crush.

Gruff old Dick was right—now Hollywood wanted Joan. She got a part in 'Bulldog Drummond,' with Ronald Colman, and began to move right along into other pictures.

Connie, breaking box-office records with fine abandon, busy with the complicating affairs of love and career, was still as far away from her sister as ever.

Then something happened to make them realize they were sisters under the skin, despite their differences.

Joan's hip was fractured in a fall from a horse. It looked as if she would be crippled for life. Connie dropped everything, and with characteristic intensity made the welfare of Joan her one interest. She haunted the hospital at all hours of the day and night.

The sisters, once as far apart as the poles, discovered each other.

Joan also found a friend in Gene Markey, now a Hollywood script writer. He sent flowers and notes of encouragement. When Joan was moved home to recuperate, he asked permission to call.

Connie approved of Markey. Always a shrewd judge of people, Connie knew a real man when she saw one, and I suspect she had more than a little to do with that courtship.

It doesn't hurt at all to hear compliments about the man who is sending you flowers.

In 1933, with Joan happily married and in demand at the studios, the teeter-totter began to go against Connie. "The Affairs of Cellini" turned out to be a sad flop. "One bad picture, at the wrong time, is enough," as Claudette Colbert has sagely observed. Big producers got cold feet; little producers couldn't afford expensive Connie. She made "After Office Hours," with Clark Gable, in 1935, and "Ladies in Love," in 1936, but neither did the trick for her. One smash hit is all she needs, but—

In the meanwhile, here's Joan simply going great guns. Their positions are reversed. Now it's Joan who is box office.

And the result is a happy ending in our drama of the Bennett sisters. Through ups and downs they've learned that blood is indeed thicker than water.

Now you'll find Connie over at Joan's house almost any day. Little Peter Bennett plays house with Diana. The children have a baby for their household, too—Melinda, daughter of Joan and Gene Markey.

The vagaries of fortune, you see, have balanced the ledger and made it possible for Joan and Connie to meet on a common ground and be real friends. Their loyalty to each other is demonstrated in a thousand little ways.

Connie, being wise in the ways of pictures, gives Joan excellent advice on movie matters. Connie is a wealthy woman, and administers large real-estate holdings. Joan admires her sister's many abilities.

Connie and her father used to be very close, but now it's Connie and Adrienne, while Joan has grown very fond of Dick Bennett. Dick has exiled himself over marital troubles, and it's Joan who looks after his welfare now.

So the changing years have changed the Bennett family, and old barriers have melted away.

fellows like Lindbergh, Lee Christmas, the gun-runner, Clyde Beatty. You'll find 'em in fellows like Errol Flynn.

He's a man's man. The kind women adore. He doesn't look as tall as he is—six two. And, at a quick glance, you'd think him almost frail. But he weighs 180. You've seen those shoulders and those slim flanks on the screen. He's built the way a man should be. The way a man must be made to stand the gaff. He has a lolling, indolent manner. So has a tiger. It may be imagined that if he wanted to he could make this manner highly insulting. He fits the description of a gentleman which says that a gentleman is a fellow who never offends any one—unintentionally. It isn't hard to picture him picking a fight with a bully just by means of a look, or by the way he flicked a cigarette ash.

He wears tweeds and soft hats. Last time I saw him his hat was on backward. At a rakish angle. The little feather pointing the wrong way. Flynn wouldn't give a damn. The tweeds don't fit him very well. He's not too, too perfectly dressed. He looks comfortable in 'em. Naturally, they're Irish tweeds. Flynn is an Antrim man. There's the trace of the lilt of Lough Neagh in his speech. Just an inflection.

It just so happens that his face hasn't been run over by a steam roller. His nose hasn't been bashed in with a belaying pin, and although he's a good enough bored to have made an Olympic team back in the school days at St. Paul's in '28, his ears don't resemble cauliflowers or other vegetables. As you, who have seen his close-ups know, the ensemble of that mug is pleasing. It is in person, too. With the outstanding characteristics those gray eyes and the flashing white teeth.

In the jacket pocket of the tweeds, of course, you'll find just what you'd expect. A briar pipe—no dhoden, mind you—and a pouch of mixture. Like most who go where mechanically devised smokes like cigars and cigarettes are unavailable, his pipe is his stand-by. He smokes slowly, deliberately. He drinks the same way, with a preference for Scotch, though we did all right with a battle of "Paddy Flaherty" from the County Cork. It's safe to say that he abominates cocktails and similarly girlish nectars.

He's happiest with men. Perfectly at ease, too. Thoughly relaxed. He loves a story—and can tell one well. He's a good listener. An easy laugher. Fight or frolic—he enjoys either. He hates swank and stuffiness. He well nigh strangles in the closeness of a formal drawing-room. He's not too keen about being regarded as a sort of stuffed pigeon of pictures. To him the making of movies is simpler than sweating in tropical gold fields, dodging poisoned darts, invading shark-infested seas for pearls, or getting copra from rotting coconuts. It's another adventure—and comparatively—a soft touch.

He'll be off again. You see if he's not. Heaven save us all, he's not yet twenty-eight! June 20th will be the date for that. And there are seas to be sailed. Strange spots to be seen. Why, there's a river somewhere the source of which no man knows! And in another there's gold for the taking—unless an old little six-inch snake sinks its fangs in your foot, or an odd little brown hand with a funny knife in it finds your throat some night.

There are pals waiting, too, in funny little bars all the world around. Waiting to welcome a guy with a crooked Irish grin and an old pipe between white teeth. They'll buy a drink for him any time, any place. He'll buy one back again. And by dawn they'll be off risking their fool necks, not for gold, but for the thrill that goes with the adventure of getting it.

He's a little restless right now. A little bored. The eyebrow is ever so slightly lifted, there's ever so slight a light in his eye, as he'll tell you with perfectly solemn mien that he's off for some perfectly civilized—and dull—week-end with some perfectly civilized—and dull—people.

Sure, that's no life for an Antrim Irishman, and a descendant of daring "Mutiny-on-the-Bounty" Christian Fletcher. Not when he's twenty-seven and alive in a world where things are happening. Those movie roles had better be amusing—or he'll find something that is.

And here, for a clincher, is a woman's angle on a man's man. The woman is Lili Damita.

She'll never remember sitting in Dirty Moore's and answering my query as to her requirements in masculinity. He must have this, that, and the other thing, she told me. He must have head. He must have heart. And he must have masculine virility.

Lili is married to Errol Flynn. Here's hoping she holds him. For in all her life the fair Lili will never again find the like of the lad from Lough Neagh.

All the World Loves a Rover

Sunny days find Lorraine Bridges enjoying a dip at the seashore. Her one-piece bathing suit is of coral knit trimmed with white straps.
On and Off the Set

Hollywood with a brand-new "act." It's simply this: she has no temperament at all. Producers, executives, and interviewers are equally astonished. She doesn't throw tantrums; she doesn't wear odd, unbecoming clothes; she seems actually to enjoy her work and all its ramifications. "My reasons are selfish," says Miss Deste. "I want people to like me, and lots of people don't like temperament."

YOU would have seen Anita Page as the heroine of the Marx Brothers' current hit if the comics could have had their own way in its casting. Marian Davies declared Anita now has the most beautiful face in the world. Mervyn LeRoy informed the blond favorite of several seasons ago that she has every quality producers are seeking to-day.

Besides this interest at MGM and Warners, another studio proposed a big build-up. And Billy Rose led Broadway showmen in dangling stage stardom. But with quiet dignity Anita decided not to return to work. She's finally fallen in love. The recent bride of Lieutenant Herschel House, U. S. N., she is happily keeping house in San Diego.

FRED MacMurray is most happily married, too, but he can't say so. Paramount has decreed that he may not discuss his wife or his home life. Presumably his fans would resent his devotion to his very attractive Lillian.

HOLLYWOOD's better brains are afraid to team any more rising players in off-screen romances. Twentieth Century-Fox had Tyrone Power take Sonja Henie places to attract attention to both of them. Now that Tyrone is a sudden feminine rove it would be a calamity if he married. The grand pretense turned into real affecction.

KATHARINE HEPBURN, we understand, was much upset over an article about her which appeared recently. Maybe some one should explain to Katie how it happened. The writer of the piece was an admirer of la Hepburn and was pleased at an assignment from his boss to write about her. When he requested on interview, it was refused with the usual Hepburn brusqueness. So he set about accumulating his material, secondhand, from whatever reliable sources he could dig up. Alter all, any number of people who are not tongue-tied have worked with Katie on sets, waited upon her in restaurants and delivered telegrams to her.

The writer put down what he could learn about her—and she didn't like it a bit. Maybe there's a moral tucked away in this story somewhere.

CHARLES CHAPLIN, one supposes, will remain a sort of Puck if he lives to be a hundred and two. In front of the Carthay Circle Theater where 'The Good Earth' is showing, is tethered a pair of water buffalo. We glimpsed the white-haired, sometimes morose Charlie, standing all by himself making funny faces at the beasts while they gazed at him in mild astonishment. We don't know what was the point of this curious performance. We are merely telling you what we saw.

GEORGE GERSHWIN visited the Fred Astaire-Ginger Rogers set and between scenes Fred begged him to play something on a convenient piano. Just as George went into a really ambitious number—despite a bruised finger—and just as ecstatic listeners were preparing not to breathe until he had finished, an assistant director bawled, 'Hey! Stop that infernal racket down there. We're trying to get some work done!'

"Then mother and I moved to Santa Barbara where we worked in the community theater, running down to Hollywood between plays trying to get a break. I tried for nearly two years and then decided to go to New York and make the grade on the spoken stage." Again his deep, infectious laugh filled the room.

"I never got there. That is, not for another year. My money got me as far as Chicago where a radio job kept me on a sandwich and a glass of milk a day diet. But I was learning something constructive. Then, as I was about to despair of ever getting enough money to fare to New York, I got eight weeks work in the play 'Romance.'

"After the conclusion of the play in Chicago, I came on to New York. The business of seeing managers and hounding casting offices began all over again, I budgeted my savings and allowed myself five dollars a week. I got a job as understudy to Burgess Meredith but never had an opportunity to appear.

"After the show closed I played summer stock in New England. It was then the talent scouts from Hollywood got on my trail.

"That winter I played in Katharine Cornell's 'Romeo and Juliet' and later in her 'St. Joan.' Then 20th Century-Fox made a test of me and signed me to a contract."

In the next room a buzzer sounded and feminine voices could be heard. "Oh," he said, "I want you to meet some of my friends from Hollywood."

Into the room came lovely Sonja Henie and a group of people to carry him off to lunch. Immediately, he forgot himself and his story and was all attention and kindness. Especially to Miss Henie with whom his name is linked these days, but which he insists is just a warm friendship.

Romance and work, as he sums it up, are the things we thrive on in life. But where is his romance?

bureau and have commandeered Ted Peckham, impresario of socially elect young men who will take you out dancing for twenty dollars a night and expenses, to write a scenario called "Personal Escort." Young Mr. Peckham's bureau has been flourishing in New York the past two winters, and so many young men of the best families work for him, it is almost impossible for a "debut" to draw a stag line to her parties without hiring the lads through him.

Joining the Audience, Maybe.—Arlene Judge, by far the most decorative customer in our night clubs during a lengthy visit here, just can't make up her mind. She's definite on one point, that she is going to get a divorce from Wesley Ruggles, and marry Dan Topping, socialite and sportsman, but just where she doesn't know.

First she planned to go to Florida, then Mexico, then she thought a nice homegrown California divorce might be suitable. When last heard from, she was headed for Reno. She has been granted a six-month leave of absence from the studio, but there is more than slight suspicion that she means to retire from films. That's a break for Rochelle Hudson, who falls heir to her next role, but is it a break for us?

Your Vote Will Count.—Whether Francine Larrimore makes any pictures or not depends largely on how many of you tell your local theater managers that you would like to see her again. Perhaps we who have admired her on the stage for years and years saw her performance in "John Meade's Woman" through hazy, rose-colored glasses.

It seemed to me that her great vitality, her assurance, gave a semblance of life occasionally to the rubbish of the plot. And yet I could see some justice in the widely quoted remark that the flick she played must have been the original of all those smoking-room stories about the farmer's daughter.

Hollywood's Anthem.—Miss Larrimore is a person who sparkles with stimulating ideas. She thinks Fred Astaire's song about picking yourself up, dusting yourself off, and starting all over again should be the local credo. In order to bear the sight of your first false steps on the screen, you need a philosophy like that. She likes pictures better than the stage in a way, because she only liked rehearsal time in the theater anyway. After her performance was all set, the theater was just a job to her. And she wants to see picture actors get out from under make-up, as Garbo did in the death scene of "Camille."

No Revisions Necessary.—Another timely visitor was, John Trent, of "John Meade's Woman" and "A Doctor's Diary," who was until recently Captain Brown, TWA pilot. Heroic in build, ingratiating in manner, Trent has the misfortune of being hailed as a second Robert Taylor. It is a severe enough handicap to be called a second anybody, but with make-up experts persisting in their deadly work of prettifying that once genuine Taylor, even one Robert Taylor may soon be a little more than we can bear.

Trent is still a little dazed over being snatched from his job to become an actor. He is keeping his rating as reserve pilot with TWA just in case he wants to go back. But from the amount of shopping his pretty young wife did in New York, I think he'll have to stick to more lucrative Hollywood.

Margo Looks Ahead.—Although she has scored a success on the stage in "The Masque of Kings" and is all set to go West to play in "Hurricane" for Samuel Goldwyn, Margo is still working as intently as a freshman in dramatic school. She takes three singing lessons a week, practices at least an hour daily, and attends all the shows whose midweek matinées don’t conflict with hers. The rest of the time she attends “The Good Earth,” studying Luise Rainer, as any young actress might do with profit.

Walter Winchell, who is constantly read and heard, is seen by only a few. Here's what he looks like in "Wake Up and Live," with Patsy Kelly.

Clothes Conscious.—At a recent lunch of dress designers and fashion promoters, a big majority agreed that off screen Gladys Swarthout was the most chic, the most exquisitely dressed of the stars. Then we all subsided into giggles, because no one could recall any outfit of hers sufficiently to describe it. That’s the final proof that Miss Swarthout has discriminating taste. Her clothes never dominate her.

You recall warm colors, a trim figure, a face that glows with radiance, not a cockeyed hat, or padded shoulders, or soucy peplums. Unobtrusive her clothes are, although in the latest fashion. And they are so perfectly fitted, so simple in design, that they seem part of her.

Crossroads Bulletin.—Sonja Henie drew thousands and thousands to a skating carnival at Madison Square Garden. Interesting to watch her entrance. She is very subdued until she reaches the spotlight, then the high-powered smile switches on, her body seems electric with vitality.... Ruth Chatterton who has been fitting back and forth from Hollywood to London, has finally decided to do a play there after long arguments.... George Brent went off to Florida in search of sun, but paused in New York long enough to take in a few shows. ... Sally O’Neil is back from London and will make pictures again for Columbia. ... Jean Hersholt is a Manhattan visitor but the night clubs don’t see him. He is up with the dawn’s early light making condid camera shots of the river front and the crowds streaming out of subways. ... Marriage has certainly civilized George O’Brien. He arrives in top hat and tails to call for his wife backstage at the theater. Not a hoss in sight. ... Dramatic schools have practically shut up shop. Instead of lessons, they assign pupils to see Garbo’s “Camille” and Luise Rainer in ‘The Good Earth.” ... Zasu Pitts is back from London where she made two pictures and is so weary she won’t sign to play in more than twenty the next six months. But at least forty pictures need her, according to the producers.

Distasteful "Revivals."—Two things we couldn’t grow excited about were the reopening of the William Desmond-Taylor case, which dates back sixteen or seventeen years, and which, we believe, will forever remain a mystery, and the so-called English romance involving Clark Gable. There might be some excuse for reinvigorating the Taylor trouble, but there was less than none for that whole Gable tempest. Such nonsensical things ought to be quashed in the first round, instead of the second or third. Most interesting of developments was Josephine Dillon, Clark’s first wife, coming to his rescue. She’s a dictron teacher of wide clientele in the movie colony.

Charlie’s Tangible Devotion.—If you think Charlie Chaplin isn’t earnest about making a talking picture star of Paulette Goddard, just check that little idea away in the moth balls. Charlie has written half the script of her first picture, along with Major R. V. C. Bodley, a most interesting personage of the movie colony, and we look for Charlie to be actually shooting before the summer is over. Paulette, in our estimation, remains one of the most glamorous possibilities among film discoveries of the past year or so.

Is Connie Shrewd in This?—Constance Bennett signs with comedy producer! Maybe you were shocked if you read this announcement. Yet Connie has pretty good acumen. She flourishes as the green bay tree in a financial way. And, after all, Hal Roach, who’s the producer, has been the moving spirit in the Santa Anita race track which has proved a gold mine for all those who “went along with him.” Furthermore he showed himself to be quite a clever producer in the case of “Cinderella Man,” as well as the Laurel and Hardy pictures, which have enjoyed international success over a long period of time. Altogether we wouldn’t say that Connie’s judgment was so deficient, despite that it looks like stepping down from her post of grandeur.

De Luxe Locationing.—Claudette Colbert and all her associates in “I Met Him in Paris” had a grand time on location in Sun Valley, Idaho, despite that they were much delayed in their work. Sun Valley is the newest mecca of movieland, and it appears that meccas must be farther and farther away. This new one is accessible only by a two-day train trip.

The “I Met Him in Paris” company went there at a cost of about $9,000 daily, but were held up for at least two weeks, if not more, in the filming of the picture. At $9,000 daily! But they had a grand time at the famous winter resort anyway.

Katie’s Stage Venture.—There’s a little secret to tell about Katharine Hepburn and her stage play, “Jane Eyre.” She’ll probably never be seen in New York in this footlight production. It’s great for the road, but the question before the house is: Dare she risk it in New York, with the memory of “The Lake” still hovering in the atmosphere? Katharine wants the strongest vehicle imaginable with which to test her powers as an actress in the theater. So “Jane Eyre” certainly won’t be seen in Gotham as a play this season, and probably not next season. But won’t it be funny if a film version is made and scores success?

Romantic Involvements.—Life is strangely complex for the young man in Hollywood. Tyrone Power, who seemed so interested in SonjoHenie Fernand Gravet, famous French actor, as he appears in "The King and the Chorus Girl," with Joan Blondell.

Hollywood High Lights

Dorothy Lamour finds herself in constant demand by the studio. "Swing High, Swing Low" is to be followed by "High, Wide and Handsome," with still another lined up for her talents.

 Doug, Jr., Follows Marlene!—Much was made of the fact that Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., accepted the engagement in "Prisoner of Zenda," as "Rupert of Hentziou," just at the time that Marlene Dietrich returned to America.

It's the first Hollywood picture in which he has played for several years, and the couple appeared mutually very interested in dear ol' Lunnon during the time Marlene was working there. And you probably don't need to be told that they have been seen about quite a bit together since Doug arrived on the Coast.

Of course, both he and Marlene declined anything like romantic admissions. "After all," Marlene reiterated, "I am still married to and love my husband Rudolph Sieber."

Spider Bite's Sad Sequel.—Bite of a black widow spider during the filming of "Lives of a Bengal Lancer" was blamed for the death of Sir Guy Standing, the veteran Paramount player who made such a big impression in various military and naval films, notably about a year or so ago in "Annapolis Farewell." Of course, it was some time ago that the misfortune of being poisoned by the insect befell Sir Guy. However, it is said to have affected his health. He succumbed to heart disease. He was one of the most capable of the elegant school of character actors.

What the Fans Think

fan friends into one circle, to keep alive their interest in him or her, and to create a world-wide, all-time following of the star.

I think fan clubs are great both for star and fan. And for the question that has been discussed so much of late—"Should the star help with any of the expense of his or her fan club?"—I do think a star should help with the club expenses after the club has shown its intentions and declared itself.

A good club never asks help. After all, the club is for his or her benefit, and the club president spends a lot of time and a good deal of her own money. It is true that clubs have dues, but they don't begin to the cost of running a club. I honestly do not believe that most stars understand just what a fan club costs—or else they don't care. I don't mean a star should give generously toward their club, but what seems like nothing to the star, say a very few dollars, is a fortune to club presidents.

Am I right?

- Deserves a "Miss."

NOT long ago, a reader criticized America's greatest singer for having the titles of her pictures read "starring Miss Grace Moore." Why shouldn't she? She's the most decent actress in Hollywood, isn't she? No scandal has ever been published about her, because there is no reason for it. She's the only one in Hollywood who is lady enough to insist upon being called "Miss."

Any one who can take Hollywood and the world by storm, as Miss Moore did, deserves to be called "Miss." Grace Moore is our best singer and actress. Every one knows what a lovely voice she possesses, but how many opera stars are there who can look as beautiful and act as naturally charming as she can? And, at times, her marvelous sense of humor is reflected from the silver screen. She is always smiling, unless the script changes that smile.

I have missed none of her pictures, and never shall, and although I have enjoyed them all, I think that "One Night of Love" begins to the best. Miss Moore is given the most popular leading men, and the plots of her movies are good, but still something is lacking. I think it is the music. The title song of her first picture is the best yet written for her. The arias are always lovely when sung by her, but I think what she needs are some nice songs that can be remembered and appreciated by music lovers who have studied music. And there are thousands of these people.

Let Joan Cry.

I ADMIRE Joan Crawford for her beauty and charm, her vitality, her lovely figure and ability to wear clothes. I admire her all-encompassing ambition and her constant improvement. But I do not admire her highly publicized attitude against criticism.

I am not speaking, of course, of disinterested or constructive criticism of her screen work. I am speaking of criticism of her appearance, her beliefs, and her "private" life. The kind of criticism, so fan magazine writers tell us, that makes the tears well up in Miss Crawford's enormous eyes.

Isn't that just too pitiful?

She is the only star whose extreme sensitiveness is thus exploited. And yet I have read articles, comments, and letters about Jean Harlow, Gloria Swanson, and Marlene Dietrich that were classed of cruel, spiteful, and unnecessary personal criticism. Unquestionably, these stars read them, too, and they must have hurt, but I have yet to read of their breaking down and crying about it.

I don't blame Joan for being hurt by brutal and unnecessary attacks. But she is not the only actress in Hollywood who is emotional, sensitive and high-strung. And remember this: that Tan and brown combine to fashion this bathing suit worn by Virginia Gray.

When Martha Raye visited Denver on a vacation recently, Colorado officials presented her with this cute little wire-haired terrier, her constant companion.

In Love With a Voice.

To Cecilia Joseph: Having heard of your "masterpiece" conception, the crooner Bing Crosby in a recent issue of Picture Play, I determined to acquaint myself with its contents. Needless to say, I have done so, and incidentally decided that you can bear enlightenment on several points.

You say Bing Crosby is the only singer who sounds "sweet" to you. This may be true, and the fact that he is the only singer you enjoy may also be true. However, your statement that he is the world's greatest singer is ridiculous. It seems to me that you, like a vast number of others, have fallen in love with his voice, and this has obviously biased your opinion greatly. For even Bing openly admits that he is not a good singer when compared with Tibbett, Crooks, John Charles Thomas, Kiepura, Chaliapin, Benelli, Melchior, and many others.

You insist that Crosby is the best singer in the world. That is one of the most absurd statements ever put upon paper by mortal hand. If you have any respect for Crosby's opinion you will realize this.

You say that if Bing had taken singing lessons and had sprayed his throat and gorged with various antiseptics he would to-day be in grand opera, or at the least imply that he would be. Your claim is rather a rash one, for it will be news to a waiting world that any one may become an opera singer by spraying and gargling one's throat, et cetera, and taking singing lessons.

You further state that any one who can carry a tune is a good singer, regardless of the quality of his voice.

Talking Back.

During the ten years that I have been a reader of Picture Play I have often wished to "talk back" to some of the fans who air their thoughts in this department.

Elsie J. Knabell: Prepare for a surprise! There are some who enjoy Greta Garbo, Marlene Dietrich, and Katharine Hepburn. I have talked with real, live, and incidentally, intelligent people who do not only think, but think they are among the most gifted actresses of the present day. Garbo and Hepburn are capable of portraying roles of which the average empty-headed feminine player could have no comprehension. Dietrich's beauty alone justifies her place in the cinema world.

Isabelle Jarak: It seems to me that all the foreign stars you've mentioned do measure up to the standard of the outstanding American players, except for Sybil Jason. She's awful! No doubt you would prefer many of them if you were unaware of their nativity.

Frank Talley: Have you deserted these columns, or are you just hibernating? There are quite a few handsome lads in pictures now who would make swell targets for some of your famous caustic remarks.

Ann D. Imman: Your praise of Jean Harlow is heart-warming. We have read reams of how Joan Crawford has worked to improve herself in pictures. But Harlow has accomplished more in five years than Crawford has in ten.

George Ferris: I see your favorite, Charles Morton, has a part in "Hollywood Boulevard." Let's hope something comes of it, for Charles is an accomplished and deserving actor.

Norbert Lusk: I want to voice my appreciation for your generous policy of giving recognition to lesser-known players in Picture Play. It is one of the main reasons why this magazine is my favorite fan publication.

Diane Allan: Yes, I am quite sure MGM would be surprised to know that Carol Lombard, Joan Crawford, Jean Harlow, and Greta Garbo can't act. No doubt they read your letter and have fired them by now.

Josephine B. Becker: Bless you for... those kind words about Katharine Hepburn. Heaven knows there are not any too many of them that find their way into the pages of this magazine. Most of those who criticize Miss Hepburn’s features must forget that it is usually the irregularities of a person’s features that endear that person’s face to one. I find it difficult to understand how any one could have seen “Little Women” and “The Little Minister” without being captivated by Hepburn’s personality and impressed with her genius. She has loads of charm, but she dispenses it sparingly, so that one does not get too large a dose at one time.

Janet Gaynor Fans: Shame on you for neglecting Janet! There should have been pages of letters praising her in “What the Fans Think” after “Smaltown Girl.” Undoubtedly that was her best talkie, and she was never more ingratiating. Don’t permit Janet to become too “dramatic” and “sophisticated” as she has expressed a desire to be. She’d be a goer in no time at all! The same goes for Ginger Rogers.

As Others See Them.

This is an answer to “Thirty of Us from London, England.” Mae West is not vulgar—she is witty and humorous. Maybe she leaves you cold, but she’s still the rage over here, and according to box-office indications, will continue to be for a long, long time, or at least until we Yankees lose our sense of humor, which isn’t likely. Of course, when we go to a Mae West picture, we know what we’re going to see and hear in advance, but that’s the very reason we go, and keep right on going advert and all.

Marlene Dietrich a “piece of ice”! That’s not funny, that’s pathetic. Blindness is always tragic, and any one who cannot see the loveliness of Marlene or sense her warmth and glowing charity is indeed blind. Dietrich is the most alluring and fascinating actress on the screen. She has soul, depth, mystery.

Joan Crawford inspires you to laughter with her dramatics? Of course. Ignorance always laughs at that which it cannot understand. As such, it must be pitied and forgiven.

You call Helen Hayes “a brilliant artist.” Well—perhaps. But her brilliant artistry seems to have dimmed and flickered out entirely as far as the screen is concerned. Which, frankly speaking, causes me no regret, for I find her dull, drab, unattractive and uninteresting. I hope she is appreciated enough on the stage so that she remains there.

Ann Harding is another who is unforgivably dull and drab. She has no real talent, and certainly has no place on the screen. I heartily agree with Patricia Hansen and Penny Allen about this insipid and utterly colorless performer. I hope she joins Miss Hayes on the stage as quickly as possible.

What the Fans Think

Free Photographs.

Why are some stars more generous than others? I wrote to George Raft praising his acting and asked for a photo. I received a price list instead. Gary Cooper also sent a postcard asking me if I knew “how many, many such requests are made.” Actors who are more popular than those two and who haven’t as much money can send photos and letters, too. Noel Madison—who, in my opinion, can act better than most of the stars who have too much publicity like Gary Cooper—always answers his fan mail personally and sends photos free of charge. As do many others I could mention.

Gary Cooper and George Raft are incomparable.

Barbara Stanwyck.

Barbara Stanwyck is the type of girl who gives new interpretation every time one sees her on the screen. She makes one feel that life is worth living and is, consequently, the type of girl that we can look up to as our ideal. I might go further and say that she is perfection itself to come to life. We want more of Barbara. Give her a real break.

What is Mae West with her so-called sex-appeal, and Anita Louise with her angelic beauty, and scowl of other Hollywood beauties, compared to her? All these put together would only be like unto a candle in the glaring sunlight of Barbara Stanwyck’s wonderfulness. I hope to buy a magazine one day and find “What the Fans Think” crowded with letters of praise for Miss Stanwyck from fans all over the world. This is my first objective. The second is to get fans to help me find a suitable quotation or phrase to describe Barbara. Frankly, I’m at my rope’s end trying to find the right words. “Incomparable,” “the one and only,” et cetera, are not good enough. I want better ones. Won’t you fans help me?”

Like Being in Heaven.

I’d like to give my humble opinion about the most charming man that ever graced the screen—Bing Crosby. He’s a treat for the eyes and the ears. In fact, he has everything—poise, refinement, intelligence, charming modesty combined with good looks, fine acting ability, and last, but by no means least, the most gorgeous voice on earth.

When Bing sings in his adorable way, something goes off to every fiber and the feeling of being in heaven. No other voice can thrill me like his. Without him life in this dreary world would not be worth living.

I can think of no other actor who has honored the screen with his glorious voice and personality.

Sour Grapes.

Poor Joseph W. Puce! What a bad case of sour grapes Robert Taylor’s good looks have given you! Although I remain a bit indifferent to his charms myself, I do wish to contradict your absurdity of his rights and wrongs.

Certainly, he has much to learn about acting. But what gives you the idea that acting proficiency is a prime requisite for screen stardom? Granted that it helps; the more, the better. So, also, does a pleasing appearance. But personality is the main essential; that something of the spirit that catches and holds our fancy. And unless you are quite blinded by the pictures of yourself, you must see the lad has something more than good looks. My own guess is that his certain “something” is a fine character and that time will develop it.

I’ve been watching these movie people with interest high unto thirty years, now!” and such experience must rate some value. I'll continue a fan for another "thifty, I reckon," and I wouldn't be surprised to see Robert Taylor still going strong, for the screen is surely his rightful place. He's a natural.

Fans Never Forget.

LET's forget about Robert Taylor for a minute, fans, and concentrate on some one else who has earned our admiration and esteem and has proved a distinctive personality without a fraction of the publicity and fanfare that Taylor has received.

I am referring to Phillip Reed. It's true that he hasn't received roles worthy of him until he played Ursus, the young Indian, in "The Last of the Mohicans."

His fans know that he is capable of playing any role with ease; he is a splendid example of physical possession, possesses a keen intelligence, and has something that few of the really big stars can claim, rare tenderness and sincerity. He is a sincere friend to his fans, so let's show that we appreciate his friendship.

To get Michael Strugess' papers, he is forced to disown his mother, and to save her from torture he is apparently blinded by a red-hot iron. His eyesight is saved, though, and even terrible scars vanish when his valor is rewarded by the czar. Anton Walbrook, Viennese actor, gives an understanding performance of Michael though he is handicapped by lack of locks. Marget Grahame is a seductive spy who, failing to snare Michael, goes soft and sweet and sacrificial—such a disappointment! Miss Grahame's evil is so pleasant that it deserves to triumph—as it would in real life. Striking, too, is that magnificent scoundrel, Akim Tamiroff, and Fay Bainter is expertly heartrending as Michael's poor old mother.

"When You're in Love."—Columbia. Devotees of Grace Moore say this is her best picture since "One Night of Love." Even I discern its superiority to "The King Steps Out." At least it is less pretentious and artificial, though, of course, we must never hope for complete realism and conviction in a film that stars an operatic diva. Miss Moore has little or no contact with opera in this "Minnie the Moocher" being the piece de resistance, together with modern numbers and an arrangement of Schubert's "Serenade." It is chiefly a comedy with incidental music. Bright, unbelievable comedy embellished with witty dialogue by Robert Riskin, who made "Mr. Deeds Goes to Town" memorable because of his unusual gift for amusing talk. We have Miss Moore, an Australian singer unable to leave Mexico City because she is outside the quota. Her difficulty is solved when Cary Grant, a charming artist, agrees to marry her for a price and enable her to enter the United States. With this familiar set-up it is impossible to think of anything ensuing but bluffs, puts, misunderstandings—and love. Mr. Grant does wonders with his role besides knitting the story together and giving sincerity to the frail situations. But it is lively.

"The Great O'Malley."—Warners. Those two excellencies among stars, Pat O'Brien and Humphrey Bogart, are brought together in a picture that deals with the psychological problem of a policeman. It is good, obvious entertainment, with excitement, sentimentality and the regeneration of the hero to make it easy to take. Mr. O'Brien is described as a traffic policeman who lives by his book of rules and has no heart at all. He finds salvation and satisfaction in arresting drivers for minor infractions. His tactics are ridiculed in a newspaper and O'Malley is demoted to a crossing in front of a school. There lame Sylvia Jason enters his life, and you know what a way she has with her! Gradually, the policeman realizes that she is the daughter of the Mr. Bogart who is in prison because of O'Malley's persecution. It doesn't take him too long to pay for an operation that restores the child to health and bring about Mr. Bogart's release. All this is embarrassingly banal in the telling, but I insist that it is much better on the screen.

"John Meade's Woman."—Paramount. After chafing more than a year in Hollywood under contract, the stage actress, Francine Larrimore, makes her screen debut. So thoroughly does she take advantage of her opportunity, that she makes important a commonplace story and outshines Edward Arnold, George Bancroft and other film veterans. Here is one of the strongest first appearances made by any stage star. The role she plays is like others you have seen, but the actress is like no other you know. She is tough, sympathetic, vital and enormously courageous in playing to the hilt a realistic character instead of a pretty one. She credits us with responding to a ruthless character study more fully than to a so-called sympathetic heroine. Consequently, we find Miss Larrimore giving a grand performance for grown-ups. She is a farm girl who strays to Chicago for work, meets a lumber baron, humbly falls in love with him and is stunned when he asks her to marry him. When I tell you that he goes through the ceremony to spite his mercenary fiancée, you won't need to know what happens between the rich man and the waif. But see the picture. It's faulty but interesting and Miss Larrimore is important. Also, John Trent is in the cast.

"A Doctor's Diary."—Paramount. This picture will be remembered not for its plot but because it introduces John Trent in his first leading rôle. It is on a par with "Society Doctor," which has become a similar historical document in Robert Taylor's career. Not that I am comparing one with the other. That would be unfair. But Mr. Trent, the former transport pilot, is bound for a high place as an actor. He has poise, dignity, flexibility and masculine good looks. I see no handicap for him to overcome. Instead, I see every quality that promises sound popularity. He is concerned in a melodrama dealing with the evils of private hospitals and Mr. Trent's championing of the free patient. True, the development of the story doesn't fulfill the early promise of the argument and it gets nowhere in the end, what with a forced happy ending, but the picture has the proper bitterness to make it interesting and provocative. It is startling to hear that money plays a larger part in the medical profession than a desire to heal. Another pleasant newcomer, Ruth Coleman, makes her début as the heroine, but it is Mr. Trent's picture.

"The Man Who Could Work Miracles."—United Artists. This is the picture that some critics described as "marvelous." I am inclined to agree with those whose intuition keeps them away and to envy those who are not bound by duty to see it. For it is pretty tepid entertainment despite the featured name of H. G. Wells as author. One of the reasons, the chief, is the unattractive persons who comprise the cast. Roland Young is a far from often delightful comedian, but he is not suited for the rôle on the screen. Here he looks the commonplace British shop clerk who is endowed with the power to perform miracles by means of trick photography, but the character is not sufficient to hold one's interest. Of course there may be more meaning to Mr. Wells's fantasy than I discern, but it seems as flat as the more pretentious "Things to Come" by the same author. The moral of the piece may be that it is not good for man to be given godlike power for he will not know what to do with it. If so, that is the case, then the picture is even more obscure than I thought. Anyway, Ralph Richardson is excellent as the principal victim of Mr. Young's tricks. The picture is virtually minus feminine interest though Sophie Stewart and Joan Gardner are successful in achieving the dreary British speech of the commonplace girls they play.

ROBERT WOOLEY implies a famously bright combination that is neither one thing nor another, and for a moment suggests a kaleidoscopic effect. Robert is a combination of Anglo-Saxon for fame and old high German for bright. Woolsey, on the other hand, is a curtailment of the Middle English expression "linsey-woolley" which was the name of a coarse, cloth combination made of a mixture of linen and wool. In time the expression became synonymous for anything not entirely pure or any mixture in which the identity of the materials remained in doubt.

ALAN DINEHART means a Tartar warrior with a worthy and honorable heart. Alan is singular for the Latin name "Alani," which was the name of a Tartar warrior tribe near the Caspian Sea. The "Alani" overran the Roman Empire and are said to have worshiped the cross in the form of a naked sword fixed in the ground. Dinehart is from Latin and Middle English. Dine is from Latin "dignus," meaning worthy and honorable, while hart has nothing to do with the animal of that name, but is merely an old form of the English word heart.

GAIL PATRICK means a gay and joyous lady's waiting maid who is a patrician. Gail, as it stands, may be derived from the French for gay, happy, lively; but even when presumed to be a curtailment of Abigail, it still means joyous, for Abigail is from the Hebrew and means a source of joy. Incidentally, the name Abigail in English became synonymous for a lady's waiting maid, even as the name Bobby now refers to a policeman. Patrick is from the Latin for a patrician and is predominantly associated with the Irish because of the patron saint of that name.

KATHERINE DE-MILE means the purest one of a thousand. Katherine is from a Latin word influenced by the Greek for pure or purest. DeMille is plain French and means of or from a thousand.

JOHN BOLES is the same name as the English John Bull and means a loud, bovine voice that is a gift from God. John is Hebrew for a gift from God. Boles is a variation of the word bull which comes from the Anglo-Saxon root "bellan," meaning to bellow.

G. E. M.—James Ellison was born James Ellison Smith at Valier, Montana, May 4th. When he was six months old his parents moved to California. Graduating from Hollywood Polytechnic High School, his interests turned toward the theater. He appeared in many productions at the Pasadena Community Playhouse. Later, a job in a studio laboratory led to a screen test, and this to a contract. After appearing in several pictures, he was called for a featured role in the "Hopalong Cassidy" pictures. It was while playing in this series with William Boyd that he was selected for the role of Buffalo Bill in "The Plainsman." You might address him at the Paramount Studio. Yes, he played in "Hitch-Hike Lady," in 1935.

Jesse G.—It was Jean Arthur who played with Richard Cromwell, Donald Cook, and Anita Louise in "The Most Precious Thing in Life."

H. J. H.—A list of Ida Lupino's films will be mailed to you upon receipt of a stamped return envelope. She is about twenty, and is five feet four. When requesting a star's photograph it is customary to remit twenty-five cents to cover the cost.

L. L.—Jean Rogers was born in Belmont, Massachusetts, March 25, 1916. "When Love Is Young" was her latest. John King, in Cincinnati, Ohio, July 11, 1929. Next is "The Road Back," Phillip Green in New York City, but he doesn't say when. He is at present appearing on the stage.

Dear.—Frankie Darro has been playing in "Mind Your Own Business," with "Something for a Thrill" and "Devil Diamond" to follow. Leslie Howard's right name is Leslie Stainer.

S. A. S.—Shirley Temple's next is "Wee Willie Winkie." For photos of Myrna Loy and Raymond Walburn, address them in care of the studios listed.

It as he annexes from the greater incomes. The agent's ten per cent is still only ten per cent. And while it is still necessary to donate lavishly to charities, and support a large collection of relatives to "keep face," it is no longer essential, or even a popular fad, to maintain mausoleums in pairs, huge mansions, armies of servants: to dissipate fortunes on night life or social functions.

Proof that stars may now live quite economically is offered by many in all salary classes. From Mae West and Greer Garbo down to the group which saves half at its few-hundreds-a-week, and yet manages to pay off the mortgage on grandma's farm.

J. B.—An interview with Errol Flynn appeared in June, 1936. This may be had by sending your order with remittance of fifteen cents to our Subscription Dept. A list of fan clubs will be sent to you upon receipt of a stamped return envelope.

M. S. R.—During the scenes of the actual charge in "The Charge of the Light Brigade," the name of the piece played is "Battalions Rules the Waves." You might address him at the Paramount Studio. Yes, he played in "Hitch-Hike Lady," in 1935.

R. E. S.—Eleanor Whitney's right name is Wittenberg. Eleanor Powell's full name is Eleanor Torrey Powell. I know no player whose right name is Jane Northrup.

H. E. M.—It is so long since. "The Sheik" and "The Four Horsemen" were released that I doubt if stills are now available. You might inquire of the United Artists Publicity Dept., 729 Seventh Avenue, New York City.

L. S.—Dolores Costello Barrymore's right name is Dolores Costello. She has not remarried since she divorced John Barrymore. Jackie Cooper will be fourteen on September 15th. Mary Pickford's right name is Gladys Smith. The late Ross Alexander's was Ross Alexander Smith. Mona Barrie's is Mona Smith. Claudia Dell's is Claudia Smith. James Ellison's is James Ellison Smith.

Wondering.—I am really not in a position to say whether the stars have their secretaries rather than themselves sign the album leaflets which fans send to them for their autographs. That really is a personal matter which concerns only the stars have a right to answer.

S. J. B.—Barbara Read played the role of Kay in "Three Smart Girls."

Girls WHICH WOULD YOU

By Claudette Colbert

No. 1. The Man of the World
(Melvyn Douglas)

No. 2. The Pushover for Love
(Robert Young)

No. 3. He Thinks He Owns Her
(Lee Bowman)

Yes, if you were a working girl, out on your one big fling, a vacation you'd saved up for, for years, and three men told you they loved you and wanted to marry you, which one would you pick? The gay, casual, fun-loving lad who's just a pushover for any girl who comes along and who is sure she's going to be a pushover for him? The man of the world who always has to cover up his emotions with a veneer of sophistication? The serious-minded youngster who thinks, because he's gone around with you back home awhile, that he owns you? I don't know what your answer is going to be. But I know you're going to get a kick out of the way we've answered the question in Paramount's
"And to think only a couple of weeks ago I was working in an old department store from nine in the morning till six at night... Come on you two, get out the skis."

"I Met Him In Paris." And, between ourselves, I want to tell you the big bobsled accident in "I Met Him In Paris" may not frighten you... but, gee, was I scared!

(Listen, girls, Claudette forgot to tell you. But you can take it from us, the Parisian styles she goes in for in this picture will knock your eyes out.)
Musical Controversy.

My great favorite is the enchanting fairy princess of the films, Jeanette MacDonald. No one can surpass her in light opera or in musical comedies, but opera—never! I suffered most intensely during "Rose-Marie" and "San Francisco" when Miss MacDonald attempted the well-known arias that she sang in those two films. Her voice was thin, to put it mildly, and her French wasn’t any too good. Her American accent was too pronounced. Grace Moore’s voice is resonant, full, and mature. For real fine voices we have to go to the concert stage, opera, or radio where we hear Rosa Ponselle, Elisabeth Rethberg, and others of like caliber.

Although Miss MacDonald’s voice isn’t one of the truly great ones, I am looking forward with great pleasure to "Maytime" because I have enjoyed all her pictures starting from "The Love Parade" through "Monte Carlo" and "Affairs of Annabel" to her last three great successes.

Miss Moore is always given the credit for bringing grand opera to the masses. Years ago Miss MacDonald made a film called "Oh, for a Man!" with Reginald Denny. I remember quite distinctly that our prima donna sang opera in that picture. She played a temperamental diva and sang beautifully—I thought at that time—I wasn’t so critical then. It was an amusing picture but no one said anything about it.

When are we going to have the glamorous Viennese, Maria Jeritza, on the screen? I’ve been waiting for her début for two years.

Elizabeth Kultala.

2119 Byron Street, Berkeley, California.

Nothing More Than Tripe.

I WAS quite interested in the pro and con of Nelson Eddy, opera, and music in general. With the March copy right here under my nose I would like to add my say-so.

I think Eddy is a great singer, but I think that Lawrence Tibbett is greater, also Ezio Pinza and John Charles Thomas. And Eddy is wasted on tripe—I mean on the screen. Narnia Reichstadt is right there. Doris May, I believe, is on the right track when she says that full-length opera in pictures would never pay from the producers’ point of view.

I am reminded of the pictures selected for Gladys Swarthout. There is another fine artist who is wasted on tripe, even more so than Eddy. Why the Paramount moguls don’t get wise is beyond me. If I were Gladys I’d get out and away, even break a contract. She is one of the best—but the little bosses on the production lots simply won’t let her sing. Yeah, some little cheap ditty. Why should we waste a great statesman in the Jeanette MacDonald is "the enchanting fairy princess of the films" to Elizabeth Kultala, who thinks she is unsurpassable in light music but should avoid operatic arias.

HOW TO BECOME A MOVIE STAR

Can you kiss a man passionately when you really want to slap him? • Can you laugh when you feel like crying?

Can you cry when you feel like laughing? • Can you take constant criticism without losing your temper? • Can you learn two pages of dialogue in an hour? • Can you stand publicity about everything in your private life? • Can you stand to be emotionally shocked by seeing the truth about Hollywood? At last it has been filmed—the unforgettable moving, hilarious portrayal of Hollywood behind-the-scenes.
When writing to The Oracle, please include your full name and address. If requesting casts, a list of fan clubs, the names of all of a star's films, or information about how to obtain stills, a stamped envelope should be included. We regret that we cannot undertake to answer any contest questions.

Flynn follows "Another Dawn" with "The Prince and the Pauper."

JEANNE ANNETTE—You will find a story about Deanna Durbin in this issue. "Personal Property," with Robert Taylor, is Jean Harlow's next. Their birthdays are: Mr. Taylor, August 5, 1911; Miss Harlow, March 3, 1911; Deanna, December 4, 1912; Clark Gable, February 1, 1901; Greta Garbo, September 18, 1906. Most of the stars personally autograph their photographs.

J. L. E.—I believe you refer to Marilyn Knowelden, who played the role of Florence Uldry in "Anthony Adverse." She also played with Bobby Breen in "Rainbow on the River." Marilyn was born in Oakland, California, May 12, 1926.

GOMON CASANO—Frankie Darro is about five feet three and weighs about 114. George Ernest was born November 20, 1921. He is about four feet eleven, and weighs about 90 pounds.

E. W. G.—For stills of Tim McCoy films, you might write to the Publicity Dept., of Public Pictures, 243 Seventh Ave., New York City, and inquire if any are available and at what price.

HENRY WILCOXON FAY—For that picture of Mr. Wilcoxson which you saw in March Picture Play, you might write to the Paramount Publicity Dept., 243 Seventh Ave., New York City, and ask them if it is available and at what price.

D. H.—For stills of "Captain Blood" and "The Charge of the Light Brigade," I can only suggest that you write to the Publicity Dept., of Warner Brothers, 321 West 44th Street, New York City, and inquire if they are still available and how much they cost.

MARJORIE REED—Al- lian Jones appears with Maureen O'Sullivan and the Marx Brothers in "A Day at the Races," and, as you know, will appear with Jeanette MacDonald in "The Firefly." I cannot say who will be given the leading male roles in these two pictures. "Desert Song" and "The Student Prince" if, and when, they are brought to the screen.

office of a city hall in a small town? Same thing.

It seems to me that the screen started out well in introducing good—I said good—music. Such as “He Miss Tonight,” “One Night of Love,” “Here’s to Romance,” “Metropolitan,” “I Dream Too Much,” and “Love Me Forever.” Those were wonderful pictures.

Since then what have we had? Tripes. Nothing much more than that. Were the first ones only a bait—so that the music-loving movie-goers might be educated to tripes, learn to love tripes, get to appreciate the cheap? In other words; are the producers trying to bring the best down to their level, or, should I perhaps say the level of the mob? To the level of tin-pan alley? And the dance hall?

I get a bit sour now and then, but, as I think of it, the movies have made fine progress. I am grateful for Huston and Connolly and Pons and Muni and Lombard and Powell; and “Winterset” and “One in a Million,” and “Camille.” Let us hope that the B pictures and the C singing and D acting will be weeded out, little by little. D. E. Swanson.

A Contradiction.

I BELIEVE that R. J. Kennedy’s comments in March Picture Play will start a deluge of letters as did Freda Wakeling’s. I wish to contradict Mr. Kennedy’s remark that Nelson Eddy’s voice is dull and flat and lacks “life and animation and warmth.” The very idea of saying such things! All those who listen regularly to his programs and attend his concerts know better. His interpretation of every type of song is far superior to any other singer’s I have ever heard. It takes plenty of versatility to do any kind of song and still do them all as well as Mr. Eddy does.

For Mr. Kennedy’s information I happen to know that Freda Wakeling does know something about music. And I agree with her about James Melton. He should never be compared to Mr. Eddy, but I shall say this, that Nelson Eddy is on top of the world in radio, concert, and movies (and has been in opera, too—and he is bound to be on top at the Metropolitan when he considers himself ready) and that Mr. Melton is now, singing on the vaudeville stage.

Eddy on An Animated Dummy.

I SEE from a recent letter in this department by R. J. Kennedy that I am not the only fan who thinks the muchly raved about Nelson Eddy is overrated. His voice is grand, so why doesn’t he stick to concert and radio work where we can enjoy it? He certainly is no actor! When I go to a movie I like to be able to lose myself in the picture, and actors have to be good in order to make one do that. Take the love scenes in “Rose-Marie” and “Naughty Marietta” where Mr. Eddy is supposed to be making love to the charming Jeanette MacDonald. He is looking at her, yes, but through her. No feeling there at all. In every one of his pictures it’s the same thing.

To me, Nelson Eddy is an animated dummy—no acting ability whatsoever. Miss MacDonald is charming, such feeling that she portrays, who can doubt that she is a fine actress?

Now that is off my chest I want to give three cheers for a real actor with a voice few men possess—Nino Martini. His performance in “The Gay Desperado” is tops. Why not team him with Miss MacDonald? Then we’ll have some real entertainment.

Opera in a Grand Manner.

HAVING read the many letters which all seemed to give Nelson Eddy the honor of presenting grand opera to the screen, I feel that these fans have forgotten one artist who really deserves this honor—Nino Martini. Certainly his splendid performance, both acting and singing, in “The Gay Desperado,” his excellent radio programs, and his successful career in opera should be enough proof of his greatness.

Is there any male lead outside of Mr. Martini who can present “Aida” or any other opera favorites with the success needed to hold the attention of the public?

In my estimation, Mr. Martini is unsurpassed in the field. Let’s have grand opera presented in a grand manner by Nino Martini.

The Stars of “Camille.”

LIKE many others, I have wondered whether Robert Taylor could really act or if he just breezes through pictures depending on his handsome face and happy-go-lucky personality to put him across. After seeing him as Armand, in “Camille,” I am satisfied that he has more to him than the tricks mentioned above. This was a very pleasant surprise to me, and from now on I hope the producers will give him roles with more depth to them. Not that we want to see him in clumsy parts, but where more can be expected of him than here-tofore.

As for Miss Garbo, whose acting was supposed to have greatly over-shadowed that of Robert Taylor, all I can say is that it was not necessary for her to act—she looked the part of the consumptive Marguerite very convincingly and I feel that where she really belongs is in a sanitarium. I actually shuddered for Robert when she kissed him so fervently in several of the scenes (not that we blamed her in the least, but living in this germ-conscious age we were very concerned about the object of her affection). How does the simpering Garbo continue to get away with it?

I am just another Scandinavian who does not appreciate Garbo one bit.

Two Sides to Every Question.

LOOKS like a scheme to embarrass me,” came the pleasing voice of America’s newest screen “find” over the radio one evening. “Not at all,” the Master of Ceremonies assured Robert Taylor after he had showered a volume of compliments upon the handsome young man in question.

A few nights later came a commentator’s disquieting news item of “handsome movie star’s” grandfather on relief.” The concise account in the papers leads me to the belief that this is not a scheme to embarrass Taylor but an attempt to injure Taylor. But relatives sometimes are that way. I wish the aunt and uncle to know here and now that this news item has not lessened my opinion of Robert Taylor in the slightest—quite to the contrary, for it has occurred to me that maybe Bob has had more than one such drawback to overcome, and having successfully done so, he must have had talent and initiative. His splendid work in “Camille” proves his talent because his Armand could not be improved upon, and that is an achievement for the role is a difficult one. Such poise and sincerity are seldom found in a player so young. His work justifies the trust placed in him by his own employers and the confidence with which his fans regard him.

DOESN’T IT LOOK EASY?

Yet it’s from the famous “Merry Widow” Waltz!

HERE’S PROOF that you, too, can learn to play the piano or any other instrument!

JUST strike the notes indicated above and you will actually be playing the opening bars of one of the world’s favorite musical compositions! And it’s just as easy to play other famous melodies, too, when you use the wonderful “Note-Finder”.

This invention of the U. S. School of Music takes the mystery out of the piano keyboard, once away with tedious study and practice, enables anyone to play a real tune almost from the start. And that’s the way this modern method works. You learn to play by playing. Soon you will be thrilled and delighted to find that you can pick up almost any piece of popular music and play it at sight. And that applies to the piano or violin, the saxophone or guitar, the accordion or which ever instrument you choose for your own.

Takes Only Few Minutes a Day!

Do you wonder that over 70,000 people all over the world have taken advantage of this easy way to learn music at home? Don’t let old-fashioned ideas deprive you of the joys of playing any longer. You don’t need special talent, you don’t need previous knowledge of music; you don’t need to spend months on monotonous drills and exercises. It’s fun to learn music this modern way. It’s easy an A-B-C, it takes only a few minutes a day.

FREE Demonstration Lesson

This demonstration lesson will give you the surprise of your life. It will show you, in black and white, how you can quickly realize your dreams of playing your favorite instrument. With the demonstration lesson, you will also receive a handsome illustrated booklet and details of the remarkable money-saving offer that enables you to learn music at home in a few cents a day. Wake Up, Hollywood!

Is it true what they say about Hollywood? Or is it possible that such eminent authors of two of the most popular plays, “Boy Meets Girl” and “Stage Door” are talking through their hat? These two successful plays which are running on Broadway give us the lowdown of the real Cinema City. “Boy Meets Girl” presents a bedlam of authors, producers, and directors in Hollywood who don’t know what they are doing. George Kaufman and Edna Ferber in their “Stage Door” tell us that Hollywood doesn’t give you a chance to show your abilities, they tell you how not to act and then make you a star; that the stage is the only place where true talent can be found, and the sole place it actually exists.

This all runs true to form in the case of Ethel Merman. This singer has all the ingredients that are necessary to go over big with the public, plus box-office appeal, but this superficial city refuses to wake up to the fact. Every one of Miss Merman’s Broadway plays have proved to be colossal hits. In her current opus, “Red, Hot and Blue,” the most critical reviewers have praised her to the hilt. Yet when Hollywood came along and snapped her up she was given minor roles that didn’t do her justice.

It isn’t any fault of Miss Merman’s that she isn’t seen in more films plus bigger and better roles. It merely goes back to the stupidity of Hollywood and the people who make the wheels of the film capital go round.

Hollywood is spending millions of dollars bringing such foolish so-called actresses as Simone Simon and Ida Lupino to the screen. They insist on giving us fresh talent. Yes, we want talent, but we want talent that can be appreciated. So by giving us a French nobody with a double name and a double agent, Hollywood has the temerity to presume that we, the public, are satisfied. No, Hollywood, we want something that is different, refreshing, real. In other words we demand Ethel Merman!

Robert Montgomery finds something very amusing on the set. His next is “Night Must Fall.”

The Best Ever.

In Norma Reichstadt’s letter in the March issue she stated that Jeanette MacDonald does not have a voice for operatic music and that she should never attempt to sing it. I disagree with her. In the first place, MGM is too smart to let Miss MacDonald sing opera if she didn’t know how, and, in the second place, Miss MacDonald was offered a contract to sing at the Metropolitan Opera House if they don’t know how to judge good singers I don’t know who can; certainly not Miss Reichstadt.

In my estimation, too little praise has been thrown Jeanette MacDonald’s way. In “Naughty Marietta” and “Rose Marie,” she gave a splendid performance, but did she get much credit? No. Most of it was given to Nelson Eddy. Not that he didn’t deserve it, because he did, but it might have been a different story had some one else played Miss MacDonald’s part. You very seldom find on the screen or stage a woman as lovely as Jeanette, who can both act and sing and who has as sparkling a personality as she has. So here’s to you, Jeanette, the best there ever was or ever will be.

A Matter of Opinion.

THE stage has centuries of tradition, yes, and its freedom in the choice of subject matter is far ahead of the screen today. This is all very well in some cases where latitude is necessary for the discussion of social problems, but I think it a good thing that the screen is subject to restriction and censorship. The pornographic play openly performed on Broadway, the strip-tease girls in burlesque shows, the frequently foul language heard on the stage, are better not seen and heard except by limited audiences who are prepared for such exhibitions. If, because of this freedom of speech and action, the stage is more legitimate than the screen I wish some one would enlighten me.

ONE has only to pass a season of theater-going in New York to have inflicted on him numerous plays more trivial, worthless and mistaken than could be found in as many “B” photo-plays, or even among those coming under a lower classification. He will have seen them in badly ventilated theaters, no matter how much he has paid for his seat. The New York stage, for all its legitimacy, hasn’t had a new playhouse with modern improvements in years and years. Stuffy air, gloomy lounges, uncomfortable seats and dingy decorations are taken for granted by followers of the stage nowadays and there are few deviations from this rule. The devotee who must perforce content himself with a seat upstairs in these outmoded pleasure palaces breathes vitiated air in a posture that makes relaxation out of the question. Never mind about the greater expenditure of time and money exacted by the stage. They are too well known.

Of course, he will have seen such past mistresses of the art of acting as Katharine Cornell and Helen Hayes, and such brilliant luminaries as Alfred Lunt, Lynn Fontanne, Lillian Gish, and Ina Claire, as well as John Gielgud and Maurice Evans. But is the acting of these unquestioned leaders more legitimate than that of outstanding stars of the screen? You decide!

At least I hope I have made my point and that you join my protest against the inaccuracy of that old-fashioned phrase, “legitimate stage.” Let the stage remain the stage and the screen stand as the screen. We call opera and musical comedy by name and let them go at that, knowing that every one is aware of the difference. Only the provincial-minded prefix the word “grand” to opera. This is as funny old-fashioned as insisting that the stage is legitimate. It harks back to the days of the old-time barn-storming actor in a frayed fur coat who pompously reiterated his contention that it was “the legitimate” in contrast to the then prosperous vaudeville stage. He was pathetic because his listeners knew that vaudeville wouldn’t have him.

Kirsten Flagstad enters the movies to sing an operatic sequence in “The Big Broadcast of 1936.” This is splendid news and as it should be. The greatest of present-day singers makes it possible for every one to see and hear her. Only a limited few may see her at the Metropolitan or in concert, while those who hear her on the air are denied sight of her grand presence. Mind you, she is not unwisely attempting the screen as the heroine of some trivial plot, but in one of her famous rôles in an excerpt from one of the great operas. Just as Leopold Stokowski was presented with dignity and showmanship in "The Big Broadcast of 1937," so may Paramount be depended upon to introduce Flagstad in the same manner to a waiting world larger than she has ever known. Perhaps she may sing her sublime "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde," or some other aria from a Wagnerian opera. What is sure is that she will not be wasted on anything less musically. Nor permit herself to be.

Flagstad's decision to sing in a film is significant. Money alone is not a temptation to an artist of her renown, nor is there any likelihood that she will become a personality girl, the pet of a fan club. I should say that she recognizes the importance of the screen and the legitimacy of it as a medium for her art, and that her greatest reward will be in reaching a new and larger public: in winning many to an appreciation of music which they would not otherwise hear.

Do followers of fan magazines ever tire of reading interviews, articles, news, and gossip about stars? Are they interested in any other topics relating to pictures? Do they care more for the stars than the films in which they appear? For example, would you rather read a description of sound recording than what your favorite star thinks of life, love, housekeeping, clothes, or her leading man?

From time to time some mature well-wisher of Picture Play asks why we never publish information about the preparations for a picture and the work of the many highly skilled contributors besides the stars who make possible the finished whole. Of course, the fabrication of a modern picture is a wonderful achievement mechanically and artistically. Few outside the studios realize how many persons cooperate and coordinate in bringing about the miracle that we accept as a motion picture and call good, bad, or indifferent. But are readers of a fan magazine, who contemplate personalities primarily, interested in the various aspects of production? Would they like to know how the names in the cast of "Maytime," formed of floating flower-petals on a drifting stream, are photographed? Or, as one critic of the magazine good-humorously puts it, do the majority of readers really insist on knowing why Don Wan has one nostril a thirty-second of an inch higher than the other?

It is significant that the majority of questions asked in countless letters to The Oracle are actuated by a desire for personal information and not technical details. Where was Nelson Eddy born, and is Ginger Rogers a natural blonde? These questions, as well as those other letters which express opinions of stars and request news of them, cannot but dictate the contents of the magazine to a large extent. But are not fans overlooking much that would interest them when they confine their curiosity to the stars?

I wish they would let me know. Hollywood has a wealth of material that never reaches the public prints. Some of it could well be published here, if readers in sufficient numbers request it. Of course, articles on technical subjects would crowd out a certain amount of star material, space being what it is, but I wish you would let me know. Whether Picture Play is as you prefer it now, or would you like the magazine better if it departed somewhat from its present make-up?

When man bites dog, that's news they say. When star asks editor for his photograph, that's front-page news in his life story. He is not likely to have had a similar request in I don't know how many years of experience with the gifted. In fact he never has had, though proof of amiable interest on the part of stars has been abundant. I am speaking of myself as the beaming editor and Joan Crawford as the star who broke the rule. Just further evidence that she is unlike all other stars past and present and is, I believe, one of the rarest girls in the world.

You may have read Lucius Beebe's anecdote of Gloria Swanson. Whether you have or not, I feel in duty bound to retell it because she is one of my favorite persons and the story is typical of her alertness and wit. Lunching at a New York restaurant, she wore a saucy little hat topped with a cluster of maroon carnations, real ones. Elsa Maxwell stopped to ask how she kept them crisp and fresh. "Just with a little water on the brain," explained Miss Swanson. Incidentally, that picture she was to make for Metro-Goldwyn, tentatively called "Maze Kenyon," is a matter of conjecture. It seems that the script was not developed according to Miss Swanson's liking. We'll probably be hearing her on the air until it is.
GLADYS GEORGE and Franchot Tone, with Spencer Tracy, are stars of "They Gave Him a Gun," a powerful story that provides each of them with a "different" characterization, especially Mr. Tone. He is an office worker who becomes a racketeer, a coward who becomes brave when he has a gun to shoot and a man to kill.
THIS is such an old, old story.
The story of the actress passed up by Hollywood after what might have been an opportunity went aglimmering, and forced to seek other means of livelihood until Hollywood finally claimed her, midst trumpeting and fanfare.
Such an old story to apply to such a young actress.
Deanna Durbin is fourteen years old. Despite contradictory reports, there repose in the files of the municipal government of Winnipeg, Canada, a birth certificate stating that one Edna Mae Durbin was born there on December 4, 1922. Edna Mae has since become Deanna, because Deanna, connected with Durbin, is more euphonious than Edna Mae.
And, as for that opportunity which ended only in disappointment, she was once under contract to Metro-Goldwyn for nearly a year. They didn't know what to do with her, finally putting her in a short subject, which, since the success of "Three Smart Girls," has finally been released.
But MGM let her go, and, with the golden opportunity behind her, she turned to radio, on the Eddie Cantor program, as female soloist. Just another heart broken by Hollywood's indifference. That is, it would have been broken, perhaps, had she been old enough to understand the significance of the event. Hearts don't break so easily at the age of twelve.
Then Charles R. Rogers, production head of Universal, heard her on the air, and arranged to meet her. To-day he is one of Hollywood's proudest men, for his faith has been justified.
But he admits that he hardly anticipated her resounding success. Perhaps he didn't dare to. Producers are necessarily skeptical; they never know until after a picture is released just how the public will take to a new player.
One Smart Girl

This attitude on the part of Rogers was of invaluable aid to Deanna, for, when "Three Smart Girls" was released, she burst like the proverbial bombshell on the public. She was truly a sensation, the more for being so unexpected.

Now, what about Deanna herself? How has she reacted to this sudden success?

It has had one invaluable effect on her; she is determined now to become an operatic star eventually. It was always the goal, even when she was singing in Sunday school and neighborhood entertainments, but there were obstacles. All those obstacles have now been removed; she is acclaimed, operatic institutions are interested in her, there are sufficient finances, and she now has the confidence in her ability.

Her voice teacher is Andres de Segurola, one-time Metropolitan Opera baritone. His faith in her eventual operatic success is unlimited. He says that "she flaps less often than Jeanette MacDonald," and that "her diction is better than Grace Moore's." Deanna now believes in herself.

But, other than in her vocal development, she is no prodigy. She is in the ninth grade in the studio school, just about normal for a girl her age. In the matter of reading, she is just now emerging from the enjoyment of children's literature exclusively. Her first grown-up book was "White Banners." She enjoyed it, but professes to some doubtful understanding of certain philosophical passages. And that is as it should be.

Most interviewers who go to the studio approach her with some trepidation. They don't know exactly what to expect. But they are soon put at ease; for Deanna behaves quite normally. At her first giggle—oh, yes, she's no different in that respect from other girls of her age—they realize that they're talking to a girl who is just verging on young womanhood, with childhood still looking over her shoulder.

She's shy, a trifle awkward at times, and interested only in things a girl of her age should be interested in. It wasn't long ago that she was known as "the pest" by older boys and girls on the beach at Santa Monica. She was always in the way, and teasing them about their adolescent romances.

When she heard that the studio was contemplating giving her just such an adolescent romance in a future picture, she said, "I don't want any of that romance stuff." But, give her another year!

On the opposite page, Deanna Durbin poses with Leopold Stokowski, famous orchestra leader who will be with her in "100 Men and a Girl," her new picture. Below, Deanna looks no more than her fourteen years. She was born December 4th, 1922.

In the corner, she goes over her geography lesson with Harold Minnier, her tutor, who accompanies her to the studio when she is working.

ON a day in summer a boy was swimming lazily in the sunlit waters of Long Island Sound. He had the place to himself—or so he thought. It was still too early for the flock of young people whose families spent their summers at Douglaston and who would soon come trooping down like a flock of gayly-colored, oversized birds for their afternoon swim.

Turning over, he caught a glimpse of blue on the float. Some one else down already? But who? He didn't recognize the turquoise-blue bathing suit nor the lovely lines of the figure. But as he drove his long limbs through the water, an exciting suspicion began to quicken in his mind.

For some days now the town's younger element had been agog with the news that a summer place had been rented by the mother of a girl who had just made a hit in a musical show called "Top Speed."

There is something of the poet in his description of the picture she made, "which was so vivid that at times I close my eyes to bring it back again. She was like a young colt with the wind in its hair, if you know what I mean—sort of long and leggy, standing perfectly still, yet giving the impression of being tremendously alive. I could see the sun glinting on her red-gold hair, and then I was hanging onto the float, looking up into those smoky, blue-gray eyes—wonderful eyes with dark, shadowy lashes.

"You're Ginger Rogers, aren't you?" he asked, breathless from both exertion and eagerness.

"Yes," said the vision. She wasn't unfriendly exactly, but he did get the impression that she'd learned how to hold importunate boys at a cool arm's length.

"I'm sorry," he rushed on. "My name's Philip Huston, and I know I should have waited to be introduced. But we all saw you in 'Top Speed,' and went nuts about you, and when we heard you were coming here—well, it was like a Christmas present in the middle of summer.

She was looking down into a lean, tanned face. Water dripped from the head, sleek and softly brown as a seal's. The sensitive lips were half parted, there was a cleft in the chin, and the brown eyes were alight with youthful candor and good will. The glimmer of a smile shone in her own eyes and dawned at the corners of her mouth.

"That was a good speech," she said. "Let's swim."

Insofar as her time permitted, Ginger joined the young circle in their fun at Douglaston that summer. If Phil Huston was with her more than the others, it wasn't because she singled him out, but because for the first time he had fallen deep in love.

"It was a completely one-sided romance," he says with the honest objectivity that makes him likable. "It never went beyond casual friendship with Ginger. I realized it never would. But I realized, too, that I was somehow getting more from her friendship than from any girl I'd ever known. And it wasn't just me. The whole crowd got to have the same feeling about her.

"You see, they were rather a soft bunch—plenty of money, and mostly spoiled. They liked to fancy themselves sophisticated, but they were just as keen on celebrities as any hick. So here comes this girl with youth and beauty and the glamour of success on the stage, and because of those things they all made a bee line for her. But they found out before long that Ginger the girl was more important than Ginger the star—what she's like inside, I mean, was worth more and wore better than any glamour.

"It's hard to describe Ginger. She has a zest for life that's contagious—just to be near her makes you feel more alive. Yet there's nothing wild or exuberant about her. She was just a kid in those days, but she never babbled or leaped about like most kids of her age. She seemed to have skipped the silly stage of adolescence. She was on the quiet side, didn't talk overmuch, and never about herself."

The boy was in love. The girl wasn't. When he couldn't see Ginger, he'd do the next best thing—go to her mother and take his head off about the girl. Mrs. Rogers is a wise and understanding woman. She'd let him talk himself hoarse on the subject of her daughter, then by degrees lead the conversation round to herself. He found himself telling her how he'd run away to sea at fifteen, how he'd drifted into this and that without getting anywhere, how he wanted to write, but didn't think he was good enough, and talking of himself, he'd forget Ginger for a while and the ache of unrequited love.

But the lovely summer came to an end. Ginger went into rehearsal for "Girl Crazy," and Phil couldn't quite face the thought of a Gingerless world.

He'd hang about backstage, contenting himself to performe with a word or a smile, or whatever she had time to give him. And slowly an idea began to take shape in his head. Why shouldn't he go on the stage? He didn't know why the notion appealed to him so strongly. He wasn't introspective enough for much self-analysis. It wasn't exactly to show Ginger that he could do it, though that was part of it. And there was a vague feeling that to share her profession, to live in her own world of the theater, would in a sense bring her closer to him.

Because Ginger had started in vaudeville, he betook himself to a vaudeville booking office. "What experience?" asked the agent.

"Before I had a chance to lie—'and I would have lied,' says Phil—a man in the corner, eyeing his six feet of lean brawn. said: 'You're just the type I need for my act. This guy has to look like a football player and throw me around.'"

"I'll throw you around," agreed Phil, and the deal was made.

Jubilant, he raced back to break to Ginger the news that he was a fellow Thespian. She listened with that little smile in her eyes that he'd come to know so well.

"That's grand, Phil." Then she looked at him for a moment, and her face turned sober. "You know, Phil, a million people are breaking their hearts to get a place on the stage. If it's what you really want, you'll have to get ready to break your heart to get it."

On the opposite page, Ginger Rogers interrupted her work in "Shall We Dance?" to be photographed with Phil Huston for this story of their friendship. "Through admiration of her, he went on the stage and later into films. She encouraged and helped him all along the way to his current success.

Phil Huston says, "She's never done a thing to kick a single stone out of the pedestal I put her on. Everything she's done has only built it higher." A fine tribute, indeed.

THEY SAY IN NEW YORK—
BY KAREN HOLLIS
VISITING STARS ENLIVEN THE SCENE, OF COURSE, BUT COMPLICATE LIFE IN MANHATTAN TERRIBLY.

Devoted as I am to many stars, there are moments when I wish they could be routed over one-way streets, or allowed out in Manhattan only at restricted hours. Their presence complicates simple errands so terribly.

The day Glenda Farrell arrived en route to London, Grand Central Station was like Main Street on circus-parade day. Commuters trying to reach their offices were swept along with the crowd.

The day Sylvia Sidney was buying kitchenware in the basement of our largest department store, not a salesgirl could be bothered to wait on any one else. They swarmed around her with a buzz almost as terrifying as the locusts in "The Good Earth."

Zasu Pitts getting her hair dressed at the Hotel Pierre, carried on like old home week with Christine Mayo, who used to be in pictures but now is beauty counselor to screen and society belles.

Grace Moore and Gloria Swanson drew a crowd that choked traffic around the Metropolitan Opera House when they went backstage to congratulate Gladys Swarthout as "Mignon."

Gary Cooper and his wife finally got in the door of a tobacconist's on Fifth Avenue, but with their nerves frayed. And when Cooper finally selected a pipe with an elongated bowl, a restraining hand clutched his arm. "Oh, no, that won't do at all, sir! The best people use only round ones this season," Cooper whirled, only to be confronted by the suavely demoniac Roland Young.

At least I wasn't trying to summon the coast guard to my rescue the day they were taking Helen Flint for a bumpy ride over the waters of New York harbor. With the aim, I might add, of calling attention to "Sea Devils," her latest picture. And it really didn't matter that I was an hour late for a dinner party at the Pierre, all because some four thousand people were trying to push their way into the ballroom from which Jack Benny broadcast while he was in the East.
Stage Yields Another Favorite.—For years Fay Bainter rejected all picture offers, but now, with three films finished, she wonders what she was afraid of. She has not yet seen "Quality Street," but she has the assurance of those who have that audiences have taken her to their hearts.

Coming East for a brief vacation, she hustled to her home near Ossining-on-the-Hudson, and it was no easy matter to get her to leave her garden and come in town for a chat.

Vivid and radiant in blue skirt, yellow sweater, tweed jacket, Czecho-Slovakian scarf and green Alpine hat, she had the ease of manner and true graciousness that come with hard-won eminence. What, I found myself wondering in panic, will the screen do when there are no more Alice Brady, Estelle Winwood, Elizabeth Patterson—so expert, so disciplined—to draw from the stage?

"It was a joy to work with a girl like Kate"—Miss Hepburn to you—Fay Bainter said. "She is so sensitive, so eager to study and develop her talent, so intent on having every performance in her pictures balanced."

Maybe girls like Hepburn will acquire the skill of oldtimers through sheer determination.

Blond Pepper.—If Miss Bainter was disinclined to mention her own big contribution to the give-and-take of the studio, it will be known, anyway, for the volatile Barbara Pepper arrived in town about the same time bubbling with enthusiasm.

While working as a gunman's moll in "Too Many Wives" she was permitted the rare privilege of watching the Hepburn company work. "I've never seen anything so marvelously eloquent as Fay Bainter's hands," she told. "I used to watch her, then go home and spend hours before the mirror trying to adopt her movements."

"I think that a girl who is trying to learn to act ought to pick out a great artist like Miss Bainter, some one not at all her own type, and study how she gets effects. While she was working at the studio, another company tried to borrow me for a part that would have delighted me at any other time. But I was desolate at the thought of going where I couldn't watch Fay Bainter every day."

The Nighthawk Troupe.—If there is a night club, a smart restaurant, a couturier's, or a beauty salon that Janet Gaynor and Margaret Lindsay passed up during their brief visit here, don't let them know. They set out to do the town thoroughly, with Mrs. Gaynor somewhat wearily keeping step all around the clock.

Lunching at the Colony, which elegantly pretends to resent the intrusion of stars, but really floats over them. At "21" with Charles Farrell, who was leaving for picture-making in London, with praises of James Stewart in his old "Seventh Heaven" rôle ringing in his ears. At the Savoy-Plaza with a Doctor Veblen, a constant swain of Janet's. At the Kit Kat Club until almost dawn.

Through it all, Janet seemed to draw on an endless well of hilarity—a far cry from the wistful, eager young person she was so short a time ago. She and Margaret Lindsay had hoped to go to Bermuda, but Warners summoned Miss Lindsay back in haste and Janet thought she might as well go along to start studying the rôle of "Melanie" in "Gone With the Wind."

Jeanette MacDonald and Gene Raymond are both conservative moderns whose tastes are similar. They both like the attentions of fans, too, and never shy away from autograph seekers.

PORTRAIT of a BRIDEGROOM

ALL THE WORLD KNOWS THAT GENE RAYMOND IS TO MARRY JEANETTE MACDONALD IN JUNE. HERE, THEN, IS A CLOSE-UP THAT TELLS EXACTLY WHAT HE IS LIKE.

I had always thought that Gene Raymond was shy. Perhaps that was because the first time I met him, some years ago, he was at a party at the Roosevelt Room, and a beauteous blonde was in determined pursuit of him. She was one of those expensive-looking creatures, dappled in white satin and emeralds, and looking as though she were accustomed to having her own way.

Gene, who, after all, has been pursued by some pretty skillful females in his day, was trying to be nice about it—trying not to embarrass his hostess, or to affront the blonde. I never saw a mere miserable fellow in my life, outside a dentist's chair. The end of the evening found him reduced to speechless exhaustion, while the unfortunate one clung to his elbow and babbled pretty nothing.

Now, I am a shy person, myself, and when I went to fulfill an engagement with him a day or two ago, I somehow pictured the two of us sitting opposite one another, with the conversation running something like "Nice day." "Uh-huh." Pause. "Bad weather last week, though." "Rotten!" Pause.

Well, it wasn't like that at all. Gene is a crisp, friendly fellow, with a pleasant knack of making you feel he means it when he tells you that he is awfully happy to meet you.

A few minutes later, when we entered the Vendome for lunch, the inevitable autograph hounds and amateur photographers darted at him. He signed the little books cheerfully, and smiled amiably at the cameras.

"Don't you get rather fed up with that kind of thing, after a time?" I asked him as we seated ourselves at the table.

"No, not a bit. In fact, I like it! I like people, and enjoy their enthusiasm. I like what they have done for me, personally. I like seeing them, and reading their letters. I learn a lot from them.

"Jeanette," (as you must know by this time, he is engaged to Jeanette MacDonald) "enjoys it too, and that's fortunate. It would be very trying if one of us were always trying to leave a night club or premiere by a back entrance, while the other wanted to mingle with the fans!"

"But I have always looked upon you as being rather shy," I insisted, genuinely surprised at this display of gregariousness.

"I think I probably was," he agreed, "but Hollywood knocks that out of a fellow. Hollywood insists upon your being cozy with it. It evinces such a friendly interest in you, and wants to know all about you. It's like a village in that respect."
"After you have made personal appearances, faced microphones, run the gamut of crowds at restaurants, and been photographed doing everything from donning make-up to taking a shower, you are either cured of shyness, or there's something radically deficient about you. As I said before, I not only don't mind the attention of the fans, I really like it!"

As we chatted, I began to think that I could see what had happened to Gene since I first met him. He has put his house in order. The process has been good for him, and the results are becoming to him, if you know what I mean. His success hasn't come to him with the dizzying, confusing suddenness with which the heights are so often attained in pictures. He came to the screen with a solid background of endeavor and experience; (he made his first appearance on the stage at the age of five, and had numbers of adult stage successes before he came to the screen.) Gene's rise has been steady, logical, and solid. He has his feet on the ground, and intends to keep them there.

His engagement to Jeanette MacDonald has, of course, done something important for him. For two or three years he was one of Hollywood's most-often-rumored-engaged young men. Eligible and personable bachelors don't grow on gooseberry bushes even here, and numbers of ladies vied considerably for his attentions. Gene liked parties, and, as was natural, enjoyed having a pretty girl on his arm when he attended them.

There was a period when the reporters were all dithering over his frequent appearances with Janet Gaynor. Then, suddenly, there was Jeanette MacDonald.

As a matter of plain fact, there was no serious romance in Gene's life...
SPIRIT-LIFTING FASHIONS

FOR THEIR PERSONAL WARDROBES
THE STARS CONSULT "NICKY."
HERE IS HER ADVICE ABOUT CLOTHES AND HATS THAT DO THINGS TO ONE.

WHEN stars-to-be are young and struggling, they often, on the advice of managers and worldly-wise friends, take the bankroll, slip into the doorway between giddy show windows marked "Nicole de Paris," and say "Nicky, I want the one hat that is absolutely right for me. My whole future depends on it. But if worst comes to worst, I may have to wear it a long, long time."

Nicky, an explosive mite of a Frenchwoman, has a deep and knowing sympathy for a girl like that. She sends her out in a simple dull crêpe dress with an endless assortment of crisp white collars and capes and vestees, and a hat of finest felt with a white flower or feather that seems to proclaim to the world, "Whee, but my life is exciting!"

The girl could wear it through many springs and autumns and always look distinguished, but she rarely has to. Nicky's followers have a way of becoming famous and prosperous.

"It's a young and innocent hat, so wear it at a daring angle," Nicole told Margo, above. Janet Gaynor has this hat in many materials and colors.

"Hats up from the forehead imply you've not a care in the world," she says. And Betty Lawford, right, hasn't.
So, ironically enough, this designer, who is so expert at creating one costume that a girl could wear everywhere until it fell to shreds, is patronized by Marlene Dietrich, Carole Lombard, Kay Francis, Claudette Colbert, Janet Gaynor, and Barbara Hutton, of the fabulous millions, who order twenty or thirty hats and dresses at a time.

But don’t jump to the conclusion that they are all different. Nicky often finds that there are but three basic hats that look absolutely right on a girl, no matter how beautiful she is. So she makes the three in many different materials and colorings, varying the trimming.

For girls who are vivid in coloring and have pronounced individual style, like Margo and Betty Lawford, Nicky uses the simplest lines, but counsels abandon in the angle at which a hat is worn.

Confronted by mousy coloring and shy temperament, Nicky is at her best. She can bring out the gorgeous hussy in any girl, with a V neck of swooping swirls—like the one on the print Margo is wearing—or a poised little hat with a tantalizing veil, like the one on Betty Lawford.

Exquisite daintiness is synonymous with appealing femininity, Nicky believes. That is why she uses crisp piqué on dark dresses. The long line of the neck is graceful as a flower stem, so don’t wear high-necked dresses, Nicky begs. The fewer seams there are in a dress, the better it will show off your figure. Nicky makes hers of material three and a half yards wide and defies you to find a seam.

Don’t be misled by the fashion writers who declare that this is a season of “pretty” clothes. They are apt to be innocuous, do nothing for you.

Avoid ruffles and frau-frau, even as you should scorn boxlike or sausage-casing dresses and cling to classic, molded lines and people will speak of your good looks, and not of your clothes. They won’t even suspect how much your clothes contribute to your good looks.

In selecting a hat, allow plenty of time to study it from every angle. Try them on until you find one that makes you hold your head higher, face the world with bravado.

"Your face seethes with drama and so will a simple, big hat if you let it swoop," Nicole counseled Margo, left.

"Here's self-assurance for you!" she exclaimed to Betty Lawford, below. Nicole can bring out the gorgeous hussy in the mosuest girl, though Miss Lawford isn’t that.
The power of the variety of her rôles is amazing. You see her, above, as an old woman in "Make Way for To-morrow."

Beulah Bondi is a penetrating observer, with high intelligence. Her keen imagination is a Heaven-sent gift.

WHEN an actress is not a full-fledged star, yet overshadows stars in their own productions, what do you say of her?

Well, that is what Beulah Bondi is—a splendid actress. I am not telling you this as news. Hollywood is fully awake to the fact, and names her one of the best character actresses the town possesses. I say she's the best.

Paramount realized the Bondi brilliance, for they signed her to make pictures exclusively for them. Her first assignment was with Claudette Colbert, in "Maid of Salem." So excellently did she portray the rôle that her second assignment took the form of the lead in "Make Way for To-morrow."

While walking to the stage where the company was working, I thought about Miss Bondi's previous pictures. Even when the picture has been mediocre, I have never seen her give a poor performance. In each one she was different.

Repressed and bitter as the reformer's wife in Joan Crawford's ill-starred "Rain." Spiteful and malicious in "Stranger's Return." Humorous and elegant in "The Moon's Our Home." Tragic and deeply emotional as the mountaineer mother in 'The Trail of the Lonesome Pine'—an unforgettable portrayal. Perhaps most striking of all, Andrew Jackson's wife in "The Gorgeous Hussy."

I had never met her, so I wondered what she would be like. Cold and repelling, or vague and indifferent? Plodding through acting as a well-paying job, or careful of its real values?

The set represented a small-town home, decorated with Victorian monstrosities. Miss Bondi was enacting the final scene for that day. I looked for her.

Beyond, in the dining room, an old white-haired woman, with sagging shoulders and shuffling gait, placed final touches to the table. Her face was careworn and deeply lined. Her eyes dim and sunk beneath white brows.

The day's work completed, Miss Bondi was ready for me. Now, I have seen some strange sights in my life. Mr. Ripley does not hold a monopoly. But never have I been quite so moved as when Beulah Bondi came over to me and gradually transformed before my eyes while we talked.

DROLL FELLOW

BY GRACE KINGSLEY

HERBERT MUNDIN SAYS IT IS HARD FOR A COMEDIAN TO RETAIN HIS INDIVIDUALITY NOWADAYS. THIS MAY BE TRUE OF OTHERS, BUT CERTAINLY NOT OF HIM.

ILL be known as the wounded and dying comedian if I don't look out!” declared Herbert Mundin. “I was wounded in 'Under Two Flags' and 'Good-time Charlie,' and I died, you know, in 'Cowardcode,' and again in 'Tarzan Escapes.'"

As a rule, we reflected, comedians live a charmed life, second only to leading men in being fireproof, waterproof and bulletproof.

Perhaps it is because Mundin happens to have a wistful something about him—the same quality which Chaplin possesses—which pages the tears when ill befalls him, that they let harm come to him in pictures. Maybe that's the reason, too, that Mundin keeps on working while other comedians are having their long dry spells of no work.

We were dining with Mundin and his pretty wife at their English house in Westwood, near Los Angeles—the home which Mundin loves, and from which his wife says she has an awful time stirring him to go out to parties or any other place.

"He's getting worse and worse," she said—but in a tone that meant better and better. "He has no hobby, but he likes to putter around the garden and read or just talk to me. He reads books that are sometimes beyond me, but he likes to talk to me about them. And he loves discussing her dancing career with our daughter, Nona."

Few people know the real Tommy Mundin—"Tommy" he is to his wife and his close friends. He is a person you may easily pass by in a crowd. You must know him a while before you realize that he has a really penetrating sense of humor and understanding, which plays over matters of universal importance as well as over the things of everyday life. His is quiet drollery.

He isn't at all like most comedians. He neither glooms as a lot of them do, nor does he clown all the time; though, if you catch him in an amusing vein, he is very droll.

He is just a cheerful, witty, tactful person, who seems always bent on making the other fellow feel at ease, yet has a twinkle that never misses anything funny. But his humor

Norma Shearer has been offered the part of "Scarlett O'Hara" in "Gone With the Wind." She is first choice of the producer, David O. Selznick, but she has not accepted the role as yet.

William Arnold, Edward Arnold's sixteen-year-old son, is going into pictures and will be known as Edward Arnold, Jr. He weighs 185 pounds and is almost as big as his dad. His film will be "Blazing Barriers."

THE costume party rage has hit Hollywood again. It's a spasmodic thing socially, and there's no explaining why it goes through revivals at rather long intervals, except that everything strikes the movie colony as a kind of epidemic.

The Jock Oakies had a "Gone With the Wind" party to celebrate their first year of marriage. Every one had to wear some sort of Civil War outfit. But evidently Pat O'Brien turned rebellious since he arrived on the scene in a Union uniform. Two other recalcitrants were the Mischa Auers who donned Russian garb, all because they came from Georgia in Russia. Wits—what!

Right after the Oakie event the Basil Rathbones invited all the film colony to their eleventh anniversary. This was the swankiest affair imaginable, and very beautiful in the matter of dress since every one was attired as if for a wedding in days past and present, not to speak of a few futuristic.

Draws Line at Wild Cats.—Here's something: Carole Lombard, whose collection of pets is rated the most varied in Hollywood, has a rooster named Edmund, a couple of hens called Eli and Jessie, a cat known as Josephine, dachshunds Queenie and Fritz, a spaniel named Smokie, and a Pomeranian—get this—called The Killer.

Clark Gable, during a hunting trip in the Kaibab Forest, captured a cougar and wanted to give that to Carole as a house cat, but she said "No!" emphatically. She probably considered the welfare of Edmund, Eli, and Jessie, not to speak of the various and assorted dogs.

Olivia's Catasfrophe.—Olivia de Havilland will never test her prowess as a jumper again. She was walking at the beach near Malibu one day, and came to a culvert which carried filthy water out to the ocean. She thought she could leap across, but instead went floundering into the awful water. And nobody was anywhere near to help her out. It's a wonder she didn't break her neck, but as it was she had to walk and walk and walk in order to get her clothes dry and prevent catching her death of cold. It was a ghastly experience.

"Secret" Completely Spoiled.—And speaking of Olivia reminds us that the secret of Joan Fontaine leaked out in an official way when she signed her contract, with court approval, with RKO.

Joan is, of course, Olivia's sister, and she tried desperately to keep this concealed, except that everybody in the world knew it, because she didn't want to appear to be trading on Cary Grant tries to protect Ginger Rogers from the horrid flashlight as they try night life together.

Olivia's studio fame. But the courts naturally required her real name of Joan de Haviland when her agreement had to be certified.

Her salary, by the way, is quite good for a newcomer, ranging from $300 up to $2,500 during a seven-year period. The girls' mother, who goes by the stage name of Meg Sheridan, recently made her débút in the play "Tovarich" on the Coast.

Eleanor Still Battles Jinx.—Some time, perhaps, fate will smile kindly on Eleanor Powell. But so far her stage and screen career have been pretty largely vicissitudes. The nervous breakdown while she was playing in "At Home Abroad" in New York a year ago, the sprained ankle ligament she sustained while rehearsing for "Broadway Melody of 1937." And then, too, Eleanor didn't fare very well in the rôle she played in "Born to Dance." It was pretty poor in opportunity. But she's busy now in the new "Broadway Melody," and perhaps the worm of bad luck will

FAME has

THE COST OF FAME COMES PRETTY HIGH SOMETIMES. ROBERT TAYLOR TELLS WHAT IT HAS DONE TO HIM PROFESSIONALLY AS WELL AS PERSONALLY.

Bob feels that in his next picture, "This Is My Affair," which deals with the political battles of McKinley's time, he has a real chance. He wears the uniform above.

Fame may have done many strange things to this fellow, but it hasn't changed him from the grand person we first applauded and are still applauding.

HARD-BOILED movie exhibitors who form their opinions strictly on the cash income at the box office list Robert Taylor fourth among the money-makers of 1936, and are giving him an even higher rating for 1937.

That's what fame has done to Bob in the world of motion pictures.

What has it done to him personally?

Let's be just as hard-boiled as the box-office poll in our check-up on this attractive young man who has climbed so swiftly out of obscurity and into the tumult of stardom.

Bob is willing to help cast up the account and see what fame has cost him. He was in the midst of filming "This Is My Affair" for 20th Century-Fox, costarring with Barbara Stanwyck. He was wearing a stiff-necked uniform for his meeting with "President McKinley," and Bob unloosed the collar, took a deep breath of relief, and plunged into the matter forthwith.

"To begin with, I expected to move along at a normal pace, studying and working for years before I got anywhere in pictures," Bob said. "But fame took things over, I could usually wriggle out of a role too difficult for me to tackle. Or if the part was punk, I could kid the casting office into giving it to somebody else.

"Now, all that is changed. This guy Robert Taylor becomes a major issue at the studio. There's no help for it, but when you are important at the box office, you become the center of big deals and what you have to say can't be heard. Money talks louder. So you see the first thing fame did was to rush me into roles for which I was unprepared or unsuited.

"Believe it or not, they decided I was to play 'Romeo' to Norma Shearer's 'Juliet.' I was appalled! I'm willing to try almost anything, but after all a man can't attempt the impossible. Me, with my meager training, tackle Shakespeare! But it shows what fame can do to you.

"Only on actual test could convince them. When they saw me play a scene they grinned and let me off. But for a while I thought I really was sunk. Leslie Howard gave a brilliant performance in 'Romeo and Juliet,' and when I saw it I was doubly glad I escaped the responsibility.

"On the other hand—the credit side, you know—there's nothing like learning to swim by being shoved off the pier. You've got to do something about it, and quickly. While I haven't been able to advance at a normal pace, my fan mail contains the most optimistic accounts of improvement between 'Private Number' and 'Camille.'

"I feel in this new picture, dealing with the hot-blooded political battles of McKinley's time, and his assassination, I have a real chance. I have more confidence in the role."

"So, in my professional career, fame has given with one hand and taken away with the other, so to speak."

"Getting more personal, the cost of fame comes pretty high at times.

"It makes leisure so expensive you can't buy a nickel's worth. A hobo has more of that precious stuff than I can ever hope to get. In three years I have been continually at the call of the studios. There hasn't been a single time when I have had a few weeks free to do as I pleased.

"It works this way: I'll finish a picture. 'Now can I plan a vacation?' I ask. 'Well, you'd better stick around because we start such and such a picture in ten days and we'll need you for fittings and tests.'

"So about as far as you can get would be Palm Springs, and you must check in to see if they are ready for you. Once I thought I had a two weeks' vacation all set, and I could forget pictures during a real rest. I made reservations on the boat to Hawaii and at the Royal Hawaiian Hotel. Every few days I would have to cancel the bookings and make new ones. I had a booking on every boat that sailed for a month—and then I gave up.

"Fame hands you some heavy responsibilities, too. Aside from the many complex angles that come up, the dealings with agents, managers, studios, and so on, personal life becomes almost nonexistent.

"I'm not speaking of carousing and high-jinks, because I don't go for that and never have, so the public has no cause to criticize there. But the public can easily attach to me responsibilities which did not exist before."

"For instance, recently there was some publicity about my grandfather which caused the family some distress. If I were just plain Arlington Brugh, grandfather's financial problem wouldn't have caused a moment's notice. Fame decreses differently. It passes on to you responsibilities which you must shoulder.

"Of course I want it plainly understood that I am not shirking or complaining. We are merely summing up what fame has done to Taylor and using him as sort of an experimental subject that we can look at through the microscope.

Among the responsibilities to be listed is fan mail. It comes in an overwhelming cas-

HERE ARE THOSE SPARKS OF OBSERVATION AND GOSSIP OF THE STARS THAT FLY AWAY
BEFORE ANY ONE ELSE CATCHES THEM.

DURING the filming of outdoor scenes for Gorbo’s latest picture, she and her maid took advantage of times she was not needed on the set to disappear in the direction of a clump of bushes. And, to the amusement of the company, the assistant director would walk in that direction and give a low whistle when the director was ready for the stor. To their further astonishment, Gorbo would shortly appear and go to work. What they didn’t know was that she was taking a sun bath and the assistant had been given his instructions in advance.

MOTHERS of Beverly Hills grammar-school girls wish Robert Taylor would move out of town because, since the girls have found Bob’s house, they never go straight home from school but go to Bob’s block. There they circle the block, again and again, imagining they see him at a window, hoping they may meet him coming out the door. There is just one redeeming feature about it, according to one mother, and that is that when her daughter doesn’t arrive home on time, she knows exactly where to find her.

JAMES STEWART and a reporter were discussing women.
“Don’t they make you sick, Jimmie, the kind that scream when they see a mouse and throw their arms around your neck?” the reporter asked.
Jimmie looked speculative.
“It sounds like a good idea,” he replied in his slow drawl. “It’s never happened to me but if it ever does I think I’ll look around for a rot.”

FRANK FAY still occupies the huge mansion in which he and Borbora Stonwyck lived when they were married. Friends say that everything in the house is exactly as Borbora left it when she walked out without even stopping to take her clothes. On her dressing table are the perfume bottles, powder boxes, and other feminine foibles, giving the impression that the mistress of the house has gone away for the week-end. Frank's friends say he gives them the impression he is momentarily expecting his ex-wife to return to him.

It was the close of a very warm day on location at Chatsworth where a big company of extras and Shirley Temple were making scenes for "Wee Willie Winkie" when Mr. Temple drove up.

"Why didn't you come sooner, daddy, so you could see me march with the men?" Shirley reproached him. And then ran to the man in charge of the soldiers.

"Do you suppose the men would march for a minute so daddy could see how well I do it?" she whispered.

"I'll see," he told her, and consulted the men. They were hot, tired, dirty, and hungry. Their day was over and they didn't work overtime unless they were paid. Finally one man spoke for the others.

"For Shirley, yes," he said. And for fifteen minutes they marched up and down, going through the English manual of arms—a private show for Papa Temple.

Luise Rainer crossed the street in front of her Brentwood home to watch a pair of little tow-headed boys play ball. They shrilled for her to join the game. Just then a tourist bus stopped in front of her house. The man with the megaphone bellowed:

"On your left is the home of Luise Rainer, who recently won the Academy award—" and so on.

The necks of the tourists were twisted toward the house, so no one saw the small figure in slacks across the street. As the bus rolled away Luise and the towheads laughed.

A blonde stopped at a Hollywood stationery store. "I want to buy a fountain pen," said she.

"That's fine," beamed the salesman. "Now here is a number we often sell to movie stars. Only last week Sonja Henie bought one."
"She did?" exclaimed the blonde, wide-eyed. "Really?"

The salesman grinned. "Well, no. That's just what we tell people sometimes to make them buy pens."

When the girl had made her selection she asked that her name be engraved on it.

"And what is your name?" queried the salesman.

As you've guessed, her reply was, "Sonja Henie."

The other day some visitors to the set wanted to meet Miriam Hopkins. "Oh, no. I wouldn't dare introduce you," said their guide. "She might blow up!"

Some one no more important than the guide overheard. Said he, "Why, that's silly! She's charming. Come on over, I'll introduce you."

Of course, Miriam was charming. The incident graphically illustrates how stars may acquire undeserved reputations for temperament. Some studio minions have such a star-phobia that they'd be afraid of Oswald the Rabbit if they worked with him.

Edward G. Robinson was entertaining us at lunch in his dressing suite. Familiar with the elaborate fittings and personal touches of most other stars' dressing quarters, we were amazed at the bareness of Eddie's.

"Let's see—perhaps there's a table in the kitchen," guessed the star, as our trays were brought in. He looked, but there was none.

"Don't you use your dressing rooms often?" we asked.

"Only to change clothes in," said he. "When I'm working I eat in the studio cafe. When I'm not working—well, I'm pretty much of a home man."

When Garbo talks about anything it's news, but when Garbo talks about Dietrich it's a sensation! Nevertheless a friend of ours, whose reports are always authentic, delivered this account of a Garbo utterance heard at a range of five feet:

Charles Boyer: "Good morning, Miss Garbo. You're looking very beautiful to-day."

Garbo (smiling but obviously startled): "I look beautiful? Thank you—but you must be joking. How could a man who has just played opposite such a beautiful woman as Marlene Dietrich say that of me?"
A VERY glamorous star told us that she was going to get rid of her stationary bicycle, because if her fans heard that she exercised on such a thing, it would detract from her glamour.

We can't understand her logic, for the next week she was one of the gayest of those inept skaters at Ginger Rogers's roller-skating party. Reporters saw her; even picked her up once or twice. If her glamour is so fragile that it won't bear exposure of the bicycle secret, how can it withstand the dreadful indignities that befall a novice roller skater?

SHIRLEY TEMPLE had been allowed to order her favorite lunch—a peanut butter sandwich and a malted milk—but with the first bite of sandwich, Shirley made a very wry face.

"Oh, mother, this is awful," she complained.

"Now, Shirley," said Mamma Temple firmly, "that's what you wanted and you must eat it. It is perfectly all right."

This conversation was repeated several times before Shirley persuaded her mother to taste the sandwich, and indeed, she found it was awful. A new waitress had picked up a mustard sandwich by mistake and poor little Shirley had eaten half of it before her protests accomplished anything.

ACCORDING to current gossip, Myrna Loy is going about looking under rocks and old logs with a microscope in search of an excuse to break her contract with MGM. She wants to go to Paramount, they say, where her husband, Arthur Hornblow, is a producer.

LOUIS B. MAYER had a new gas range installed in his kitchen the other day as a surprise for his veteran and valued cook. He lurked in the shadows of the pantry to await her ecstatic reactions. The lady, encountering the contraption, looked, looked again and gulped.

"I quit!" she announced. "I certainly do not intend to cook on a stove that has twelve burners, three ovens, and what are those other things? Anyhow, I shan't cook on anything that's big enough to hold a barn dance!"

MGM's chief executive begged her to reconsider. He'd have the whole thing torn out, he promised. She could select her own stove. He did and she did and a new six-burner stove was installed and al! Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer breathed easily again. (Continued on page 88)
I MUST MAKE FUN

BY HELEN LOUISE WALKER

SO SAYS LUISE RAINER WHEN SHE FINISHES A PICTURE AND THE SUFFERINGS OF THE HEROINE MUST BE COMPLETELY FORGOTTEN.

I'm old—perhaps a generation older than I was when I started to play in 'The Good Earth!'" said Luise Rainer. "With many such parts I shall be too, too ancient." She paused to twinkle and to add, "I hope that it will not show too much in my face, jus' in case I shall want to slip back and play something young and gay and—what you say?—tri-vo-lous. It will be something important if I can learn the secret of slipping back and being young, as I have learned the secret of growing old."

These remarks were only half humorous, only half mocking, half affection. Or perhaps there was no affection at all.

Luise Rainer is so serious an artist, so thorough a workman, so imbued with European stage training, that she actually does experience much with the character she is portraying.

In her mental approach to her work she is very like Emil Jannings who used to become so absorbed in a rôle that he took on physical characteristics of the man he was pretending to be.

I recall watching Jannings going to his car during final sequences of "The Last Command." Leaving the studio, Emil was still shaking with palsy, still dragging one leg, and he brushed past acquaintances without recognizing them or even seeing them.

Luise is not quite so thorough as that, perhaps, in her absorption in a rôle. But she found difficulty in eating her meals during the famine sequences of "The Good Earth."

"How can I eat this so nice food," she said, plaintively, "when 'O-Lan,' this woman who is a part of me now, is so veree, veree hungry?"

At other times, when the woman who is "a part of her" is to have a tragic scene, Luise weeps into her breakfast coffee. "She is going to be hurt so terribly to-day!" she wails.

When the picture is finished and has gone to the cutters who, she says, "are like bread cutters, so little do they care for the art, the thought that you have given," she assumes abruptly and surprisingly the rôle of a mad-cap and unruly child. She tried to explain to me about this.

"I know all the pain and tragedy and suffering that life can offer," she told me, her great eyes wide and dark. "When I finish a picture and have a vacation, I must make fun as I did when I was a child. This is so I can forget the suffering."

That seemed quite an order to me for so young, gay, and vibrant a woman, however fine, imaginative, and experienced an actress she might be. All the pain, tragedy, suffering of this rather large and tragic world! Dear me! I thought that perhaps we had better take up her ideas of "making fun" for the moment. I found that she was definite on the subject.

She lives in a large, overgrown sort of house which overlooks the Pacific. If Garbo had built it it could not be more thoroughly walled and hedged for privacy. Inside are enormous, almost stark rooms, with massive, carved furniture, plain rugs, huge fireplaces. It might almost be the interior of a men's club, if only there were more chairs. But there are windows, windows, windows. And French doors. Floods of sunlight and acres of glass giving you views of the ocean, the hills, the walled garden.
"My garden!" Luise said, with huge satisfaction. "Is it not lovely? All color and bloom and no tidiness. I could not bear a tidy garden!"
I began to see that Luise could not bear a tidy anything.
Especially a tidy life. The garden is a hodgepodge. Tall things are planted in front of tiny things. "I felt like planting those that day." A neat gravel path leads you abruptly to a tangle of shrubs which shelter a pool which is a welter of water plants.
"Isn't it a cute surprise?" Luise wants to know.
The house is a hodgepodge. Formality reigns in one corner but the alcove next it is a muddle of sheet music, manuscripts, books, phonograph records.
Luise is wearing brown corduray slacks, a yellow sweater, heavy brogans. Her face is devoid of make-up. "I have worked so hard and it has hurt me so," she tells you. "Now I make play.
In this afternoon I am going to make a joke on someone!"
Her idea of making a joke, I learned, was to leap into deep water and scream for help until dozens of people leaped into the water to rescue her. (She swims like a fish.) Or another fancy to break into some one's house and rearrange all the furniture "just so that they will be puzzled when they came home!"
She also likes to "make tennis" and to "make walks." "Only," she commented, sadly, "there is no place to walk here."
I looked through the window at sun-drenched hills rolling gently toward the sea and suddenly I giggled. Her gaze followed mine and she giggled, too. "What I mean," she explained, "is that no one else walks. They all go by last in cars

THE CASE OF KITTY

BY HERBERT CRUIKSHANK

CROWDED OUT OF HOLLYWOOD, KITTY CARLISLE GOES BACK BY WAY OF A BROADWAY HIT WHICH SHE IS TO DO IN TECHNICOLOR.

Kitty Carlisle's truly streamlined figure needs no improvement for her second début in pictures.

You see Kitty, right, as the heroine of "White Horse Inn," the Tyrolean extravaganza which set the recent vogue for the Alpine note in feminine sports clothes and accessories.

Next is Miss Carlisle in evening regalia, sumptuous silver fox setting off her refined beauty.

HERE'S a new Hollywood axiom: "When they start crowding you off the traffic lane on Option Boulevard, take the Broadway detour."

It was grand advice for Gladys George, Jean Arthur, and several others who found the "nobody home" sign on front-office doors when contract day come around.

And it has proved a perfect route for Kitty Carlisle who, after appearing in four important films, took the detour with such success these past months that not only does she return to the cinema citadel as a star for one of the biggest Technicolor films, but two contracts have been dangled invitingly before her, and so the lucky Miss Carlisle says, "Now I believe in signs."

As in the case of some other Hollywood actresses who had to prove their ability on Broadway even after the movie moguls should have realized it, Kitty Carlisle's success in the leading feminine rôle of "White Horse Inn" brought her a return ticket to Hollywood. This time she goes back to duplicate before the cameras her personal triumph in the Tyrolean extravaganza.

As casting matters look now, Fernand Grovet will probably appear opposite her, and that's only the beginning. of plans now being hatched for the gifted girl who says she never really intended to be a movie star in the first place.

The fact is that studio executives have surprised Kitty twice in the past few seasons. The first was when they drafted her out of a Broadway operetta and rushed her across the continent before she could get her breath.

With matching speed she was cast in "Murder at the Vanities," in which she sang "Cocktails for Two" so delightfully that she was signed to appear with Bing Crosby in "She Loves Me Not." Remember that duet, "Love in Bloom," that everybody was humming?

Paramount remembered it when it was time to cast the next Crosby vehicle, and again the dark-eyed Kitty warbled with him through "Here Is My Heart." Her fourth film was with the Marx Brothers in "A Night at the Opera," and in this she won plaudits for her rendition of the song "Alone."

"A Night at the Opera" was followed by days of waiting, and Miss Carlisle is not the kind of girl who can sit and wait. She read the flattering notices she received, but the telephone didn't ring on Monday, Tuesday, or Wednesday, and so on Thursday she bought a ticket for New York, assuring herself and everybody else that she needed a vacation.

The vacation turned into a series of signal honors.
She was invited to lunch with Mrs. Roosevelt at the White House, she was chosen to sing at the Democratic Convention in Philadelphia, and she was photographed and feted so much that if rest had been her original idea she didn't get around to it.

The opportunity in "White Horse Inn" was one realization of a long ambition, an ambition she had bolstered by continuous study in five countries and by serving her apprenticeship as understudy to two prima donnas in Broadway musicals.

Critics dusted off superlatives for her performance and caption writers alluded to her as "the beautiful screen star who has temporarily deserted Hollywood." That was all right with Miss Carlisle, too.

What puzzles movie executives now is how they permitted her to leave their midst without getting her name to a contract. But they've learned, and it was the good old Broadway detour that saved them.

In her fashion, Kitty Carlisle is somewhat of a contradictory person. She's a Southern girl without a Southern accent; she's been coached in voice and dramatics by some of the best teachers in Europe, yet has acquired none of the prima donna airs that most singers believe belong with such a background.

"My first ambition was to sing in opera—or that was the idea of my teachers," Miss Carlisle confided as she talked about herself in her Manhattan hotel suite. There was a note of resignation, just the suggestion of a thought,
"I suppose I'll never do it now."

But you wonder about that, too, and realize it wouldn't be such a far-fetched idea to wager that maybe she'll do it yet. There is an impression this actress gives—that she usually achieves what she wants, eventually.

"For years I was trained in music, drama, and languages, and my hope was to sing on a New York stage," said Kitty as she talked about her past abroad and her future in Hollywood.

"So anxious was I to get a start that I applied for the title role in a condensed version of 'Rio Rita,' which was the stage attraction at the Capitol Theater, and I was quite a surprised girl when I got it. Eight months on the road followed, but at last I was singing every performance and hoping it would lead to New York."

It did, but not for long, because while she was appearing in "Champagne Sec," a scout from Hollywood cornered her and said he wanted her to take a film test.

"I'm sure I wouldn't screen well," Kitty protested, and perhaps it was that lack of enthusiasm which was the smart note. Anyway, she found herself taking the test and then migrating to Hollywood for " Murder at the Vanities."

In California she did none of the things that divert most newcomers. She wasn't seen at the big parties, she stayed away from the popular public places—not because she wanted to be alone, but, as she explained, "I worked in the daytime and I needed rest at night. If I stayed

"Top of the Town."—Universal. Too much of everything, including vast, glittering sets, and too little story make this most ambitious musical top-heavy and rather exhausting. But if it is showy, superficial, and empty diversion you want, here is your banquet. Not that a musical film should be thoughtful and controversial, but it should hold together and utilize the talent of the cast. This does neither; everybody performs in snatches. However, the sets probably are the largest ever seen on the screen. They extend as far as the eye can reach, especially that which represents the "Moonbeam Room" atop a skyscraper, and they are brilliantly modernistic. The fragment of story has Doris Nolan, another "richest girl in the world," putting on a night-club show as she thinks it should be done, failing to click with it. Then the lively young orchestra leader, whom she has opposed, stages a big "swing" show and everything is all right. Everybody in the cast is good, though Ella Logan, who sings torch songs with a Highland burr, came through most emphatically when I saw the picture.

"Elephant Boy."—United Artists. The name of Robert Flaherty in picture-making is magic to the discriminating. "Man of Aran," "Moana," and "Nanook of the North" are unforgettable. "Elephant Boy" will not be forgotten by the same public, either. It is so human, natural, and untouched by those values we accept in ordinary films. This is Mr. Flaherty's great gift. He takes us to far places, not impersonally as in a travelogue, but intimately and warm-heartedly. Without making us conscious that he dramatizes the people he finds there, he draws us into their lives. We find them more absorbing than a plot arranged by a scenario writer. In this he takes us to the ancient jungles of India, with a twelve-year-old native boy, Sabu, our hero. And what a hero he is! He is brave, beautiful, and sincere and his English is captivating. His charm is poignant because he doesn't know the meaning of the word. He is earnestly ambitious to become a great elephant hunter as the men of his family have been for four generations. Taken along grudgingly on an expedition, he proves himself—with the help of his devoted elephant—to be a greater hunter than any of the men. He leads his masters to a wild herd. His moment of triumph will wring your heart. Not only because of Sabu does the picture fascinate: it is rich in jungle and elephant lore and it pulses with the wisdom of a legendary country and an old civilization.

"Seventh Heaven."—20th Century-Fox. James Stewart and Simone Simon come gloriously through the new version of a famous play. Their acting and the manner of telling the story remind us that times in the cinema have indeed changed since 1927. Not that we've been asleep all these years, but a new picturization of a familiar story quickens our appreciation of all that we have to be thankful for in this year of grace. This film is one of its major blessings. It proclaims Mr. Stewart a star by virtue of being one of our finest young actors, and it fastens Mademoiselle Simon's gleaming talent securely in the film heavens. Mr. Stewart's acting is rich and warm and, as all fine acting must be, at the core, simple. The little Simone is utterly captivating. No longer playing a mental strip-tease, she is tender, sincere, her portrayal of the downtrodden waif gradually blooming with love so delicate and penetrating that one cheers her for beautiful artistry inspired by rare understanding. I believe the sentimental story of Chico and Diane is as popular to-day as it ever was. The garret romance of the sewer man and girl of the Montmartre dive will never grow old for it has idealist, charming make-believe, and the urgent call of youth for youth. A splendid production and brilliant acting throughout recommend it to every one.

"Quality Street."—RKO. Katharine Hepburn always surprises. Sometimes it is by the beauty, truth, and originality of her acting—or the awkwardness and inadequacy of it. Frequently it is her choice of vehicles, as in "Christopher Strong" and "A Woman Rebels," or when she lets another player surpass her in acting, as was the case with Cary Grant in "Sylvia Scarlett." This time she surprises even more. Though nominally the heroine of the story, she permits the character's problems to be felt more poignantly by her elder sister, Fay Bainter, of the stage, proves her greater skill by communicating to the spectator more than Miss Hepburn. She feels from within while the star is concerned with surface manifestations. In short, Miss Bainter "steals" the picture. It is a frail picture, interesting but mild, with quaintness and charm its strongest claims. Because of an exquisite production, Georgian England of 1805 is a delightful place to contemplate and the prim conventions of spinster life are pathetically amusing. Miss Hepburn scarcely fits into all this antique whimsicality; her charm is too modern and aggressive. When she weeps because it isn't "ladylike" for a girl to let a man kiss her in Quality Street, you know she is only fooling. The titbit of story has Phoebe Throsell expecting a proposal of marriage which never comes from a man who goes to war. After ten years he returns to find Phoebe faded and worn, whereupon she changes her dress and introduces herself to him as her sprightly niece, intending to turn him down when he proposes. But he never does. Instead, he tells her that he loves Phoebe in spite of her lost looks. Curtain. Through all these maidenly crises Miss Bainter gives the tremors of a devoted sister the depth of true emotion. Another stage recruit, Estelle Winwood, is likewise excellent, and so are Cora Witherspoon and Eric Blore, while Franchot Tone's elegance and humor make the dashing Valentine Brown more likable than the character really is.

"Call It a Day."—Warners. This is a sunny, rippling picture. One chuckles but does not laugh unkindly at the frailties of human nature portrayed in a comedy of an English family. Their tempests are restrained, their actions always well-bred no matter what soul-stirring crises are at hand. The trouble involving the large group—and some outsiders—comes with the first day of spring. From Cook Beryl Mercer in the kitchen to Lady Frieda Inescort in the drawing-room all "feel the sap rising," as giddy Alice Brady puts it, and there is the devil to pay. Everything is trivial and vital at the same time. Both husband and wife are tempted to stray after twenty years of married resignation and their various children also yearn for self-expression in amusing, characteristic ways. It is all delightful, with such delicate, knowing acting, careful direction, and skilled writing that this becomes one of the most entertaining pictures of the month. I think the most surprising performances come from Olivia de Havilland and Bonita Granville of all the perfect cast because they step out of their usual selves. Miss De Havilland is a headstrong minx and Miss Granville is an ardent, idealistic adolescent who is only a mild problem and not a fiend. She is quite wonderful.

"Maytime."—MGM. As sweet as June roses, as sentimental as an exquisite lace valentine, all cupid's and forget-me-nots, as melodious as the wind in the willows, as modern as the most advanced technique of picture-making—this halfway expresses the joy that sings through Nelson Eddy and Jeanette MacDonald’s current film. The rest of it you will have to let the picture express to you: the task is beyond me. All I can say is that its loveliness is haunting, its sadness like that of regret for one’s vanished childhood. It is as opulent as money can make it, as sensitive as the mind and heart. Comparisons may be odious but they’re going to be made right here and now. Miss MacDonald so completely proves herself the first singing actress of the screen that Grace Moore and Lily Pons might just as well make up their minds to take second place, although they may earn millions for consolation. Miss MacDonald’s beauty, verve, delicious humor, tender sentiment are equipment that any actress might envy. And there is her voice besides! It is more exquisite than ever and she sings more than in any other picture. Nelson Eddy apparently is reborn. His voice richer than before, he has developed as an actor. He is gay, reckless, humorous as a fun-loving music student in Paris who coaxes a prima donna out of her routine and away from the maestro she is about to marry for a May Day in the country. The story that concerns them is much like “Romance.” An old lady in a garden of falling apple blossoms tells the story of her life to a girl who is undecided between a career in New York or marriage in the country. John Barrymore is the maestro. His sarcastic, deliberate performance makes his début as a character actor an event richly promising.

“History Is Made at Night.”—United Artists. Charles Boyer and Jean Arthur are one of the most harmonious and arresting combinations that I have ever seen. It is, I think, because they are reticent actors and infinitely persuasive. Cunningly they seduce you into believing in their picture, into sympathizing with them to the utmost. Only when the film has ended do you realize that you have been fooled by a trashy melodrama exquisitely acted and mounted with dignified beauty. But you have been entertained and that, to most of us, is all that matters. Only this is such a puzzling combination of delicate comedy and violent action that the two elements clash and form an unsatisfying whole. Murder, suicide, the crash of an ocean liner with an iceberg, loom luridly above the quiet conversation piece of Mr. Boyer and Miss Arthur. He is an elegant headwaiter, she the loveless wife of a madly suspicious husband who kills his chauffeur when the latter fails to compromise Miss Arthur. Mr. Boyer steps into the police investigation, pretends to be a thief and kidnaps Miss Arthur for a whimsical flirtation at his restaurant. This gives you an idea. Now go on with the story if you care to. But it is tenderly acted.

“Silent Barriers.”—Gaumont-British. An English producing company invades America and borrows one of Hollywood’s leading men as well as several old-timers for its first picture filmed in the New World. The result? Good. The story they have chosen has swept, if not power. It broadly describes some of the difficulties and hardships endured by men in pushing the Canadian Pacific Railway through the Rocky Mountains. The tale is exciting, picturesque and the acting vigorous and sure. The continuity is not good, however, too much being left to the imagination, and the conclusion is abrupt. Actual completion of the railroad is not seen. And that is the goal toward which the entire picture has been moving. The motivation of the whole thing, the reason why the characters are brought into the wilderness. However, the wild mountain scenery has grandeur and one feels the tang of clear air in high altitudes. Mr. Arlen is a gambler who becomes interested in the foreman’s daughter, reforms and and they stare at you as if you were a strange animal or an idiot. Sometimes they stop and ask you, with pity, if you would like—what is it they say—a lift? It is so conspicuous to walk in this country. They wouldn't stare so much if you rode upon an elephant or a goat."

"She confided that she also likes to make food sometimes. "Only I don't like to make it out of a book. I go to the kitchen and look in the cupboards and the refrigerator and see what is there. Then I put some of the things together and add some seasonings and sometimes it is good. I wrote down in a book how to make some of these dishes that I discovered and I gave copies of the book to my friends at Christmas. They had never," she added, gravely. "eaten things like those before!"

People in Hollywood eat all by rules—rules for the figure. One day I had lunch somewhere and I ordered steak and baked beans and cheese.

I like all those things. People stopped and stared at me. One young man wrote about it in a newspaper—what I had eaten for lunch. Whatever you do in Hollywood that you want to do makes you conspicuous!

"These people buy their clothes by rule and fix their hair by other rules. I buy material and have a dressmaker come to the house and cut my dress and pin it and sew it up for me. I am not," she paused and looked exceedingly indignant. "I am not shaped like everybody else! These people have stiffening put in their hair so that it will be like every one else's hair. I jus' cut my hair short and wash it and comb it. I don't wear a hat and the wind makes my hair look tousled. I like my hair to be tousled."

She admitted, further, that she cannot keep her bank balance in order. "I cannot understand these raws of figures," she said. "Money is only to make you comfortable, anyhow, and I always hope that there is enough for that. There has not always been enough. I don't want furs or sapphires or race horses or big automobiles. I like a house with same air and sunshine in it, with a garden. I like some people to cook for me when I do not want to make food. I like to buy books and tickets for concerts and I like a little car with a top which I need not have over me unless it rains very hard."

I have neglected to mention her marriage to playwright Clifford Odets until now because it seemed, somehow, such a detail. (Perhaps I am doing them both an injustice.) But Luise did not accomplish this "by rule," either. They were married without customary Hollywood fanfare. A few days later she was en route to New York and Mr. Odets was knee-deep in work in Hollywood. "He is busy," quoted Luise. "So am I. What else is there to say?" And that left the bays and girls of the press looking blank and wondering what else there was to say!

Time, you see, is the most important thing in the world to Luise Rainer. Life is so short and she is so ambitious. There is so much to learn, to be done, to be accomplished, and always that inexorable clock ticks on and on. That is why she does not like, will not tolerate, large parties at which she meets people for fleeting moments, exchanges banal small talk.

"You haven't time for that when nothing will come of it," she says. But she will spend patient, earnest hours in pursuit of a friendship, an acquaintance which she thinks will have meaning.

She is frightened of fans who stand on sidewalks and ask for her autograph. "They don't know anything about my work," she says. "They only know that they have seen my face in the papers and they are interested in me as they might be in a murderer!" But she cares tremendously about what the critics say of her performances and she is intensely interested in her fan mail. "These people have seen me at my job. If they do not like me, then I have failed!"

Of course she doesn't like Hollywood. ("The cutting rooms ruin everything you try to do!") She objects to most people—they waste time. She likes sympathetic directors, good roles in pictures, sun, air, dogs, and symphony concerts.

She is very sure of herself, this Rainer. And she likes to have her own way about things. She seems to have been right, to date.
The Case of Kitty

out late, my work would show it and work is too important for me to jeopardize it by other activities which are relatively unimportant."

So she worked—in four pictures—and then took herself back to New York to find herself engaged for the entire theatrical season in the most lavish stage production the big town had to offer, "White Horse Inn."

On the beach at Santa Monica we find Carol Hughes, who recently made "Marry the Girl," and Veda Ann Borg, now in "The Singing Marine."

Kitty was quite at home on the elaborate sets because during her long and exciting European residence she had visited the very inn in the Tyrol copied for the production. There are few places in Europe where Kitty Carlisle has not stopped at some time or other since her childhood migration from her native Louisiana. Her real name is Katherine, and as such she was known until after her eighth birthday.

Her father was a New Orleans surgeon who died when she was eight years old, and shortly after that her mother took her to a school at Lausanne, Switzerland, where there were so many Katherines registered the American girl felt she had to do something about it. She didn't feel like Kate or Kathleen or Katrinka, so she decided she'd be Kitty, and that's what she's been ever since.

Swiss school days were followed by seasons with tutors in France, and finally she was enrolled at a finishing school in Paris. A year in Rome perfected her Italian, and then her mother started on a social program which she had planned for Kitty. A villa on the Riviera, an apartment in Paris, and trips to England were all on the sched-

Cavorting around the stage in her boy's costume and displaying shapely limbs, Kitty couldn't escape the appraising eyes of Hollywood scouts and the mad dash across the country came next.

As has been said before, Kitty doesn't wait long, or perhaps it is that fate hasn't planned long lulls between the exciting events in the Carlisle career.

When she found herself in the intolerable position of sitting back, even for a little while in Hollywood, she followed her usual instinct—she traveled back to New York. Her journey was a bit of fortunate planning, for it led her to "White Horse Inn," and it led the cinema producers right back to her dressing room. And so, when this production goes before the cameras, she will be right there, dressed in her charming Tyrolean costume to sing the role she made popular on Broadway.

of them were back again. Our accepted glamour girls don't run so much to hips. Wagner did all he could for them, wouldn't let them take a husband or a child along. It didn't seem in keeping with the public's notion of developing beauty. But he did let Phyllis Gilman announce her engagement to Lou Holtz en route.

Hips, Hips Away.—Diet and exercise are at the moment being ignored in favor of a new ointment which can be used in home reducing treatments, though the stars in their elegant way go to a salon where there are Carlsbad-trained masseuses to add their calming touch.

You spread the ointment over your body from head to foot, get in a warm bath for a few minutes, or sit in the sun if you have a protected yard or terrace, then wrap up in blankets for forty minutes. After a cold shower you find that you have lost about two pounds. And only a quarter-pound comes back when you drink all the water you crave at that point.

the treatments, or use the ointment for briefer periods at home, because it leaves their skin in a state of satiny perfection just right for bathing suits or shorts.

New Aids to Beauty.—With the challenge of glaring sunlight and thin clothes looming up, stars, even more than other women, get concerned about their faces and figures and set out to remedy defects.

Marked and sudden transformation of some of our star visitors set me to gumshoeing and questioning, and I found three notable discoveries to poss along.

One is a moderate-priced all-purpose cream made from oils extracted from milk. It is a thorough cleanser and emollient, and works wonders when you have been exposed to sun and wind.

Journey’s End.—The third discovery is a boon to us poor folks. A star who has spent as much as thirty-five dollars a bottle in a search for true fresh-lilac perfume has found a new brand in the ten-cent store, of all places, that is exactly what she always wanted. Trade names of any of these will be sent to you on request, accompanied by a stamped, addressed envelope.

National Pride Saved.—Just imagine how outraged American film producers were when they found that the highest-paid star in the world had never been seen in America! Twentieth Century-Fox rushed to remedy that. They signed Gropie Fields to make pictures in Hollywood and brought her over for a brief visit to discuss details. After dashing back to the Coronation she will return to work.

Very much like our own Jean Dixon — and why doesn't some one star her and pay her a million dollars a year?
— Croplie Fields rejoices that she wasn't signed for her glamour. She regrets that all her British pictures were done in Lancashire dialect which kept them from being shown here, but not very much, because, after all, they made her the pet of the British Empire and made lots of money.

So much that she thinks the empire ought to name a battleship for her, in deference to the huge income taxes she pays. She is tall and gaunt and has the exaggerated expressiveness of a born comic, the racy gusto of a caricaturist. She might even be able to hold her own playing opposite the Ritz Brothers, than which there is no higher praise.

Goldwyn's Choice.—Lithe and ex-quise Vera Zorina, who toured with the Monte Carlo Ballet Russe last year, and who this year has been one of the belles of London while she played the lead in “On Your Toes,” will dance in the Goldwyn “Follies.” After that she will groom her for stardom in dramatic rôles.

She is reserved, even remote, in person, but dynamic the instant she whirls out on the stage on her toes. Born Brigittie Hartwig, she was merely following an old Russian ballet custom when she adopted a new name. She is young—not more than nineteen, I should judge—though she has had years of experience.

Birds and Flowers.—Marlene Dietrich says that Elizabeth Allan has the most beautiful legs in Hollywood, but Miss Allen claims for herself only the largest feet. She is so tall and well groomed you’d never notice. You cannot take your eyes off her red-gold hair, anyway.
THE BEAUTIFUL, YOUNG

Duchess of Leinster

Tells you how she cares for her glamorously clear, smooth skin

She will stand for hours in Westminster Abbey the day of the Coronation, in a robe of velvet and ermine—jewels flashing from coronet and necklace—her lovely skin clear and luminous against its brilliant setting.

Of all the peeresses who will attend the Coronation, none will be lovelier than the slender, young Duchess of Leinster.

Admired for her beauty during her recent visit to New York, the Duchess said her beauty care is "the simplest and best —Pond's." "Pond's Cold Cream is a complete facial treatment in itself," she said.
"I use it to invigorate and freshen my skin for the most important occasions."

Like hundreds of British beauties—the Duchess follows this daily method:

Every night, smooth on Pond's Cold Cream.
As it releases dirt, make-up, skin secrets—wipe them off. Now put in more Pond's Cold Cream—buttly, till the circulation stirs. Your skin feels invigorated and freshened.

Every morning (and always before make-up) repeat . . . Your skin is smooth for powder—fresh, vital looking!

Day and night, this rousing Pond's treatment does more than clean your skin. It invigorates it . . . Fights blemishes, blackheads, lines, coarsening pores. Get a jar today. Soon see your skin growing lovelier!

- Delicate features in a heart-shaped face, lovely, liquid blue-gray eyes, lustrous dark-brown hair—the luminous beauty of a clear, smooth skin!

"Which proved," comments Huston, "that Ginger had me down pat. She never did anything so crude as to preach. But this was her nice way of saying: 'You've gone where the wind blew you, my lad. Now you'll have to trim your sails and steer your course, if you want to get anywhere.' So I set out on a six months' tour of the sticks, determined to show her that I could keep my nose to the grindstone."

On his return, he "just happened by luck" to get a part in a play called "The Unknown Soldier" at the Cherry Lane Theater. The Cherry Lane is a tiny house in Greenwich Village, used mostly by experimental and semiprofessional groups. Ginger was still playing in "Girl Crazy." "And I didn't get in touch with her because I didn't want her to see me in the part. I knew I was bad, but by the time the producer realized I was bad, it was too near the opening to do anything about it."

Rehearsing one day, he paid no attention to two figures who slipped in and took seats at the rear of the small auditorium. But when the rehearsal was over they came down the aisle.

"Hello, Phil," smiled Ginger.

"Come out and have a bite with us," said Mrs. Rogers.

"They'd heard what I was doing," says Huston, "and treked down to this little hole in the wall out of sheer friendliness and to see if they could be of any use, as Mrs. Rogers put it."

"I know I'm rotten," he told them miserably.

You're not rotten," Ginger flushed back.

"And in the first time," he says, with the smile that makes him look about ten, "I felt hope flicker. You may not consider it much of a compliment to be told you're not rotten, but from Ginger it was. She's no hand at turning pretty phrases that don't mean anything."

Their ways parted. She went to Hollywood and become a luminary of the films. He played leads with such stars as Jone Cowl, Ethel Barrymore, and Eugenie Leontovich. They wrote occasionally.

Once Ginger and her mother passed through Baltimore while Huston was there for an opening tryout. They met on the old friendly basis, as if they had parted only yesterday, and talked half the night through. "Ginger hadn't changed," says her friend, "except that she'd grown still a little quieter, perhaps, a little more self-contained, but without losing a particle of her zest for life."

Last summer Huston was playing the leads with the stack company at Dennis, Massachusetts. They were planning to put on "The Petrified Forest," with Huston as the killer, "Mantee."] One day Raymound Moore, the producer, was musing aloud. "I know how that's perfect for the girl! Ginger Rogers! Just the right combination—child of nature plus a certain spiritual quality."

Ginger to the Rescue

It was a shock and a temptation. Huston couldn't bring himself to a flat refusal, but he asked a salary he considered prohibitive and returned to Dennis. A few days later came a wire. "Salary O. K. Take next plane to Hollywood."

With four hours to get his release and pack, he made the plane. It had all happened too swiftly to give him much time for thought, but as he flew westward he found himself growing more and more doubtful of the wisdom of his step. He was going from the known to the unknown. Established in the theater, he was nobody on the screen. Maybe he'd been a fool. And as the plane landed at Burbank in the silent darkness of midnight he emerged feeling rather lost and forlorn.

"Hello, Phil," said a voice. And there stood Ginger, her mother smiling beside her. He hadn't even known that she'd known he was coming. "And when I realized what devil of a thing they'd done—came there at twenty thirty just to give me a hand, when Ginger had to be up at six next morning, I felt such a surge of warmth and gratitude that the whole face of the thing was changed."

She helped him through more than that first moment. She helped him through the snags of his first picture. She saw through the fakes and painted out flaws. She made it her business to attend the sneak preview, that even he didn't know about till she phoned him to say: "You were all right, Phil." She introduced him to her friends, made him at home in her home, guided him past the pitfalls that await every newcomer in Hollywood.

This isn't a love story. The bay doesn't get the girl. But romances to the contrary notwithstanding, there's more than one sweet way of ending a tale. "She's never done a thing," says Huston, "to kick a single stone out of the pedestal I put her on. Everything she's done has only built it higher."

And in this tribute to the girl lies a tribute, without his knowing it, to the bay as well.
CAROL HUGHES
STYLED FOR A SONGBIRD
Jeanette MacDonald's wardrobe includes these charming sport and evening clothes. The suit, on the left page, has a black woolen skirt, topped with a dusty rose jacket. Black accessories complete the ensemble.

The creation next to it is fashioned entirely from clear crystal bugle beads.

Black net over a taffeta slip is the attractive gown that follows. White silk roses form a dropped shoulderline.

The afternoon frock is rust silk seersucker, with Mary and her many lambs forming the design.

Spun-gold-and-copper slipper satin make up the stunning pajama ensemble.

Violet chiffon covers a printed slip of fuchsia shades, in the formal gown, above.
One Smart Girl

Five feet two, she weighs one hundred and six pounds, in her socks feet. You cannot say "stocking feet" because Deanna won't wear stockings. She just doesn't like them.

Recently, she took her first trip to New York. She stopped at the largest hotel in the city, and her first comment to reporters was "Everything's so big in New York. It's exciting!" College professors wouldn't get excited about her reactions. They were too naïve.

She spent her leisure time in the big city reading "Winnie the Pooh." She's just a girl growing up.

She will tell you that her funniest experience is a recent one, at the studio. "Three Smart Girls" had been released, and she was being hailed on all sides. She was an object of curiosity every time she stepped inside the studio, which is odd. And invariably she carried an autograph book. Each time she met a star, she asked for an autograph. Then, one of them, after signing the book, asked her for her autograph. It was too much for Deanna. She began to giggle. She had to be coaxed, and she still thinks it's funny.

Later, it was learned that she was not collecting the autographs for herself, but for a friend who was ill. She is curiously unimpressed by celebrity of others: more so by her own.

Not that she doesn't realize that she is a celebrity, nor that she has an unusual singing voice, but she wonders what all the fuss is about.

She has the way of detaching herself mentally from her voice, and is dubious about taking any credit for it. To her, the voice is a thing apart from herself. There is Deanna Durbin the songstress, and Deanna Durbin the girl.

There is a possible psychological explanation of this attitude. Her vocal cords have been pronounced mature by experts. In every other way she must grow up to those vocal cords. Perhaps, when that happens, she will feel that her voice is a part of herself.

You'd know her anywhere. She looks exactly as she does on the screen, except that her coloring is darker. She is addicted to brown in her dress.

On her fourteenth birthday—December 4, 1936—she was given an automobile by the studio. She did not know how to drive it but soon learned. Then she found that she could not drive in public, because she was too young to get a driver's license. She cried. A compromise was arranged. Universal studio, due to peculiar location, is a city in itself, apart from Los Angeles. So she was given a special permit to drive her car within the limits of Universal City, which is the studios. She spent days driving aimlessly around the lot.

Since the release of "Three Smart Girls," her fan mail has become tremendous in volume. Her agent collects it twice a day. She has had over fifty proposals of marriage, despite the fact that her age has been widely publicized. When asked about the proposals, she looks baffled, and shrugs her shoulders.

Her two favorite expressions are "Bunk!" expressing disapproval, and "Swell!" when she likes anything or any one. She is just becoming conscious of her appearance, and has begun—with parental approval—to use a little lipstick.

She bites her finger nails, and somewhat gloatingly blames it on Henry Koster, director of "Three Smart Girls." She had never bitten a nail previous to that scene in the picture. It was several times, and Deanna immediately became addicted. That sounds like press-agent copy, but her nails prove the truth of it. She teases Koster about it every time they meet, and if Koster appears to take it seriously (expressly for her benefit), she chuckles with glee. She refers to him in his presence as "Mr. Koster, the man who taught me bad habits."

She has a very cute way of referring to herself, "When I was a child." It would be cruel to tell her that she is hardly more than that now, so nobody calls her attention to the fact.

Her favorite food is spaghetti. She insists that she knows eighteen different ways of preparing it, and that nobody can cook it like she can. Her mother backs her up in the statement.

These are the facts about Deanna Durbin, currently Hollywood's—and the public's—darling. She will soon make a picture called "100 Men and a Girl." Among those one hundred men will be Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra.

When she met Stokowski for the first time, she said, "Some day, I hope to become as great a singer as you are a conductor. Do you think I can?"

Stokowski became quite modest about his abilities, but Deanna smiled up at him.

"Bunk, Mr. Stokowski!" she said.

out, although I really was pretty sick during that Washington trip. I'd tried to fight off the flu, and succeeded pretty well until it was over and I was on my way back. Then it really did hit me.

"I've got myself a complete cowhand's outfit now, a few guns, and I'm pretty happy. Ever since I was a little shaver I've had my own horse. It's fun to slap on a pair of chaps, a ten-gallon hat, and go gallivanting through the mountains on a good horse. Whenever I get a chance, I go hunting.

"Last time I went duck hunting something happened which can give you a moral to think over. I was crouched in the blinds, watching a flock of ducks coming down the lake. When the moment came I blazed away—and missed every shot! I knew I'd failed to 'lead' the ducks.

"Well, I sat there, feeling like a fool, when a bewhiskered old codger paddled up and asked why I'd missed. He looked over my gun, and finally took it apart to see if it was working. Just then another flock come by, the old fellow jumped up excitedly, fired at the ducks, and brought down a nice bunch.

"'See how it's done!' he yelled.

"And there I had to sit with my gun apart! Nothing makes you feel so disgusted as to miss an opportunity when duck hunting. I decided then and there I'd be ready to shoot when the time came, and do the best I could. That's what I'm doing now—shooting as best I know how and hoping I'll hit often enough to keep the fans with me.'"
Hollywood High Lights

respective on their auto trailers and boats, which enable the studios to keep in touch with them wherever they may be. They find this is one way to avoid being tied down when they are likely to be called back for retakes. They can rush home from wherever they may happen to be even if it’s in the wilderness or on the tumultuous seas. It looks, therefore, as if the radio will become a great aid to the vagabond-age of Hollywood actors.

They All Return.—We were quite fascinated to see Catherine Dale Owen recently. Do you remember her blond loveliness in the early talkies? She never succeeded in getting a chance in just the right role or picture, but the screen did present her as a memorable beauty, especially in “The Rogue Song,” with Lawrence Tibbett.

Catherine visited Hollywood following her divorce from Milton F. Davis, Jr., New York broker, stopping with the P. G. Wodehouses and being entertained extensively.

Ever the Cinderellas.—Lona Turner's story will ever be that of the Cinderella girl, since without any previous experience she was cast in the leading part in “The Deep South,” by Mervyn LeRoy. No use to retell her story which has already had wide publicity, except to say that she won the part in competition with twenty other girls who were tested, and that she is quite radiant with her reddish-brown hair, hazel eyes, and attractive complexion.

She was glimpsed by a studio scout while eating a bowl of soup at a lunch counter near the high school she attended. She had only arrived a few weeks before in Hollywood from Idaho.

Norma’s Slow Emergence.—The emergence of Norma Shearer following the death of Irving Thalberg is being watched with interest. So far, it has all been very tentative. She was present at the Academy dinner, and she attended the preview of “The Last of Mrs. Cheyney” some weeks ago. A lot of talk went the rounds about Miss Shearer playing “Scarlett O’Hara” in “Gone With the Wind,” but there didn’t seem much foundation in fact. Believe Walter Winchell started it all anyway.

Norma’s first picture is likely to be “Marie Antoinette” if not something modern. As might be expected, she was in the Louis B. Mayer party at the Academy banquet, but sought to avoid being photographed.

Anita Joins the Navy.—Quite the most charming wedding we have attended was the religious ceremony which confirmed Anita Page’s engagement to Yuma, where a civil marriage took place. Because Anita is a Catholic she had a second wedding, presided over by a priest, at her beach home.

She is the wife of Herschel Austin House, junior grade lieutenant of the United States Navy, and Anita, whose career was so bright when the original “Broadway Melody” was produced, has moved to Coronado and will probably forever forsake the studios. We always thought she was one of the most promising younger girls in the films, and certainly one of the most beautiful.

Simone’s Many Rivals.—There’ll be a race between French beauties soon on the screen. One studio, 20th Century-Fox, has no fewer than four under contract. Simone Simon is, naturally, their star, and Annabella, so lustrous in the color ‘actress from England, “Wings of the Morning” is coming to America. Others they boast are Els...
Argoll and Germaine Aussey, who is a real dazzler. One or two other studios are preparing to offer contenders.

Very Friendly Enemies.—While rumors are going the rounds that Stan Laurel and Oliver Hardy will be separated in the future, the two comics deny vigorously the very suggestion that there are any differences between them. It would be pretty hard to break up this combination, since it is one of the most successful all over this mundane sphere.

Films that you and we may not care for have a world of fans in the far parts of the earth. So our surmise is that they'll stay together. You know, perhaps, that they have very little to do with each other off the screen. Stan goes in much more for rarefied society.

Madeleine Favor; Maturity.—Who better to decide the question of male handsomeness than Madeleine Carroll? She, after all, is one of the foremost screen beauties. Madeleine made her selection of the best-looking gentlemen recently. And she fooled everybody who thought she would choose screen Apollos and Adonis.

Instead, she chose Franklin D. Roosevelt, George Bernard Show, Anthony Eden; W. Averell Harriman, railroad man; Charles A. Lindbergh; Gene Tunney; Raymond Guest, polo star; Baron Gooffried von Cramm, tennis champion; Admiral Richard E. Byrd.

Madeleine interprets the word "handsome" as meaning distinction, so she gives a grand break to chaps high in their thirties and well past their forties.

Connie Takes Cut.—Secret comes out of how much Constance Bennett received for her English picture, "Everything Is Thunder," which you may have seen. A court fight entered into by the star with Gaumont-British revealed that she had gathered in $35,000. She signed, according to her own statement, for $5,000 plus ten per cent of the gross receipts from America, and was guaranteed $30,000 in any case.

How different this from the $150,000 apiece she received a few years ago for two Warners films.

Connie warred with the British movie organization over the fact that she was never summoned for a second picture, according to contract.
On and Off the Set

The house which Jack Dempsey and Estelle Taylor occupied was a Hollywood landmark for years. Basil Rathbone lives there now. Looking for Mr. Rathbone the other day, we were fooled because Ivy has completely disguised the building. We stopped at a similar house and asked for Mr. R. "Sorry," said an unfriendly-looking woman. 'Never heard of him.' But, we persisted, "he lives in the old Jack Dempsey house—where Jack and Estelle Taylor lived."

Never heard of any of 'em," quoth the lady. She slammed the door. We found Mr. Rathbone and the house, next door, not twenty yards away. So much for Hollywood landmarks.

Jeanette MacDonald, practicing like everything for her dance numbers in "The Firefly," recalls, wryly, that when she went, years ago, to try out for one of Ned Wayburn's shows, that gentleman advised her, "You've got a swell pair of underpinnings, kid. Your singing is all right, it'll just get by. Put your faith in your legs and they'll make your fortune!"

Jeanette took his advice and danced and the money she made from dancing she spent on voice lessons. Now she's spending money she has made from her singing to brush up on her dancing and—oh, well, you figure it out!

Brian Donlevy thought that he had caught a burglar, all by himself. There was a chap removing Brian's new, back screen-door and in broad daylight, too. "Whatever you think you are doing, stop it!" admonished Brian, sternly.

The door-remover looked tough. "I'm takin' orders from nobody but the boss and you ain't the boss 'cause I've seen him!" he retorted. He proceeded with his door-removing. By the time Donlevy had retreated, he had rounded up his next door neighbor who really wanted to have his rear screen door removed, the tough gentleman had demolished half the Donlevy back porch.

"But he didn't poke me in the nose," Donlevy sighs, gracefully.

After this, Academy dinners will be rehearsed at length. This year's affair did not go smoothly. Victor McLaglen, presenting the winner's award to Paul Muni, made a long, rambling speech that drew titters from restless guests. (Victor, said reporters later, was "ill."

Poor bashful Muni stood by patiently, obviously embarrassed, anxious to be handed the statuette and get back to his seat.

At the same affair Bette Davis, intending to present the award to Luise Rainer, was completely overlooked. George Jessel, master of ceremonies, just sort of shoved the gold-plated statuette at Miss Rainer and rushed on to further business. Thus it appeared that Bette refused to make a speech, and both Bette and Luise were hurt.

From Dick Powell himself comes the final comment on the lurid publicity attendant on his honeymoon with Joan Blondell. He read newspaper clippings describing in lush phrases the love and travels of 'Joan and Dick,'
On and Off the Set

We are perfectly fascinated with the daily routine accompanying Douglas Montgomery's horseback rides. The stables are situated some distance from the Montgomery home, so the horse is delivered at the front door in a truck. Out pops Douglas, fresh as a daisy. Out pops the horse from the van, fresh but shaken. Off they go. When the ride is over, Montgomery dismounts in his own front yard and sends for the van to carry the horse back to the stables.

Franchot Tone will keep right on being overlooked by Hollywood producers, a star explained to us, as long as he is married to Joan Crawford. "Just Hollywood psychology," she explained grimly. "We rave about him in 'Quality Street,' 'Mutiny on the Bounty,' and 'Bengal Lancers,' but he's still Mr. Joan to the boys!"

It's nice, you know, to be a friend of the Basil Rathbones. One of their intimates, down on her luck, left Hollywood for a needed rest and vacation. In her absence they broke into her shabby apartment, hired pointers and decorators, and she didn't know the old place when she returned. It helped her morale and is bringing success, just as they hoped.

Those handsome darlings of the fans, Bob Taylor, Tyrone Power, and others, have had an amusing effect on social life in the colony. Tyrone attended a party recently and sat glumly in a corner, looking beautiful but harassed. "Even if they are just pretty boys," one charmer stormed, "you might think they'd at least try to show they have more to offer!"

A writer doing a story on Una Merkel thought it could be improved. "If I could talk to your mother," he said, "I'm sure she could tell me some things about her darling daughter that ought to be included." "Yes," Una agreed promptly, "but nothing you could print."

Have a laugh on Buck Jones—or is it on his daughter? She got a job with Universal as a designer and worked a week before he found out about it. But when he did find out, he stuck around until pay day and then borrowed five dollars from her.

Skinner's Sohy Powder won't Stay

Skin's So Dry Powder won't Stay

One Minute with Pond's Vanishing Cream

Then Powder's Swell...

Stays on for Hours

Melt Flakiness Away—in One Application

Dull and dead-looking, or tight and shiny... Dry skin needs the flattery of powder. Yet powder just won't stick to it.

Try softening that dry, "tight" skin with a keratolytic cream (Vanishing Cream). Then see how beautifully your skin takes powder!

A distinguished dermatologist explains this instant softening: "A keratolytic cream has the ability to melt away dried-out, dead surface cells. Then the smooth, underlying cells appear, moist and young. The skin takes on a fresh, softened appearance instantly. Vanishing Cream regularly applied also preserves the softness of the skin."

Use Pond's Vanishing Cream for more than just holding your powder. You'll find it does wonders for your skin, too.

For overnight—Apply after cleansing. Not greasy. It won't smear.

Lady Smiley

"I use Pond's Vanishing Cream as a foundation. It holds powder so long!"

For protection—Apply before long hours out of doors. Your skin won't rough up.

For flakiness—A film of Pond's Vanishing Cream smooths flakiness away. Make-up goes on perfectly, Stays.

To illustrate, he has solved the vexing question of what to do with used razor blades. He wraps them in the wrapping from the new blade, and drops them into a wastebasket, thus eliminating fear of injury to servants, and preserving his love of tidiness.

His chief hate is the twenty-miles-an-hour-driver who hogs the middle of the street, and won't move over. On our way out to Bel-Air, we met many of them on the wide boulevard.

His secretary was sorting fan mail which had arrived from the studio. There were three piles — the "crank" letters which Gene never reads; the ordinary run-of-the-mill begging letters and epistles from yearning adolescents requesting his photograph; and a sizable pile of what are judged as intelligent letters, offering criticism of his work, or comments on his pictures.

"I read all of those, and answer them," he told me. "I learn much that is helpful; although, sometimes, they are a trifle confusing. Most of my work on the stage, and my early work in pictures, was in dramatic roles. We'd like to see you in comedy roles, for a change," the letters suggested. Now that I've had five pretty successful comedy roles in a row, they are beginning to say, This is all right, but how about some dramatic roles—something with backbone to them?"

"I don't know but that they're right, at that, although I hadn't thought much about it until so many letters came in. I have come close to being typed two or three times. Maybe, I'm coming close to it again."

"When do you relax?" I wanted to know. "Seems to me that you've made a bushel of pictures in succession since you've been in Hollywood."

"I had a vacation a couple of years ago—the first I'd had since I really got under way on Broadway. I had never been abroad, and I set forth with grim determination to see all of Europe that was possible in three months. I tore through Bremen, Berlin, Munich, and wound up with a flourish at St. Moritz for the winter sports. In the midst of strenuous skiing, I suddenly realized that I'd gone all that way to see the same kind of snow and slide down the same kind of slides that we have within sixty miles of Hollywood—except, of course, for the Alps! So I came straight home. No London! And just a glimpse of Paris on the way."

"I thought it rather a sad story, and wished him better luck next time."

Despite his valuable versatility as an actor; despite his undoubted glamour and romantic appeal, Gene is actually, fundamentally, a sound business man with a commodity to sell to the best possible advantage.
Droll Fellow

is always kindly, even when he takes a sly poke at you. It's as if he said, "Oh, well, we're all funny at times without knowing it!"

His wife and he have the same sort of sense of humor, and she says that it was laughing at the same things which first drew them together.

"Tommy's humor isn't just street humor, either," says his wife. "It grows along our daily path and has helped us over a lot of rough places."

And he is a modest person—never, for instance, talks about being the grandson of Sir Joseph Mundin, one of England's greatest character actors.

But he loves to tell jokes on himself—and thus he gave me some amusing highlights on his career.

"My family decided I was a comedian while I was yet small," he said. "An aunt of mine used to exclaim, 'With that face, look what a start he's got!' And my mother, looking at me critically one day, remarked, 'I think it's pulling his face about has done all that!' Even as a child I seemed to know what she meant!

"As a kid I recited at entertainments, and I was nine when I went to Welwyn to sing at a church fair. It was then I got my astrakhan-trimmed coat and made up my mind to be an actor. My mother had seen actors, and they all wore fur-trimmed coats.

So she cut up an astrakhan muff of my sister's and trimmed my little coat with it. From that day I never looked back—I was an actor!

"When I was twelve I was in a missionary pageant and had to blacken my face and recite about Africa. It was a religious thing. They took me off after the first performance. 'Why,' they said, 'you're funny!' So I just took their word for it! I thought, 'Am I funny? Yes.' I still think so, except when one or two dear friends occasionally set me wondering if I really am so very!"

Then there was the time he went to sing at a little town in Wales, in a picture house, where, arriving for rehearsal, he went on the stage waiting for the orchestra. A man was playing the trombone. After an hour or so Herbert said to him, 'When is the rest of the orchestra coming?'

The man stopped fiddling and said, 'They're not coming. There's only me.' "Well," said Mundin, "I couldn't sing a comic song to the accompaniment of a trombone even if you were the best trombonist in Wales.' To which the musician answered, 'Indeed in goodness, I'm not that. If I were, I'd be at the mayor's party right this minute with all the other trombonists!'

"The next funny thing I did," said Mundin, "was to dress myself up as a sailor and go to war. Everybody told me I looked very funny as a sailor.

"And after I left the navy I stopped amusing people and struck rather a tragic note—I started mending people's telephones. I left people without telephones for hours while I fooled around trying to find out why they couldn't talk over them. I seldom found out, so I was asked to leave.

"Then I went on the stage again. As my friends thought I was amusing, I thought I had better hurl myself at the people en masse. And when I went to get the job I sang 'The Holy City'—and got a job as a comedian! They didn't know 'The Holy City' was funny until I sang it!

Mundin was performing for the children in a school at Eastbourne when the great André Charlot whose son was in the school, came down to visit the boy and saw the comedian perform.

"Whether it was that he didn't think my act was a good influence on his son, or for some other reason," Munsin twirled, "he sent me to London to perform there in his revue. Then I came to America with him in 1924."

Munsin has cause to love this country, he admits, for it was America which made him.

He longs to play "Pickwick" on the screen.

He has some pithy things to say about comedy.

"It is hard for a comedian to retain his individuality nowadays because he must help motivate the plot.

"And it looks as if, if we don't watch out, we are going to stop people from laughing, because we are making audiences too analytical. Comedians used to spend their time acting, not thinking. Comedians now are forced to think too much. It spoils their spontaneity. "The audience gets ahead of them."

"A comedian puts on a tuxedo and thinks that gives his comedy an air of distinction. What would happen if the circus clown came out and did his stuff in a top hat? Comedians these days apparently want to disguise that they are being funny—and some of them don't have much trouble doing it."

"Yes, comedians these days just let people guess whether their jokes are funny or not."

"But after all, the desire to act sometimes possesses the comedian, and he tries to act while being funny. And—a whimsical grin lit up Munsin's Punchbowl face—"and the leading man is funny while he is trying to act!"

The bent neck raised itself to a graceful curve. The sagging shoulders straightened. The shuffling gait became elastic as we walked to her dressing room. The dim eyes became a brown of great depth, shining and tender.

Professionally speaking, I have held hands with quite a few stellar lights. Holding Bondi’s hand, momentarily, was entirely different. I have never felt such harmonious vibrations come from any other player. Right away we chimed.

“We pay too much attention to outer form,” she remarked when I called attention to the fact that meeting people is often a most agreeable surprise, often quite contrary to what is expected.

“The other day,” Miss Bondi continued, “I heard some one playing a melody of Tchaikowsky on the piano over there. Curious to know who played so well, I come from my dressing room. The player was that stage hand across from here.” She indicated a burly man who suggested a prize fighter. “That man must have music in him. Yet to glance casually at him you could scarcely imagine it.”

The power of the variety of her rôles has always held me. Just as it is beyond me to know how she transforms herself from one to the other.

“As an actress, you come to sense the hidden things behind form,” she said. “To play a rôle, I must sense it flow through me, like music. There’s good music and evil music. But even a repellent character has music in it.

“I’ve found it always best to relax and wait for the character to flow into my mind. I do not believe an actress has to experience in actuality what she portrays on the stage and screen. That, surely, is not acting.

“In ‘Maid of Salem,’ I found myself to a woman of 1640. Naturally, I knew nothing of such a period, or the people who lived then. I wanted to know how a woman of that period would think and feel. I did not hunt up innumerable historical volumes. Nor did I fight with myself to force the personality into my mind. I merely imagined what this woman would be... noticed her attitude seemed very antagonistic. During the playing of a symphony, I glanced her way. I could see her inwardly fighting against herself. Gradually the music held sway, and she slowly submitted to its influence. Finally she was in tears.

More Than Actress

Born in Chicago, she was drawn early to acting. She started in amateur shows, studied oratory, and became a member of the Chicago Little Theater.

Stuart Walker saw her and called upon her to play a small part in one of his stock companies. "I can't pay you very much, Miss Bondi," he added, "only twenty-five a week." "What? You want to pay me?" gasped Bondi. "Mr. Walker, I'll pay you to get this chance!"

Bondi's chance started her on the road to Broadway. "Street Scene" called her to Hollywood, when the play was filmed.

"I approach each new part with awe," Miss Bondi said. "Everything I do is always a first effort. I handle the rôle in almost a holy manner. With me it is not a matter of pulling on a wig"—she pointed to the white hair she still wore—"and smearing grease paint on my face, or penciling lines of old age."

"In making up any character, first of all I sit before my mirror. It becomes an empty canvas. I merely regard my reflection and see it change. I cannot account for it, I don't know the psychological angle of it, but I do know that by the very alchemy of imagination my face changes into the character I plan to portray."

Indeed, her like is rarely seen. Not her own profession. They don't observe. They don't study. Some of them can't.

—and her acting is this—means constant study. Her keen imagination is a Heaven-sent gift. Not all can possess it!

No wonder Bondi overshadows the stars. Working with her, they face a splendid actress. She is a splendid actress because she is a splendid woman.

all of us. We equally have the privilege of looking at pictures, people, scenery, and any visible object from our own viewpoint. It is only sporting to respect that of the other fellow, though we may disagree therewith.

To my mind, Fredie March, as Both- wold, looked and acted the part splendidly. His bluntness seemed in keeping with his role, and his bit of a brogue delighted me immensely, being a Scot myself. In fact, I thoroughly enjoyed "Mary of Scotland" and all the actors therein and thought they acquitted themselves nobly. Of course, it is not history. Nevertheless, it appealed to me. Of course, my opinion cannot compare with that of a critic, trained in the art. His keen perception observes weaknesses not apparent to the casual person.

Anyway, a sharp rap on the knuckles is more stimulating and bracing than too many pats on the back, and I feel sure Mr. March will take the criticism fairly and squarely and profit thereby.

Mr. Nestor will miss much by eliminating Picture Play from his list, but the circulation department need not worry as a result of this dire threat. Since the publication of one of my letters, mail has come to me from many parts of the world, so the loss is Mr. Nestor's. With so many loyal friends and subscribers, who "take it and like it," Picture Play will be able to carry on in its own efficient way.

Cream Puffs in Comparison.

SOMETIMES I wonder what is in the minds of some of the reader-critics whose letters appear in Picture Play periodicals. I think it is just something they ate that causes them to vent their wrath on the heads of their victims.

Screen stars are not perfect, and neither are the rest of us. And if we are prone to bewail the apparent lack of beautiful ladies on the screen, then we had better come down to earth and admit that we as a human race are really a homely bunch, after all.

In short, why not let our critics begin at home? Heaven knows we need it. How many of us really would be willing to stay under the lights, rehearsing, taking, and retaking scenes day after day, sometimes with uncomfortable make-up and props, often only to find out that half of it had to be done all over again?

We also forget—if we ever were wide-eyed enough to think of it—that the work that makes these pictures possible did not begin with the cranking of the camera on the first red. Pictures require actors and actresses, and such great personalities as Jean Crawford, Ginger Rogers, Fred Astaire, Jennette MacDonald, et cetera, are successes because of hours and hours of hard work and training before the footlights, with the inevitable sore feet, headaches, sacrifices, and disappointments before they ever signed their first movie contracts—all with such ambition and determination that would make the rest of us look like cream puffs in comparison.

The stars of today need not try to "take the place of stars of a few years ago." They have their own jobs to fill, and are doing a mighty good job of it, if you ask me. Poor vehicles and mediocrity can ruin even the best of them. Good pictures and adequate support can put many a promising young man and woman on the road to success.

I have come to realize that, after all, the screen is just one of many professions, that the great stars are really people, and that if we can just lay down ourammers long enough we'll soon find out that they are as a whole mighty grand people.

It is for that reason that I shall continue to recognize the charm and sweetness of such troopers as Madge Evans and Loretta Young—the personal magnetism of la belle Crawford, Marlene Dietrich, Greta Garbo, and others, and the glorious comedy of Irene Dunne, Grace Moore, and Jennette MacDonald. And why? Guess it's because I don't consider myself a would-be critic—only a fan, that's all.

Della Lind, Viennese actress recently placed under contract, dons her new sand-color woolen suit. Her knitted sweater is of maroon.
goes to work. With J. Farrell MacDonald, he finds the pass through the forbidding Rockies that makes the railway possible. His performance is excellent. Especially good, too, is Barry Mackay, his escapee friend. He is one of the most expressive British actors I have seen.

"The King and the Chorus Girl."—Warners. Any number of critics say this is a marvelous picture. I cannot, for the life of me, remember any of the particulars of their enthusiasm: that is, just why it is marvelous. So I must give you my opinion for what it is worth to you. I do not consider any picture marvelous that can be anticipated scene by scene. I think that surprise, even mild surprise, is important in keeping the spectator interested. This surprised me not at all at any time. I do not like characters that are built up for charm and irresistibility. I do not like charm to be ballyhooed; I like the actor to be unconscious of it and to discover it for himself. But here we are introduced to a new star, Fernand Gravet, and we are virtually dared not to find him delightful. He is a good actor, assured, young, a romanticized Johnny Hines who speaks excellent English, but his natural ability is robbed of its worth by being overplayed. He is an ex-king in Paris who, at first attracted by Joan Blondell of the Folies Bergère, falls in love with her when she shows her American independence. Tiffs, pouts, a slap and the rest of it unite them after a long interval of side-stepping. An elaborate production camouflages the unimportance of the acting, with the fanciest automobile ever seen on the screen featured for royal entrances and exits. A publicity bulletin tells me that Edward Everett Horton plays his 999th rôle. I have been tired of Mr. Horton's jitters for years without this reminder.

"Waikiki Wedding."—Paramount. Encouraging enthusiasm and surrounding applause greeted this picture when I saw it. So, by that token, it must be immense. Frankly, I don't know. All I do know is that it seemed to be keyed to the ten-year-old intelligence. Perhaps that is why I found in reviews of the picture merits that I hadn't noticed. Maybe my mind is too immature. I learned that Mr. Crosby was in top form, that the songs were a delightful accompaniment of an enjoyable musical and that the whole was, of all things, a satire! It must depend on whether one likes crooning or not. I don't. It hurts my throat to listen to such misuse of the voice. Mr. Crosby's hoarse, uneven speech testifies to the condition of his vocal cords. Oh, well! Lushly attractive backgrounds of the Hawaii of musical comedy, with hula dancers, palms, and flowers galore give visual satisfaction to the follower of the story of a girl contest-winner from the States who comes to Honolulu as the "Pineapple Queen." Disillusioned and dissatisfied, she is taken in hand by Mr. Crosby, publicity man of the pineapple firm, who acquaints her with the romance of Hawaiian nights and an adventure with antagonistic natives. He with his trumpet, she with her voice. Fritz Kreisler and Kirsten Flagstad in their places couldn't serve art more reverently as when Mr. MacMurrayrotts and Miss Lombard croon. Hope they never mislay their sense of humor again.

"When Love Is Young."—Universal. Though unlike "Three Smart Girls," this is equally entertaining. The composition is made because both stories come from the same studio. The newer opus is freshly treated, is lively, colorful, and human. It gives Virginia Bruce her best opportunity, with a similar break for Kent Taylor, who shows himself to be an excellent actor for the first time. Bruce is not ugly enough to graduate class. No hope is held for her future, but she goes to New York for vocal culture just the same. Even her teacher is pessimistic. By a fluke she lands in musical comedy and becomes a hit. Her trip back home as a Broadway celebrity is amusingly ironic and the earlier stage episodes are attractive and original. Especially good is Walter Brennan, the Swede of "Come and Get It."

"Wings of the Morning."—20th Century-Fox. Annabella, the French actress, gives such a delightful account of herself in this British-made Technicolor film that undoubtedly she will be seen in American pictures. She is fetching, as we used to say, knows how to act and has credible, not synthetic, individuality. She is concerned in a tale of more than usual imagination and substance, too, but she is more important than the story. She begins, in the prologue, as a young princess who marries an English nobleman in 1889 and becomes her grandson in 1937, masquerading as a boy. There is much about horse-racing, with England's Derby as the colorful climax. But Annabella's refusal to take off her trousers for a morning plunge with Henry Fonda is more important. In fact, Annabella's part in the entertainment is the most important part of it; more important than for instance, the tenor singing of fat, famous John McCormack, who doesn't belong in the buoyant, light-hearted proceedings at all.

"Leading artists of the screen prefer Luckies"

"I live at the beach most of the year and there is hardly a weekend that a number of friends don’t drop in. Naturally, I keep several brands of cigarettes on hand, but the Luckies are always the first to disappear. I suppose it’s just natural that Luckies would be the favorite brand because picture work certainly places a severe tax on the throat. Leading artists of the screen prefer Luckies because they are a light smoke that sympathizes with tender throats."

Janet Gaynor
Feminine Star of David O. Selznick's Technicolor Production of "A Star Is Born"

An independent survey was made recently among professional men and women—lawyers, doctors, scientists, etc. Of those who said they smoke cigarettes, over 87% stated they personally prefer a light smoke.

Miss Gaynor verifies the wisdom of this preference, and so do other leading artists of the radio, stage, screen and opera. Their voices are their fortunes. That’s why so many of them smoke Luckies. You, too, can have the throat protection of Luckies—a light smoke, free of certain harsh irritants removed by the exclusive process "It’s Toasted". Luckies are gentle on the throat.

A Tip for Barbara Stanwyck.

Potentially, the screen has produced its finest American actress in Barbara Stanwyck. Those who saw "Ladies of Leisure" recall a tour de force comparable only to the "Mildred" of Bette Davis, the "Mrs. Craig" of Rosalind Russell, the "Marguerite Gautier" of Garbo. A happy picture, it was Miss Stanwyck's only great one and, artistically speaking, the apparent swan song of director Frank Capra. Dazzled by commercial reception, Mr. Capra has allowed his gifts to dissolve into the most appalling parade of hokum and whimsy ever recorded on celluloid and labeled box office.

As a dining and dancing partner of Robert Taylor, Miss Stanwyck enjoys immense renown. No one blamed her for realizing on this canny publicity campaign when her career was at low ebb. Nor is she blamed for the years laden with putrid pictures, years in which money was her sole comfort. By now Miss Stanwyck should be rich enough and certainly ought to be bored enough to contemplate artistic growth.

Miss Stanwyck is a grand person, a great emotional actress, and it is indeed a regrettable fact that she devoted the thought and discrimination to roles that she lavishes on her social activities, she might possibly achieve a place on the shining scroll which will cherish Garbo's exquisite memory through the silver mists of immortality. A memory which will touch the soul to music.

Bonita's Acting Talent.

I have seen Bonita Granville in "These Three," "The Plough and the Stars," and "Maid of Salem" and I have come to the conclusion that she is the most talented child in pictures. Bonita knows more about acting than most of the big stars of to-day. It is my opinion that the Academy award for the best performance in 1936 should have been given to little Miss Granville for her superb work in "These Three." What other child actress could
What the Fans Think

Over here we think she’s swell, and it doesn’t matter what English fans think. We think she’s good and a nice salary paid to her says so!

As for Jessie Matthews, she is not popular over here. True, some theaters show her pictures. But, as you probably know, we are shown two features on every program. I don’t think many people would enter a theater where only Miss Matthews’s picture was being shown. She is not pretty, and it looks to me as though she had copied her style of dancing from some of our dancing stars.

So, Miss Swallow, you can keep your Jessie Matthews. And please keep Dietrich, too. And we’ll keep Madeleine Carroll, and I’ll bet she’ll be glad to stay!

Best in Musicals.

What joy it gave me to find that very delightful full-page portrait and the interesting write-up about John Boles in the April issue!

This magazine has been my favorite for over five years, now, because Norbert Lusk’s reviews have always been extremely interesting to me. I have not missed a single copy since the very first one that attracted my attention with a portrait of John Boles in a baseball uniform. That was shortly after his brilliant success in “The Desert Song,” and also in “Rio Rita.” John Boles’s glorious tenor voice in those two musicals was certainly a wonderful treat for movie-goers.

I admire and deeply appreciate Mr. Boles’s superb portrayals in dramatic pictures. He was unforgettable in “Back Street,” and I liked him in “A Message to Garcia” and “Craig’s Wife,” but, still, I like him best of all in musicals. He was delightfully refreshing in “Redheads on Parade,” and I enjoyed him so much in “Rose of the Rancho,” opposite lovely Gladys Swarthout! I should like very much to see the two together again.

Please, fans, tell his studio we want John Boles to sing!

Hints for Movie Opera.

It seems that there are two main arguments against the production of screen opera. (1) That the plots and language of most operas are obscure, and therefore not suited to screen translation. Also, they are mainly tragic. (2) That the movie-going public is not intelligent enough to understand or “stand” opera, because of the lack of action and the higher type of unfamiliar music.

Bo-hi! I submit that these arguments are fallacies of a well-worn kind. In the first place, there is in existence a general fallacy to the effect that all operas have unwieldy plots, little action, and tragic endings. Those who generalize in this manner reveal the fact that they are least qualified to discuss the subject at all. I can name at least twenty well-known operas which end with the hero...
What the Fans Think

and heroine “plight their tooth,” and with the villain invariably meeting a sticky end. Regarding the obscurity of plots, since generalization is so beloved by these students of opera, I will answer them in their own coin. No operatic libretto is ever as obscure as the vast majority of our modern film plots, which are often so obscure as to be nonexistent.

I have seen films in which operatic excerpts were featured, and I have seen nothing more ridiculous in all my life. In addition to the language barrier, the costumes, postures, and gestures of the artists, entirely stage-trained, were ludicrous in the extreme, and before long, the audience was reduced to tears—of mirth.

Take the operatic sequences in “Rose-Marie,” although this is not really a representative case. We have Jeanette MacDonald tripping onto the stage with arms out-stretched in the conventional operatic style, and going off into the exquisite “Waltz Song” in French, not one word of which is understood by ninety-nine and nine tenths of the audience. The montage scenes which follow give us flashes of the opera—fortunately, the story of “Romeo and Juliet” is so well-known that no explanation is needed, but if the audience had to rely on its knowledge of French to tell it “what it’s all about” then it would be just too bad. I think I am safe in saying that very few did realize the portent of the action in the “Tosca” scenes at the end, which were in Italian.

So, those among my critics who are judging opera by the excerpts in a foreign tongue which they have witnessed on the screen to date, may have another guess.

Again, there are those who think that I suggest opera should be transferred to the screen as it is staged. Heaven forbid! I can imagine nothing more awful: nothing better calculated to kill off the revived musical interest now in full force. So far, the camera has not been taken “into” an opera. It has merely looked on at the scene from the stalls of a theater. That is because producers are so self-conscious about opera; they continually think of it as “grand.” If they were to treat it in the same way they treated “Naughty Marietta,” then we should see—and hear—something revolutionary.

In the right hands, the flexibility of the camera could destroy the stiffness always connected with acting in opera. Just because, on the operatic stage, the hero is apt to plead with the heroine for her hand for the best part of an hour on one knee, is no reason why he should do the same thing on the screen. That is just one operatic convention which the screen could destroy and more power to it! Eventually, there must come a release of opera from the century-old traditions of the stage, and I repeat, that what has already been done on the screen with musical comedy and operetta can be done with opera. And how marvelously it should turn out, when one considers the glorious treasure-store from which to draw, both in the music, and in the performers. Garbo’s Perseverance.

I RECALL the charm of Maude Adams in Barrie’s plays, and the enchantment of Jane Cowl, and Norma Shearer in “Smilin’ Through”; but surely there never was anything so beautiful and inspiring as Garbo’s portrayal of Marguerite Gautier in Dumas’s “Lady of the Camellias.” It was so poignantly beautiful. Every expression in her eyes, every inflection of her voice, every muscle in her hands, helped one to forget Garbo and to think only of Marguerite Gautier.

Recently, I heard two women commenting on “Camille.” One said that Garbo’s performance was one of “pure inspiration”; the other called it “genius.” But is that quite fair to a real artist?

Actually, Garbo’s preparation for that role began when she was a little girl in Stockholm. She might have been sitting on the grass in her own yard, or somewhere beside the sea; but wherever she was she was dreaming of that day when she could pretend that she was a Marguerite Gautier, or a Queen Christina, and make us walk with her through the lives of these people, laughing or crying, as they laughed or cried.

However, it is well that that little Greta Gustafsson could not look into the future and foresee the cost of her dream. Garbo has strength and courage, but it is doubtful that she would have had enough of either had she known that success would come only in exchange for family, country, and mother tongue, and dearly loved freedom. In fact, everything that is worth while in life.

And, as if that were not enough, she has been tormented with loss of loved ones, the gnawing agony of homesickness, and the ignorant criticism and ridicule of those who must always disbelieve that which they do not understand.

Therefore, let us not sum up Garbo's great performance with words like "genius" and "inspiration," no matter how superlative they are. Let us say that it is the result of years of study, self-sacrifice, and hard work. A poet once said, "Genius, that power which dazzles mortal eyes, is oft but perseverance in disguise." Any one who has worked with Garbo will tell you of her patience and perseverance over the smallest detail of her work.

Champion of Fair Play.

In Picture Play for February, under the caption "Observations," signed by A. W., Battle House, Mobile, Alabama, was the following paragraph:

"Joan Crawford—Her vulgarity and coarseness are pathetically and unsuccessfully hidden behind a grotesque artificial mask."

I don't wonder that A. W. was ashamed to sign his full name, for a more contemptible, despicable paragraph it has never been my misfortune to read, especially about such a prominent person as Miss Crawford. What her surroundings were before she became a talented dancer, and later elevated herself to movie stardom by sheer courage, perseverance and self-analysis I do not know, but I do know she is admired and respected by millions of fair-minded persons.

Assuming there is some slight foundation for A. W.'s insinuations, it shows how contemptible a person can be to bring it up now, but until I have positive proof of those accusations I will still consider Joan Crawford as just an individual as she is on the screen today, and if more stars were like her and followed her example the morality and decency in the movie world would be on a great deal higher plane.

The Perfect Male.

Why all the criticism against Robert Taylor? Certainly he has done nothing to deserve such unjust criticism. An Adult Fan, in the April issue, said he found it impossible to consider sitting through his Arnaud, watching him posing and making funny faces. I guess he doesn't know the difference between making faces and acting. Why, Bebe can do more acting through his facial expressions than most actors can do through actions.

That fan also said he was boring. I don't think he was boring in "Camille"; the picture itself was. I can't understand why he hasn't had a good picture since "Small-town Girl." Surely the most popular, most handsome, and most romantic star in Hollywood deserves a good picture. People like Errol Flynn and Gary Cooper are starred in every picture while Taylor's name is always found second in the cast. That's another thing I can't understand.

I've seen every one of Robert's pictures, with the exception of "Handy Andy," and he did a perfect job of acting in each one. He's the most perfect male I've ever seen. Ever since I can remember, I used to change my favorite every month or so, but Robert Taylor has been my favorite since "Society Doctor" and I doubt whether I'll find any one to equal him. It's not only his good looks that have won him so many fans, but his beautiful voice and striking personality. He's one favorite who'll always be "tops" with me. At least one costume to match your dog is another Hollywood fad. Maureen O'Sullivan's sports ensemble is of gray pongee, with navy-blue dots.
Gracie Morgan.—John Gielgud, whose "The Good Companions" and "Secret Agent" were shown in this country, and who appeared on Broadway last winter in "Hamlet," has returned to England for the stage production "He Was Born Gay." He was born in London, England, April 14, 1904, has fair hair and blue eyes. Came to America eight years ago to appear in "The Patriot." In London he has been seen in many plays, modern and classic. For stills of "Secret Agent," write to Gaumont-British's Publicity Department, 1600 Broadway, New York City, asking them if the stills are available and at what price.

Mervyn LeRoy.—Merle Oberon was born in Calcutta, India, February 19, 1911; five feet two, weighs 112; brown hair, hazel-green eyes. Her father was connected with the English Army. Her right name is Estelle Merle O'Brien Thompson. She worked as a secretary in a large commercial firm, but the thing she loved most was dancing. In London she went to work as a dance hostess. An American director gave her her first movie job, an extra in "Ebb Tide." She made a number of English films before going to Hollywood to appear in "Folies Bergère de Paris."

Alvex Locken.—Virginia Bruce did her own singing in "The Great Ziegfeld." Olivia de Havilland is five feet four; Frankie Darro is currently appearing in "Devil's Island," "Tough to Handle," and "A Day at the Races."

Margaret Skaggs.—Deanna Durbin was born December 1, 1922, and Mitzi Green, October 22, 1920. Jean Harlow's "brownette" dresses aren't as dark as they were, which proves that most of the stars simply cannot resist changing the color of their hair as often as the mood strikes them.

Arthur Sampson.—Shirley Temple's next picture is "Wee Willie Winkie." Sorry, but I haven't the information you ask about Marie Wilson. Errol Flynn was born June 20, 1909; Frances Langford, April 1, 1916. Miss Langford has been scheduled to make "Broadway Melody of 1937." "Easy to Love," "The Hit Parade," and "Vogues of 1938." Jessie Matthews is with Gaumont-British.

Tony.—Patricia Ellis is five feet seven, weighs 115; Marlene Dietrich, five feet five, weighs 130; Kay Francis, five feet six, 112; Merle Oberon, five feet two, 112; Gypsy-Swan, five feet three and a half; Fay Wray, five feet six. When an actor plays leading roles then he is considered a star. Jeanette MacDonald has never sung in opera. Randolph Scott's latest is "High, Wide and Handsome," with "Buccaneer" to follow. Humphrey Bogart's is "Marked Woman," with "Kid Galahad," "San Quentin," and "Dead End" following.

Los McCarthy.—William Boyd is under contract to Paramount. For stills of "Hopalong Cassidy Returns," address the Publicity Department, Paramount Pictures, Paramount Building, Times Square, New York City. First write and inquire if the stills are available and at what price.

Kay.—Nino Martini was born in Verona, Italy, August 4, 1901; five feet nine, weighs 150; black hair, brown eyes. He has never been married. He is scheduled to make "Song of India" for RKO. Elissa Landi was born in Venice, Italy, December 6, 1906, and was brought up in England. Five feet five, weighs 117, light-auburn hair, green-blue eyes. Married John C. Lawrence, an English barrister, in 1928; they were divorced in 1936.

Let's Have Opera.

I THINK that opera has a very definite place in pictures. And I disagree most heartily with those who say differently.

Why should people who have not much money be deprived of the finer and more beautiful things in life, when through the medium of the screen these things could be given to them at a price they could afford to pay?

Even though I do not know the stories of the operas, I enjoy the singing and acting as done by Nelson Eddy and others with equally fine voices. How nice it would be to see as well as hear "Carmen" or "Aida" or any of the other beautiful operas as sung by such stars as Nelson Eddy, Lawrence Tibbett, Lily Pons, Gladys Swarthout, or any of the other singers with whom we are all acquainted.

1. for one, hope that we soon may have operas and more serious music on the screen.

Autograph Hunters.

THE day being an unusually sunny Saturday afternoon, and Yours Truly being an autograph hound, my sleuthing nose scented that celebrities were running loose on Fifth Avenue.

My expedition brought me face to face with a timid soul, dressed far too simply for an Academy award nominee, but on her forehead were bangs—which identified Luise Rainer to my mind.

This actress of renown was outfitted in a smart rust-colored suit, low-heeled shoes of the same color, and her brown hat looked as worn out as the headgear that is worn by Miss Rainer's contemporary, Burgess Meredith.

My autographic understanding reasoned that the foreign actress would not sign my book in the busy shopping district, so I permitted my footsteps to trace hers. A half a block behind Miss Rainer I spotted my brother and sister autograph hounds who had reasoned as I had. They, on the other hand, had pursued Miss Rainer from her hotel, the Waldorf, which is on 50th Street and Park Avenue, to 65th Street and Fifth Avenue and were continuing their pursuit back to the Waldorf without a stop.

Never before in the history of autograph collecting has a movie celebrity been known to use this amount of shoe leather.

Miss Rainer was being pursued because earlier in the day she had refused to autograph. In her slight foreign accent she murmured, "No, go, way, you will attract a crowd." Knowing our insistence, she probably expected us to follow her, which we did. The promenade led us back to the Waldorf after a twenty-two-block walk, and another delay, during which I took little star's autograph.

As the famous actress trod into the elevator we all hastily thanked her for the stroll.

What our seething minds think about Clifton Odell's doctrine is not for publication, but our better nature admires her sweet simplicity. During Miss Rainer's stay in New York, Marlene Dietrich was also sojourning here. Miss Dietrich dis-played a show of vulgarity in her dress and manner, which, despite being only autograph hounds, we thought degrading.

This so-called actress would only sign when she was assured that a crowd would gather about her overdressed person. Whereas, Miss Rainer, despite receiving the New York critics' award for the best acting, tried to make herself inconspicuous, and if it was acting it certainly proved her technique.

Before closing, my fiery heart presses me on to make known the real Jean Arthur. Just a short year ago Miss Arthur was sweetness itself in obling the autograph hounds. Has success gone to her head? She is now listed in the same category as Wallace Beery, a pair whom we willingly throw stinkweeds to.

A Scoffer Repents.

About a year ago, I joined the local movie club. All the girls had some particular favorites. I had none. I was one of those detestably superior persons who profess to look down on movie stars as 'dull.' My only reason for joining this club was that all the nicest girls in town belonged, and wherever the nicest girls are, the nicest boys manage to gravitate. Catch on? Each girl had a scrapbook in which she pasted pictures and news items about her favorite. While they were showing their books at meeting, I employed my time making cracks about their 'traves.'

Imagine my popularity? But they did not kick me out, because my father is a professor in a near-by university which some of the girls attend and they were afraid of reprisals in grading their work (all wrong, of course, because Dad is Honor 100%). Well, to get on with my confession, last March I saw "The Crusades," and DeMille's medieval hokum hit me like a charge of dynamite. I mean Henry Wilexon as Richard the Lion-hearted. Henry was grand, the most furiously vital person I had ever seen on the screen. And a voice that affected me like an organ.

At last I understood why girls keep scrapbooks. At the next meeting, I rashly announced the name of my favorite and that I, too, had a scrapbook.

What the Fans Think

Barbara Stanwyck is a Jim Tully heroine. I can't help liking the gal and her grit. Her only fault is Robert Taylor. Best brunettes: Oberon, Shearer, Frances, Colbert, and the cinema's Cornell—"Macedon" Dorothy Wrek. Double Simone: a potter. No chin. Spoiled. Should be soundly spanked. Favorite villainess: Bette Davis. Her rages are magnificent.

Garbo and Dietrich: I don't even hate them. One doesn't speak ill of the dead. But why don't they lie down?

Favorite prima donna: piquant Jeannette MacDonald. All her leading men become merely part of the background. She's never played with a male equal.

Surely no one can ever forget that gracious lady—Vilma Banny. Her innate refinement, her womanly charm, her personal integrity as well as her fine acting serve to make her memory far more potent than the actual presence of many so-called exotics. Her ethereal loveliness makes Anita Louise seem almost gross. My congratulations and best wishes to Miss and Mrs. Rod La Roque on their tenth wedding anniversary.

Based Upon Ignorance.

I have never had much patience with stupid people who criticize natural-born actors. Their greatest difficulty usually is their blindness to genuine acting ability. Having never been educated to recognize real talent, their judgment is more or less based upon ignorance.

Is there then a wonder why there is a scarcity of great actors and actresses such as Fredric March, Ronald Colman, Greta Garbo, Norma Shearer, Marlene Dietrich, et cetera, when they are constantly being cheapened and picked apart. Criticism does not hurt any one, but even an actor can't accomplish the impossible. Surely now and then the fans can give a little help. Maybe the only person who said, "this is a thoroughly classless personality, ought to divert her attention and attend a dramatic school for a time, instead of chattering on something she knows little or nothing about.

Great actors would be better off these days if they raised chickens instead of trying to please some of these narrow-minded critics. There is little reward in either, but at least from chickens you derive some satisfaction, and retain your self-respect.

The Stars of To-day.

WHERE, oh, where, are the stars of yesterday? It is perhaps true that many of them can no longer return to the screen in the kind of roles that brought them fame, and some of them, such as Wallace Reid, Valentino, and John Gilbert, have passed away, but what I want to know is where are their counterparts, their successors?

Naturally, I don't expect that there could be an exact duplicate of Wally or Tip—an'éver there could be—but where are their equals to-day? I remember a Wally Reid whose pictures were a joy and a delight; a Valentino whose films were full of passion and romance; a Negri whose latent fire flashed out in even her most mediocre films; a Swanson who gave us successively so varied portraits as those in "Zaza," "The Hunching Bird," "The Manicled," and "Madame Sans-Gène"; a Garbo whose heroines were pulsating with poetic beauty; a Novarro whose Rex Ingram films were a succession of vivid roles.

In the case of Novarro, we find the answer to the puzzle of why to-day's personalities rarely elicit the excitement of yesterday's. Novarro, under the direction of Ingram, dazzled us with a profusion of roles. When he left Ingram, his directors were chosen indiscriminately and we later found him repeating his roles. More to the point, his roles were rarely directed with the understanding that Ingram gave them.

In the same way, we found Gloria Swanson at her happiest under Allan Dwan; Richard Dix at his breeziest under Gregory La Cava; Pola Negri most scintillating under Ernst Lubitsch; John Gilbert most fiery under King Vidor; and Mary Pickford most lovable under Marshall Neilan. Of course, all these stars were versatile enough to show up well under other good directors, but the winning combinations should have been repeated at intervals.

June Travis has a formidable chaperon on her vacation at the beach on completion of "Men in Exile," but she insists that the expression of her English bulldog has nothing to do with the title of her latest film.
Nowadays we find no such happy instances of a star developing under a sympathetic director. At one studio the male discoveries are paired off successfully with Harlow, Crawford, Shearer, and Garbo—a regular routine of mere "foil" roles. At another, if a new player succeeds in a certain rôle, he is rushed into a quick and seemingly endless procession of similar roles. And if he dare rebel, as did James Cagney, he is practically banished from the screen.

My conclusion is that to-day's newcomers may have as much talent, personality, and individuality as yesterday's, but the producers do not properly develop them by presenting them in colorful and, above all, varied roles, at neither too rare nor too frequent intervals.

An Apology.

EVER since Robert Taylor became women's idol, I have seen him in all his pictures, trying to learn to like him. But I couldn't see this boy in my way; nothing could change my dislike for him. He was a conceived fellow in my mind. But when I read Jack Snalley's article in March Picture Play, my opinion of Robert was entirely changed. I can now see his side of the problem. He is up against a lot of criticism and ridicule and I marvel at his sincerity and wonderful character.

Here's to you, Bob, and I am sincerely sorry for the way I misjudged you, and I hope that you will always be just plain "Doc Brugh."

Why Go to Hollywood?

LIKE pilgrims to a new shrine, each year hundreds of movie fans flock to Hollywood.

It can't be the celebrated climate. Other parts of California boast that, too. It must be a desire for a closer look at these glamorous inhabitants of an Enchanted City—the movie stars.

But why?

A friend vacationing in Hollywood writes: "Saw Ginger Rogers at the Brown Derby today. She sure is cute."

Of course she is. But I'll wager Ginger was just as cute—and much more intriguing in "Swing Time" when I saw her for two bits at my local theater. There she was—twirling, dipping, skipping, skimming—the very personification of youth and loveliness.

In fact, I've seen all my favorites under the most favorable circumstances—on the screen. I've seen them happy, sad, angry, impatient, in love—with proper lighting to bring out their good points, and clever lines to make them appealing.

In my mind I've built up ideals, as all fans do. If I met face to face these people for whom I feel such a sincere long-distance admiration, and they fell short of those ideals, would I be disappointed? Forever disillusioned?

I'd really like to know.

To paraphrase George Bernard Shaw: "Why should I go to Hollywood? The best of Hollywood comes to me."

MRS. LOUISE A. BALDWIN, 118 West Ninth Street, Mount Vernon, Indiana.

A Plea.

WHY don't we see and hear more about Cary Grant these days? Not only has he charm, good looks, and personality, but he has real acting ability, and makes the part he plays seem quite real—he's so natural and convincing.

Also, he is one of those actors who is as popular with men as he is with women!

Now, you can't say that about Robert Taylor, who is a promising youngster spoiled by too much publicity. At first, I used to take an interest in his work, but nowadays his self-consciousness mars my enjoyment of his performances.

Another likable fellow who has not had the luck he deserves is Robert Young. He has been typed as the rich playboy who does not get the girl. Please, Mr. Producers, in future let Bob play the hero who ends in a blaze of glory and confetti!

What the Fans Think

The Personal Touch.

MAY I say a word about my two favorites? One is Frances Langford, the petite blues singer, and the other is Lloyd Nolan, the modern villain. I saw Frances in "Broadway Melody of 1936," and then started listening to the "Hollywood Hotel" radio program so that I might hear her sing. Several months ago I wrote to her and asked for a photograph. You can imagine how I felt when I not only received the picture but found that she had autographed it to me. I liked her, and enjoyed her singing before—now I adore her. To me she is the essence of feminine charm.

After seeing Lloyd Nolan in "Texas Rangers" I wrote to him telling him how much I enjoyed his performance, and also asked him several questions. And was I thrilled when I received a personal reply? Is it any wonder these two are my favorites? Knowing how busy players are, I expected secretaries to answer my correspondence and, of course, I appreciate the personal replies I received.

Tenor or Baritone?

I have read R. J. Kennedy's letter referring to the slighting remarks Freda Wakeling made in regard to James Melton's voice in the December issue, and I would like to voice a protest, also. It is in extremely bad taste to make such "catty" remarks about some one else in endeavoring to impress the public with the artistic ability of one's own favorite star.

One may admire more than one artist at a time. It is only a matter of personal taste whether one likes a tenor or a baritone voice the best. Personally I like Mr. Melton's voice better than Mr. Eddy's, but as it is not very likely that I shall ever have to make a choice between them, it would be very childish and unfair to go around knocking Nelson Eddy! Both are splendid singers, each in his own class; and any one who classes Melton's voice with a crooner's is certainly ignorant of fine voices.

Any one who has heard Mr. Melton in opera roles and concert numbers is aware that he possesses a voice of rare beauty. He has been studying with the same voice coach who taught the great tenor, Gigli; and if you think such a prominent teacher would waste his time on a "crooner," Miss Wakeling, you're crazy!

BURGESS MEREDITH'S contract with RKO permits him to make one picture a year, at his own convenience, and do the rest of his work in the theater where he is regarded as the most important young actor of the day. He receives $750 a week on the stage and $1,500 weekly from the studio at present, but at the time his eight-year contract expires he will be earning $3,500 from picture work. But Mr. Meredith is not satisfied. In an interview published by the New York Herald-Tribune, he says: "I don't really like picture work. I don't believe any actor honestly does. There's such an appalling lack of personal satisfaction to it. You can't help but admire and respect the efficiency and what you might call the 'perfectionism' of the people who make pictures—they'll do anything on earth to make a perfect picture—but everything has to be done under too much pressure."

"An actor can't take the time to work things out when it costs $5,000 a minute, and where there are 350 persons waiting on a set a quarter of a mile square. . . . You can't stop and say, 'I don't like the way I read that line.' Yet, when it all comes out, it is only the line that matters.

"You can't grow and develop under things like that. You do acquire a certain facility, an ability to turn on your acting when and as required. . . . But it is all pretty bad if you are serious about an acting career. I think you have to come back to the theater to grow."

MR. MEREDITH says that acting in pictures is more difficult than a stage performance because of the physical strain. "But," he adds, "you can get away with a lot, too. Take your memory, for instance. You don't have to know more than a couple of lines at a time."

All in all, there just isn't any reason for a film career, according to my understanding of Mr. Meredith's interview, unless it is the money. But I don't like to think that an actor of such high ideals could give more than a passing thought to cash, especially as he cannot have any economic problems with an income of $750 a week from the stage and over a long season, too. His wife, Margaret Perry, inherited a little over $600,000 from her father and electrified New York some years ago by a first marriage that cost $13,000, including a reception for 2,000 guests.

I CANNOT believe that so enlightened and progressive an actor as Mr. Meredith finds no artistic compensation in a medium as important as the screen. Yet, all that he concedes is: "The better you become back here (the stage), the better you'll be out there (the studio), but it doesn't work in reverse order." In short, Mr. Meredith would have us believe that the actor acquires nothing from the films, that he can't grow and develop in them, that the physical strain is greater and that it is all pretty bad if one is serious about an acting career. However, in spite of this, Mr. Meredith is to make two pictures this year instead of one—his development and growth retarded, one judges, just twice as much as was the case with "Winter-set" last year—and his earnings more than doubled. Then he will return to the stage to be serious and to grow!"

LAST month I took up the question of the strange attitude of Hollywood's Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences toward Garbo, deploring the fact that she never had been given an award for a performance, nor even been nominated for one. I did not realize how many fans feel exactly as I do. Of all the letters received, I think one from Miss Mae H. Ashworth, of Mt. Vernon, Indiana, most squarely hits the nail on the head, as follows:

"Many have been wondering for years why the woman who is acknowledged by most critics to be the screen's best actress, and admitted by all the others to be one of the best, has been so consistently snubbed by a body which sets itself up as an artistic judge.

"One suspects, upon examining the record of Academy Awards for the past few years, that the Academy has been guilty of angling for public approval of its decisions. Nothing else can explain the acting awards given Claudette Colbert and Clark Gable for their rôles in that delightful comedy, 'It Happened One Night.' But the same public which applauded that picture as a masterpiece of light entertainment was horrified that its facile characterizations should be rated above the best dramatic rôles of the year.

"Bette Davis was the popular choice for the Award that year. When the Academy learned this, through scores of indignant fan letters, what did it do? It gave Miss Davis the Award the following year, as a peace offering, for a performance which was not outstanding.

"Though I thought Luise Rainer's work in 'The Great Ziegfeld' well done, I firmly believe that the award would not have gone to her had the Academy not felt that public sentiment pointed in that direction. So just what are the Academy Awards? Under the circumstances, they certainly cannot be considered unbiased estimates of artistic achievement. Neither are they the full expression of popular sentiment, since the public has no vote in the matter. They should be one or the other.

"As for Garbo, the rare shadings and subtlety of her interpretation in 'Camille' defy comparison with anything that has ever been done on the screen. If she needs consolation, or if her admirers need consolation, we should find it in the knowledge that, regardless of Academy Awards, box-office rumors or devotees of the hysterical school of acting, Garbo is and will be remembered as the greatest actress the screen has ever known.

Thank you, Miss Ashworth.

* * *

While we are on the subject of best performances and prizes, it's amiss for me to single out the most stunning acting I have recently seen. It is Spencer Tracy's exhibit in "Captains Courageous." While it is realistic in the extreme, the character of the Portuguese fisherman is sufficiently showy for the actor to make a grand celebration of playing it. For this reason his acting stands a better chance of being remembered at the end of the year, when not only the Academy, but all sorts of groups step forth and proclaim best performances. I believe Mr. Tracy will stand a better chance of winning the majority of prizes than, say, Robert Montgomery, whose acting is not a bit less noteworthy in "Night Must Fall." But it is not a showy performance, and the character he plays is definitely repellent. It is a psychological brother to Basil Rathbone's extraordinary study of psychopathic depravity in "Love From a Stranger." These two gentlemen deserve a special prize for courage in essaying rôles that cannot by any chance win sympathy from the public, no matter how much admiration their acting evokes from critics.

Among feminine performances so far seen, I nominate Garbo's "Camille," of course: Jeanette MacDonald's beautiful self-realization in acting and singing in "Maytime"; and Luise Rainer's superb self-effacement in "The Good Earth." Rich as the new season is in promise, I don't see how any performances can top those mentioned above. However, this is a year of surprises, of submerged talent suddenly bursting into bloom, of familiar gifts taking on new luster. Last but not least, there is Scarlett O'Hara, whoever she may be on the screen, to reckon with. The actress who plays her has every reader of "Gone With the Wind" waiting for her. And if she turns out to be Tallulah Bankhead, she will accept with gusto the challenge to cancel her previous failure as a screen actress with a performance that will make her one of the greatest to-day. That's what my crystal gazing reveals.

What has become of Marguerite Churchill and where is she going? True, she has a contract with Columbia, but she is rarely cast, and at this writing might as well be in permanent retirement. Why? With a name both on the stage and the screen, she is young, lovely, sophisticated, and was first brought to Hollywood because she was well known on Broadway. She was one of the first of the early recruits to qualify in talking pictures, one of the few to stay because audiences wanted her. Yet her individuality was gradually submerged in a series of routine rôles that any one could have played. To-day finds her ready for rôles that might be considered for Jean Arthur or Myrna Loy. All that is wanting is a producer to heed this reminder and give her a test.
HAIL, all hail, this first glimpse of the premier songbird of the screen, Jeanette MacDonald, in "The Firefly"! She is a Spanish singer and dancer and spy, the time is 1808, during the Napoleonic wars, and Allan Jones is the dashing hero who joins his beautiful voice with hers and wins her against exciting odds. Be patient until it is ready.
SIMONE SIMON DOESN'T MAKE FACES AND THROW THINGS AT PEOPLE ANY MORE. SUCCESS HAS CALMED HER—AND GIVEN HER GREATER CHARM.

GOOD-BY,

TANTRUMS

BY HELEN LOUISE WALKER

WHEN Simone Simon first came to Hollywood she moved into a house high in the Hollywood hills which her agent had chosen for her. It was a modest establishment which had recently been vacated by Binnie Barnes, who had moved on to more elegant quarters. I attended a cocktail party there when Binnie was pointing with pride to the white walls and startling blue-and-white curtains which had been her own ideas. About a third of the living room was occupied by a grand piano.

When Simone moved in, she kept the blue-and-white decorations, but she had the piano removed and a ping-pong table installed. This took up nearly all the living room, and if you didn't care to play ping-pong when you called on Simone, she would suggest, helplessly, that you sit outside and look at the nice view. Or—eagerly—that you come into the dining room and work on a jig-saw puzzle.

Simone was then a rather frightened, a lonely, a restless little girl. Not exactly homesick. She had lived in too many places abroad, had worked at the constantly moving show business too long to be homesick. But she was a small stranger in a large and extremely untried land.

"They won't like me," she used to mourn. "Women in Hollywood are too beautiful. I am not very pretty, and you have to be pretty! I'm so afraid of not being pretty enough!"

She bought a modest car and drove it herself. She wore simple, almost careless, tailored clothes, and her French thrift restrained her from buying new ones. When spring arrived she remarked, "Two sports outfits are enough for this season. The people who buy o lot of dresses think they are going to stay here! Some of them are not."

She bought a radio, though, and listened to the programs with earnest concentration. "This is how I study my English," she announced. "I regret to report that while her intentions were doubtless excellent, her progress in the English language, by this method, was practically nil. I think she liked to listen to the radio.

It was during this period of uneasiness and self-doubt that the now-famous Simone temperament began to manifest itself. She hurled epithets and slippers at people who wished her well and who were being paid to try to help her. She made naughty faces at important people. She stamped her feet and shouted.

She was cast in the rôle of "Cigarette" in "Under Two Flags," and was withdrawn abruptly after a short period of shooting. The studio said that she was ill. The newspapers said that she had had tantrums. Simone said, "Nobody likes me. I shall have to go home."

But she didn't go home. She stayed right in Hollywood, and she took up the study of English with a teacher instead of a radio, and after a while she was cast in "Girls' Dormitory." She had stiff competition in that picture, but Simone wasn't afraid of that. She may have had doubts about her face, sometimes. But she knew that she could act. When the picture was previewed she found herself an overnight sensation.

"Before that preview, no one asked me to go anywhere," she said. "Afterward every one called and asked me everywhere. Is this Hollywood success?"

She didn't go "everywhere." She continues, even now, to go scarcely anywhere. She has been too hurt, too bewildered, to trust many people.

Her closest friends in Hollywood are Charles Boyer and his wife, Pat Paterson. She goes to parties with them sometimes. She never gives parties herself unless Charlie and Pat tell her that she must. Then she says helplessly, "If I must have a party, who is it that I must invite?" So they make out her guest list, plan the menu and consult the cook.

When the big evening arrives, Simone knows no more of what there is to be for dinner than her guests do. But, once her initial stage fright is past, she becomes a charming hostess. She obviously enjoys every moment of her party and she loo-aves all her guests. The only plans she makes are for the entertainment of her guests.

"They can play ping-pong," she suggests, with enthusiasm, "or they can do jig-saw puzzles. Or they can listen to the radio, or they can sit and talk interesting talks."

For Simone's house now has a room in which people can sit. After the success of "Seventh Heaven" was assured and she began to be convinced that she would really remain in Hollywood for some time, she waxed extravagant. She leased a large and ornate furnished house in Beverly Hills. It is a red brick, English farmhouse "type," and it has elaborate gardens and swimming pool. Simone's ideas of a scale of living collided just a bit here with that innate sense of thrift.

"I must have a swimming pool," she explained. "All stars in Hollywood have swimming pools. But I shan't fill it up except for a month or two in the summer. It is too expensive." This was two months ago, and Simone has kept her word. The pool is still empty. "I don't like to swim," she added in a whisper.

The inside of the house typifies, as emphatically as does the pool, Simone's recently acquired idea of herself and her new status. It can only be described as rococo. There are "things" all about. Elaborate lamps and chaise longues with gold tassels. There are statuettes and gilt tables and carved crystal cigarette boxes. There are buttons to push, and it's great fun for Simone to push one and have a servant appear to inquire what is wanted.

"What is there for lunch?" demands Simone. The cook beams. "You wait and see," she admonishes. "It's a surprise!"

A pleasant surprise, too, it turns out to be. For it is an excellent cook—with a motherly feeling for Simone—who will presently emerge with a clear bouillon, followed by something delectable, made with shrimps, something crunchy to eat with these things, and a mixture of chilled fruits which makes you feel downright poetic.

Simone is as pleased as a child at a birthday party. "Isn't it nice?" she demands.

Her staff consists of three people. The cook-housekeeper, a secretary, and a houseboy-chauffeur. Sometimes they all come in to help her with the inevitable and interminable jig-saw puzzle. "They are the nicest people!" Simone will tell you.

I'm sorry if I seem to harp upon this predilection of Simone's for jig-saw puzzles, but honestly, it's a mania with the girl. Once she and Pat Paterson went to Arrowhead Hot Springs for a "rest," and for five days they sat there,

PICTURE PLAY'S FAMOUS PREVIEWS

JOHNNY DOWNS AND ELEANORE WHITNEY

IN "TURN OFF THE MOON."
"THE EMPEROR'S CANDLESTICKS" has William Powell as a Polish patriot and a spy, on a dangerous mission into Russia, and Luise Rainer as a Russian spy. Below, Henry Stephenson requests "Wolenski" to deliver two rare candlesticks to a friend in St. Petersburg. Both of the spies try to gain possession of the sticks, which contain valuable documents in secret compartments. Above, Bernadene Hayes and Donald Kirke.
"WEE WILLIE WINKIE" has Shirley Temple and her widowed mother on a trip to India to visit her grandfather who is in command of a frontier army post. Here she goes in training and becomes "Private Winkie." Below, with Victor McLaglen, who has been mortally wounded in a brush with a party of Indians. Outer left, with C. Aubrey Smith. Center, Michael Whalen and June Lang. Bottom, Cesar Romero.
FRENCH LEAVE
"I MET HIM IN PARIS" tells what happens to Claudette Colbert when she goes to France on a vacation. She attracts the attention of Robert Young, married, but not living with his wife, and his playwright pal, Melvyn Douglas. The former invites her to take a holiday with him in Switzerland. His friend invites himself along as chaperon. The best man wins.
FORTUNE - HUNTERS

"WOMAN CHASES MAN" has Miriam Hopkins conniving to make Joel McCrea turn over to his father enough of his fortune to back a project to build a model village for which she has made the sketches. Right center, with Charles Winninger, the father, and Ella Logan. Every time Erik Rhodes, above, tries to go up the tree, Miss Logan pulls him down.
"THEY GAVE HIM A GUN" has Spencer Tracy, circus barker, enlisting in the army. Franchot Tone, small-town bookkeeper, is drafted. The latter is critically wounded. Seeking him in the field hospital, Tracy meets Gladys George, nurse, and falls in love with her. But she marries Tone, more out of pity than affection. After the war, the one returns to his circus and the other turns racketeer and gunman.
and WAR
"MELODY FOR TWO" has James Melton head of a band. When his arranger walks out on him, Patricia Ellis, blues singer, pays him to do the arrangements under an assumed name. When he learns that he has been fooled, Melton leaves the band flat, and the singer takes his place. He organizes a band of beautiful blondes, one of whom is Marie Wilson, outer left, with Fred Keating. Left, with Lois Lindsay. Bottom, left, with Cleo Collins. Right, bottom, with Wini Shaw, another blues singer.
"THE ROAD BACK" is the story of a company of German soldiers. Below, Noah Beery, Jr., and Henry Hunter read with John Emery for food. Above, Andy Devine and Slim Summerville celebrate. Maurice Murphy, right, views with alarm the change in his sweetheart, Barbara Read. Upper left, Hunter returns to his unfaithful wife, Greta Gyntie. Center, Miss Read with Richard Cromwell. Bottom, Slim is blissfully married to Louise Fazenda.
RAY MILLAND AND WENDY BARRIE

IN "WINGS OVER HONOLULU."
THE ORIGIN OF STAR NAMES

BY BORIS RANDOLPH

EDDIE CANTOR’S name is unusually appropriate. It means a singing guardian of happiness. Eddie is short for Edward, which comes from the Anglo-Saxon and Teutonic and means a guardian or defender of property and happiness. Cantor is from the Latin and means one who sings.

LUISE RAINER means an abundant giver of fame and fighting courage. Luise is a feminine version of Lewis which comes from old high German and means a famous and courageous fighter. Rainer is from Anglo-Saxon and means one who bestows profusely and abundantly.

ALLEN JENKINS signifies a Mongolic flatterer of high personages. Allen means one of a Mongolic Tartar tribe called the Aloni. Jenkins is colloquial English for a flatterer of high personages. It is interesting to note that in gangster pictures Allen Jenkins frequently plays the rôle of a flatterer.

JUNE LANG may almost be said to mean a long honeymoon. More literally, it means a long month of marriage under the protection of a guardian deity. June is from the month, and the month is named for Juno, a guardian goddess of women and marriage. Lang is dialectic English for long.

GUY KIBBEE means a nimble leader and an eager guide. Guy is from old high German for a guide or leader. Kibbee is dialectic English for nimble and eager.

PAUL MUNI suggests a monk or saint with a small face. Paul is Greek for small, or little. Muni, on the other hand, seems related to an Icelandic word alluding to the face, or a Hindu word meaning a monk or saint.

JACK BENNY denotes a supplanter who is the right-hand son of his father. Jack is an abbreviation of Jacob, which in Hebrew means a supplanter. Benny is short for Benjamin, also Hebrew, and meaning a son of the right hand.

CESAR ROMERO may mean either a blind pilgrim or a cut spray of rosemary. Cesar seems to be very much involved with the Latin roots for both blind and cut, while Romero, spelled exactly as it is, is Spanish for both pilgrim and rosemary.

WARNER OLAND means the protecting warrior of a famous land. Warner is Anglo-Saxon for protecting warrior. Oland is evidently a shortening of the name Roland influenced by the form Orlando. As such, it comes from the Anglo-Saxon and means famous land.

SALLY EILERS means a princess among little old men. Sally is a nickname for Sarah, which in Hebrew means princess. Eilers seems to be connected with the Middle English word aiel which was a diminutive for grandfather. In its present form it is a plural of the original word and contains a suggestion of those little old men or dwarfs mentioned in "The Legend of Sleepy Hollow."

MAY ROBSON implies a child of increasing fame. May, like June, is taken from the month of the same name. The Romans called the month after the goddess Maia, known in mythology as the increaser. Robson, of course, is the son or child of Rob, or Robert, and Rob, in Anglo-Saxon, means fame.

MYRNA LOY is either she who weeps for the good and desirable, or an admirable law. Derived from the Greek Myra, Myrna means she who weeps, but as a possible curtailment of the Latin Miranda, it means admirable. Loy likewise has two possible origins. As a variation of the Greek Lois, it stands for good and desirable, but through French it may also be derived from the Latin for law.

MARGOT GRAHAM describes a pearl in a gracious home. Margot, of course, is a form of the name Margaret, which comes from the Greek and means pearl. Graham is a mixture of Irish and Scotch, the first syllable meaning loving, or gracious, and the second being a variation of the word home.

ARLINE JUDGE means the strength of the spoken law. Arline is a corruption of the name Caroline, and is ultimately connected with the name Charles, which is from the German for strength. Judge is from two Latin words meaning to say the law. Amusingly enough, there is a Scotch word spelled ailes which means earnest money, and could the name Arline be associated with it, the full name Arline Judge would be equivalent to an attorney’s retaining fee.

SINCE HE STEPPED OFF THE TRAIN IN HOLLYWOOD, JAMES STEWART HAS CLICKED BOTH PROFESSIONALLY AND PERSONALLY. THIS TELLS HOW HE FEELS ABOUT HIS SUDDEN SUCCESS.

It was just two years ago that James Stewart swung off the train in Los Angeles and caused nary a ripple in the station.

To-day he is an attraction at the Burbank airport, for now when he travels it's by plane. He is billed as a star, joining MGM's select upper crust. His salary is regular. When he wants a date he telephones such top-notchers as Ginger Rogers, Virginia Bruce, and Eleanor Powell, and they never say no.

On his first arrival he was met by a reception committee of one. The greeter was Henry Fonda, a shade annoyed. Who wouldn't be after welcoming three trains in vain? Jimmy had forgotten to wire which limited he was coming to California on.

Shortly he was unpacked and settled in his pal's apartment, ready to share the rent again. Four months previously they'd broken up apartment-keep-he presented a splendid impersonation of a dummy. But then he relaxed a bit, caught onto the character.

He has clicked emphatically, both professionally and personally. So what has this sudden success done to him?

Sprawling in the leather chair opposite me, in an empty office at the studio, he didn't seem a major man. He doesn't turn an personality at sight of you. Incredibly tall, lean against his will. Jimmy alternates between a completely passive mood and varying degrees of enthusiasm. As he is aroused he becomes truly interesting. His clear blue eyes sparkle, and his long face lights up.

He has never been touched by tragedy, nor lashed by love. Although he has the whole-hearted approval of chums who have had to struggle, he himself went to Princeton instead of the university of hard knocks.

"I don't believe this has happened," he declared in a drawl. "All the while I'm wandering when they're going to change their minds about me!"

Being lent to 20th Century-Fox for the lead in "Seventh Heaven," would have given him an excuse to gloat if he were the type.

"In New York I made a test for Fox, one of those watch-the-horses-run affairs. You know, you gravely turn your head from side to the other, and assume that you're observing something intently. It was all in close-up and oh-h-h-h... " He twisted in the chair and groaned. He'll never brag about being borrowed by the studio which once turned him down because the bitter memory of that brief photographic ordeal will always linger.

"A month elapsed after I tested for Metro before I was given a contract and a ticket to the Coast. So when I came West I didn't count on much success."

Pleasently naive, he admits he anticipated practically everything else, though.

"The advance data in Hollywood stunned me. I'd been told, it was a crazy, wild village. That, from the acting standpoint, I was signing my death warrant. That the climate would ruin my ambition. Yet some said it was paradise.

"I go for uncertainty. I don't want to be sure what's ahead. If I had to work at something where there was no suspense, where the future was obviously safe, I'd be restless. I prefer to take a chance."

Jimmy was warming up, and his lassitude was disappearing. He ceased to seem too profound.

"So what, then," I probed curiously, "have you learned for yourself? Is it paradise or an ultra-modern..."

He interrupted me with a grin.

"I'm all for Hollywood! It's given me big opportunities quickly. People do everything possible to boost me, help me improve. And the town may be a little crazy, but exactly enough so to intrigue me!"

His first encounter with rabid fans occurred when two girls rang the doorbell one sunny morn. The intrepid souls marched in, all through the house to see what there was to see, and wound up whisking out their kodak and posing the dumfounded Jimmy in almost every room. Most persons wouldn't be gracious when their privacy was stormed like this. He thought perhaps this was a standard procedure. And, after all, he's willing to be amazed!

Now he lives in a rented house in Beverly Hills, with two other Princeton graduates. They are employed by Walter Wanger, not as actors, but behind the scenes.

"I collected dogs and cats, but I've stopped being overly extravagant in that fashion. All of us have been so busy this past winter that sometimes we haven't even seen one another for several days." He hates to be alone incidentally.

"The vastness of this business fascinates me," he said then, attempting to sum up his impressions of Hollywood. "They do such wonders technically." He doesn't discuss his newest pictures as his high spots.

No secret hopes or hobbies have had to be abandoned.

"I like the same things I used to, only many more besides. I fuzzed with tiny model airplanes in a New York apartment; now I'm making a model so large it has an engine. I can travel by air rather than crawling on the earth in a train. I've bought a miniature film camera and I fool with it. I'm a greater fan than I ever was; now I can go to previews and it's exciting to be in on them."

His architectural training isn't entirely wasted, however.

"Of course, I want to build my own home some day, and out here," he explained carefully, "it'll be up in the hills, with a view. The panorama of Hollywood is breathtaking at night. I'll design a low, rambling structure, with lots of windows to take advantage of the sunshine. That's one funny thing I've noticed in Beverly; so many houses are built as though they were in the East. They haven't enough windows, enough feeling of freedom."

Such sane talk of his ideal residence reminded me of Jimmy's social reputation. Columnists are agog over his constant rating of the colony's best dates. He's no collar ad. He has no line. He doesn't spend lavishly. Yet this year's kisses—

Before I could quiz him on this a woman from the publicity department opened the door. "A writer is doing a story on Ginger Rogers and her beaux, and wants a—"

James Stewart isn't sensational either in looks or ways, but that is his charm. He will be seen next in "Vivacious Lady," opposite Ginger Rogers.
STARTING AT THE TOP

BY HELEN LUDLAM

THERE WASN'T THE USUAL SLOW RISE TO FAME FOR DORIS NOLAN. SHE CLICKED IMMEDIATELY, AND THE STUDIO CONSIDERS HER ONE OF THE BIGGEST "FINDS" OF THE YEAR.

DORIS NOLAN is one of fortune's favorites. Hers is not a story of struggle, frustration, poverty, and heartache. She laughed her way to fame and fortune in less than two short years.

Perhaps that happy laughter of hers is what drove the big bad wolf from the Nolan door. Because there was a time just after 1929 when the family fortunes got a start on the toboggan and things looked shaky for a while. But have you ever noticed that bad luck never sticks to people who can laugh?

Doris was born in New York, but when she was a tiny girl her parents moved to New Rochelle where they still live. She has an older sister, Gladys, and a younger brother, Warren.

Doris was always crazy about acting, and her cousin, who is Boyd Nolan, encouraged her in her hobby. She was very active in the school and civic dramatic groups and her sister guards several scrapbooks filled with raves about Doris from the local papers, and which she showed me with great pride.

Gladys is the domestic one of the family, and keeping house for Doris in Hollywood is more fun than a barrel of monkeys. Theirs is a popular ménage, I had heard, and when I met the family I wasn't surprised. Both girls have a frank, joyous personality with no nonsense about them.

Just before I met Doris her studio told me that it considered her one of the important "finds" of the year. She looked a little startled when I told her that, as though she felt that she still had a lot to learn and didn't want to be boosted up the ladder too fast. But Gladys and her mother were all smiles. They have the utmost faith in Doris.

There was a holiday spirit in the atmosphere. Mrs. Nolan had settled the girls in Hollywood, but her husband and son need her care in the East, so she is not with them this time.

But she wasn't uneasy. She has trained her girls to be self-reliant. Gladys is a splendid housekeeper. Both of them have plenty of horse sense and Hollywood is only a few hours away by plane if an emergency demands her presence there. But it must have been thrilling to those two sisters, starting out together on a road that looks so glamorous and so exciting.

We each have fun in our own way," Doris explained. "I love to act. It isn't work to me—everything about it thrills me through and through. Gladys loves to keep house. She loves to cook and to give parties and go to parties. I hate cooking but I like to clean house and I'm good at it, too. I haven't time for many parties, but Gladys never misses one if she can help it."

"Where do the boy friends come in?" I asked, having heard rumors of her popularity.

Though Doris is looked upon as a comédienne, she is an emotional actress at heart, and while her rôle in "As Good As Married" isn't very dramatic, at least it gives her opportunity to display her ability.
She gave one of her quick, hearty laughs while the dimples chased each other over her vivid, expressive face. "I haven't time for anything serious in that direction. Of course, we all gang up for swimming and tennis and riding and come home for picnic suppers. We have swell times, but those things I can do with a clear conscience because they are part of my routine. This work takes a lot of strength, believe it or not, and actors need plenty of outdoor exercise to keep well and strong. Can you imagine doing a comedy part with dull eyes and a sluggish liver?"

Which reminded me that Doris started out as an emotional actress. "How came they switched you to comedy?" I asked.

She giggled. "Well, one of the studio bosses saw me clawing around on the set between scenes and said they had doped me out all wrong. I was a comédienne. So they popped me into comedy. I hope they're right!" she added with another laugh.

After Doris graduated from the New Rochelle High School she joined the Reginald Goode Studio of the Drama located in the famous old Provincetown Theater in New York. She studied with Mr. Goode for little more than a year and it was at his summer stock company at Clinton Hollow, New York, that she was discovered by a Fox talent scout and given a contract.

Feeling that a glimpse into this Thespian hatchery would be interesting to all you lads and lassies who yearn for a screen career, I interviewed Mr. Goode and attended some of his classes.

He was disappointed to hear that Doris was featured in a comedy part in "Top of the Town." "Her greatest gift lies in emotional work," he said. "She could at a moment's notice throw herself into an impromptu scene and weep real tears over the death of an imaginary mother or sweetheart. She's a hard and conscientious worker, takes direction beautifully and deserves the success she is having."

Doris Dudley was another of his pupils, though she only remained three months. Dorothy Tree and Eleanor Lynn, as well as two or three others not so well known, likewise got the rough edges polished in Mr. Goode's studio which has only been in existence four or five years. In his present crop there are several students that I am sure will be heard from in a year or two. Their names would mean nothing to you now, except that one of them is a niece of Tallulah Bankhead. She looks like Tallulah, too, except that she is dark and Tallulah is fair.

I watched the class with interest. Mr. Goode was instructing one girl. "Your dog has just been killed. Give me an emotional scene about that," he said. That seemed a terrifying assignment to me but the girl sat on the floor and buried her head in her arms a moment to get herself into the mood. There were tears in her eyes when she looked up and she sobbed out a heartbreaking story of how

"I love to act," says Doris Nolan. "It isn't work to me—everything about it thrills me through and through."
Orchids and laurel wreaths for Janet Gaynor! The "little girl" is tops again. She was returned to the peak of the golden stairway at the preview of "A Star Is Born," seen by all Hollywood.

While many producers were ready to sign her for pictures after that, it seems David O. Selznick intends to take her under his wing. He was the producer of the color feature which gave Janet her new lift to fame, and he has further plans.

Any star who makes a successful début in a color film nowadays seems slated to go places. It's the real test that the ladies must pass if they want to enjoy a brilliant future. "The Garden of Allah," despite many did not actually care for the story, has given new luster to Marlene Dietrich. Much to everybody's surprise, "God's Country and the Woman" has helped Beverly Roberts.

More and more feminine stars are realizing that they must learn to look pretty in rainbow shades rather than just plain black and white. It certainly has worked out splendidly for Janet. The acclaim she enjoyed at the preview reminded one of the grand glad days that followed "Seventh Heaven."

Just a Movie Star.—Funny place, Los Angeles. Aimee Semple McPherson and Clark Gable were making appearances in court about the same time Aimee in connection with a libel suit involving her daughter, and Gable during the trial of the Englishwoman, Violet Wells Norton, who contended that the actor was the father of her daughter, and was subsequently accused of using the mails to defraud.

What bowled all Hollywood over was the fact that more fons besieged Aimee than Clark, despite that he attracted quite sufficient attention.

But Aimee—well, she's a real star!

Gypsy Rose Ambitious.—What everybody is wondering is whether Gypsy Rose Lee is going to hit in the movies. If she does, she'll probably prove the most important acquisition since Moe West. She's considered a great bet for publicity, and is pretty bright besides.

Former strip-tease champion, she asserts that she wants to be a serious actress. Her mother evidently subscribes to the notion, too, for she declared somewhere along the line that she thought it most regrettable that Greta Garbo had played in "Camille" before Gypsy arrived on the scene.

Well, there's no good squelching ambition.
Mauchs Get Salary Boost.—The Mauch twins are getting into the money, and why shouldn’t they? For these bays are about as clever as any that have come to pictures, if not more so. Twelve years of age, they were recently given contracts over a seven-year period ranging from $350 to $2,250. Previous to this new agreement the youngsters were getting less than $200 apiece.

“The Prince and the Pauper” has put them over in a big way, especially Bobby, who makes his real debut in this Mark Twain story.

Twins, Twins Everywhere.—Incidentally, there is a siege of “twins” in Hollywood. Some of the time the youngsters are not really related. Nancy Clancy and Derry Deane, who look just alike, recently signed a contract with RKO, and Joan Howard and Joan Breslaw with Universal.

The two Jaans were born the same month and have the same first names. When engaged, they also had the same number of freckles on their faces, though it was subsequently discovered that these were make-up.

Properties Well Observed.—What a young widow should do in Hollywood is no longer an unsolved problem. Norma Shearer is not only to proceed with her career, but also is very quietly and reservedly beginning the social side of her life again.

Her first appearance, as you may recall, was at the preview of “The Last of Mrs. Cheyney,” in which she starred a few years ago. Joan Crawford playing in the newer version. Next she attended the banquet of the Academy when the awards were tendered, and most recently she was at the stage premiere of “Tovarich.” She went to that with the Fredric Marches, and was attired in black with a hat. Nothing so flashy as evening dress.

None Like Simone.—The French were always partial to “shewing gum,” we knew, but then Simone Simon did take every one by surprise when she showed up at a swanky theater opening with her jaws busily working. The incident drew a barrage of comment from the fans—more, indeed, than the fact that she carried a little white muff and was

Anna Sten returns to Hollywood films at last. She is to make “Gorgeous” for Grand National. Joan Fontaine, sister of Olivia de Havilland, is a full-fledged star after four appearances. Tallulah Bankhead is this month’s strongest possibility for the rôle of “Scarlett O’Hara.”
ALLAN JONES'S STRANGE, EVENTFUL HISTORY REACHES A STRIKING CLIMAX WHEN HE PLAYS OPPOSITE JEANETTE MACDONALD IN "THE FIREFLY." BUT READ HOW HE WORKED HIS WAY OUT OF THE COAL MINES TO DO IT.

BY SAMUEL RICHARD MOOK

ALLAN JONES has had to fight every foot of the thorny road to success. It is customary in Hollywood to hear newcomers grumbling over the bad breaks they get. Nine times out of ten, they aren't equipped or haven't the ability to take advantage of a break if they get one. Allan Jones is the exception. He has everything it takes to make a star—except the opportunity. His is an unusual story—and a courageous one. He has kept fighting.

Most players these days grudgingly give you an hour for an interview—and wish to God you'd get through sooner and clear out. Mr. Jones and I met in the publicity offices at MGM.

"We'd better go over to the commissary and get this over with," I suggested grumpily. "You probably haven't much time."

"All the time in the world," he informed me agreeably. "We can spend the afternoon together if you like."

I nearly collapsed.

In the café he ordered only a glass of milk for lunch. "I put on about five pounds recently," he explained, "and I have to take it off again. It's too hard on the make-up men when they have to paint my face like a Comanche Indian's so the jowls won't show."

Another jolt. It's the first time I've ever heard a star admit his appearance was less than perfect.

After lunch we adjourned to his dressing room. I was surprised to find him quartered in the stars' building. Allan has appeared in only three pictures. Of those three, two were little more than bits—the romantic lead in "A Night at the Opera," with the Marx Brothers, and a bit with Jeanette MacDonald and Nelson Eddy in "Rose-Marie."

They served their purpose, however. In the first he was introduced to picture audiences through his singing of that beautiful song, "Alone." The second taught him he must learn to take it—even if the lesson—or the part—almost broke his heart.

"I had a grand sequence in there from an opera," Allan related. "But they had to cut it out because Eddy was the star and there was no place in the picture for him to sing opera. It wouldn't have looked well for me to be singing an operatic number and the star only popular songs."

It's a long lane that has no turning, though. When practically every one else had been tested for the lead in "Show Boat," Universal, in desperation, tested Allan—and the part was his. His future seemed assured, but there is no fothing the workings of a movie executive's mind.

For ten months after his hit in "Show Boat," Allan did nothing. Other studios tried to borrow him but MGM refused to lend him. He became so discouraged he asked for a release from his contract. They refused to give it to him.
senger during vacation. The next summer his family took him to Asbury Park. He found a place as soloist with one of the fashionable churches at twenty dollars a Sunday. During the week he worked as a helper in a bakery. The man over him tried to shave all the work on Allan. A fist fight followed and they were both fired.

A job driving a laundry truck followed. One day he had the truck parked on a steep hill. Allan went back of it and yanked at a package of laundry he wanted to get out to deliver. He jerked so hard the truck started rolling backward down the hill. I suppose you could say "he didn't know his own strength." A chain hooked itself in the cuff of his trousers and he was jerked off his feet. The truck crashed into a telephone pole and was wrecked. Allan was pretty badly cut and scratched. That was the end of that job.

A job as chauffeur for a wealthy family followed. He started out in full livery—cap, uniform, and puttees. At the end of two weeks he was eating at the table with the family—practically one of the family. They are still his close friends.

It was during this time that he met Marjorie Bull. They fell violently in love with each other—or thought they did. For the next two summers he returned to Asbury Park and their love grew.

He graduated from Scranton High School in February and got a job driving a coal truck for an independent company. During the strike they had a steam shovel digging into the great piles of slag outside the mines and shoveling the coal out. The man who operated the shovel went on a bender. Allan volunteered to run it.

"Had you ever run one before?" I interrupted.

"No," he grinned, "but I'd watched the man operate it and thought I knew how it should be done. That paid me $75 a week. I only had to work ten hours a day to get it."

When summer came the company went broke. Allan went into the mines as a laborer. By working double shift all summer and fall he managed to save $1,500. It was the first step on that long steep climb to fame. He enrolled in the Syracuse University Music School. When he had been there a month he received a scholarship at New York University and another for a course under Claude Warford, a noted voice coach.

Singing in church choirs, Allan

Wrestling will always be Nat Pendleton's first love, for he won the Olympic heavyweight wrestling championship in his early days. Here he is having a work-out with Dave Levin in Hollywood.

Mr. Pendleton is an intelligent, well-read scholar and linguist. He speaks French, Portuguese, and Spanish as fluently as a native, and Italian almost as well.

YOU KNOW THIS MAN FOR THE STUPID, BLUNDERING RÔLES HE PLAYS. THEY GIVE NO INKLING OF THE CULTURED GENTLEMAN THAT HIDES BEHIND THEM.

It is generally known that Hollywood's strong man, Nat Pendleton, won the Olympic heavyweight wrestling championship in his early days. But this is only a minor event in the colorful career of "Sandow."

Of all the Americans in Hollywood, Pendleton can lay claim to one of the oldest Yankee families. Born in Davenport, Iowa, he was named for Nathaniel Greene Pendleton, an ancestor who made history by acting as a second in the famous duel between Aaron Burr and Alexander Hamilton on an early morning in July, 1804, on the heights of Weehawken, New Jersey.

Nat's youngest brother, Gaylord, is the slim, graceful chap who played with Helen Hayes in the stage version of "Coquette," and has been facing the cameras since. His other brother, Edmund, is a recognized musical composer in Paris, where he has spent the past fifteen years.

His mother, whom he affectionately calls "Toots," is a young, aristocratic-looking woman who herself took a fling in the theater with Mae West in "Diamond Lil," when the latter played in New York.

Although he is usually cast as a stupid character, Nat is an intelligent, well-read, and brilliant scholar. He won a scholarship for engineering at Columbia University. While still a student there, he became a member of the wrestling team and went to France for the Olympics, where he captured the heavyweight wrestling crown.

Upon completing his course in engineering, a friend connected with the Standard Oil Company gave Nat a job in the Portugal branch. He made a great deal of money and traveled extensively, thus gaining his reputation as an accomplished linguist. He speaks French, Portuguese, and Spanish almost as fluently as a native.

FROM IMMIGRANT TO STAR

BY MADELINE GLASS

YOU LAUGH AT MISCHA AUER TO-DAY, BUT WHAT DO YOU KNOW OF THE HARDSHIPS AND GRIEF OF HIS EARLY LIFE? THIS STORY WILL MAKE YOU APPRECIATE HIM MORE.

PRESS people are practically standing in line to interview Mischa Auer, yet when I told him on the telephone that I, too, wanted him to talk, for the benefit of Picture Play readers, he replied, “Love to!”

As it turned out we talked all over the Universal lot, beginning in the dining room, losing sight of each other in the publicity department—it was then that he went across the street to get something for his cold—were reunited on the set, and finished in his dressing room.

“Must be a nuisance to have someone tagging you and asking questions while you are trying to concentrate on your work,” I remarked.

“It would be much more than a nuisance if no one wanted to ask questions of me,” said he. “When interviewers stop coming—” Broad shoulders heaved in a telling shrug; brown eyes expressed apprehension.

But such apprehensions are for the far distant future. To-day Mischa’s popularity is growing by leaps and bounds—na pun an his astonishing monkey impersonation in “My Man Godfrey”—and he is kept so busy by the studios that he has no time to answer the deluge of fan letters that are pouring in on him.

“But now,” he told me, beaming, “I am to have a three-day vacation. I will have time to play with Tony. When I am working long hours, day after day, I hardly see him.”

Tony is his son, a 1934 model. Mischa wants him to become a sportsman, though not in the popular sense of the word.

“No football,” said he. “No brutal sports. I am something of an athlete—tennis, riding, aquatics—but I see nothing admirable in sports which involve cruelty. Life offers enough pain without our going out of our way to invite or inflict it.”

LORETTA YOUNG won't remember me," said the studio visitor. "We met six years ago, and our acquaintance was brief and casual."

Just then Loretta saw him, came forward and promptly greeted him by name. "Nice to see you again," said she.

This memory feat, typical of Loretta, reminds us of an anecdote about a certain dizzy ingenue. A scribe interviewed her one day and met her again just a few days later. With a puzzled look, the starlet remarked, "Your face is strangely familiar—I'm almost sure I've seen you before."

THE fact that Bette Davis's husband, Harmon O. Nelson, is now a successful business man makes no difference to typical hecklers of stars' husbands. One ungentlemanly and stupid quip was launched at Nelson recently by a noted actor who always portrays cultured gentlemen.

His wit provoked guffaws from some of those present. But Bette and Ham, who have developed a defense mechanism against such attacks, knew what to do. Unsmilingly, silently, they stared at the actor. Then they looked at each other, and in unison shrugged.

Hurt, the heckler retired in confusion.

IT was days after Garbo appeared on the "Walewska" set with a bulky package that our stooge was able to find out what the package contained. In it were pencils, a pad of writing paper, and two books. The star was filling the pad with her own hand-written jingles.

She did this between scenes, courting the muse instead of knitting, working cross-word puzzles, or just sitting. Finally our spy got a good look at the two books, which Greta consulted frequently. They were volumes of jingles by Dorothy Parker and Ogden Nash!
AT Hollywood's fistic treat, the Nestell-Ramage fight, we saw this amazing phenomenon: a bediamonded Los Angeles society woman who, instead of paying attention to the thrills that packed every round, spent her whole time taking candid camera snaps of Clark Gable.

Gable plainly portrayed that he was backing Nestell, for as the fortunes of that fighter varied, expressions of anguish or savage triumph crossed the star's face. Presumably this was caught by the amateur photographer. Gable was totally oblivious to her presence, but Mae West and other ardent Fight fans were ready to annihilate her.

JEANETTE MAC DONALD," gushed a fashion scribe, "appeared on the bridle path riding side-saddle style, and wearing a brown suede skirt, brown coat, and brown derby."

Far be it from us to poke fun at the fashion sister. But we can't help wondering what she'd have written about Jeanette had she seen her as we did recently.

She was astride a cow pony. She wore blue denim jeans, new, a hickory shirt, faded. A red bandanna, also faded. A battered cowboy hat. Attractive? Of course! Even riding side saddle under a brown derby she'd charm the eye.

A MAN about town was showing off Hollywood's celebrities to two young lady tourists of junior-college age. They were properly thrilled when they saw James Stewart, Henry Fonda, and Fred MacMurray. They were disappointed at failing to see Gary Cooper, Clark Gable, and Franchot Tone.

Then their guide in triumph pointed out the pièce de résistance of the whole show, Robert Taylor. There was a moment of polite silence. Then one girl confessed, "We-el, we don't care so much for him. We hear Joan Crawford isn't keen about him, and what Joan doesn't like, we don't like!"
ELEANORE WHITNEY, on the "Turn Off the Moon" set, complained that her small portable dressing room simply could not accommodate the hairdresser, the wardrobe mistress, and the make-up man. As she was returning from lunch, the door of the little structure burst open and out came, single file, the hairdresser, the wardrobe mistress, the make-up man, Johnny Downs, Bill Farallo, assistant director, five extra men, and three electricians and a little dog.

"It's a pretty roomy wagon, after all!" Eleanore decided.

IT was fun to watch Sophie Tucker on the "Broadway Melody" set coaching Judy Garland. 'Listen, Toots,' said Sophie, 'you've got a lot of stuff. But I've had experience. If you'll do it the way I tell you, you'll wow them.' Judy did it the way Sophie told her and, from all reports, she wowed them. Marie Dressier used to give just such salty and interested advice to youngsters who were working on the stage with her.

THE next "Thin Man" picture, we understand, is to be called "The Thin Man Returns." "But what," asked same one, "will you do for a title after that?"

"We'll call it 'The Thin Man Gets Thinner,'" replied the studio wag.

WE were just in time to wave to Luise Rainer as she roared away from the sandwich stand in the desert where all Southern California is rushing to enjoy the wild flowers just now. "Clark Gable came through yesterday," the sandwich purveyor stated. "And this morning there was that chap—what d'ya call 'im—Fred MacMurray. He had a gun, a hunting gun. I guess it was Fred MacMurray," he added, pouring coca-cola. "Anyhow," he said, "whatever it was, he fell over his gun. It didn't go off."

FOR years Joan Crawford has been an admirer of Garbo, and for years they have worked on the same lot. For years, Joan, hurrying to her dressing room, has paused to say, "Good morning, Miss Garbo!"

For years there has been no reply.

Joan, hurrying to her dressing room the other morning, and nursing an aching tooth, did not pause to say anything at all to Garbo. But Garbo paused, hands on hips, to look after Joan with resentment.

"So-a-o-o?" said Garbo.
ALISON SKIPWORTH, towel over hair, resigned herself to undergo the ministrations of the studio make-up man. In the next chair was another figure, also with towel over hair.

"I have admired you so much!" said the figure. "Will you give me your photograph?"

"Thank you," said Skippy. "Of course I will."

There was a pause, and then the figure, still smothered in towels and cold cream, said, "Do you skate?"

Skippy said that she didn't skate. There was a pause, and then Skippy, wishing to be polite, said, "Do you skate?"

The figure said, "Yes, I skate!" It was released and it went away.

"That was Sonja Henie," the make-up man reported to Miss Skipworth.

THE sure cure for an inferiority complex is offered by Robert Taylor. Rake your memories for a dozen life stories of yourself and the exhaustive self-analyses will kill all lingering doubts you may have nurtured. He's beyond all suppressed feelings. But now he has another problem. It's what to say to the next interviewer who demands an exclusive, untold incident.

IS there any justice? In high school in Cincinnati, Tyrone Power used to be known as the best bean shooter and paper-wad thrower. He even was elected president of the German club because he was the poorest student in the German class. Now, at twenty-three, he's adored by the fabulously paid Sonja Henie and radio moguls are arguing with screen executives for him.

THAT Ginger Rogers is going to live alone for some time is indicated by her new home on Beverly Crest above the wealthy Dohenys. She's going to have to like it, too, because it took six months to build. They call the cement buttress around her gardens Hollywood's Great Wall. It's twenty feet high in some spots, and rambles so impressively.

PAUL MUNI, who has always been the symbol of simplicity, has bought next to the grandest house in southern California's swanky Palas Verdes Estates district. He's atop the highest hill, with a fifty-mile sweep of city and beach at his feet. The Munis have a formal drawing-room,

Mrs. POWELL knows her

O n a September afternoon a little less than two years ago, three people—a girl, a man, and a woman—sat in the balcony of Broadway's Cap-tol Theater watching eagerly as a highly touted new picture unfolded itself on the screen.

There was nothing seemingly unusual about these three people except the way they were behaving. The girl kept saying "Ooh!" and clutching the seat in front of her until the gentleman who occupied the seat got up and mused across the aisle. The man kept exclaiming "Swell, kid!" "Marvelous! " "Swell!" in excited staccato bursts, until his neighbors were violently shushing him from all directions. The woman sat quietly oblivious to her surroundings, alternately weeping and smiling into her handkerchief.

The picture was "Broadway Melody of 1936." The girl was Eleanor Powell, the man was Walter Winchell, and the woman was Blanche Powell, Eleanor's mother.

Just as "The End" flashed on the screen, to a rich swell of music and a sharp crash of applause, Walter Winchell whispered into the ear on his right, "Well, Mrs. Powell, you've got a picture star in the family now! How do you feel about that?"

"I couldn't say a word," Mrs. Powell told me, reminiscing about that memorable afternoon. "I just couldn't get a word out until we'd sat down in Lindy's and I'd had a cup of tea. Because sitting there in that theater watching Eleanor's first picture, I realized for the first time that I didn't have a baby any more. I had a grown-up daughter and I must do what's sometimes hardest; for a mother—accept the fact.

"In my mind I've accepted it." She turned her gray eyes toward the sun-washed lawn and smiled in such a way that I knew she wasn't seeing the lawn at all. "But in my heart—it's so different in your heart, isn't it? She's still a tot to me there, begging for her hair to be rolled up in 'turl-papers'; racing off to dancing school with a scuffed ballet slipper in each hand; putting on her first stage make-up saying 'Mother, how in the world da ladies get rouge an pretty?'
Even back on Broadway they used to call her the 'baby of the street.'"

There's no topic Mrs. Powell would rather talk on than her talented daughter. On this morning she sat in a wide blue armchair sewing—she's the kind of mother who's always sewing—hemming bright squares of linen that would eventually become lavandered triangles in her talented daughter's handkerchief drawer. And she was giving me, kindly and expertly, just what I'd come to see her to ask for.

Because once, when interviewing Eleanor herself, I chanced to get into a long conversation with her mother discussing, of all things, girls in show business. It was a conversation that went on and on for a full hour after Eleanor had dashed off to the dentist. And so ab-sorbingly and sanely did Mrs. Powell talk, she gave me an idea for what I thought should be a truly revealing, personal story. This is it:
an intimate close-up of the Queen of Tap, by the person who knows her better than anybody else.

"I think if any one thing has mainly contributed to Eleanor's proergess, outside of hard work, it's been her unswerving belief in herself," her mother told me. "Never did there seem to be one iota of doubt in her mind that ultimately she would arrive. Even when she danced as a child professional it was never 'If I ever star——'; it was 'When I star in a show some day, mather, we'll buy us a house in the country.'"

"I've never seen her stricken with stage-fright or uneasiness about the outcome of a new performance. She's always told me 'I'm just going to do the best I can and I think it'll be all right.' And usually it was. I've seen Eleanor's belief in herself enable her to go through same nerve-racking moments with perfectly calm control of herself."

Mrs. Powell laid down her needle, leaned back, and laughed. "My dear, if anybody had ever prophesied to me back in Springfield, Massachusetts, where we used to live, that to-day I'd be in Hollywood waiting for a movie-star daughter to come home from the studio, I'd—well, I don't know what! So far as I know there never have been any theatrical people in our family. I enrolled Eleanor in dancing school when she was nine mostly for the sugar-coated exercise she'd get. Then the first thing I knew her grandmother and I were moving the furniture out of the back bedroom and installing a ballet bar and a victrola—we had a dancer on our hands!

"I believe most of Eleanor's fans know the story of how she got her start on Broadway, so I won't repeat that now. Ever since she began

Mrs. Blanche Powell, seen with Eleanor on the opposite page, says that when she saw her daughter on the screen for the first time she realized she didn't have a baby any more.

Eleanor Powell says her feet are her love-life. They do what she tells them and they can't walk out on her!

She has never had a pastime nor a hobby. Dancing has always been her only occupation.

They Say in NEW YORK-

THE very people who only yesterday referred to "that awful Winchell" now speak in claying tones of "Our Walter" and his spectacular success in "Wake Up and Live."

Maybe they are applauding his success from slightly mixed motives. It is just possible that with him far away in Hollywood they can face the morning paper with fewer qualms, fairly confident that their petty meannesses and evasions won’t stare at them in print. But with Hollywood claiming him, who will champion the chorus girls who were gypped out of their salaries, who will rescue old performers from oblivion and despair, who will discern the clay feet of many an idol, and who will constantly enrich our vocabularies with new and vivid slang?

Mr. Winchell breezed back to New York for a brief visit after finishing the picture, beat his drums loudly in praise of Jack Haley and Alice Faye, fargathered with his old cronies at the Montclair Casino, and achieved the healthy distinction of not letting any one give a cocktail party in his honor. You are going to like him a lot in pictures because he is having such a swell time making them.

The Easy Way to Success.—The way to get on in the world before you are twenty is to be born with a personality like Wyn Cahoon’s. Columbia has just spirited this young person away from the company playing Brother Rat on Broadway and, unless I am the champion wrong-guesser of all time, the public is going to take her to their hearts when her first picture is released. Clean-cut, alert, and vital as her screen idols Myrna Loy and Carole Lombard, she is the confiding sort of person whom every one wants to help.

HOLLYWOOD LENDS US THEIR ADVENTURERS, IMPS, AND BEAUTIES, BUT MUCH TOO BRIEFLY TO SATISFY FANS.

The Mauch twins, Billy and Bobby, stars of "The Prince and the Pauper," are dynamos of ingenuity.

Ill health is cutting down Lily Pons’s activities. She may not make another picture now until September.
A woman whose last name she does not even know, got her first job on the stage. Turned away from the New York office of a movie company, she and an accompanist named Mildred, started to the subway together. Mildred offered to introduce her to some theatrical managers, did that very afternoon, and Wyn got a job. Mildred was supposed to wait for her while she was being interviewed, but didn't, and Wyn has never seen her since.

A few months later she went to the Texas Centennial to sing the lead in "Jumbo" and newspaper correspondents went into such raptures over her that a Broadway lead this season was inevitable. Paramount rushed to make a film test of her and it turned out very well, indeed, as they admitted. Oddly enough, they turned her down because they needed players only for musicals, and they had neglected to test her singing or even ask if she could sing. She does, but would rather act.

The Charmed Life.—Errol Flynn, that hardy adventurer who got hit only with falling plaster when Spanish machine guns were popping all around him, paused in New York only briefly on his way to Hollywood, but he was studying maps and already planning his next escape.

Discussion of his pictures arouses only mild tolerance on his part.

Frances Farmer will take a fling between pictures at a summer theater in New Hampshire.

Deanna Durbin is winning new glory as fashion sponsor.

It's the success of his book that makes him unreservedly proud. If you haven't yet read "Beam Ends," published by Longmans Green, do so at once even at risk of missing movies and radio programs for a day or two. It is crammed with adventure and you will like the casual, candid way that he presents the most hair-raising experiences. It will convince you, too, that he has a fine sense of comedy. Something ought to be done about letting it out in front of the camera.

Dressing Like Deanna.—It is stale news when a dress manufacturer buys the right to have a star sponsor his clothes, but it is exciting headline news when the clothes thus launched are expertly designed, practical, and cheap.

Deanna Durbin has the honor this summer of having fashions marketed all over the country in her name that are just what every girl wants. Denim overalls that are grand for the garden or country hikes, play suits of shirts and shorts and skirt, socks and blouses, and crisp cotton dresses are all included. These aren’t just for schoolgirls; they come as large as size sixteen and are so smart they will do everything for you but give you Deanna’s high notes.

THEY'RE ALL
TWO-FACED

BY WILLIAM H. McKEGG

ONE SIDE OF A STAR'S FACE CONTRADICTS THE OTHER. SOMETIMES THE DIFFERENCE IS ASTONISHING. PUT THEIR FACES TO THE TEST DESCRIBED HERE, AND SEE FOR YOURSELF.

The human face has been called all sorts of things. It doesn't matter what you think of it if it belongs to an ordinary human being. But when it's the face of a movie star, then all levity must cease. And that's just what's going to happen now.

One side of a star's face contradicts the other. Sometimes the difference is astonishing. Put their faces to the test described here, and see for yourself.

The face of each player is the medium of his histrionic expression. The eyes, the facial muscles, together with the voice, combine to make the portrayed characters we see on the screen living people.

They say the camera reveals more than the eye detects. It is also true that the face discloses more than many of the stars care for others to know. In this way they cannot escape revealing the inner conflicts of their real selves.

Offhand, we often call a person two-faced. This goes treble far the movie great. It's not their fault—entirely. But two-faced they are. So much so, in some cases, that the contrast is terrifying.

And at this point we are going to be terrified.

Let us take that up-and-coming young hopeful of Metro-Goldwyn—James Stewart.

On the screen he is one of those breezy, scoffing blades. He can't help it. His acting merely reflects himself. Now place a piece of paper over the right side of Jimmy's face. Here we see a sneering expression, somewhat scoffing.

We are left to wonder why Mr. Stewart is divided in two—prankish and sneering. What has happened in his young life to throw him into these two states?

While we are wondering over it, let us consider Ralph Bellamy, who by no means escapes the two-sided fatal expression. On the They're All Two-faced

To get where he is today, Ralph has had to be ever on the alert. In his lean days, out of work, he even contemplated suicide—and while reading "Crime and Punishment," instantly alert, even on the brink of suicide, as to what people might say, he retrained. He had time then to contemplate his wild decision to end it all. His contemplative side lets us see that he studies deeply life's mysteries.

Kay Francis has always managed to be something of an unknown in Hollywood. Unfortunately, no star can be unknown in a community where the underground wires are always hot with news.

Even if we did not know this and that about Kay, her face would tell us all we need to know.

On the left side, Kay is seen to be calculating. There is no mean trait in her calculating side. She is merely withdrawing herself to see just what will be in everything for her own benefit. This is not a mercenary streak, either. People are objects of suspicion to her. She must know you very well to be your friend.

On the right side of Kay's face is a look of profound hurt. I have often wanted to hear about the cause of this from her. But to interview Kay is to come face to face with a calculating dame. Kay is matter of fact, slightly humorous, but her quotations for the press are very abstract in the main.

Perhaps with her hovering marriage—her third or fourth, I forget which—Kay will find in scenarist Delmer Daves the very man of her dreams. It will be interesting to find what will take its place—I mean in fact! expression. Let us hope wedlock will banish the profound hurt look to the right.

Since her marriage to John Forrow, Maureen O'Sullivan has entered a new phase of living—and a very delightful one it is. Of the cinema's elect, the O'Sullivan has interested me more than any. In the center of gloss houses, Maureen has been closed from everybody. You know her, and you don't. Her personality is mercurial. You sometimes wonder if she herself knows what she's about.

This Irish charmer always has been self-possessed and independent. Yet evidently Maureen had been frequently fearful. She once told me the only person she feared was herself. The loss spoke truly. But today fear is banished in wedded bliss.

What Maureen kept from Hollywood was always evident in her face. On the left side, as she smiled, a look of melancholy appeared. While on the right was seen fear.

With "Lloyds of London," Tyrone Power came into the limelight as a full-fledged favorite.

Tyrone has been coming against Hollywood for the past four or five years. Like "Don Quixote" against the windmills. With money scarce, meals scarcer still, Tyrone underwent the usual grind to crash the gates.

Yes, his father was famous on the stage, and Tyrone was able to see men his father had known. But nothing came of such meetings.

To-day the lad is well set. Meet him and you find a humorist, a jolly companion. But let's not do that. Let us regard his picture and find out what his face reveals.

On the left side is depicted suffering. On the right, humor. I cannot say just from where the suffering comes. Some accident in his path through life that went uninsured by Lloyds. Tyrone is sensitive, but his humor saves him from being melancholy. Ah, but what is humor? Surely only a shield used by the most sensitive souls.

To the man that thinks, the world is comic. To the man that feels, the world is tragic. And that brings us to Elissa Landi.

The lady Elissa both thinks and feels. The left side of her face is gay. The right side is sad. You see, this is just the opposite to Tyrone. It means that all worldly things are sorrowful to the lad, while they are highly amusing to Landi. On the other hand, whereas the lady Elissa feels the sorrow in all spiritual things, Tyrone is ever ready to have a good laugh.

How do I know all this? Merely by looking at their faces.

You'd think that with a steadily growing fan following, Don Ameche would stop crying and smile, smile, smile.

Dividing Don in two, we see a look of amazement on the left side of his face. On the right side appears the crying look.

Here again we find another sensitive soul in life's tough existence. Don is always afraid of people and things. He is happily married and has a couple of darling chil-

EDDIE, WILLING and ABLE, BUT-

BY HERBERT CRUIKSHANK

MR. ROBINSON IS ALL SET TO GIVE US GREAT MEN OF THE PAST ON THE SCREEN. NOW IT LOOKS AS THOUGH THE BOSSES WILL LET HIM.

So ready, willing and able is Edward G. Robinson to play "Napoleon" that he has the costume all prepared.
Here he slips it on Eddie, Jr., to keep it in good working condition.

"But it's on error to think that the 'strong character' sort of fellow I've characterized so frequently is purely a product of this age, this day. He's always existed. Porfirio Diaz, who ruled Mexico from 1877 to 1911, was no sissy. He lived in stirring times and dominated them both in peace and in war. Diaz, as a young man, was as colorful a character as ever stepped from the pages of either fact or fiction.

And there's Georges Jacques Donanton, the French lawyer who at thirty-five went to his death at the hands of the very Revolutionary Tribunal; he, himself, had created a year earlier. You'd scarcely call him a nomby-pamby guy. His motto was 'to dare, to dare again, to always dare.' Pretty good one, eh? And in these times the story of a man like Donanton takes on a double significance, for the background that created him looms again at this very moment. But let's not get political.

The man who called himself Sir Basil Zaharoff, of course, is more immediate, and perhaps he'll be first to reach films. What a strange guy he was! So mysterious that no one knew his name or nationality until the probes got busy with a post-mortem delving into his career. Power, strength—those were the keynotes to his character.
Eddie, Willing and Able, But——

A bad man? Well, he lustered worse. That was his rocket. And how it dwarfs the rockets of, say, 'Little Caesar'! Yet, this evil genius of our age endowed colleges, gave millions away.' Robinson grins. 'Probably he was good to his mother!'

From present and future we skip to the past. And Eddie tells of making 'Thunder in the City' in England.

'You know, over in the London studios I reminded myself of the fellow who hits himself on the head with a hammer because it feels so good when he stops! I mean I actually missed the presence of the individual who is the most maligned in Hollywood—the supervisor. Oh, yes, they have 'em over there—but they're so darned polite.

'I guess all show folk are a little screwy and temperamental. We need some one to ride herd on us and keep us from straying off the reservation. I enjoyed working there, though. Principally, perhaps, because I like big cities. In Hollywood life outside the studio is a little circumscribed. You want to go places and see things. But there aren't many places to go—and the things you see are certain to be the same as you've been seeing on the set all day.

'On the other hand, Hollywood is only as provincial as you make it. Not even in London or New York can a fellow gather together on short notice so congenial a company as Gladys and I can assemble at our table. If it's literature you wish to discuss, there are writers and galore among our friends. If you feel like a musical evening, many of the world's finest composers, musicians, artists are on the Coast. So, you see, it's up to the individual. What is missing is the tempo and excitement, the buzzing vibrance and electric vitality of New York, London, or Paris.'

Eddie tells how he received the keys to Copenhagen when he visited the Danish capital, which they spell Kobenhavn, and how he surprised them with a neat little speech in their own tongue. Eddie really hasn't a very extensive vocabulary in foreign languages, although he speaks a number of them well enough to converse, and can fake all of them amazingly. On the stage and in pictures he has been called upon to talk practically every accent. He has been a Swede, an Italian, a Portuguese, a Chinese, a Spaniard, a Russian, a Dawn-East American, a Mexican—well, name your language, and Robinson will tell you the play or picture in which he simulated it.

There's a trick to talking dialect, he says. In fact several. One is never to overdo it. Never lay it on too thickly, or make it appear too prominent. Just drop in a few words here and there, emphasize a lingual mannerism. A mere inflection will turn the trick. He learned the various idioms he has employed by association with persons who unwittingly spoke that way. He'd listen and pick out the outstanding oddities.

It remained for Mr. Robinson to make Hollywood art conscious. He, himself, has by far the finest collection on the Coast. It includes the works of many of the masters—Daumier, Cézanne, Renoir, Gaugin, Pissaro, Degas, Monet, and the American, Grant Wood, among them. He haunted galleries and studied art long before he could afford to buy. But he was a potential patron, and when fame filled his pockets he went on it whole-heartedly accumulating swiftly a collection which many men would envy.

Mr. Robinson, his wife and son came to New York for the opening of "Thunder in the City," which he filmed in England.

His current Warner picture is "Kid Galahad," with Bette Davis as his partner. He hopes it will be his last modern role before he takes a crack at great men of the past.
"Captains Courageous."—MGM. Superlatives galore are evoked by this free adaptation of Rudyard Kipling's stirring tale, which becomes as strong and moving a picture as the memorable "Mutiny on the Bounty." Like its predecessor, it is not only a play of action but a study of character, with the raging sea a background for both. It must be classified as a "man's picture" inasmuch as there is no sexual love story, but if it is overlooked by intelligent women I shall be dumfounded—and disappointed. For this is one of the most splendid achievements of the season, with acting so true and fine that the spectator is left breathless. Grand as every one in it is, I think that Spencer Tracy is the stand-out, with Freddie Bartholomew standing right beside him. Aunt Myllicent's boy is no Lord Fauntleroy, either, with perfect speech his strongest claim; he is a sneak and a snob, one of the most repellent children the screen has given us, as chilling in his way as was Bonita Granville in "We Three." Tumbling off a luxury liner, he is picked up by a fishing schooner off the Grand Banks and for three months is a member of the crew, sharing work and hardships and learning the decencies that exist between men. It is a wonderful study of regeneration. Mr. Tracy is a Portuguese fisherman who befriends Master Freddie—the briefest summary of a rich, full-blooded character that I can think of. It is brief because Mr. Tracy's performance overwhelms me, leaves me awed and speechless with admiration. Miss this picture if you dare, but don't say I didn't tell you.

"Night Must Fall."—MGM. If you want a cruel, realistic picture of morbid psychology, disturbing, shocking, then you should not miss Robert Montgomery and Rosalind Russell in a brilliant departure from their usual gracious selves. Mr. Montgomery is an egomaniac murderer and Miss Russell is fascinated by him almost to the point of falling in love, and she does go so far as to protect him from the police. Both are part of a strange tale in a remote English village which has Dame May Whitty, distinguished British actress, a stupid, cruel old woman with whom Miss Russell lives as a poor relation. Mr. Montgomery is a page boy in the village hotel, whose broken promises to marry Dame May's servant eventually bring him to the old woman for cross-examination. He so charms and flatters her that she hires him for the sheer delight of having him around. Investigation of a murder in the neighborhood convinces Miss Russell that the stranger is the guilty man and she, like the spectator, knows that Dame May is doomed to die by his hand. But she can do nothing about it and is frightened and confused by her growing interest in him. He knows it and taunts her with this knowledge. How it all ends I leave you to discover for yourself. You will be held by the slow progress of the story because of the excellence of the acting, although you may find the picture a bit monotonous, too, for virtually all of it takes place in a cottage and it is long drawn out. But you will have new respect for Mr. Montgomery's courage in choosing a repellent character, as well as admiration for his skill in not slighting a single detail of a portrait that will be remembered with horror.

"Café Metropole."—20th Century-Fox. Pleasant is this little farce, its chief claim to importance the presence of Tyrone Power and his increasing skill as an actor. He shows that he is much more than a good-looking newcomer in each successive picture. His poise and assurance are as amazing as is his skill in creating character deftly and smoothly. There is no young actor of sounder ability and with as solid a future. Everything about him is balanced. His good looks do not strike the beholder too hard, nor does he show off. He makes his points quietly and economically. One feels that he was born to be an actor and his polish quickly acquired with the minimum of training. He certainly proves the truth of heredity. The piece that employs his talent fades from memory as soon as it ends. It happens in Paris where Mr. Power is forced to impersonate a Russian prince to cancel his indiscretion in writing a bad check. Adolphe Menjou is the blackmailing headwaiter who has Mr. Power under his thumb. Loretta Young the heiress who is in love with him and knows that he isn't a prince at all. All this is worth seeing on account of Mr. Power.

"Wake Up and Live."—20th Century-Fox. This rousing musical is guaranteed to bring the most reluctant picture-goer—if there is such a being nowadays—out of his shell. It is genial, glittering, topnotch, a medley of entertaining odds and ends that do not obscure a pleasant, heart-warming plot. The picture discovers a new star, Jack Haley, introduces the famed Walter Winchell as an excellent actor and gives Alice Faye opportunity to be charming and clever. And that's only the half of it, only half of the whirlwind of singing, dancing and clowning. The Condos Brothers are marvelous tap dancers, the best ever it seems to me, and Joan Davis and a burlesque Spanish dance that is painfully funny.

"Dreaming Lips."—Mr. and Miss Faye a kind-hearted singer who helps him overcome his timidity. She gives him such confidence in himself that he becomes a success when heard by accident over the air and the feud between Mr. Winchell and Ben Bernie reaches a new high as both claim to have discovered the identity of the "phantom troubadour." while the troubadour himself is ignorant of all the excitement his singing creates. Mr. Haley is delightful in this role. Always a splendid comedian, he now becomes a fine actor and a charming hero.

"Make Way For To-morrow."—Paramount. This is one of the truest and most poignant pictures ever produced for adults. That is what I thought until something happened to spoil the uniform excellence of what still is a fine picture. But it could have been perfect. It isn't, now. It is marred by a sequence that doesn't belong, that was written in, I imagine, by the adaptor of the play for the sake of making the film longer. It couldn't have been in the original. A plague on padded films anyhow, say I! However, it is so grand up to this point that I must voice unusual enthusiasm and explain the defect which you may not feel as keenly, perhaps, as I did. It is a quiet story of family life centering about an old couple who do not fit into the lives of their married children, their separation when one is an unwelcome guest in their son's home and the other is grudgingly taken in by a daughter, and the ultimate unhappy, inevitable solution of a problem that is familiar to us all. There is nothing maudlin in the telling of this, no tear jerking in the manner of "Over the Hill to the Poorhouse." These are civilized, middle-class people who are not given to histrionics or crying in public, nor and Italian with little less than perfection.

During this time, Nat never lost his interest in wrestling. All the top-notchers in the ring became his opponents. Gaining the title of heavyweight champion of Europe, he lost interest in oil and gave up his job.

Even in those pre-Weissmuller days, Hollywood went for athletes in a big way and Nat appeared in Rudolph Valentino’s “Monsieur Beaucaire.” He was the man who threw somebody out of the palace window!

Pendleton’s Past

way productions, including “My Girl Friday,” Nat had not overcome his urge to wrestle. He felt that he was ready to meet all champs by hook or by crook. There was only one fly in the ointment. He could not take orders to lay down at times. It went against his Yankee sportsmanship.

Nat wrestled all the top-notchers of that time, Jimmy Londos, Renato Gardini, and “Strangler” Lewis, and my confidence in him was so great that I put most of my spare cash “on his nose” to win—and he always came through.

During that time I discovered that Nat shares his brother’s talent for music. One evening he visited me with a guitar and introduced me to “I Can’t Give You Anything But Love”—and I understand that he still sings it. When he opened his mouth in song, my kid brother innocently observed: “Gee, what a lot of cavities that man has!” With Nat’s musical tendencies still latent—and he really has a nice voice—I wouldn’t be surprised to see him break into song in the next “Broadway Melody.”

It was after one of these midsummer serenades that Nat broke the news to me that he was rehearsing for a new play, “The Gray Fox,” with Henry Hull and Warren Hymer. During the engagement, both he and Hymer were offered film contracts to go to the Coast. One picture followed another so quickly that he never has found time to return to the squared circle. While he never has achieved stardom, Nat has been a featured player almost from the beginning, and each interpretation has been an honest and interesting one. He made the French as well as the American version of “The Big Pond,” with Maurice Chevalier and Claudette Colbert, and has made recordings in Spanish and Portuguese for Latin America.

I am of the personal conviction that, despite the fortune films offer—and make no mistake that Nat overlooks this detail—if wrestling returned to its firm two feet and Nat had a chance at the heavyweight crown, he’d overlook all movie contracts and get right back into his trunks.

I’d have a ringside seat with money on his nose to win!

Marie Wilson is about recovered from the automobile accident she suffered recently. Latest is “Melody for Two.”

I first met him while we were both working for a publisher. Nat was photographed as a muscular marvel, wrote about strength and health, represented strength generally. He persuaded our boss to produce films and Nat became the director.

Eventually he was inspired to produce a super-super. And you can’t produce a super-super without a great star. So Nat began talking business with Katharine Cornell. Alas, the picture was made, and that may be the reason the great Cornell has declined all offers to go to Hollywood since! At any rate, the picture was never shown.

I tell you the above only to give a more intimate glimpse of the man I knew “when.” Most actors spend twenty-five or thirty years of their careers acting before they aspire to become directors, whereas Nat began directing before he really became an actor. That’s his way of doing things. After appearing in several Broad-and also in her dressing room she keeps a small wooden tapping platform, practice shoes and a portable victrola. When we travel they are carried in her trunks. So trains, location trips, or vacations never interfere with her two hours a day spent in bar work and rehearsing old and new routines. She prefers to wear for practicing a loosely tied gingham apron.

"Five years ago in New York Eleanor realized a great ambition of hers by taking a home in the country, a beautiful place in Westchester. But do you know, of the five years she had that house, she actually spent less than twelve weeks there? Just about three weeks a year! We were always traveling or detained in the city.

"Now we have a home that's really a home in Hollywood, and Eleanor's crazy about it. She entertains quite a lot, because it's more convenient for her to be hostess than guest; that way she can fit play into work without upsetting her routine. I enjoy her friends, and we've had some lovely times with them. Most of them are in pictures but there are others to whom she is equally devoted.

"Eleanor's a curious mixture of younger and serious grown-up. She drives a car with the utmost care and regard for regulations, she heartily dislikes anything connected with housekeeping, she loves to make big events of birthdays and holidays. She keeps her wardrobes and dressing table as neat as a pin but lets her clothes remain right where she took them off. A movie isn't a movie to her unless she carries something to eat during the show. She detests high heels for street wear but she has dozens of pairs of spike-heeled mules that she enjoys lousing around in at home.

"One time," Mrs. Powell went on sewing and talking, "an interviewer asked her what her favorite pastimes were. Eleanor said she was sorry but she'd never had a pastime in her life. After the interviewer had gone she turned to me 'Mother, do you suppose I've missed much by not being crazy on the subject of bridge or stamp-collecting or something? I mean, do you guess I've missed much by not loving to do anything really but dance?' I didn't answer her right away. She thought a moment, then answered herself, 'Well, I don't. It's been a swell life even when we were hitting the bumps.'

"If there's any secret behind Eleanor's success I believe that tells it.

"Frequently I'm asked about her dates and beaux. She has never been one for keeping lots of men on the string at once; usually there are three or four who take her out over a long period of time and wind up either as remaining beaux or good friends. Some time back her friendship with Abe Lyman was much publicized. Abe has a heart of gold and I'm extremely fond of him. Many times he has said to me 'It's in the cards, mother, that Eleanor and I were meant to marry. I know.'

"Well, at the time they were going together so many erroneous statements about their romance were credited to things I'd said, I learned not to make any comment. I think I'd better leave it to Eleanor to tell about her boy friends. After all, they're her secrets. Just yesterday, on the set, a columnist asked her 'How about the love-life these days?' and she pointed to her feet and answered 'These are my love-life—they do what I tell them to and they can't walk out on me!"
Starting at the Top

the little dog, her only friend, had been run over. It was darned good.

Then he rehearsed scenes from several plays, each pupil getting a chance. One newcomer suffered terribly from self-consciousness, a bad enemy to a player until it is overcome. A bad enemy to any one even in the business world. "You've got to learn to use your personality," Mr. Gaade said. "Even in everyday life it is valuable."

How's he going to lick that self-conscious one, I thought. I soon found out.

The girl could hardly speak above a whisper and her face was crimson. "Speak up. You're addressing ten thousand people and they all want to hear what you have to say."

Na good. She couldn't do it. He went over to her, and as one would to a child, tousled her hair to break up her stiffness, shook her by the shoulders and told her to stick her tongue out at the class. "Be ridiculous," he said. After a tremendous effort her tongue appeared—perhaps a quarter of an inch.

"I said stick your tongue out! If you don't do that I'll give you something much harder to do. No one can do a good job of acting until they have first learned how to be ridiculous." Finally her tongue came half way out, and he let it go at that.

"I was so embarrassed," she told me later. "I simply couldn't force my mouth open."

I was present at the next lesson to see the result of that treatment. This girl was in dead earnest, you see, and worked hard at home to overcome her difficulty. She was like a different person. Her voice had three times its former volume and she spoke her lines with astonishing poise.

Doris thought the end of the rainbow had come when she signed her movie contract, but through one of those inexplicable things she didn't work a day. It began to gnaw at her morale and to keep from getting despondent she asked permission to appear in a stage play given at a try-out theater in Hollywood.

Al Woods happened to be in the audience and decided that Doris was just the gal he wanted to play the lead in his forthcoming production "The Night of January 16th." By an arrangement with Fox he signed Doris to a contract and told her to post with all speed to New York.

"What a laugh that was," said Doris. "Mary and Gladys and I had about seventy dollars between us after everything in Hollywood was settled up and we started out across country in our old Ford. 'We got here, too.'

Mary is her mother. Outside of several difficulties in cold-shouldering the boys—it was Mary who insisted upon that, I suspect—who stopped at the same tourist camps along the way and were dying to be friendly, the trip was uneventful. 'We didn't even get a flat,' said Doris.

"A good thing, too," said Gladys, chuckling. "I don't think there was a spare fifty-cent piece on us when we landed home."

"With a contract you put up with all that?" I asked.

"Oh, I could have asked for an advance," said Doris, "but you know how it is. You don't like to and we didn't want to write dad. We had enough and we knew he would meet us in New York. It was great fun."

She has her admirers trained as to her taste in flowers, but once a newcomer sent orchids. She wore one but remarked to him afterward, "Now do I look like an orchidaceous woman?"

"I'll bet she was an imp when she was little," I said to Mrs. Nolan.

"Na," she replied. "As a matter of fact, she was the best child I had. She was seldom ill and always happy and sunny-tempered."

That's it. The potent feature of her success. Every one wants to rub elbows with luck and happiness, and Doris has both.

Everybody Has a Sideline.—Stars of The Prince and the Pauper" at the ripe old age of twelve might be enough glory for some juvenile actors, but not for the Moueh twins. They are inventors. They are chemists. They fairly devour books and magazines of medical research. On a sight-seeing tour of New York they left a trail of upset dignity as they pointed out flows in exhibits of crown jewels, and omissions in the spiel of Radio City guides. The amazing part of it is they are not smart-Alecky. They just know all the facts.

Ambassador at Large.—All those fans who think that stars are apt to look a little plain off-screen, who believe that glamour is something bestowed by the camera, ought to catch a glimpse of Loretta Young.

Arriving in New York for a few days en route to Bermuda, she was a picture of loveliness. She is extremely fortunate, and she appreciates it, in that she is not readily recognizable. Slender, pale, and dressed in subdued elegance she can walk right through the crowd of fans waiting at her hotel door and be off about her business before they realize who she is. Her business, in case you are curious, is collecting the most exquisitely beautiful wardrobe you ever saw.

Like most of her fellow-players, Loretta has a feeling of intense loyalty for 20th Century-Fox. It is exciting working there. It is a challenge to veteran players to see how public favorites can be built up overnight with one great picture.

Slightly Faded "Scarlett."—For the next two months the highways and byways of the country will be fairly dotted with talent scouts, and youngsters will have to be surreptitious about putting on even a pins-for-admission show in the attic if they don't want a studio representative spying on them.

Paramount is sending Oliver Hinsdale to colleges in search of another Robert Taylor. Womans are sending Haven MacQuarrie and his "Do You Want To Be An Actor?" radio skit on a cross-country tour to pick up likely film prospects.

George Cukor, growing old and gray in the preliminaries of "Gone with the Wind"—or maybe it just seems like a decade or two since the search for players for that began—reports that promising young players are to be found all over the South. He found eight girls who are at ease before the camera and hopes to use them in pictures some time. Not in "Gone with the Wind" though; it seems they are too modern for that. When last seen he was gazing dreamily at the swoops and swirls of that most polished of dance teams, Veloz and Yolanda, reflecting, perhaps, that the Civil War ought to be over by now.

Acting Out in Public.—Not even her steady rise in pictures is enough to make Frances Farmer forget that what she really wanted was to go on the stage. She will have her fling between pictures this summer up in Peterboro, New Hampshire. But what has become of Joan Crawford's plan to invade some off-the-beaten-track summer theater for the experiment of acting before an audience? Please, Miss Crawford, pick a New England theater so I can see you. And please wheedle Noel Coward into letting you do "Still Life." You could do wonders with it, and I am sure it would do wonders for you.

Hilarity in Numbers.—Lily Pons considers thirteen her lucky number, so she always has the auto license plate L P 13. Not to be outdone, her fiancé, Andre Kostolontz, prevailed on Connecticut authorities to give him A K 13. He is getting a little annoyed at the goles of laughter when he drives through the Broadway sector, not knowing that AK has unfortunate biological significance in Yiddish slang.

A Long Wait for Lily.—It may be September before Lily Pons gets around to Hollywood and another picture. Her frail ninety pounds are feeling the strain of opera, concert, and radio appearances and her lovely little house and garden at Silvermine, Connecticut, appeal to her more strongly than the studio does. Besides, Jesse Lasky is having his annual brainstorm about filming an opera with Nino Martini and Lily Pons and he is waiting for a good knockabout comedy to turn up.

Back From Oblivion—at Sixteen.—When Grand National abruptly summoned Stuart Erwin back from a New York vacation, his one big regret was missing Mitzi Green's musical comedy début. It was something to regret, for it was the greatest, most glittering, and heart-warming first night of the season. There was Mitzi, a poised and charming and melodious sprite, who only six years ago was the bash and challenging brot who shared comic honors with Stu in pictures. Surrounded in "Bobes in Arms" by giddy and talented youngsters, Mitzi and her playmates make the Hollywood ingenue of nineteen or so seem a little faded. RKO stands ready to make pictures with Mitzi whenever she can tear herself away from "Bobes in Arms."

All Around Town.—Katharine Hepburn has bought a house on Forty-ninth Street, next door to her ex-husband, Ludlow Smith. Sometimes the most inane press-agent stories are a comfort in retrospect. For instance, while watching the sinister, gripping performance of Basil Rathbone in "Love From a Stranger," I found myself comforted by the thought that he always has eighty-six kinds of tea at his house. Just a tea fancier is all he is, I had to keep reminding myself. Much as I love to get mail I don't want another one of you to point out that Sabu of "Elephant Boy" fame is an infinitely better choice for "Kim" than Freddie Bartholomew. Write and tell MGM how you feel about it.

Gloria Swanson is off to England to try her luck in films there. Doris Nolan wouldn't cut short her vacation even for a grand part in Goldwyn's "Dead End." managed to support himself and keep his $1,500 intact. In the spring he sailed for Europe to continue his voice studies.

He studied in Paris all summer at the warld school. He coached with Reynaldo Hahn, the famous French conductor and composer.

Returning to this country, he was engaged as soloist, along with Anna Case, for the New York Philharmonic, Walter Damrosch conducted. When the Philharmonic season was over he went on a concert tour. It was during this time that he and Marjorie Bull were married.

He had managed to save $1,100 out of his various engagements and they sailed for Europe at the end of the season to enable him to continue his studies.

Things were tougher that summer. He hadn't as much money as he'd had the summer before—and this time there were two of them to live on it. There were other things, too. "I wanted to study an oratorio in London under Sir Henry Wood," he explained. "All my other teachers were in Paris so I had to live in Paris and fly over to London twice a week for the oratorio work. Those flights made deep inroads into my cash."

Returning to the States again, Charles Wagner engaged him to sing the title rôle in "Boccaccio," which was followed by a concert tour. The critics were enthusiastic.

During the summers he sang with the Municipal Light Opera Company in St. Louis.

It was during that time that he and Marjorie separated. The boy-and-girl love affair had blown up. They were grown then and realized how unsuited to each other they were.

Returning to New York for his third season with the Shuberts, he was cast opposite Mario Jeritza in an operetta called "Anima." A long road tour was mapped out to whip the show into shape for New York. But it turned out to be a flap.

Returning to New York, MGM invited him to make a test. His contract followed as a result. Then came those long months of waiting that break the hearts of practically all newcomers to Hollywood, when he did nothing but the bits in "A Night at the Opera" and "Rose-Marie."

But the bitterness was lessened by his meeting with Irene Hervey. They met at a party, withdrew to a corner immediately after their introduction and talked for three hours without stopping. It was love at sight.

After his success in "Show Boat," Marjorie gave him a divorce and he and Irene were married.

Maybe in his long story of tough breaks, with "The Firefly" and "The Desert Song" in the offing and with Irene Hervey for a wife, things are taking a turn for the better. I hope so. He deserves it.

REATIONS

Upon reading unfavorable criticism:

A sniff emphatic from Edna May:
"I don't care what the critics say!"

A tragic stare from stricken Joan:
"I'll seek kind comfort from my Tonet!"

A glare from Connie: "The vulgar press—I'd like to sue the whole crude mess!"

A cruel review? Harsh words throughout?
Such only makes Simone... pout.

Upon reading a flattering review:

"This is great! Joy pure and simple!"
A wide grin from Clark—a flash of dimple.

Marlene draws, "How very nize!"
A Mona Lisa smile—a droop of eyes.

Harlow laughs happily—swings a hip;
"This write-up surely is a pip!"

A kind review? Flattering words throughout?
Such only makes Simone... pout.

Stars' reactions to blame and praise?
They issue forth in different ways;
But midst the joy, the gloom, the shouts;
Simone Simon? She sits and pouts.

From Immigrant to Star

Hour after hour he drilled himself in the correct pronunciation of English words. To-day his speech is free of accent, yet he frequently finds himself cast in roles where it is necessary for him to assume one. This minor irony amuses him, as do life's other inconsistencies. Unembittered by his experiences, he is notably cheerful and optimistic.

For America, where he grew from stunted boyhood to strangling and distinguished maturity, he has the greatest affection. He laughed in recounting how, when he went to vote at the last presidential election, he found only one other voter at the poles—a fellow Russian.

The day's work was finished and, getting into Mischa's car, he drove us over to his dressing quarters. As befits his honestly earned success. Universal, where he is under contract, has provided him with a cheerful modern apartment. Sitting in a streamlined chair, still wearing his ochre make-up, he commented on the local Greek-Catholic church, where the atmosphere reminds him of his childhood in St. Petersburg, of conditions in Europe; of his work and family.

"My wife is American, born in Canada. When her parents heard that she was going to marry me they asked why she couldn't find an American or Canadian instead. They had never met me, and such photographs as they saw were not reassuring. When I left the stage and got work in such pictures as 'Lives of a Bengal Lancer' and 'Clive of India' I was continually cast as assistant to the villain. When they saw stills from such productions, with me bundled up in whiskers or wearing the sly, oily expressions of polished cut-throats, they thought their daughter had lost her mind.

"I am very glad that I have got into comedy work. It gives me a feeling of satisfaction to see my pictures and realize that the character I am playing is affording amusement. I think the world needs all the humor it can get."

The fans, too, are glad that Mischa is no longer cast as "assistant to the villain," and they are expressing their appreciation in an avalanche of mail. "They do not send mere requests for my photograph, but write sizable, interesting letters," said he gratefully. It was men like Frank Tuttle and Gregory La Cava who helped Mr. Auer get into picture work, and it is a pleased and admiring public that will keep him there.

Emily Lane, whom you remember in "When Love Is Young," enjoys a vacation with the help of a cretonne play suit in neutral greens.

grandparents, Leopold Auer, a music master of renown. He cabled passage money, and Mischa set out on a long journey. Through an error, no one met his boat, and he was sent to Ellis Island for three days.

Thereafter the sun of good fortune began to shine on the big-eyed immigrant. His grandfather adopted him, sent him to high school, introduced him to prominent people of the artistic world. He learned our language, among other things, and to dislodge a lingering accent studied pronunciation with a teacher of the deaf and dumb.

how I was to locate her. When I walked down the street people—Italians are naturally excitable—gathered and followed me, talking, and trying to solve the mystery of my appearance.

"An attendant at the city hall looked through the records which they keep on foreigners, and the friend's name was listed there, also the name and address of her husband. She must have been astonished to find so strange-looking an object at her door, but she appeared not to notice. Where is your mother?" she asked. Only then did it seem fully to dawn on me that mother was dead. I dropped over in a faint."

FOUNDATIONS OF

BY LAURA BENHAM

THIS IS THE FIRST OF A SERIES OF ARTICLES GIVING REALLY AUTHORITATIVE HINTS ON BEAUTY AIDS.

WHEN The Editor of Picture Play asked me to start this Beauty Department, I felt both happy and humble. For it is both a pleasure and a responsibility to be intrusted with the privilege of bringing you the latest news about beauty styles and products, and of suggesting ways and means that will help you to achieve and enhance good looks.

Because beauty is to-day more important than ever before. It counts tremendously in business as well as in a girl's personal life. But, luckily, it's a very modern kind of beauty. It has little to do with classic perfection of feature, but is composed of cleanliness and daintiness and grooming and meticulous attention to the details of appearance—all things within the reach of every one. And it is in these things that I hope to be of some help to you.

Here in my office, I'm surrounded by jars and boxes and bottles, all containing the latest creams and lotions and powders that expert chemists and scientists can create. Some of them are expensive—many may be purchased for less than a quarter. Most of them are excellent products, but a few are not all that they should be. Therefore, it is for me to test them and experiment with them and decide which ones you will want to know about. For, strangely enough, their price tags have little or nothing to do with their worth.

So, I promise to do my best to tell you all the facts about the newest aids to beauty, not overlooking many of our tried and true friends of the past. I give you my word to be truthful and hope that you will let me know what you want to hear about by writing me your beauty problems. I'll answer personally whatever you ask, and will try to give you information and advice that will really be of benefit.

Now, for a beginning this month, I'm going to talk about beauty and daintiness as one whole. For truly the two are so closely related that they cannot be separated.

Of course, there is no such thing as beauty that does not include cleanliness, but even soap-and-water cleanliness is not enough. There must be real daintiness and freshness that begin in the bath and finish when the last hair is in place, the last drop of perfume dabbed behind the ear. For the truly dainty and fastidious woman knows that besides looking immaculate, she must smell sweet, too.

So let's not quibble over words and about the bush. Real daintiness—and thus real beauty—demands a body freshly bathed and powdered and perfumed, with proper precautions taken to avoid all odor of perspiration even in the hottest weather.

Now the first step toward daintiness is to take two baths a day, instead of one, especially if you're one of the increasing number of young women who dash to business every morning. For the prevalent habit of taking a bath every night in order to get an early start next day, doesn't make for the most desirable daintiness, as you'll realize if you stop to think about it.

The bath at night is a fine thing, for your own enjoyment—and by the way, all baths should be fun instead of mere routine cleaning jobs, and they can be if you indulge in a few of the frivollies I'm going to tell you about—and to help you off to relaxed sleep and sweet dreams. But it ever occurred to you that during the six to eight hours that you sleep, your body is at work?

During the night your pores are more relaxed than at any other time and the natural oils of the body are pouring to the surface. So, when you awoke in the morning, there is a thin film of oil over your body, too fine for you to see, but it's there nevertheless. And a few short hours after you're up, that oil begins to emit a slight odor. Not pleasant to think of, is it? But important to know about so that you can take a quick tub or shower every morning and thus assure yourself of day-long freshens.

Of course, if you don't go to business, but spend your mornings running a home, you'll wait until your tasks are finished before taking your bath. But regardless of the hour you take it, do let it be fun! And it can be if you'll get some of the grand new bath salts and soaps and eau de colognes and dusting powders that were created just to make you feel and look lovely.

Personally, I think that half the fun of a bath depends on the soap that is used. For a soap should be mild and soothing as well as penetrating; it should have a clean, sweet scent and it should lather quickly in soft, fluffy bubbles in water that's hard or soft.

A fine soap that meets all these requirements is one that's made by an old, established firm. It has a delightful bouquet fragrance and makes a wonderful lather, small-bubbled and light. What's more, it leaves the body sweetly scented from bath to bath. I love this soap and have used it ever since I was a little girl and lately have been more than pleased to find that it has been reduced in price while retaining all its high quality. Write to me for the name of this soap and I'll bet that once you've tried it, you'll be devoted to it permanently.

Or you might like a soap that is one of a whole sequence of products from one of our finest makers, all in the same scent, a spirited haunting fragrance reminiscent of the famous blue grass of Kentucky. There are soap and bath salts and eau de toilette and dusting powder, all of thoroughbred quality and exactly right for making you feel fresh and cool even when the thermometer is soaring toward the top.

For those of you who prefer a definite flower fragrance, I suggest one of the intense floral scents recently introduced by another well-known beauty house. In either Lilloc or Narcissus, Gardenia, Lily of the Valley, Violet, or the combination of three flowers you can obtain dusting powder, eau de cologne, talcum powder, toilet water and perfume all to match. And regardless of which scent is your choice, you'll find the perfection of an odor which captures the true essence of the flower from which it was distilled.

Foundations of Beauty

While not new, there's another regular talcum whose popularity through the years testifies to its quality and it's especially fine for use during the summer because of the lasting power of its fragrance. In familiar tall red rins, it's one of the inexpensive toiletries whose value cannot be measured by its modest price.

But just because you've had a fine bath and have splashed yourself with eau de cologne and dusted yourself with fragrant powder, don't think you are assured of absolute daintiness unless you've protected yourself from any odor of perspiration.

And I assure you that among groups of women this perspiration odor is the most prevalent of offenses. I've noticed it in offices, in the theater, in the dressing rooms of celebrated stage and screen stars, for it's an offense of which the wealthy are as guilty as are those in less affluent circumstances. It is the result of carelessness and is, I think, the worst fault of which a woman can be guilty. And it is so easy to avoid.

For medical authorities agree that it is not the perspiration of the entire body which is noticeable, but that of the area beneath the arms, due to the inclosed nature of the armpits. Therefore, it is easy to control.

Remember, there is nothing injurious about checking the perspiration beneath the arms, as once the pores of these limited areas are closed, the perspiration will be eliminated through other parts of the body where the pores have not been closed. But these other parts of the body will not be inclosed areas and thus will emit no unpleasant, noticeable traces.

Which brings us to the fine new cream that safely stops perspiration and all chance of offending. It's a pure white, greaseless, stainless vanishing cream that dries immediately after application. It stops perspiration for from one to three days and is mild and non-irritating to the skin.

Once you've assured yourself of all this freshness and daintiness, it's time to think of your grooming. And one of the most important parts of grooming is carefully selected make-up.

Of course, I can't go into all the newest make-up trends to-day, for that's a whole story in itself. But I can warn you to choose your powder carefully in order not to clog the pores of the skin you've so freshly cleansed. And for summer especially it's necessary to have a light, gossamer-thin powder that will cling to your skin without smudging from the heat.

A powder that you'll certainly like is one that has been put through an entirely new process that makes each particle finer than ever before. This powder, instead of being sifted through layers of silk, is blown by air through giant drums until each tiny grain is round and polished. It has no rough-edged particles to injure tender skins and it comes in a number of luscious smart shades. What's more, there are some of the same smoothly processed rauges to blend with the powder, thus providing you with two items of make-up that are certain to be kind to your skin.

Of course, no make-up is complete without a good lipstick, and for the best grooming you need one that is smooth and velvety and that lasts for hours. Such a one is that made by the firm that startled the cosmetic world with its grand liquid toning-lotion, foundation and powder all in one. This new lipstick comes in five shades and really merits the term indelible.

Just write to me and I'll tell you the name of this lipstick, and of all the other products I've described here. And I have to rush off now to look at a lot of new things that I'll be telling you about next month when we plan the cosmetics you'll need for vacation.

The stars take a great deal of trouble to cover up their private lives. But why? What is the use of such precaution? As I said at the beginning, you have only to look at their faces to see what goes on inside them emotionally.

I do not know what they can do to forestall my facial pryings—unless they receive me wearing a veil.

WE REMEMBER

They brought life's big parade, its show of shows to us
Intrigue and love, life's fineness, its brutality.
John Gilbert gave romance; entrancing music, Russ;
Will Rogers, wit, unique originality.

All tortured souls we knew in Chaney's every part;
All beauty's dreams in fair La Marr's reality;
All human, kindly love in Dressler's finished art;
All Puckish fun in Normand's whimsicality.

The screen seems sadly blank, our friends, the actors, gone.
The picture done, in cruel death's finality.
But loyalties survive, old troopers still play on;
Our memory lives, and gives them immortality.

Hollywood sort of snubbed Simone that evening but Wyler was intensely devoted.

Bing Battles Government.—As income taxes have always been a pain in the neck for Bing Crosby, who’s given fully half of his money to the government in the past few years, according to common report, the actor is starting to get back a little. His demand is for about $14,000, fairly modest.

Meanwhile Cecil B. DeMille Productions, Inc., won a $1,200,000 decision.

The Barrymore "Crash."—The straw that broke the camel’s back in the affairs of John and Eloine Barrymore was the seizing of the lady’s car for a grocery bill, which she asserted was accumulated while they were together. Right after that she rushed into the divorce courts, which settled all talk of reconciliation. Oddly enough, too, she and John dined together about this time.

The famous actor recently listed his assets as $261,597 as against debts of $161,503 in his bankruptcy petition. He mentioned $55,000 as owing to Dolores Barrymore. In all, there were about seventy creditors enumerated in London, New York, and Los Angeles. Assets of the actor are pretty well frozen.

Barrymore goes about these days with Sally Allen, a young screen actress.

Can Errol Be Restrained?—Warner Brothers will probably put firm thumbs down on Errol Flynn’s adventuring in the future, but will they be able to make the rule stick? That is what everybody is wondering, and no one will know until Flynn sets forth again for Europe or some place.

Of course, the cause of the studio conservatism, not to say consternation, is that little Spanish incident. After all, though, it wasn’t so serious, and really grand publicity.

And then think of Ann Sothern. She tripped over an electric cable on a set, fell, and had her lower lip pierced by her teeth as a result. She had to have five stitches taken, and was laid up for a week from shock and loss of blood.

Whereas Flynn came buzzing back almost immediately to America following his casualty.

The Niesen Gentility.—Gertrude Niesen, who looked like a young Moe West in “Top of the Town,” gets the highest rating with the folk around Hollywood for appreciation of any attentions tendered her. Gertrude’s policy is always to send a little telegram of thanks which is quite personal. She dedicates about an hour or two a day to consideration of these matters. And that’s just one of the reasons everybody is “for” this remarkable young blues singer.

Doris Nolan Plays Safe.—Doris Nolan certainly manages to keep up on Sally’s Wonder Child.—Sally Eilers takes much pride in the fact that her two-and-a-half-year-old boy rates on intelligence quotient of four and a half. He obtained this honor because he could lace his own shoes and count up to twelve, among other accomplishments.

No Excess of Vanity.—No flub-dub about Jeonette MacDonal’d. When she recently attended a costume party she didn’t disdain to wear the dress used for the screen by another actress. Because of her engagement to Gene Raymond, Miss MacDonal’d wished to appear in “Juliet” regalia, and so she wore one of the magnificent gowns used by Norma Shearer in the picture of Shakespeare’s play. It was white, and Gene, who accompanied her, was also attired in white. Norma herself was not at the party.

Sisters and Brothers Score.—Relatives of stars are making a record for themselves, and it may be Joan Fontaine who set the pace. That little blond lady, sister of Olivia de Haviland, was most insistent that she be not exploited at such. She wanted to win success on her own. But, of course, she has received tons of publicity on that account. Nothing could stop that, and it doesn’t seem to have interfered a bit with her progress.

Meanwhile two sisters of Lolo Lone, Rosemary and Priscilla, make no such concealments. They are to shine out in "Varsity Show" with Dick Powell and Fred Waring under their own names, and Lola, you know, is enjoying a revival of her fortunes because of "Marked Women," in which she demonstrated new capability. Among other relatives on the scene is George Lo Marr, brother of Malvyn Douglas.

Gary May Face Knife.—Gary Cooper is battling an abdominal ailment which may necessitate his going to the hospital eventually for an operation. He hopes to avoid this, but he was under observation while he was on his vacation in Florida and New York.

He was finally able to return to Hollywood and complete some additional scenes for "Souls at Sea," which has been something of a problem picture because of the difficulty of providing a satisfactory ending.

Golden Harding Homecoming.—Quite a homecoming for Ann Harding was duly celebrated. In the first place, she was absent from Hollywood for many months. In the second, she brought her new husband, Werner Jonsen, with her, and, thirdly, she was freed of any kidnapping charges in connection with the removal of nine-year-old Jane Bonnister to England. A Quebec judge settled that question, which has been raised by Ann's ex-husband, Harry Bonnister. Apparently the sun shines more brightly over the well-guarded hilltop home of the star than prior to her departure.

Acclaim for Martini.—The greatest acclaim ever was tendered Nino Martini when he gave a concert in Los Angeles. People literally hung on the rosettes to hear this young tenor, and he had to respond to the applause with about fifteen encores. That's all the result of the film build-up which was previously noted with Lawrence Tibbett and Grace Moore when they made appearances.

Martini was welcomed by Elissa Landi on this arrival, but we're wagering it's only a friendship without possibility of marriage.

Approving Jane Bryan.—Very promising and talented, and also a bit roly-poly is little Jane Bryan, who has her chance really to show her talent in "Kid Golahad." She's one of the most interesting young girls to arrive lately in pictures. She was discovered originally by Jean Muir when Jean was operating a little theater.

Hollywood High Lights

Jack Haley's leap to stardom after many pictures is deserved. His work in "Wake Up and Live" did the trick.
On and Off the Set

If he attempts to turn it off, or even over, she says: "I won't play it again. I like it."

"Broadway Melody" is a nice-enough tune," he said, "but you try listening to it for eight hours straight—even with Garbo to look at."

In the romantic days when Herbert Marshall lived across the street from Gloria Swanson, the two households were on very friendly terms. When Marshall moved away and Michael Barlett took possession of the house, no one, apparently, explained to Gloria's chow dog that things weren't the same. He continues to visit the place, and, resenting Michael's dog, which he adores. Silver-haired and kindly, he has taken care of her teeth since she came to Hollywood five years ago, and she regards him as one of her best friends.

SOMETHING new in the entertainment line was introduced at a tea which Anita Louise gave recently. However, the innovation was not of Anita's planning. It was entirely original with her block Scottie, Thistle, who, with a true Hollywood flair for publicity, mistook the white drawing-room for a nursery and gave birth to a pup. Even after being banished to her own quarters, her enthusiasm continued until she had presented Anita with six puppies.

Formality was forgotten, and the party ended with all the guests clamoring for puppies.

At Max Factor's make-up laboratories where they concoct the stuff which makes actors' faces glamorous upon the screen, they have lots and lots of little white guinea pigs. They shave the pigs' pink tummies and then apply the lotions which they plan to use on the glamorous stars' faces. "A guinea pig's stomach is very sensitive," the guide tells you. "If a lotion won't make his stomach break out in a rash, then we are safe in recommending it to the stars."

A woman we know invited friends to one of those on-the spur-of-the-moment suppers. When the dessert came in the cool made apologist faces. "I tried to make a noodle pudding the way Louise Roïner does," she explained. "I understand that she just puts in anything and it comes out all right. I started to make this to go with the meat and then I thought that we needed dessert so I put in sugar and things. Do you suppose that if Miss Roïner had made it they would have liked it better?"

The mystery of Robert Cummings's million dollars increases. His sudden fortune, the result of gold-mine stock turning out good, was duly announced. Several interviewers got stories for fan magazines from Bob, but when their editors asked for a sworn statement of verification from him he refused to sign on any dotted line. Why does he insist his word is enough?

There is no servant problem for the Don Ameches. They don't employ servants, even though Don now earns...
o big salary and they have a fairly large house and two babies. They have a man who went to school with Don and a girl who wanted a nice home and these two helpers are treated as part of the Ameche family. Such pleasant democracy is an innovation in Hollywood society.

HOLLYWOOD boy prefers to date screen mother! Kenneth Howell, scion of the films' "Jones Family," is more anxious to date Spring Byington, who portrays his mater, than any of the girls about town. Of course Ken is really twenty-four and Spring, out of character make-up, is actually a lovely sophisticate.

WHO do you suppose has the Diet-rich complex now? None other than Rochelle Hudson, who—according to her leading men—would rather be beautiful than act. They say it's proving hard on them, for Rochelle simply determines on her best stance before the camera and leaves them to act around her any way they can.

NEARLY every star in Hollywood is in a rage about reports made to millions of listeners by that radio whisperer who specializes in open letters. Apparently he leaps to conclusions for the sake of sensationalism. A number of players who have had no chance to talk back are thinking of going on the air with an open letter to him!

BETTE DAVIS doesn't have to be nursed through interviews by studio advisers. In fact, she declares she won't be chaperoned. In her instance her studio probably didn't want to take any chances on Bette's reviving memories of her suit to be professionally free.

ANOTHER instance of Richard Arlen's graciousness. There is always a mob of autograph hounds at the broadcasts. The stars dread leaving the theater, and cops and attendants usually make a flying wedge to get them safely into their cars. When Dick appeared on the Lux program the cops and attendants surrounded him as he was leaving the theater. "Ready, Mr. Arlen? Let's go!"

Dick looked at the crowd of disappointed faces. There must have been a couple of hundred. "If you'll take it easy," he told them, "I'll stay long enough to autograph your books."

And that's one of the reasons Dick's popularity continues undiminished.

NOW, at last, there is a cream deodorant that is absolutely non-greasy. And checks perspiration immediately!

Just apply Odorono Ice with your finger tips, night or morning. In no time, it is completely absorbed, leaving no greasy to make your underarm or your clothes messy.

A single application keeps your underarm odorless and perfectly dry for 1 to 3 days! And Odorono Ice leaves no odor of its own to betray you to other people. Its own clean, fresh odor of pure alcohol disappears at once.

Odorono Ice is made on a totally new principle. Its light, melting texture is entirely different—refreshing and cooling on your skin. And unlike ordinary creams, it frees you not only from odor, but from all dampness.

This means you need never again worry about ruining your lovely frocks. You'll save on both clothes and cleaner's bills.

Odorono Ice is so easy and pleasant to use, so dainty and so wonderfully effective that 90 per cent of the women who have tried it prefer it to any other deodorant they have ever used! Buy a jar tomorrow, 35¢ at all Toilet-Goods Departments.

statement from you as one of them. Why, do you particularly like Ginger?"

Jimmy gulped. He flustered for words. Eventually he spoke, but he offered no glip comment. "Let me think it over. There are many reasons."

He gets along with the feminine prizes, I am informed by some of them, because he is so completely unaffected, so considerate. He gladly fits in with whims for the evening. He's the kind you don't have to pretend with.

"Yes," he confessed, "I do go out more than before I was in pictures. But—why not? I enjoy dancing. There are so many keen dance floors here." He mustered up a noncholant shrug as he could. "So, er—why not?"

Smart women who carve their own path to the heights impress him, pretty girls enchant him. All the gay swing songs delight him, and he grows sentimental at the initial bar of a torch tune.

Still, Jimmy hasn't foreseen overwhelmingly in love yet, although he is anxious for the event. He won't hesitate about marriage. "I won't object if she has a career. That wouldn't spoil our happiness."

Later I overheard him phoning Virginia Bruce. Before vacationing, he was arranging to see her again.

Remarkably adept at characterizations, considering his youth and inexperienced, and refreshingly normal when he plays himself, Jimmy isn't provocatively silent like Gary Cooper. He hasn't adventured like Clark Gable. Nor is he handsome like Robert Taylor. He's sentimental neither in looks nor ways, and that is his charm. You sense that he isn't a drifter, that he appreciates the niceties of life and will strive for them. He's the boy next door who can go to town.

these two, never poking their noses out of their bungalow. They were working on jigsaw puzzles. Now, I shan’t mention it again.

After she acquired the ornate house Simone astonished every one by going on a clothes-buying spree. Only a month or so ago she suddenly went to one of the best shops in Los Angeles and purchased eight hundred dollars' worth of frocks and coats and hats and bags. She asked advice from practically every one about these purchases and her advisers were a trifle upset because she simply would not look at anything that wasn't blue. Any sort of blue. The bronze and peach shades, so suited and so flattering to her reddish-lighted hair, left her completely cold and unenthusiastic. I don't know how many ensembles she finally acquired, in various shades of her favorite color. But there were a number of them—all blue—and some of them very frivolous.

"I don't like Hollywood men," she told me, tossing the red-gold locks. "All the time they want to talk about themselves. Well, I want to talk about myself, too, sometimes." There was a pause and then she smiled her gamin smile. "I guess I want to talk about myself a lot!" she admitted.

A marked change has come over the Sts Simone in the past two months. It isn't just that she has bought a house, some new clothes and two new cars, although these things are doubtless symptoms or symbols. She is so good these days, the Simone! She is prompt for appointments, she poses graciously for photographs, she refrains—sometimes with obvious struggle—from feet stampings and shouting. I want every one to like me! She reiterates, sticking out her lower lip and looking like a little girl who is trying to convince Santa Claus that she has been a model of behavior for an entire year.

There are two or three reasons for this abrupt virtue, I think. Simone has undergone a bit of discipline, for one thing. The press has not been exactly caustic about her temperamental diatribes. It has been mildly amused. And Simone does not like to be laughed at. Her own publicity department grew weary of coping with her and announced that it simply wouldn't bother with her any more. And this at a time when "Seventh Heaven" had just shown all the critics what Simone could really do in the way of acting!

Now, 20th Century-Fox has just signed three new and exotic foreign actresses. Competition on the Fox lot mounts. Publicity is important to any new actress. Simone is a showman and a good one.

She has proved herself as an actress. Critics, the cubs, have even said that she was beautiful. She is not so frightened anymore. She is beginning to see the importance of getting along with people, of helping them to help her reach her goal.

She is an artist, the hot-headed, impetuous Simone. But she is a business woman, too. With her new sureness, with her growing perspective on her job and on the film business in general, Simone is gaining poise.

She is an interesting person and I'll wager that she will be worth watching, both on and off the screen, as time goes on.

PRINCE CHARMING
Golden-haired and golden-voiced,
Tall and woman-wise
Nelson Eddy swaggerers by
With laughter in his eyes.
Masterful, yet tender,
His serenades arise
To win a lovely lady—
And every woman sighs.

Edith Grames.
TO those readers who write us about Thomas Beck: Here is your hero luckily paired with charming Madge Evans. They are the youthful heartthrobs in Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's revival of the melodramatic thriller, "The Thirteenth Chair," with Dame May Whitty, distinguished English actress, in the leading rôle, and Elissa Landi for added polish.
as the acquisition of a lifetime. Following his example, Katharine Hepburn, Warner Oland, Miriam Hopkins are in the market for the modern masters. But the Robinson gallery has a head start.

An intense, passionate man, Robinson plunges into every undertaking with tremendous concentration and virility. One may well imagine him as an impetuous, breath-taking lover, sweeping all before him. He swept the dashing Gladys Lloyd off her feet, in any event. And not only did he woo and win her—but he's kept her both wooped and won. He's inclined to scoff at the fluttering Casonovas who can't hold their women, and regards a man who flirts from one girl—or one wife—to another as somewhat lacking in masculinity. He remains a lover to his ideal, who happens to be Mrs. Robinson, and he pours equal fire into every activity, be it the making of a movie or the artistic rapture which a rare and beautiful painting engenders.

Like all the vital beings whom he so well typifies, Robinson has a passion for creation. If he were a composer, memorable music would be his. As an artist he might find immortality on canvas. As an actor he has contributed character creations which most definitely put him on a pedestal. This creative urge is essentially apparent in his most fierce affection for the son he has fathered. His exciting life is crowded with his woman and their child, his work and their play. He lives in a madcap fashion, and conveys the impression of keeping himself in constant restraint, under constant control. But only with an effort and an expenditure of will power.

He has a great all-inclusive love for his fellow man and in him there is an inborn passion for service. In youth he wavered in the selection of a profession. He wanted to teach. He wanted to practice law to defend the weak. Thwarted in all three, he turned to the theater. In this medium he has sought to teach much, preach a little and through the drama in which he stars to correct evils and bring the sorrows of the under-privileged into the consciousness and conscience of his audience. Everything considered, Edward G. Robinson, like "Chico" in "Seventh Heaven," is indeed a "very remarkable fellow." So remarkable, indeed, that unlike "Chico" he doesn't have to call attention to the self-evident fact.

FOR BORIS KARLOFF
He gives you a perfectly elegant chill.
He's deep-dyed and wily and wicked and wary.
For a horrible, hideous, harrowing thrill.
He's the absolute, ultimate, maximum berry.

The creeps that he gives you are simply divine.
He haunts and he threatens, he lurks and he slithers.
He practically freezes your petrified spine.
He's the blood-curdling, hair-raising tops on the dithers.

He weaves the most glorious nerve-racking spell.
His gristy hand clutches, his evil eye glitters.
Utterly swell as a bat out of hell.
Boris Karloff's the consummate King of the Jitters.

What the Fans Think

I contend that a star is entitled to an uninterrupted private life. It would be an arduous task for Garbo to read and answer even the most worthy letters. Would any one want a stereotyped letter, signed by a secretary? That would be much worse than the rubber-stamped "Refusal!"

Miss Mathie, followers of Garbo will find their compensation in her superb characterizations, rich with beauty and spiritual fire. In the exquisite execution of her art speaks the true soul of the woman.

You say that the public molds the stars' places for them. You seem to imply that in return for this favor they should show us consideration. I disagree with you. First, the potential stars must arouse our interest, make us acutely aware of their power, and then mold their places in our hearts. We do not sit enthralled out of a sense of duty to Garbo, but because it is a privilege to do so.

Analyze your feeling for Garbo and if you find that you have honestly thought her "ethereally beautiful, magnetically charming, and gloriously contributing to the screen," the incident of a returned letter will not change you. Don't criticize her eccentricities too severely. Think of her as you would any other friend. You love her "not because of her virtues, but in spite of her faults."

Without Ballyhoo.

I THINK it's high time some one wrote a letter about Craig Reynolds. It's beyond me why the studios bring in new talent, publish a lot of ballyhoo about them, and let foreign stars give their opinions of the studios in America and abroad when they might well give the space to their own talent, right at their finger tips.

Craig Reynolds is a tall, good-looking young man with acting ability. In fact, he's doing well without any ballyhoo and that only proves that he can and does act. So here's wishing him luck and full speed ahead. I feel sure that he has many admirers who have the same opinion.

Rebuffed.

A RECENT issue of Picture Play tells us that an admirer of Katharine Hepburn wrote the editor about obtaining her autograph and he suggested writing to California.

When Miss Hepburn was right here in New York, appearing in her stage play, "The Lake," I called, taking with me some stills of "A Bill of Divorcement" as well as several lovely studio photographs. I attached a note and asked the usher to take the pictures back stage thinking, of course, that Miss Hepburn would sign them, or at least several.

During intermission, the usher returned with the pictures, unsigned, saying that Miss Hepburn was not in the habit of signing pictures except for her closest friends!

When I told Elsie Janis about it, saying she may see the day when she'll be glad to sign a picture, her reply was "Judge not, lest ye be judged."

FRED HENRY.

Terry Walker goes for a little wading between scenes of "Mountain Music" and no one minds, least of all the cameraman, who doesn't often get a chance as charming as this.

Betty Furness discards her trick hats for a moment to model a striking two-piece sun suit of royal blue and white.
do they brawl. The pathos of the whole is felt all the more because of its quietness, and the viewpoint of each is understandable and intensely human. The old folks are just not wanted, not because they are unwelcome but because their presence complicates active households. They bore, they are in the way, they jar. We've seen all this, if we haven't experienced it. The sequence that led me down and spoiled the mood of the picture occurred when the old couple joined up for a farewell party. They visited their honeymoon hotel of fifty years before, found it ornately modernized and adapted themselves to the habits of to-day without a qualm. Sitting at the bar, they had cocktails, became a little tipsy and danced in the huge, gilded restaurant. Not once was the old lady conscious of her shabbiness, unsuitable clothes. This may have been done to give the picture "flash," but it didn't harmonize with the characters. Victor Moore, as the old man, forgot his age and became a zestful comedian and I don't think that feeble Beulah Bondi could have downed an old-fashioned cocktail without falling off her stool. Ah, but she is marvelous! Her performance is that of a great artist, a star if ever there was one, and the group surrounding the two principals offers as fine an exhibition of acting as you will find anywhere.

"Dreaming Lips."—United Artists. Elizabeth Bergner makes another of her infrequent appearances and forces me to conclude that while she continues to be an arresting and highly proficient actress, she also is a limited one. She continues her gamine rôle, half woman, half child, artful, artless, and I, for one, want her to grow up and be her age. I'm a little tired of finding Gemma, with variations, in every part she plays, including Rosa- lind in "As You Like It," and now in this story of sophisticated musicians in London, Miss Bergner is skilled in her art; she has rare ability to portray the willfulness and confusion of the character, and everything she says does seem to come from deep, inner understanding, but there is something lacking just the same. I think it is sex-appeal. There is some- thing there talking about her and little that is warm and feminine. However, we see her here as the wife of a violinist and falls in love with his friend, a visiting virtuoso, and their clandestine affair so troubles the wife that she drowns herself in the Thames, leaving behind a pleading note for her husband. Of course there is excellent, penetrating dialogue throughout it, on the part of Romney Brent as Miss Bergner's volatile husband and Raymond Massey as her somber lover. The picture holds, but does not stir.

"A Star Is Born."—United Artists. One of the most adult films as well as the most adult picture of Holly- wood life yet seen, this will live longer than most because it is enter- taining, enlightening and authentic. A virtue that stands out in my mind is its perfect balance. There is not too much of any phase of life in the movie, being a real balance, but this is that is the absence of exaggeration, of bur- lesque. The picture neither white- washes nor glorifies. It is amazing—and admirable—to see that no one con- cerned has lost his perspective. Still another virtue is the fact that the pic- ture isn't overcrowded with characters and incidents. It really is a simple story—and not what one expects. We have a small-town girl who becomes a movie "find," marries a star and as her career advances, his goes down and down until he ends it with suicide, died being the cause of it all. Fredric March plays this character superbly. His acting has wit and keenness, depth and understanding, fulfilling those two performances of his which always stand out in my mind as his best, in "The Royal Family of Broadway" and "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde." Janet Gaynor surpasses herself, too, and looks winsome and lovely in Techni- color that is more restrained and un- expected than the screen has ever given us. If she is not one of our finest and subtlest actresses I don't know who is but excellent will deny the picture the same rating.

"The Woman I Love."—RKO. This only goes to show us that even fine actors cannot give us a fine picture when it isn't given to them in the first place. Paul Muni could never slight a rôle but Miriam Hopkins can and does. And in the same month that she per- forms brilliantly in "Woman Chases Man," the story concerns them is a trite War yarn. Probably it had psychological undertones and what not but I couldn't get it and as a film it is mildly undistinguished, although it is grimly serious and every one suffers. But you don't care. Mr. Muni is the French pilot, Louis Hayward is his young friend also in the service. Mr. Muni speaks lovingly of his wife at home, Mr. Hayward dwells glowingly upon the beauty and allure of his inamorata in Paris. It develops that Miss Hopkins is all things to both men. Mr. Hayward makes this painful discovery on his furlough when, after a rendezvous with his sweetheart, he delivers Mr. Muni's letter to his wife—and Madame Hopkins enters the drawing-room. Tableau! The conclusion is abrupt and obscure although one is supposed to wonder if Mr. Muni knows about Miss Hopkins' infidelity after Mr. Hayward is conveniently killed in action. Miss Hopkins snubs her rôle, if you know what I mean, and annoys by dressing in modern clothes while other women in the cast are costumed as of twenty years ago.

"Love From a Stranger."—United Artists. Ann Harding will give you a taste of that quality she lost in recent pictures and Basil Rathbone will hold you in a vise of horror and suspense in this British film. With two Hollywood stars, a scenario written by Frances Marion and the director also an American, the set-up is unusual for an English picture and the result is excellent. Consider the unusual story, Miss Harding is a business girl who wins a huge lottery, quarrels with her fiancé and meets an ingratiating stranger whom she marries. He takes her to a remote house in the country and gradually it is apparent that he means to murder her as he has murdered his other wives. For it develops that he is a psychopathic maniac who preys on women who are tired of a humdrum existence, marries them and obtains possession of their money. A crude procedure, but not as the play is written and not, by a long shot, as Mr. Rathbone and Miss Harding act it. Every word and gesture, every thought even, gradually reveals character and leads up to the unbearable climax when, alone in the house, the wife faces her husband with full knowledge of what is in his mind. How she outwits him, reduces him to智能的 conjecture, is ingenious and terrific. You must see this if you can stand strong fare.

"Woman Chases Man."—United Artists. That serious-minded producer, Samuel Goldwyn, makes an excursion into goofy comedy. It is mad, utterly mad, as carefree as Mardi Gras, and as expert as any of his other notable pictures. The fun is unflagging, laughter is virtually continuous and you must have sharp ears to catch all the dialogue under the concatenation of mirth that rises from those around you. I found it so at the public preview that I attended. Had it not been a public showing I might have thought that the critics present were charged with what Walter Winchell calls giggle water beforehand. Everybody bubbled. To tell you what it is about is beyond me. The picture is one of unexpected incident, skyrocketing wit and convulsing action rather than an ordered plot—not to mention original characters. Enough to say that Miriam Hopkins maneuvers to get Joel McCrea's signature to an agreement. Finance, the father's crazy scheme, that Miss Hopkins is an architect, Mr. McCrea a millionaire, and Charles Winninger his parent who cannot be trusted to resist investing in gadgets. There are others involved in a hurly-burly farcical proceeding that defy description. And believe me when I say that Miss Hopkins is a priceless comedienne, Mr. McCrea plays the somewhat dull young man to perfection and Mr. Winninger is, as everyone should know by now, one of the great comedians of our day. He proves it anew in this.

"The Prince and the Pauper."—Warners. Mark Twain's famous story, beloved of juveniles everywhere, has this unique point in its screen representation: the title rôles are played by twins for the first time. Billie and Bobby Mauch are so alike in feature, physique and voice that the prank that places Tom Canty, a beggar boy on the throne of England, and sends Edward Tudor, heir of Henry VIII, to fend for himself among thieves and murderers, is believable. They can scarcely be told one from the other. It is a fascinating tale of confused identities, but somehow is not as exciting on the screen as it is in the book.

ELEANOR POWELL is entirely from the Greek and means a little torch. Both names are variations of two other common names, Eleanor is equivalent to Helen, meaning torch, and Powell is a different spelling of Paul, meaning small, or little.

HENRY FONDA is synonymous with the ward innkeeper. Henry is from old high German, and means the head, or chief, of a house. Fonda is Spanish for a hotel or inn.

Betty E.—I don’t like to disillusion you, but I understand that any number of our movie heroes get permanent waves. You may rest assured it isn’t their own vanity that makes them do it. In most cases the studio suggests it as an improvement in their screen appearance. I am unable to say whether Fred MacMurray is included in this group. But even a person with straight hair is able to put a wave into it, if he so desires, without actually getting a permanent.

Helen Marie.—I have no record of the name of the late Ross Alexander’s daughter by his first wife. “Here Comes Carter” was first called “The Tatler.” You might write to Warner Brothers Publicity Department, 321 West 44th Street, New York City, and ask them if

NEXT MONTH: WHAT STARS DOES THE PUBLICTHAT'S TO SEE?
I was riding on the top of a Fifth Avenue bus. Yes, sitting there all clumped up, worrying about how I could squeeze a new budget-shop hat out of my poor little old salary. Then it happened. A fur coat landed out of the sky right in my lap. And what a coat. Not lapin or Kolinsky, not even mink, but real movie-star sable. Imagine a million dollars floating into your office window and you'll know just about how I felt. Naturally, when I recovered enough to ring the bell and get off the bus, I hurried right back to see where it came from. I knew it had to go back. After all, twenty-dollar-a-week stenos don't keep sable coats.

Mr. Ball buys a hat...

I went back to where the bus was when the coat fell on me. And I stood there holding it, hoping whoever was tossing sable coats out of windows would come and claim it. Then I met Mr. Ball. Mr. Ball was a big man who looked as if he owned the world. His face was red kind of like he was angry. He tipped his hat and said, "Young lady, do you like that coat?" I thought the world had gone completely mad. "Well," he went on, "keep it then. I'd rather see somebody wear it who can appreciate it. But you need a new hat. Something's happened to yours, hasn't it?" I took off my little ancient felt and, sure enough, the coat had hit it, and it was squashed in worse than ever. Well, it's unbelievable. Mr. Ball just took my arm and shoved me into the swankiest hat shop on the Avenue and bought me a glorious new hat. "There," he said, "You look fine. Goodbye."

I get a town car

But this was only the beginning. Here I was, Mary Smith, with a beautiful new sable coat and a beautiful new Paris bonnet, and before you could say Jack Robinson another amazing thing happened. A little man you got hit on the head with sable coat! How would you feel?

I MEET MY DREAM PRINCE...

And yet the most wonderful thing of all I haven’t even mentioned. My dream prince. Suddenly there he was, grinning at me, and wearing not any fancy prince charming clothes, just an ordinary gray suit. But he had a smile like all the best story book lads and he told me he loved me, me, Mary Smith...

But Mary’s told you enough. Did she have to go back to pounding the old typewriter, punching the old time clock? Or did her series of amazing lucky breaks end happily for Mary? You’ll find the answer in Paramount’s “Easy Living,” the grandest picture of the summer, starring Jean Arthur in her sweetest role as little Mary Smith, Edward Arnold as Old Mr. Ball, and dashing Ray Milland as her dream prince.

I MAKE A MILLION...

But, as if all this wasn’t enough to make me keep pinching myself, a very serious minded gentleman in a derby bow in front of me and asks me if it’s all right for him to invest a few hundred thousand dollars for me. And before I can even think of a sensible answer like “No,” he’s invested or done something with his dream money. For he comes back to tell me I’ve just made a million dollars. Me, Mary Smith, living in the ritziest hotel in town, wearing sable and silk and having chauffeurs and butlers and valets and florists and masseuses bow to me as if I were a queen... and now I’m told I’m worth a million dollars.

WHAT THE FANS THINK

Hideous Make-ups.

WHAT is wrong with the make-up men of Hollywood? They seem intent upon blighting out every semblance of beauty from the screen by covering every actress's face with a horrid mask of make-up.

When I saw "The General Died at Dawn," I thought Madeleine Carroll the loveliest creature on the screen. But, alas, it wasn't long until the "artists" began brandishing their paintbrushes and soon Miss Carroll looked as she did in "On the Avenue." Her mouth was painted almost from nose to chin and her eye make-up was dreadful.

Jean Harlow's exaggerated eyelashes are ridiculous over her tiny eyes. In "Quality Street," Katharine Hepburn was infinitely more attractive in those scenes where lip rouge was not used in such abundance that her mouth photographed black. Jean Arthur is another star whose beauty is marred by excessive use of lipstick. Likewise Joan Bennett and Sylvia Sidney. It must be the Martha Raye influence.

Unfortunately, I'm afraid nothing can be done for Loretta Young's mouth, but attention need not be drawn to it since it is her poorest feature. On the other hand, Joan Crawford's make-up in "The Last of Mrs. Cheyney" was a delightful revelation. Never before has Miss Crawford been more beautiful. Her eyelashes were not absurdly long, and moderation was used in applying lipstick. And bravo to Joan for keeping her eyebrows where they should be and as they should be!

Simone Simon appeared to better advantage in "Seventh Heaven" than in her previous pictures for she did not look as though she had any make-up on at all. That is the effect that should be striven for by all those who apply cosmetics.

I might add that I think the worst point of all is on Garbo's eyes. The effect may be different but it adds about ten years to her appearance.

Get wise to yourselves, you make-up men. You've made beauties of many plain-looking girls and you deserve credit for that; but in trying to create striking effects, please don't make caricatures of the stars.

Ellen Hendrickson.

Los Angeles, California.

The make-up experts of Hollywood are taken to task by Ellen Hendrickson for spoiling Madeleine Carroll's natural beauty by overdoing their passion for alteration. Jean Harlow, Katharine Hepburn, and Greta Garbo are other victims of too much make-up, she says.
What the Fans Think

The two Garbo issues of Picture Play bored one beyond words. I respect our editor's opinions and certainly seek to change no one's views on the subject of Garbo's acting ability, but I belong to the vast majority of American fans who must remain outside the pale.

We remember that she was fanfared into this country ten or twelve years ago, enjoyed a brief sensation, failed to deliver, and has only been kept alive by clever press-agent plugging ever since. MGM is notable for that.

Greta Garbo is definitely a headachy hangover from the silent slitters, and it amazes me to see her continually given roles far beyond her depth. It is irritating, also, to hear a handful of Americans who still prefer to believe that our country is in its savage state, profess to consider her a great artist. And worst of all, bolster their arguments with the opinions of Max Reinhardt and some of MGM's preparation expert foreign importations. This, to an independent American, is a stench in the nostrils.

I find it difficult to sympathize with any extolling of Fredric March, who certainly ever knew "Anthony Adverse." He and Garbo should always play together, for if either of them can act, then I think Martha Raye and Andy Devine should be singing at the Metropolitan Picture Play Fan.

This Year's Kisses.

In watching the stars kiss, these thoughts come to mind:

Robert Taylor: gentle and tender.

William Powell: a bit airy and seemingly ashamed of the emotion.

Clark Gable: assured; positive the lady could refuse nothing.

Robert Montgomery: playful but sincere.

Nelson Eddy: under control.

Garbo: spiritual surrender.

Joan Crawford: starved for love.

Jean Harlow: revolting.

Charles Boyer: dazed with the wonder of it all.

Claudette Colbert: purring.

Rosalind Russell: teasing but impressioned.

Leslie Howard: stingy but sweet.

John Boles: respectable.

Franchot Tone: no fooling.

Loretta Young: too ready, willing and able.

Jealous of Garbo?

Norbert Lusk is right when he laments the ignorance of the Academy in not showing any inclination to give Garbo the annual award. Are they made of stone? Do they worship only the sexy, wise-cracking type in whom there is no depth? Are they afraid of Garbo? Or are they jealous?

Beyond a shadow of a doubt, Garbo is the most fascinating genius the world has ever known. Is she, like Columbus, Emily Dickinson, Rembrandt, and many others, doomed to live unrewarded the highest praise?

In this civilized era should we be ashamed of neglecting a genius. I suggest they kick out the members on the Academy and fill it with those who are emotionally mature and mentally capable.

Let the Academy members take their "It Happened One Night" and live with it forever. We will take art.

Another Angle.

I AM usually of a pretty mild disposition, but, as a Britisher, that letter of Mrs. W. G. Bassett's in May Picture Play Burns me up.

She brings up the old story about producers employing foreign players. I wonder if she realizes the percentage of profits the American producers derive from the showing of their pictures in foreign countries. I advise her to make inquiries about this matter before she writes any more such letters. Furthermore, if American producers want to fire all foreign players, it is quite all right with us. We can easily ban their pictures. It is easy to see who would get the worst of the deal. Without any foreign players in them, American pictures wouldn't be worth going to.

Mrs. Bassett also makes a crack about our ex-king and an American girl. Does she consider a twice-divorced woman a "girl"? If that hawk-faced woman is a "typical American girl," then America is welcome to her. We have made it pretty plain that we don't want her, and if we were to meet the "girl" in question face to face, I would tell her so. I suppose according to some American standards, a once-divorced woman is a "child," a twice-divorced woman is a "girl," and a woman who has never been divorced is an idiot. I say according to some American standards because I admire lots of Americans in many ways, but their silly, childish, spiteful newspaper prattle, especially during the last six months, makes me sick and has created a lot of ill-feeling in Canada. Personally, I think that what happened was the best thing that could have happened and I for one am glad that we have a family man on the throne now.

Doesn't Make Sense.

As an ardent music lover, I am intensely interested in the treatment which Hollywood's current problem children, the opera stars, are receiving. And, in my opinion, the whole system is just plain screwy.

Strange as it may seem, there are thousands of people who attend pictures starring opera stars expecting (and hoping) to hear opera. And what happens? In Grace Moore's last two pictures, operatic artists have been conspicuous by their absence: Lily Pons had one very short sequence in "That Girl from Paris" and Lily's Swarthout has never sung a standard operatic role in a picture.

"Why?" asks a disappointed public.

"Mr. and Mrs. Average Fan don't want highbrow music, and will not patronize films in which it is too much emphasized," replies Mr. Producer.

And that is supposedly that.

But what of Jeannette MacDonald? Consistently this star sings opera, opera, and more opera, and obviously the public doesn't boycott the pictures because of this. Now, although Miss MacDonald is unsurpassed in operetta and light-opera roles, her voice is neither strong enough nor sufficiently trained for the more difficult arias; past performances have shown this to be true. She may be a potential Flagstad—but not yet.

Meanwhile, her costar, Nelson Eddy, an operatic baritone of Number One rank, stands by and listens, and the Foreigners, Indeed!

LOOKING through the May issue I happened on Mrs. Bassett's diatribe against "foreigners."

Letters like that make me sore. They are stupid and show an intolerable kind of ignorance. Where would this country be if it were not for so-called foreigners?

Where would "Rembrandt" be without Laughton, or "Good Earth" without Rainer? And many, many more I could mention if I'd take time to look them up. Where would literature be without Shakespeare, science without P. T. Barnum, music without Beethoven? "Foreigners." Indeed! Go on down the line, Mrs. Bassett, and keep quiet.

And while I am at it, why not keep our own American actors home? Why should foreign countries allow them to make pictures there?

Provincialism like that is hard to swallow, Mrs. Bassett. D. E. SWANSON.

Only One Garbo.

I HAVE been a reader of Picture Play for many years and from time to time have read many unkind and vicious remarks about the stars and long wanted to air my grievances, but never got to it. After reading Mrs. W. G. Bassett's letter denouncing foreigners, and, above all, wishing that Garbo would go back to Sweden where she could be appreciated, I could resist no longer.

She begins by saying that King Edward gave up the throne for an American, but having some English blood in my veins, I am loath to say what I think on that score which, however, is beside the point in using him for an argument, Mrs. Bassett, you have contradicted yourself.

I agree with you that there are many handsome boys and beautiful girls but the fact remains that there is only one Garbo who not only has physical beauty but beauty of character and soul, and while there are legions of males and females of every color and creed who adore her, she won't have to go home until she gets good and ready. Robert Taylor was cast with her because it was his opportunity to play a man's role with a genius. And where, may I ask, in all the world is there an actress who could have interpreted the role of Marquise with as much love, pathos, and heartrending drama as did Garbo?

Also, without casting aspersions on Mr. Taylor's acting, do you think for one moment he could have given the musingly sensitive performance he did without the aid of the superb acting of Garbo? I doubt it. And the reason you couldn't understand her is because the English language is ordinarily so badly butchered that Garbo's perfect diction, sparkling inflection, and dramatic eloquence confused you.

To the few of you who either through prejudice, jealousy, or plain ignorance won't let yourselves like or appreciate her, you don't have to go to the theater with the legions of us who look forward with joy to seeing her. I am sure you will never be missed. Moreover, she has the acclaim of almost every dramatic critic, leading playwright, actor, and actress, and from those who have the pleasure of working with her there comes nothing but the highest praise and admiration.

Watch Craig Reynolds!

I'VE been waiting patiently each month for some mention of that up-and-rapidly-coming star, Craig Reynolds, in this department. To date nothing has happened, so I hasten to break the silence.

Craig Reynolds has everything—you've heard that before—but never was it meant quite so sincerely. He is almost too hand-some, without being pretty. He couples his looks with plenty of talent, an outstanding personality, a grand boyish grin, and a disarming friendliness.

The fact that he has been such an awful "meany" in so many pictures has probably scared the fans away a bit, but wait until you glimpse him in his latest, "The Footloose Heiress." Living in Hollywood and being fortunate enough to have access to the studios, gives me an opportunity to see things before they reach the rest of the world. I've watched Craig work on this picture, and I've seen rushes, and believe you me, you'd go for that boy! JEAN BETTY HUBER.

IN April Picture Play, Marie O'Neill gets on a vinegar jag and swats some stars she dislikes—ten in all, and she mentions five that she likes, her aver-sions outshining her favorites two to one.

She is disgusted at Jean Harlow's "cheap roles," and "stupid expression when she tries to look pretty." Jean can't select her roles, but she puts life, character, charm, and good humor into them, never "daring cheapness" to an impartial eye. And she doesn't have to "attempt to look pretty." She is naturally so beautiful and charming that she couldn't look otherwise if she tried. Marie, your imagination is playing tricks on you and

What has happened to Elissa Landi? I don't believe there ever was an actress that has succeeded in acting herself into oblivion more surely than she has. Being too sure of oneself is a fault that brings its own penalties, and in the case of Miss Landi that penalty was severe indeed.

Jeanette's Sparkle.

It seems to me that one of the most beautiful performances by one of the most beautiful people on the screen was given by Jeanette MacDonald in "Maytime." She has a flower-like face, and a spirit as gay and charming as a child's laughter.

No wonder they call her "lovely." There's an exquisite quality about her, for which she never seems to have to strive, as do so many players. It isn't just breeding; several others have that. It isn't just beauty; one can name at random several famous beauties who are always good to look at on the screen. It isn't just charm; a few others have a good deal of that delightful quality. It's a subtle combination of the three, with an added quick-silver sparkle that one cannot name. At any rate, it comes straight out of the screen and catches the hearts and spirits of the audience, and makes them respond to her own emotions in an astonishing fashion.

What is the trouble with foreign stars, Mrs. Bassett? What is the trouble with Simone Simon, Greta Garbo, Luise Rainer? Perhaps Simone's pout annoys you; or Garbo's poise; or Rainer's emotionalism. Anyway, you didn't say, "I wish Garbo would go home and take the rest of these foreigners with her." I cannot agree; these foreigners are the best actresses we have.

What the Fans Think

I M with Mrs. W. G. Bassett of Toledo, Ohio, one hundred per cent in wanting our own boys and girls in preference to foreign actors and actresses, whose English is so often a poor imitation of what is said or, rather, what is trying to be said. I, too, am particularly referring to Simone Simon.

Constance Bennett and Janet Gaynor both have always been favorites of mine, but even their charming personality did not overcome Simone spoiling "Ladies in Love" with her idiotic neck-stretching and broken English. I'm sure one of our own girls playing the same part would have made it one of the most entertaining pictures of the year.

Yes, we have plenty of talented boys and girls—at least they can speak English as we can understand it. And why give those foreign players our money to take out of our country? There's Garbo hoarding her thousands, and when she retires we can wager it won't be in America. And I have yet to understand why her art is so great and valuable.

Of course, it's folks like us that keep shows going, but I wouldn't care to see any more of Simone if the show was free. I fail to contact her personality, so I say "Scat" to her.

Our Foreign Sisters.

Since childhood I have been a devoted reader of Picture Play, and I have always been interested in the letters from fans. But never, until I read Mrs. W. G. Bassett's letter from Toledo, Ohio, have I felt the urge to write myself.

I think her disapproval of foreign stars a little unfair, particularly Simone Simon. I saw Simone in "Seventh Heaven," and I wept with her and smiled with her. I saw the show three times, and came out of the theater with an uplifted feeling, a greater faith in God, and a strong conviction that love is greater than life, death, ill luck, or anything else that can happen to us.

Simone is such a good actress. She lived the part of Diane, and the audience lived the part with her.

Our stars go to Europe and make money, so do our doctors, lawyers, and people in other lines of work. Why can't people from Europe work over here? We need the help of our neighboring countries, and our neighboring countries need our help to keep the world going around.

We need the real acting of Simone, the inspiration that only Garbo can give, and Luise Rainer's quick smile. They came to us as strangers and won their battle in a fair way. I am standing by them and so are many other fans all over America. Come on, and let's give our foreign sisters a big hand.

Leave Dietrich Alone.

Will certain people never realize that there are still high-minded individuals who admire and worship so beautiful a star as Marlene Dietrich? Why, of all people, should that "Voice from England" resent Miss Dietrich's publicity and still go on reading about it. Anyway, we are glad she is back in Hollywood, away from such absurd people.

And while I'm on the subject, I hope that those very generous ladies from Alabama have a dozen fat birds—buzzards—would be suitable—left for themselves. I'm positive that they are being much too generous to others, and having those nice hungry birds would give them something to do other than criticize Miss Dietrich's eyebrows and hair.

No matter what such avaricious, so-called human beings as Betty M. Swallow and the ladies from Alabama think, there will never be as great or more beautiful an actress as Marlene Dietrich.

O. K. As He Is.

Many of the letters that have appeared in this magazine have been protesting about the thickness of Freddie Bartholomew's English accent, and the perfection of his character portrayals. They seem to want him to act the parts of "Peurold" or "Huckleberry Finn." That is O. K. for I believe that he could act the parts perfectly. But they seem to forget that the reason for his popularity is his perfectness and unique accent; they seem to forget that there are many other boys who can act the parts of average American boys such as "Peurold" and "Huckleberry Finn" roles are, but that there is only one boy

What the Fans Think

The patient becomes violently abusive about the actress who is trying to prove her right to the title, and this is followed by the verbal remark, “Carole Lombard could have played that part much better!” My friends have been embarrassed lately by this attitude on viewing “The Last of Mrs. Cheyney” and “Personal Property” with me.

I must admit this afflication is of more or less recent date. It cropped up a few years ago when “Twentieth Century” was released. I attributed it to John Barrymore’s coaching. “White Woman” and “Rumba” did not alter my opinion. Carole began the breakdown of my forces with “My Man Godfrey,” and completed the destruction with “Swing High, Swing Low.” Dear Carole had finally lost her three stock gestures—raised eyebrow, set lower lip, and folded arms, and become an emotional actress. She had already proved herself a sensational comedienne.

Carole is not coiffure and clothes-conscious, like her glamorous rival, Lombard’s hair is always becomingly the same. Her clothes are smart but subdued by her own personality. You are not aware of them as you are with Crawford, to the exclusion of characterization.

Aye, there’s the rub! For years Joan held me under her spell. I defended her against all comers. I always thought Joan would some day repeat her splendid performance in “Grand Hotel.” Forget, as she did there, the coiffure, the clothes, the camera angles and really throw herself into a part. I suffered through “I Live My Life,” “The Gorgeous Hussy,” “Love on the Run,” and “The Last of Joan Crawford,” or was the name “Mrs. Cheyney”?

In the latter her newest hair madness merely accentuated a face so white and drawn I decided she was fading physically as well as literarly. Somehow I couldn’t imagine Joan squashing a hideous panama hat on her head and prancing about with careless disregard of appearance as Carole did in “Swing High, Swing Low.” All this has convinced me that fans are not fickle from choice but from sheer exasperation. I’m weary of defending Joan while waiting for her to be an actress.

Marcia Ralston, who looks a little like Merle Oberon, will be seen next in Dick Powell’s “The Singing Marine.”

I feel a faint sadness and disappointment over Joan’s failure to fulfill her promise. If her fans would stop coddling her, as I did, with praise of her beauty and charm, and help her to remember that she is no actress, she might get mad and do something about it.

But if she continues in these frothy pieces she will soon satiate all her fans as she has this one. Too much candy is bad for the digestion.

Clark Gable is a man’s man, and Robert Taylor is a handsome one. Ronald Colman has a delightful charm, and Charles Laughton has amazing histrionic ability. Wallace Beery possesses a great deal of the down-to-earth naturalness of the late Will Rogers, and Paul Muni submerges his personality in every character he portrays. Victor McLaglen has terrific power in his acting, and George Raft is very smooth and polished.

Bing Crosby’s rooster lies down and goes to sleep, roller skates, and crows on signal, so they say. He even studies the script of “Double or Nothing,” with Mary Carlisle and Bing, if you can believe what you see.
LET'S call Bette Davis before the curtain this month and give her a rousing salvo of respect and admiration. I'll lead it because I know I am speaking for many who are only waiting for the word. They know, as I do, that Miss Davis hasn't received nearly enough acknowledgment of the actress she is, nor has she been fully recognized for her spirit and courage. She is one of the most extraordinary persons in pictures, one of the few real actresses in the younger group and, in my opinion, will be generally acclaimed a box-office leader in the next year or so. Especially if she keeps up at the rate she is going, and there is no doubt that she will.

LATEST of her proofs of high talent is in "Kid Galahad." I urge every admirer of Miss Davis—every quasi-admirer and every skeptic—to see it. Whether or not you have been entertained by prize-fight melodramas in the past, see this one and thrill to the exception. Exciting though the slugging is, you will find Miss Davis's acting—which does not include fighting but, rather, is notably restrained and low-keyed—as charged with emotional impact as every blow struck in the ring. Depending not at all on hardness for emphasis, as she did in "Marked Woman," she plays instead a sympathetic character, a woman who gives up the man she loves without a quiver of self-sacrifice because she knows the girl he prefers is more worthy of him. Miss Davis is as honest in her appeal for sympathy as she is in portraying the negative aspects of character. And that honesty is the keynote of her success as an actress and a person.

SHE is not intent on flattering camera angles, studied attitudes and sculptured hair waves, but on the character she is representing. If that character has spent a night in jail, as we saw in "Marked Woman," Miss Davis does not emerge as if from a session with Elizabeth Arden. She feels like the devil and looks it! If, as in "Kid Galahad," she is hostess at a three-day drinking party, with leaders of the fight racket and their women as her guests, Miss Davis conducts herself according to the environment as she understands it. She does not affect elegance and ask you to believe that she is pure and circumspect because she is the heroine of the picture; that she just happens to be mixed up with a rough crowd. She makes you feel that she "belongs."

THIS is a realistic age. Picture-goers are part of it. That is one of the reasons why I think that Bette Davis, because of the courage and realism of her acting, will go farther in the future than many of our romantic heroines.

MUSIC-LOVING fans who protest that Nelson Eddy should sing operatic arias on the screen, that Jeanette MacDonald sings too many of them, that full-length operas should be photographed and that—we mustn't forget this music-lover—Bing Crosby has the greatest voice in the world—these ardent fans have overlooked one source of beautiful music that has charmed the public for generations. I refer to the melodies and lyrics of Sir William Gilbert and Sir Arthur Sullivan. No reader of Picture Play has urged Hollywood producers to film the immortal operettas of Gilbert and Sullivan, yet they are known all over the world and have entertained greater audiences than some of the standard operas. They require exceptional skill in singing and recitation, in pantomime and orchestration. More, they are loved by a large public who see them over and over again, hand them down, so to speak, to their children and their grandchildren.

THAT progressive new company, Grand National, has taken all this into consideration and stolen a march on all other producers. Grand National is the first to present Gilbert and Sullivan on the screen. Wisely, they have not attempted to film one of the operettas in its entirety. That will come later. But they give more than a taste of several. Cautiously refraining from depending solely upon the operettas, they have combined excerpts with an everyday story which climaxes with much of the first act of "The Mikado." If you are immune to the wit and charm of Gilbert and Sullivan, you are asked to be satisfied with the story of "The Girl Said No." If you regard that as inconsequential, you are offered Gilbert and Sullivan for artistic satisfaction. One or the other is sure to qualify. Of course, this is only an experiment and if it creates comment, wins applause and support, undoubtedly we shall have more complete representations of these famous compositions on the screen. Meanwhile, to Grand National goes credit for an innovation that cannot fail to bring joy to many and it may be the beginning of a new vogue in screen musicals. I think it would be welcome after the surfeit of Puccini and Gounod as motivation of the heroine's triumphant first appearance at the Metropolitan in the usual film with an operatic obbligato.

NOTHING that has appeared in these columns has brought so many responses from readers as my tribute to Garbo, first for her "Camille" and more recently because of the failure of the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences to recognize her genius as evidenced in twenty-one pictures. Letters have arrived from almost every State and from several foreign countries, the writers of some disagreeing with me in my estimate of the actress, but most of them sharing my enthusiasm and applauding my defense of her qualifications for the Academy's annual award. Because interest in Garbo is proved to be more widespread than her detractors realize, I quote hereewith one of the most beautiful letters as follows:

"My admiration for you as a critic has increased tremendously because of your understanding and appreciation of the greatness of Garbo. We who for years have knelt humbly before the shrine of the rare and amazing talent of this person; we who have found in her all the beauty of great poetry; all the rich and sweeping inspiration of a mighty symphony; all the gentle, unassuming tenderness of a painting by a master: all the mystery of the sad sea-horizons at sunset, do indeed salute you.

"That a smug group of individuals with only a gilded statuette to offer have so lightly passed over the greatest living actress is, to say the least, most regrettable. The intelligent of course realize that the reflection is not upon Garbo or her incomparable histronic ability, but rather upon those who so pompously call themselves 'The Academy.' Should she ever acknowledge their recognition by deigning to accept the immovable statuette it would be greatly to their honor as a group—for Garbo, not the Academy, will live in the history of this age.

"Garbo's 'Camille' is a magnificent achievement—liquid, flowing and as divinely beautiful as Liszt's immortal 'Liebestraum.'"

EVEN more revealing than this all-embracing tribute from a fan is the statement contained in a letter from a famous star who says: "I didn't know that anybody else felt about Garbo as I do. Out here (Hollywood) people leave the room when I mention her name, and not too politely, either."

If you require further proof of Garbo pre-eminence, I can offer nothing!

THIS is especially for those readers who write to The Oracle requesting news—any news—of Ramon Novarro. Often as they have been reminded in these columns, their loyalty to their favorite exceeds in longevity and undimmed ardor that of any other group for any other star past or present. They will rejoice in the news that Ramon is ending his absence from the screen. He is as optimistic about his return as if he were making a first appearance and apparently finds humor in the title of his new picture, "She Didn't Want a Sheik," which Republic is producing. Knowing nothing of the story, it is obvious that the title predates a modern comedy and that, you will agree, is exactly what Ramon's admirers have long wanted him to do. His sense of humor, his feeling for the right word in the right place, his picturesque appearance and his romantic charm, not forgetting that idealism which perhaps more than any other quality has endeared him to those loyal fans of his—this is what we are hoping he will embody in his new venture, and we are wishing for him all the good influences of his saints and his heavenly stars in bringing it about.
MELVYN DOUGLAS, Marlene Dietrich, and Herbert Marshall form a triangle of dramatic surprises in "Angel." Mr. Marshall is a British diplomat, Miss Dietrich his neglected wife, and Mr. Douglas the friend who becomes a lover. And Ernst Lubitsch returns to direct them. BENJAMIN FRANKLIN was the first American columnist. Walter Winchell is the last. There'll never be another like either of them. In Ben's day the homely axioms of his "Poor Richard's Almanack" were the copy-book precepts which guided the nation's youth. In Walter's—and Roosevelt's—era the whole kit 'n' kaboondle of old saws and whiskered wisdom are as obsolete as the schottische in a ten-cent tango dansant.

Consider, for instance, the crack that "Silence is golden," which ancestral grandmas stitched into samplers. Had Walter followed that advice he'd have been lolling on the relief rolls. But Winchell has reached a flood tide on a deluge of words which the alchemy of the times has transmuted into dollars.

For the written words of his syndicated column he garners a harvest of some $80,000 a year. And he can increase this at any time he wishes to type tripe for outside publication. The words that tumble helter-skelter from his lips during the fevered moments of his Sunday broadcasts enable him to gather in the sheaves to the tune of $156,000 or thereabouts.

For saying his sides in 20th Century-Fox's "Wake Up and Live," the lengthiest of which is sixteen lines, Darryl Zanuck was happy to donate $75,000 to the Winchellian exchequer. Add 'em all together and you'll see that Mrs. Winchell's brightest bay will pay income tax on a minimum of $311,000 for 1937! "Silence is golden?" Phaey!

so much that there weren't enough in the language. So he made more, which to-day are a recognized part of the living tongue we speak. No need to recount them. They're as familiar as a baby's liping "Ma-ma." And while you read, Winchell's making more. Like the proverbial suckers, they're being born every minute. Yes, Walter was a philologist before he knew what the word meant.

Just forty now, the far-famed phrase-framer looks five years less. He is lithe, blithe and slender. His hair has been whitening for years and now adds distinction to his appearance. His eyes, most memorable of his features, are an electric blue, and an inward dynamo keeps them sparking, save when some dullard's conversation causes a short circuit. Then his gaze is far-off as his vaulting thought.

That he is a good listener is evidenced by the reams of news he gleaned. That he is a good talker will be vouched for by any who have heard. When he can learn he stays still. When he feels that his own conversation is more interesting than that of his companions, he unleashes a rapid-fire patter of ideas and anecdotes. His greeting, invariably, is "What's new?" And you'll notice that the first and last letters of the query make W. W.

For a dozen years, belittlers have been saying that Winchell is a passing vogue. Yet he and the presses of his paper keep on rolling along while Cannon (Bishop), Coll (Vincent) and Coolidge (Colvin), Willebrandt (Mabel) and Walker (Jimmy), Hauptmann, Hoover, a thousand names that once filled the Winchell column and the public eye have gone with the wind.

Walter wasn't born famous. He was born to blush unseen among a multitude of underprivileged kids spawned upon the sidewalks of New York. His mother's name was Bakst. His father was a Winchel—with one "I." An electrician at a Chicago theater added the second "I" to Walter's name when, in spelling it out in bulbs on the marquee, he mistook a flourish for a letter.

Winchell, however, has been known by another name. He was the Lawrence of a trio of singing ushers in the Imperial Theater who were known as McKinley, Stanley, and Lawrence. McKinley and Stanley were Eddie Cantor and George Jessel. Walter's thin, bayish tenor arose from the orchestra of

"THINK FAST, MR. MOTO," has Peter Lorre playing the rôle of a Japanese detective. Disguised as an Armenian rug peddler he discovers a ring of diamond smugglers and traces their leader to the Orient. On the steamer leaving San Francisco also is Thomas Beck, a fellow traveler, son of the owner of the line. At Honolulu, Virginia Field, young adventuress, comes aboard. Because she has talked too much, the girl and boy are bound and gagged.
"BROADWAY MELODY OF 1938" has Eleanor Powell buying a horse named "Lucky Star" at an auction. Robert Taylor, playwright and producer, helps her pay for it. George Murphy is the trainer, and Buddy Ebsen the jockey who rides the horse in the big steeplechase. With the winnings, Bob has enough money to put on his own show, in which every one has a part, including songbird Judy Garland, left.
"STELLA DALLAS" has Barbara Stanwyck in the title rôle. An uneducated millhand's daughter, she marries John Boles, only to discover that they live in worlds apart. Their daughter grows up to be Anne Shirley. A beautiful friendship exists between her and her father which brings them joy during their infrequent visits. However, it is the mother's unselfish sacrifice which is the high light of the story. Left, Alan Hale has become part of the family circle.
"MOUNTAIN MUSIC" has Bob Burns, amnesia victim, running out on a marriage with Terry Walker so that his brother, John Howard, can marry her. In a small town, Bob meets Martha Raye. Meanwhile, Howard has gone on trial for murder. Martha, below, with Dave Robel. Bottom, Rufe Davis.

FURLOUGH
MAUREEN O'SULLIVAN AND ROBERT YOUNG IN "THE EMPEROR'S CANDLESTICKS."
EVERY ONE must admit that "Wake Up and Live" placed Jack Haley on the cinematic map. Not that Mr. Haley needed to be roused out of the slough of despond. He's never had an idle second on his hands since he made his first public appearance at the age of five. Of course, life become furiously agitated when he fled the Haley home for the theatrical bus- tle of Broadway. But of that, anon, sweet nurse.

After the preview of "Wake Up and Live," Hollywood became Haley-conscious. As if the antics of Joan Davis were not enough, Jack gave a jaded audience the time of its life. The town woke up with a sudden jolt to his ability to be funny and also pathetic—that spark of genius in the true comic.

Indeed, Haley could probably step alongside Leslie Howard and John Gielgud as "Hamlet," for the contemplative Dane should, above all else, be pathetic.

I believe Jack thinks he could, too. But he's a comic comedian. Life is a jolly old game. No tragedy for him. No secret sorrows hidden beneath a laugh. He gets too great a kick out of being funny. If he regards himself as good, he fails to admit it, either by plain statement or fancy innuendo. He is too enthusiastic about his friends, and what's of greatest interest at the moment than to speak of Jack Haley, Esq. He has spent his spare time waking up dormant talent in aspiring fellow artists, as you shall see.

Jack loves to talk of his friends. So it seemed quite natural that he should take a letter from his pocket and read portions of what his pal, Fred Allen, has to say here and there. Fred praised "Wake Up and Live," therefore Hollywood was not mistaken. He was glad Jack had had a good story at last, and hoped good stories would continue his way. Something like "Mr. Deeds Goes to Town"—"Which would have suited you fine," Fred added.

"As a writer, Fred could be one of our best humorists," Jack stated, quite seriously, as he replaced his pal's breezy epistle. "Of course, he makes too much money acting to give it up."

The SUPREMACY

THIS KEEN DISCUSSION OF LEADING MEN IS PROVOCATIVE

It's been a banner year for male stars in Hollywood. No less than five have risen to dizzying heights, and many, many more have caught the raving eyes of feminine fans.

And is Hollywood surprised!

For years the wail has been that box-office male personalities are scarcer than natural eyelashes. This, as you've been told more than once, is a rigid, Mede-and-Persian rule of pictures. The story goes that somehow audiences do not take to stellar actors. It's confirmed by the unquestioned fact that there are only a few men who can support stardom in their own right—even the great male personalities usually ploy an equal terms with women celebrities. And the inference drawn by Hollywood is that this situation lies in the nature of things.

There's something in it, to be sure. Acting has always been primarily a woman's game. Even in the days of Booth and Irving, it was Duse and Bernhardt, Ellen Terry and Modjeska whom the box office loved. The logical reason for this is, I think, that acting offers more to women than to their brothers and husbands.

What other career is as glamorous and satisfying to the boarding-school miss—or to the gal who leaves Central High for a place behind the five-and-ten counter? The world offers her no business life, which will bring her a star's salary and the adulation of every responsive man in Christendom.

But most men grow up with their eyes not on the spotlight but on fame and fortune in the financial world, in law, medicine, politics. They'll even turn more readily to painting or music than to histrionics, because men need the respect that is offered solid achievement rather than a flash in pictures.

There are exceptions. Films have never locked the collar-odd type, whose beauty fates them from childhood. But it has been found that audiences prefer men who look and behave like men, not actors. And they are precisely the ones who are hard to get held on, because other professions want them, too.

But the world changes. Hollywood jingles its purse, and year by year more exponents of virility blaze the trail to California gold. So that I think the old axiom that male stars must always play second fiddle is headed for the ash heap.

What year has been more exciting, surprising, more

---

What woman star last year achieved success comparable to Gary Cooper's in "Mr. Deeds Goes to Town"? He is the complete actor to-day.

Supreme for six years, Clark Gable continues gayly as a perennial success, the permanent symbol of sex-appeal, content to remain himself.

Charles Boyer is potentially the most magnetic idol the movies have ever known, but he curiously has yet to register heavily as a fan's favorite.
continuously entertaining than the last one? And it has been a year of male supremacy—of the triumph of Robert Taylor, the flashing rise of James Stewart and Tyrone Power. What woman star achieved success comparable to Gary Cooper's in "Mr. Deeds Goes to Town"? What comédienne so convulsed audiences as did William Powell in "My Man Godfrey"? And what year has seen such a rush of patrons to the box office? Picture prosperity is back, and with it the supremacy of the male.
Outstanding phenomenon of the year is, of course, Robert Taylor's tumultuous rush to the top of the heap. Unknown in 1935, he is conceded by every one to-day to have reached the dizziest pinnacle the movies can afford a newcome, and is no longer in danger of being considered a flash in the pan. There isn't a woman in the land unconscious of him, and that, no matter what the critics say, is the final word in popularity.
Sensibly he realizes that unviolled fame brings problems with it, and has set out to overcome the motinée idol handicap, to develop staying power. He works hard at acting, and has successfully survived the incandescent ordeal of ploving opposite Garbo, which almost finished Robert Montgomery's budding career in 1931. With Metro-Goldwyn's faith in him and their loving guidance of his personal and professional life, there is every chance he will survive the period of frenzied adoration which his fans now inflict upon him.
Taylor to-day overshadows every one else. Even those of us who instinctively dislike matinée idols admit that. The clamor of his rise has somewhat obscured the more temperate débuts of James Stewart and Tyrone Power, but with any luck these two will divide in 1937 the interest which was Taylor's alone last year.
Of the t\wo, Power is paramount at the moment. Signed on the strength of his father's name, he is already headed for the heights after a picture career of less than twelve months! The boy must have something, you say, and he does. He has the might of 20th Century-Fox behind him, pushing him for all he is worth. He started with a small role in "Girls' Dormitory" and since then the studio has given him three leads in quick succession. All the world knows of his romance with Sonja Henie, and the Power publicity flows in torrents. This can mean only that his studio is offering him as a rival for Robert Taylor.

Tyrone Power knows the theater's parodoxes. He understands that the only sure formula for continued fame is that of always offering something new.

James Stewart plays each rôle as if he were playing himself. That's all right to-day, when he is riding the crest, but he needs careful handling.

Robert Taylor's tumultuous rush to the top is the outstanding phenomenon of the year. He has reached the dizziest pinnacle possible for a newcomer.
The Supremacy of the Male

I know it means that the next mail will contain kidnap threats, but nevertheless I confidently predict that he will equal and even surpass Taylor. The latter is trying hard to make himself acceptable as an actor, but the good looks which made him stand out may eventually prove a curse. He may grow to depend on them, and on the personality the studio is building for him, rather than on his own effort. And that personality, potent as it is to-day, will eventually grow stale.

There is less danger of this with Power. He, too, has youthful good looks—some say beauty—but is better equipped to withstand the devastating effect they sometimes have on careers. The son of a famous actor, he knows the theater's paradoxes, and his present success follows a long, hard struggle. He understands the seesaw of popularity, and that the long formula for continued fame is that of always offering something new.

A trouper by heritage, he doesn't believe all that is written of him. And best of all, the boy can act—he feels the urge to live up to the standard set by his famous father. His first three leading rôles, in "Ladies in Love," "Lloyd's of London," and "Love is News," all were ludicrously unsuited to him. Forced to hide his admired youthfulness behind the make-up of older men, he miraculously suggested maturity and experience. He has the power to suggest more than his rôles say—a quality necessary for fine acting and one that is still lacking in Taylor.

The third threat of 1937, James Stewart, has suffered curiously slow progress. MGM has recognized his potentialities, but they have been so occupied with furthering Taylor that he has been comparatively neglected. Yet his début in "The Next Time We Love" created a sensation, and with reason.

Stewart's personality is rare on the screen. His naturalness is perfect, and there is something more—an air of candor, of fundamental honesty clings to him, and gives his acting a punch unusual in a youngster. And do the girls like him that way? Ask them!

Why, then, is he still relatively unimportant? I think the answer lies in the very qualities which arrest attention. For Stewart doesn't try to characterize. He acts each rôle as if he were playing himself. That's all right to-day, when he is riding the crest of acclaim, but he needs careful handling for the future. His rôles should be written to reflect his natural talents. The failure of the revived "Seventh Heaven" to stand comparison with the 1927 version suggests that his lack of versatility is a factor requiring consideration.

Though Taylor, Power, and Stewart have dominated the newcomers during the past year, theirs has not been the only male successes, or even the most important. In fact, the greatest hit of 1936 was unquestionably made by established Gary Cooper.

It's been years since any picture has swept the country as did "Mr. Deeds," and I don't hesitate to class Cooper as top-ranking male star—this in spite of Robert Taylor's more sensational career. For Gary is a lasting star. He has survived poor rôles, the condescension of critics, and, most dangerous of all, his refusal to conform to Hollywood.

The discerning have praised his ability from the beginning. Always he has been sincere, forceful, and physically possessed of a panther grace which makes him a perfect camera subject. But with years of success behind him, Gary has grown even beyond the expectations of his admirers and comes to us to-day as the complete actor, authoritative, perceptive, completely in command of his talent. "Mr. Deeds" was a triumph of character, "Desire" a subtle demonstration of his boyish sense of humor. But though both these performances seem the last word to-day, I think we have seen only the beginning. Helped by the intelligent rôles he will inevitably get under his new Samuel Goldwyn contract, I predict that Gary will rule out competition for years to come.

There is only one star on the horizon who might surpass him. I refer to Charles Boyer, to me the supreme romantic actor of the present screen and potentially the most magnetic idol the movies have ever known.

An established success for two years, he curiously has yet to register heavily as a fan's rather than a critic's favorite. Hollywood recognizes and fosters his great talent, but no American rôle has yet projected the electrifying magnetism which astonished Europe in the foreign-made "Thunder in the East."

What Boyer needs is a part in which he can command the attention of the public which is unconsciously waiting for the qualities he has to offer. His subtle talent is at once sophisticated and simple, comprehensible to the majority yet challenging any standard in depth of human understanding. Perhaps "History Is Made at Night," in which he achieves the impossible by making a headwaiter a romantic figure, will awaken the fans to what they have missed. Then let the clamor begin!

Already this summary has listed five objects of feminine adoration, with still no mention of Clark Gable! Does this mean that the man who has been supreme for six years is at last on the down grade? Far from it. Expertly guided by indefatigable MGM, he continues gayly as a perennial success. His finest acting triumphed in "Mutiny on the Bounty," and he lightly pleased the majority in "Wife versus Secretary" and "Love on the Run."

Clark has found his level. Always a positive personality, he no longer strives for esoteric sophistication and is content to remain himself—a welcome self on the screen, where rugged masculinity is still at a premium. The permanent symbol of sex-appeal, his name may be made lustrious by successful acting in the difficult leading rôle of "Parnell"—but whether or no, his popularity remains and will remain at flood-tide.

I thought the last possible word of praise had been meted out to William Powell. His achievement over a period of years has long stamped him as an extraordinary star. But "My Man Godfrey," and "Libeled Lady," force the critic to sharpen his pencil and give finer point to adjectives already well worn.

Always called suave and subtle, Powell's acting to-day positively glitters with perfection. Every detail of pantomime, every syllable of speech, is precise, provocative, and enormously funny. And here lies the secret of his audience appeal. He makes each moment count for stimulus, interest, and entertainment. Handicapped by a small rôle and unattractive make-up, he redeemed even "The Last of Mrs. Cheyney" from its native dullness. A steady success, his future after a long reign is still bright, and his increased ability truly astounding.

Note that with the exceptions of Boyer and Cooper, all the big guns of the year belong either to Metro-Goldwyn or 20th Century-Fox. Of all the studios, Metro seems to have the magic touch when it comes to fostering star material. But Darryl Zanuck's campaign for Tyrone Power may mean that his studio will fight to corral the male star market. If it comes to a battle between the two, we'll see some real fireworks. Fox already has Warner Baxter, and Zanuck is pushing Don Ameche, Michael Whalen, Jack Haley, and Brian Donlevy as fast as schedules will allow.

None of them yet equal Robert Montgomery, Spencer Tracy, or the infrequently seen but tremendously successful Nelson Eddy, who after more than a year's absence is once more on top in "Maytime." But Ameche and Whalen both have already surpassed Francot Tone, who never was given a chance to fulfill his early promise and now seems the stepchild of MGM.

Other studios, recognizing the trend started by 20th Century and Metro, are making haste to jump on the band wagon. There has been a rush to sign up free-lance leading men and to encourage those already on the pay roll. Columbia, casting about for dependables, has signed the pseudo-popular Melvyn Douglas, and given Gary Grant his best opportunity in "When You're in Love." They've also provided the staidly successful Ronald Colman with one of the year's hits in "Lost Horizon." Francis Lederer has been put on contract, but has yet been given nothing to do to confirm the hopes of those who see in him something more elementarily popular than a subtle comedy gift.

At Warners, Dick Powell continues a successful but rigidly patterned path, and George Brent is in nearly every picture the studio makes. Paul Muni, a success in character rôles only, seems a fixture none the less. The studio has quaintly coined "cinema's man of the hour" as a catchphrase to put across the limited talents of handsome Errol Flynn. In spite of his colorful background, though, he doesn't overshadow Humphrey Bogart or the adolescent newcomer, Lee Dixon.

The "new" Universal, desperately striving to conceal its inferiority complex, offers us John Boles, James Dunn, Walter Pidgeon, Kent Taylor, and Louis Hayward. Does this list inspire you to poetry? I thought not.

RKO is almost as completely lacking in names, though Fred Astaire is probably worth more to them than half a MISS TEMPLE IS NOT ONLY THE MOST POPULAR ACTRESS IN THE WORLD. SHE IS ALSO THE UNKNOWING HEAD OF A VAST BUSINESS EMPIRE.

SHIRLEY: A $1,000,000 INDUSTRY

BY JACK SMAILLEY

A VENDER of soft drinks was standing outside the set when Shirley and Gertrude Temple walked past.

"Mom, can we afford a bottle of pop?" Shirley asked.

"I guess we can, precious," twinkled Mrs. Temple.

Shirley could buy the whole pop wagon, of course, but in that innocent question lies the secret to a formula which has kept her unspoiled.

She doesn't know that she is the center of a vast industry worth uncounted millions; that she herself is a million-dollar business.

To keep her that way has cost George and Gertrude Temple a fortune. Until she is old enough to have a firm sense of values, they have refused radio offers which would have paid $250,000 in seven months. Personal appearances for which dizzy sums have been offered are coldly rejected.

The empire of high finance which revolves about Shirley does not make her parents greedy for more. As custodi-
Shirley: A $1,000,000 Industry

...of the most valuable little girl in the world, they long ago became accustomed to dealing in fabulous figures. After a certain point, money takes on a meaningless sound, anyway. They have only one rule: how does it affect Shirley Temple?

Therefore, to dispose of the negative side of finances first, they say “No” to radio because it would take too much of her time despite the fact that Shirley, hearing other children over the air, has begged for a try at it. They turn down personal appearances because if they take one, they have to take others.

But this method is also good business. Exhibitors—sixteen thousand or more in this country—waft prayers of thanksgiving that Shirley isn’t on the air. If she were, they’d play movies to empty houses that night.

And now we’re coming to one of the most fascinating, and least often noted, aspects of S. Jane Temple.

That’s what she signs on her school papers when she wants to tease mom. Her full name is Shirley Jane. But she wouldn’t sign S. Jane to a contract or a commercial product, because all the magic of millions lies in the name of Shirley.

That name, on various commodities, is worth upward of $350,000 a year to its owner.

It is, roughly, four times her salary as a movie star.

And it’s only a tithe of her value to 20th Century-Fox, where she is figured conservatively as forty per cent of their assets.

There you have but the beginning of Shirley’s empire, over which she presides in dimpled unconcern, unwittingly providing bread and butter for ten thousand families.

Let’s thumb through the ledgers for a peek at the manufacturing end of the business, which has nothing to do with her studio or the theaters she fills.

Before Shirley came into prominence, the Soolfield Publishing Company in Akron, Ohio, was a relatively small concern. Now it is a thriving business with outlets over the world distributing books, cut-out paper dolls, bridge scores paying cards, stationery, paint boxes, and crayon boxes.

In one year the paper doll book sold six million copies, a total exceeded by only one other children’s book in history—the story of “Heidi,” which will be Shirley’s next film. Millions of copies at Shirley Temple’s life story, the Temple Story Book, the Temple editions of “The Littlest Rebel” and “The Little Colonel,” and a host of other titles, have been sold.

Forty carloads of paper will come into the plant for an edition of a Temple book. Trace that back and imagine the lumberjacks who led timber for that paper, the mills that gave employment to hundreds, the salesmen and wholesalers and all the army of workers involved, and you’ll begin to guess at the number of dinner pails Shirley fills.

Out on Long Island, the Ideal Novelty Company was a small doll-manufacturing plant until Shirley Temple dolls began to march out there and into the far corners of the world, bringing joy to an endless army of kids. Now it has grown, a new plant has been built, and from many blocks away you can see the huge likeness of Shirley that has been erected not only as an advertisement, but as a monument to a golden-haired child.

In Philadelphia, a company makes underwear, sleeping garments, bath robes, hosiery, footwear, bathing suits, mittens, gloves, hand bags—all with the magic name of Shirley Temple. A great cereal company has her face on a package of breakfast food, in Utica is a soap-making company that flourishes with Shirley soap, in Wheeling they turn out glass mugs and tableware, in Boston there are Shirley Temple shoes, in Minneapolis the General Mills manufacture grocery-store premiums, in the Bronx a company turns out soap-bubble sets, in Jersey City it’s slippers, and so on. Some twenty-five major industries depend on Shirley to help them sell goods and keep people employed.

Should the unthinkable happen and Shirley drop from sight, calamity would visit them all. Therefore large sums of insurance must be carried. Without Shirley, who would buy her dolls? It’s impossible to reckon the indemnities which protect the manufacturers—and provide lucrative incomes to insurance salesmen.

How this industry grew is a story in itself. When the offers began to come in a horde to the Temples, they talked it over with Darryl Zanuck, boss of 20th Century-Fox. Until he took over the studio, such tie-ups had been denied Shirley and she made, in fact, little money.

Zanuck made only one reservation: that he should pass on all connections that the Temples O. K.’d. So far as is known, he has approved all that astute George Temple has himself approved. The studio receives none of this money.

In return, Shirley works for a relatively small salary, compared, let us say, to Mae West. But it’s adequate Shirley’s “Wee Willie Winkie” doll is the latest of innumerable articles from which she derives a greater income than her salary as a star personality.

Sometimes too much happens around here too fast. This month our Grand Central Station blossomed out with a news-reel theater, making it almost as glamorous a haven for fans as the beauty salon at the Hotel Pierre, where just the other day Loretta Young and Myrna Loy found their first opportunity to chat together quietly, or lunch at Sardi's, where you see all visiting he-man stars.

Now you can hang around the gate of the Twentieth Century, watch the arrival of Madeleine Carroll, Cary Grant, or Gale Sondergaard, and then dash in to see the latest news of the world on the screen. If there is a big disaster, coronation scenes, a horse race, or even a particularly good Mickey Mouse, your chance of sitting next to one of the newly arrived stars is very good.

You will hear them saying that the changing of the Buckingham Palace Guard isn't nearly such a marvel of precision as the weekly routines of the Rockettes at Radio City Music Hall.

Gale Sondergaard, arch-villainess of the screen, is crisp and vivid, a most charming person to meet. She should be given a modern rôle after so many costume films.

Eleanor Hunt, left, is trying to decide between a career as actress and one as writer. She has sold several scenarios under the name Cynthia Meade.
Hall. You can scurry over to the Music Hall and find all the hoofers in town pausing in the corridor to try the steps of the Rockettes or of Fred Astaire if his picture is being shown. But you can't linger there.

The one and only Kirsten Flagstad, most divine singer of the day, is recording songs at the Long Island Paramount Studio. Helen Vinson is prowling through antique shops. Cary Grant is receiving friends at El Morocco. Beulah Bondi, trim and tailored and young-looking, is in the Criterion lobby listening to comments of people who have just wept over her in "Make Way For To-morrow." Myrna Loy is buying household gadgets at our largest department store. And you want to play along with all of them.

The Awful Truth.—Walter Wanger who is about to put "52nd Street," our lane of loudest, smokiest, and noisiest cafes into a picture, took a step toward making the film a glamorous fantasy when he hired an author who had never been there. But he counteracted that by sending the director on for a visit.

Harold Young, the director, left fired with a desire to show our night life on the screen as it really is. This is what he found: night-club floors so crowded that people can't dance, they just wiggle; tables so close together that it's just sheer luck if you pick up your own drink in-

Madeleine Carroll, left, says that any woman can be glamorous.

Helen Vinson, above, tried to corner the British antique market. And, despite rumors, her marriage is working out beautifully.

And Kirsten Flagstad, greatest of modern singers, has two numbers in "The Big Broadcast of 1938."

What an Actress Talks About.—It is a severe blow to my pride that after I have set down a literal account of meeting a star for the first time, friends and correspondents ask, "But did you really talk like that? Weren't you bowled over by meeting her in person?"

Well, I was bowled over by meeting that arch-villainess Gale Sondergaard, because she was so charming. And we really talked very little about "Anthony Adverse," "Seventh Heaven," or "The Life of Emile Zola." We sighed over the beauties of the University of Wisconsin campus, where her father is a professor, and over the countryside near Minneapolis, where she lived as a child. We hymned our devotion to old Mr. Rennie of Old Greenwich, Connecticut, who taught us both to ride. Not that he cares. Ruth Chatterton is his favorite pupil of many years ago.

SELF-MADE WOMAN

BY SAMUEL RICHARD MOOK

MARTHA RAYE STARTED OUT IN LIFE WITH NOTHING BUT SOME GOD-GIVEN TALENT AND A GRIM DETERMINATION TO GET SOMEWHERE.

SHE'S in her early twenties and she's what you would call a self-made woman. If ever a girl started out in life with nothing but some God-given talent and a grim determination to get somewhere, that girl is Martha Raye.

Her parents were vaudevillians. Of their talents I know nothing. I only know they never got anywhere—and got there fast. They played the poorest circuits in the business.

Mortho was practically born in a dressing room. Her mother laid off a week in Butte, Montano, to have Mortha and then returned to the act. When she was three years old Martha was inducted into it and she has been appearing before the public ever since.

When her brother Douglas, known to the family as Buddy, was born, Mrs. Raye laid off another week. They were living in the cheapest theatrical hotel they could find. Vaudevillians are notoriously soft-hearted and fellow players supplied the poverty-stricken family with food.

When the week was up and it was time for the act to resume, there was no money to settle the hotel bill and they couldn't leave. They had already played the town in which they were stranded so there was no chance of booking another week there to raise funds to get out of town.

"How did you finally get out of town?" I asked Martha curiously. "The city helped us out," she replied grimly. "At least, they helped us out to the edge of town."

They had a whole trunk filled with kitchen paraphernalia and cooked their meals in their hotel room over a two-burner stove. Doors, windows, vents, and keyholes were carefully stuffed with paper so that no odor of cooking might permeate the halls and give them away. At times the smell of cooking was overpowering in the stuffy rooms they occupied.

She has been to school only three weeks in her entire life. Those three weeks she attended the Professional Children's School in New York. She recalls that Tom Brown was one of her classmates.

The rest of her childhood was spent dodging truant officers. Wherever they played her father and mother arranged with the stage doorman to let them know if a truant officer showed up. Immediately upon being notified they ducked out another entrance and returned later for their baggage.

Whichever education she has, Mortha received from her mother. To-day, while her English is not flowery, it is grammatical.

One hobby, she says, is collecting modern classical phonograph records. It seems strange to hear this girl who has never had any advantages, discuss with knowledge and authority the works of Debussy, Stravinski, Bach, and other composers. She not only discusses them, she knows them and can tell you without hesitation when one of her favorite composers' works is being played.

Martha was engaged to Jerry Hopper, the young man with her on this page, at the time the picture was taken, but Buddy Westmore has since become head man in her life and an early marriage is hinted.

On the opposite page you see the "Oh, Boy! Oh, Boy!" girl dressed up like a prairie flower for her rôle in "Mountain Music," her next picture.
Another hobby is collecting perfumes. She has twenty-seven bottles of different shapes, sizes, and scents.

About the time she was eleven vaudeville petered out and Martha turned her talents to night-club work. She did specialty numbers with Paul Ash's orchestra and finally appeared at Ben Marden's Riviera—a night club on the Jersey side of the George Washington Bridge—where she repeated her act.

It was while she was appearing at the Riviera that she heard Lew Brown was casting a show, "Calling All Stars." Martha sailed down for an audition. She—but let her tell it.

"The room was filled with the most beautiful chorus girls and show girls I've ever seen. Some of them were well known around New York and were making good salaries. Others had sugar-daddies but all of them were dressed to the teeth. In that crowd I looked worse than the ugly duckling. My clothes were neat—and clean—but I hadn't any money to buy outfits like they were wearing and even if I'd had the money I didn't know anything about dressing in those days. I'd never had anything to dress with."

"Finally my turn came. Mr. Brown listened to me while I sang and danced and then he shook his head. The voice and gams are not bad," he said, "but, Jeezes, that face!"

"There's nothing the matter with my face," I told him, "if you get somebody to make me up and give me some decent clothes."

She got the job. In the same cast was Leon Janney. They renewed acquaintance in Hollywood recently and that's how the rumors of their "romance" started.

When "Calling All Stars" finally folded, Mrs. Raye booked Martha for an engagement at the Club Casanova in Hollywood. She played there ten weeks—an almost unprecedented record. Arrived in Hollywood, they engaged an agent. One Sunday night he was staging a concert at the Trocadero. He booked her to appear between numbers at the Casanova.

Among the guests at the Troc that night was Director Norman Taurog, of Paramount. Next day, due to Taurog's CLOSE-UPS OF STUDIO AND STAR DOINGS IN THE GAYLY GLAMOROUS MOVIE CAPITAL.

Victor Orsatti, actors' agent, and June Lang, actress, are Hollywood's favorite bridal couple of the moment, knot tied May 29th.

George Brent surprised the gossips by marrying Constance Worth, Australian actress, for his third try at matrimony, celebrated in Mexico recently.

Benny Baker, Collette Lyons, Lynn Overman, and Mary Carlisle, above, whoop it up in "Hotel Haywire" and seem to enjoy it, too.
SUPREME conviction should be driving home to everybody by this time that Tyrone Power is a very faithful young man, and that's at variance with most of the rules of Hollywood.

When Sonja Henie is in town, as she has been for many weeks, there is nobody else that seems to attract his interest, and when she's out of town he plays the field.

Well, Bob Taylor doesn't do so badly either on the question of loyalty, because Barbara Stanwyck and he have certainly been devoted for months and months. And nobody else seems to have a real look-in. Apparently these younger leading men have developed a brand-new code of devotion. Probably they also deserve a lot of credit for that. It sets a high standard.

A Heart-breaking Loss.—None of the girls of Hollywood wanted to believe that handsome George Brent had finally gone and got married. But they finally had to admit that George was no longer one of the town's handsomest unwed gentlemen—unwed, at least, since he secured his divorce from Ruth Chatterton several years ago. Now, of course, Constance Worth, the Australian girl who acts for RKO, is Mrs. Brent, and the envy of a large number of ladies. The marriage was kept a secret for a day or two, after it had been celebrated in Mexico. Theirs was a real whirlwind romance.

Youth's Glad Reunion.—They're going to get the "three smart girls" together in a picture again. Probably you hoped, as we did, that this would happen. For among pleasant recollections of the past year, there's none quite so agreeable in its particular way as the film "Three Smart Girls," which had such a quality of youthful freshness. Universal, which has the young ladies under contract, was dispatching them on their separate ways, but was finally forced to concede that there should be another movie starring Deanna Durbin, Nan Grey, and Barbara Read. It's a cheering decision to chronicle.

The Jolsons Move Out.—Ruby Keeler's departure from Warners means the breaking up permanently of the team of Dick Powell and Ruby Keeler. And that writes off a page in movie history, because together they were reigning stars two or three years ago. Disagreements on various scores caused Al Jolson first to depart from the organization, and then Ruby followed. Powell, of course, stands aces with Warners, where he has worked probably harder than anybody ever since he won success. And, by the way, let's make a note of this: Dick has proved himself a swell stepfather to Joan Blondell's youngster. It's one of the many indications of his fine character.

Madame Joan De Farge.—After what she did in organizing the Screen Actors Guild, Joan Crawford could probably carve a political career for herself. Among the women she was the most strenuous campaigner during the days when a strike threatened in Hollywood. She personally visited the sets at various studios and secured players as members for the guild. They tell it, too, that when the actors were rounded up, Joan would bring her crocheting along to fill in the time while listening to speeches.

WROTE Claudette Colbert the nicest letter asking for a photograph. In reply she sent me a price list! "I twice sent Clark Gable the money for a photograph, but though a year has elapsed I've received neither reply, photograph, nor the return of my money!"

Every editor, as well as every writer on film topics, constantly receives complaints such as the above from fans who, in enthusiastic admiration of a star, have written their idol a letter, only to receive a figurative box on the ear for their pains.

Why? Without their loyal fans very few players would become stars at all. Without stardom there would be no Beverly Hills estates, no marble swimming pools, no hobnobbing with visiting nobility. Then why, since they are so eager to accept the rewards of popularity, are they so unwilling to pay the price or to acknowledge the slightest debt to their public?

Apparently the average star, once he achieves the heights, nurses the fond illusion that his superlative art alone has placed him there. That is not true. If art alone were the measuring rod the Hollywood firmament would be far less crowded than it is.

Granted that no star can reply personally to every letter received, is that any excuse for returning mail unopened, callously stamped "Refused"?

Why not let the writer suppose that the little paean of praise had at least been read? Shouldn't there be a sense of noblesse oblige about such things? Doesn't the fact of being greatly admired, sincerely loved, place a certain responsibility upon the object of all this affection, however unwelcome? And wouldn't a little plain, old-fashioned courtesy be an admirable addition to most stars' equipment?

Persons at the top in all other professions, as well as kings, presidents, statesmen, all seem to practice it and consider it important. I know of a dishwasher in a cheap café who wrote a letter to Mussolini. A cordial "thank you;" with Il Duce's signature, came by early mail.

Of course, Italy's dictator has a secretary. But so has every film star. And just there is the key to the trouble. The secretary.

In his fine editorial in January, 1936, Picture Play, Norbert Lusk wrote:

"A star's secretary is apt to occupy the post not for his efficiency in secretarial duties, but for other values. Such as buffer, companion, yes-man, a runner of errands, bodyguard, general factotum, or perhaps for no reason at all except the obligation to pension a relative.

"Until working secretaries became the smart thing to have, fans will continue to complain and stars will continue to lose admirers instead of holding them through secretarial courtesy and efficiency. So, do not be too quick to blame the star for your unanswered letter. Ten to one you failed to receive a reply because the secretary was too busy answering demands on him outside the required duties of a correspondent."

This is a kindly and generous viewpoint, and it places the blame exactly where it most belongs, on the shoulders of the star.

Granted that a person intelligent enough to be and do all these varied things can be of inestimable service to a star, he nevertheless remains of slight secretarial value in the true sense of the word. Then why not, in the name of all that's sensible, have a working secretary, or two or three, in addition to this other general factotum? Douglas Fairbanks employed six, simultaneously, during his stellar days. One as executive secretary, and five others as assistants.

Let the star bear in mind that complaints from fans invariably wind up with—"I shall never attend another of his pictures," or "I never want to see her again!" In Hollywood jargon, such words are dynamite.

It is the fans who have been the most vital factor in any star's success. It is his personal following that forms the fan clubs and that fights so desperately for him when he begins to slip, and it is only when these same fans lose interest and withdraw their support that his career is definitely over.

As a writer specializing in interviews with celebrities, I've long ago come to the conclusion that a male star fares better, in his relations with both press and public, when he employs a man instead of a woman secretary.

I realize the wrath that is about to descend upon my head, but after long and varied experience I insist that I have always found a male secretary better mannered, more tactful, and far more dependable than a girl in the same position.

Certainly there are young women who are all they should be—and to them my deepest apologies—but one doesn't find many of them working for our stars. They may begin with the best of intentions, but apparently the proximity to so much glamour and masculine attractiveness upsets their equilibrium. They suddenly acquire an exaggerated idea of their own importance, as well as a wholly erroneous impression of a writer's motive in seeking an interview.

Wives, I have always found, are invariably gracious and willing to cooperate, but the secretary will do everything she dare to prevent the interview. I have known secretaries to delay important messages, "forget" them entirely, and give out such a mass of misinformation that I have often abandoned the intended interview entirely rather than proceed in the face of such determined opposition. In such cases the star is the only loser. The writer can always find plenty of others to write about.

Sometimes, too, a secretary seems to fear that instead of professional matters a measure of actual friendship is developing between the writer and her employer. This, apparently, must be prevented at all costs.

I remember one instance in which the secretary tried to give me the impression that she was having an affair with her employer. The man happened to be one of the most happily married and decent-living persons one could hope to find, and I fortunately knew this. Whether by her tactics she merely sought to quash any personal interest on my part, or whether she hoped I would believe her and would start a whispering campaign that would harm him, I don't know.

Another time a foreign star, whom I interviewed twice, urged me to dine with him and his wife at their home, "some evening soon." I accepted with pleasure, but no definite invitation ever materialized. Months later, on the eve of their return to Europe, I met them again. Both expressed regret that I had never found time to dine with them.

"But I've never been invited," I countered.

"But dozens of times we phoned you," insisted the wife. "You always told Miss Blank you were too busy. You never even answered the three letters Miss Blank wrote to you!"

Sometimes, too, an employee can do harm unintentionally, as when Lloyd Nolan and his wife went on location in Arizona.

They left their housekeeper in charge of their home, not

A TOUGH guy is a gentleman," said George Raft.

The silky, cobra-eyed actor should be on authority on tough guys for he has been a storm center in disputes with Paramount and often has defended his ideas and ideals with fist and phrase.

"A tough guy is gentle until he has to get rough, and he's nice to women," he added. "He doesn't have to act tough if he really is. It's only the phonies who try to be hard. That's why I'm sick of all this talk about me being hard to handle. Sure, I refuse parts, not because I'm temperamental but because they're unsympathetic.

"I'll play a heavy if they make me a nice guy in the end. It's O.K. to kill a couple of guys, but you've got to get sympathy in the end or the picture hurts you. People in New York or other big cities might go back to see a rat, but you don't think the people in Sheboygan, Wisconsin, would, do you?"

BY JOE MACKEY

George Raft says that he's sick of all the talk about his being hard to handle. Then he gives his definition of a tough guy, alibis his quarrels with the studio and says that moving into Gary Cooper's dressing room, when Gary left Paramount, will bring him good luck.

On the opposite page: as he appears with Olympe Bradna in "Souls at Sea," in which Cooper stars.
George is one of the most maligned men in pictures, so I had been prepared to meet a pretty disagreeable, difficul t fellow, but there was nothing unpleasant about the dapper man who discussed his career with more frankness than most stars use.

Of course, his appearance wouldn’t inspire you to leave your life’s savings with him, but there are countless faces like that on screen and off. Anyway, if he looked like a Bay Scout he probably wouldn’t be in pictures. “A menace with sex appeal,” was what Director Rawland Brown wanted when he was casting “Quick Millions” and saw George in the Brown Derby.

His reason for refusing some rôles is logical. He thought tough guys were gentlemen and wanted to play them that way, and he wanted sympathetic parts so that he could remain popular. Reasonable? Of course.

George knows that heavies in real life take a final bow too quickly, riddled by bullets in some gutter, and he thinks that heavies in real life also fade too quickly, pushed into Class B films.

“You can work up from second-rate pictures,” he said, “but you can’t come back from them.”

Although George has been associated with sinister screen misdeeds that would shame most big-town mobsters, his recent pictures have played him up as a hero. Ha isn’t asking for this, either.

“Say, don’t get the idea that I always want to be a romantic lead. In fact, my favorite rôles was in ‘Scarface.’”

And here’s a funny thing. In that picture I killed about fourteen guys, yet at the end I was the fair-haired boy. Remember that death scene? That’s what got them, me dying without a ward, unjustly. They forgot I’d been knocking off Paul Muni’s enemies all through the picture.

“Too last you have a have the masses behind you. They have to walk out of a theater t’king you or they walk out for good. People stand and take off their hats when you wave the flag, don’t they? It’s the same thing when you save the girl or kill the heavy.

“An actor has to be pretty careful about his parts. No pun intended,” he laughed, pointing to the white line that split his sleek hair near the side. “I’m supposed to be a lot of trouble to the studio, but like I said, it’s not tempera ment. It’s self-preservation.

“Look at fellows like Ronald Colman and Gary Cooper. Big shots. And for a long time, too. In ‘Lives of a Bengal Lancer,’ Gary was almost a heavy at times, but they made him a nice guy at the end.

“Look at Gable. He started as a villain but turned into a hero. Now, though he’s tough sometimes, they don’t let people go out thinking he’s a mug. Those fellows keep going.”

Superstitious, Raft believes that Cooper’s dressing room, into which he moved when Cooper left Paramount, will bring him luck in a long career.

“I can’t pick my own stories,” he continued, “but I can yell if I don’t like ‘em. The only one I walked out on be cause the part was too nasty was ‘The Story of Temple Drake.’ There’s been other trouble but mostly because the stories were inferior.”

George laughed again and showed white teeth that he brushes many times daily. He seemed amused that a man would be censured for wanting material that would build him up. He likes to do a good job but he doesn’t lose sleep over art. He knows the movies are a business.

He wants now to make “The Four Horsemen of the Apocalyp se.” Back in the old days before his add and rather reptilian dance style made him known as a night spot dance floors as “the blacksnake,” he was a dancing partner for women at Rector’s, Churchill’s, and Murray’s. It was at the first that he met Rudolph Valen tina before Rudy went on the screen. They became friends.

After Rudy’s death and George’s rise, partly because of his resemblance to Valentina, he was groomed as a second Valentina. This always annoyed him because he didn’t think there could be a second Valentina, and any way, he wanted to be a first Raft. Now, however, he would like Rudy’s old part in “The Four Horsemen.”

He also wants to do “The Patent Leather Kid,” a rôles

The decree against slug-fests Raft has been yearning for the good old days. Last year when Clark Gable knocked out a former collegiate amateur champion during the making of a film Raft considered a ring comeback, with the first bout with Gable for a benefit. Screen work blasted this idea so he had to be content with memories of his twenty-five professional bouts years ago, frequent trips to sporting events and work-outs with friends.

George is tough, but he’s not so tough that he didn’t have to be taken in hand about his money. When he started to earn big money a lot of friends looked him up. Some people he didn’t know as friends also appeared. A startling number of them were in desperate straits, to hear them tell it. George would give some money to this one, some to that. Then he discovered that only a little of his big salary was doing him any good. His hard background didn’t keep him from being too good a fellow. Finally, more business-minded friends took him in hand, and to-day he receives two hundred dollars a week from his manager.

ITEMS OF INTEREST SNATCHED HERE, THERE AND EVERYWHERE IN THE MOVIE MERRY-GO-ROUND.

In "A Star Is Born" one gripping scene occurs when a group of top-notchers "cuts" a fading star. We watched a group of top-notchers in real life greet Buster Keaton, once on top himself. He wasn't "cut," but obviously they had little in common. Conversation languished. And Keaton's eagerness to remain part of the group was as touching as the scene in the film.

Ted Peckham, originator of the paid escort idea, didn't have much luck asking Hollywood girls for dates, even though he offered his services free. In the film colony, girls outnumber men eight to one. Why advertise the fact? That's what our fair ones asked themselves. Gypsy Rose Lee turned him down, and then attended a night club with another girl, but no men.

Mrs. Fred MacMurray, although she has been ill for some months now, knows just how progress is coming along on the new house she and Fred are building. He takes motion pictures of the rooms as they are completed, and shows them in the home where they now live. To those who know the whole story, this is Hollywood's most appealing love.

Carole Lombard's spicy language is amusing or regrettable, depending on your sense of humor. But she isn't the only one. Alice Brady's reputation for mentioning "unmentionables" grows daily, and Hollywood in general, being more outspoken than society approves, finds the same thrill as a little boy scrawling bad words on a back fence.
WELL-MEANING writers rushed out to Janet Gaynor's after the preview of "A Star Is Born" to congratulate her on her miraculous comeback. Congratulations, it seemed, were not in order. "Come-back? I've always been on top!" was the general tenor of the little star's remarks.

DON'T feel too sorry for the stars who can't marry their new sweethearts because their spouses, even though separated, won't consent to divorce. Sometimes this is a happy, secret arrangement by all concerned. The wife remains Mrs. Star. The star has all the freedom of a bachelor. The sweetheart gets an escort—and lots of pictures in the papers. "An ideal set-up," we heard one wife call this tangled situation.

IN Hollywood you don't have to worry about your dog's diet. A smart firm for canines assumes all the responsibility of preparing and serving the correct variety of scientific food. Anita Louise has six dogs and every day an appropriate dish is chauffeured to her back yard. This convenience costs her twenty-four dollars a month.

MICHAEL WHALEN yearned for the gay spots when he was just an extra. But now he shuns them. He'd rather week-end at that twocabin auto camp by the lonely Saltan Sea than drink champagne at the Troc. An average of a new picture every six weeks has done this to him.

WARREN WILLIAM began his MGM contract by giving the glamour studio something to gape at. He can't be bothered with a clumsy portable dressing room on sets. Instead, his man drives his car onto every stage. The back has been ingeniously converted into a nifty rest haven as the studio ever imagined. When Warren's gentleman disconnects the electricity from the stage plugs at the end of a scene, away they drive, leaving gasps behind them. "The Baby"—Jean Harlow to you—is fit to be tied!
WEALTHY Jack Haley admits he bought his Beverly Hills home at a bargain. Also, that he’s done over the inside without expensive advice. But he doesn’t tell his friends to dash out and do likewise. “I wouldn’t want them to risk being stung with poor plumbing,” he explains quite seriously.

JOAN CRAWFORD always said she admired the way Frances Deaner, publicity woman, handled Janet Gaynor’s fan contacts for so many years. The other noon Joan proved her sincerity by dropping over to 20th Century-Fox to lunch with Frances. Afterward the pleased hostess reciprocated by taking Joan on a tour of the lot. Miss Crawford was as wide-eyed as though she’d never seen how movies were made. But no, Darryl Zanuck didn’t “discover” her.

THERE is no rush of sophistication to Wayne Morris’s head. The new blond hope at Warners declares that collecting hotel stickers on his luggage is what he most prefers to do in his spare time. To heck with any pretense about high-flown hobbies!

THE Hollywood stars who are buying acreage at Chatsworth need never fear stepping on their neighbors’ toes, what with Barbara Stanwyck’s ranch comprising 500 acres; Joel McCrea’s a thousand; Robert Taylor’s and Francis Lederer’s each several hundred. They can be next-door neighbors and still be miles apart. The latest star to move out there is Luli Deste, Columbia’s Viennese importation, who has purchased a 170-acre estate next door to that of Francis Lederer.

Miss Deste was so excited over her purchase that she insisted upon moving in despite protests of her friends that she must wait until gas, electricity, and a telephone were installed. “We know how to manage without those things in Europe,” she said calmly. “We’ll cook outside on a fire.”

She moved in and her meals have been cooked on a grill in the patio. Furthermore she loves it.

JIMMY ELLISON, of “Twenty-three and a Half Hours Leave,” and Gertrude Durkin had been married but two weeks when all her friends got together and gave Gertrude a shower. There was silver and glassware. In fact nothing was forgotten. Then Gertrude opened a large package which turned out to be a fully equipped picnic hamper. Her eyes fell on one article and with a most satisfied expression on her face she exclaimed: "How I have needed a can opener!"

WHEN Claudette Colbert appeared at a lunch at the Trocadero recently wearing a very becoming hat, she explained that her chauffeur had bought it for her.

"I've been on location for so long that I had nothing to wear. I told the chauffeur to go to a shop and bring me some brown hats. This is one. Does it look all right?" she asked anxiously.

DID Lew Ayres get a Paris divorce from Ginger Rogers while he was in Europe? Close friends of both Lew and Ginger are of the opinion that a secret divorce has been obtained. They base their belief on the fact that Ginger flutters around with the most popular men in town more than she did formerly and Lew hasn't been any stay-at-home, either.

ANITA LOUISE, in her young enthusiasm, got all dressed up for the "Coronation Ball" with which Hollywood celebrated the accession of King George VI. She wore a white satin gown with a four-foot train and a tiara, no less. She looked, of course, perfectly beautiful. A woman who must have been reading assiduously the stipulations for lengths of trains and types of coronets required of peeresses at the actual coronation, approached her and inquired, with more hauteur than good manners, "My dear—er—are you a 'Lady'?"

"Good gracious!" returned the startled Anita. "I do hope so!"

CONSTANCE BENNETT who is usually so elegant, startled every one on the "Topper" set by chewing gum persistently. "I'm cutting down on my smoking," she explained, sort of between cuds.... Some one swiped Harpo Marx's make-up box and the comedian is so devastated that he is offering a reward. If you find an ancient cigar box, containing (item) one tattered powder puff (item) a lump of black grease point and (item) some loose powder drifting over the whole interior, Harpo will pay a tidy sum for its return. (Continued on page 62)
FREQUENTLY, or a little oftener, some alleged authority breaks forth in print on the subject of love. Usually the article is devoted to instructing women in how they can be fascinating, glamorous, irresistible, etcetera. To put it baldly, they explain how one can get a husband.

Any woman of any gumption can get a husband; the real rub lies in getting a man who is not a husband. Mae West has given rooms of advice on the technique of snaring the wary male. Various psychologists have rolled up their sleeves and tackled the matter. Glamour queens galore offer rules guaranteed to bring about a proposal.

Nothing seems to come of all this advice and instruction, and my own probably worthless opinion is that love is determined, not by appearance and manners, but by mineral properties and combinations in the body, natural chemical elements which function magnetically. To strike a safe balance nature inclines us toward those whose qualities complement our own.

Thus it is that the outstanding romances of Hollywood exist between couples of

No, Nelson Eddy and Jeanette MacDonald don't love each other. Far from it! Both stand for conservatism too strongly. Lack contrast.

Franchot Tone and Joan Crawford complement each other splendidly. Franchot is reason; Joan is emotion. A perfect combination for love.

Robert Taylor is conformity; Barbara Stanwyck is resistance. It is only natural that they should find comfort in each other's company.
complementary qualities and, perhaps, mineral properties. Having no means of proving the latter, I shall confine my analyses of these interesting cases to outward manifestations of the former.

Apparently Joan Crawford and Franchot Tone complemented each other splendidly. Franchot is reason; Joan is emotion. Miss Crawford's virtues have been praised so highly and demonstrated so often that I shall not dwell upon them. That she is loved is but natural. Comparatively little, however, has been said of Franchot's lovable qualities. He has, of course, many endearing traits, not the least of which is kindliness.

I remember going to interview him a couple of years ago. There had been some trouble with the publicity department about seeing him. I was nervous and worried and definitely prejudiced against this actor whom I had come to regard as a frosty, pampered upstart. To my surprise I found myself telling the frosty upstart my troubles. To my greater surprise I found him replying in gentle, courteous tones, straightening out the difficulty and quietly allaying my fears. Emotion qualified by reason makes an interesting combination, as Joan and Franchot doubtless have discovered.

On the other hand, when temperament marries ambition trouble moves right in. John Barrymore is notoriously fractious and independent. Elaine Barrie is determined to promote her own interests, come what may. Their marriage was doomed from the beginning, not by the difference in their ages, but by lack of harmonious personality properties.

The apparently lasting happiness of Al Jolson and Ruby Keeler proves that spring and Indian summer may mate successfully. Ruby

The contrasting qualities of Gary Cooper and Veronica Balfe make for a happy balance, say the author, Madeleine Glass. Gary is strength; Mrs. Cooper is fragility.

Lupe Velez's primitive nature finds its answer in Johnny Weissmuller, an athlete whose nerves are insulated by hawserlike muscles, kept in condition by much swimming.

is faith; Al is dependability. Moreover, Al is Jewish, and Jews make uncommonly good husbands.

If William Powell and Jean Harlow marry their qualities will complement one another nicely. Powell is discrimination; Jean is peace. From all I can learn Miss Harlow is notably mild-tempered, an admirable quality in a wife. One day I stood watching her work on a set. The scene didn't go off well. Jean moved rather awkwardly. "Wasn't that graceful?" remarked the director, sarcastically. I expected the spectacular blonde to reply in kind, but she only looked embarrassed and set about doing the scene again.

True, Powell has two matrimonial failures behind him, Jean three, but previous experience, together with their native good sense, should see them through.

Discussion of the Clark Gable-Charles Lamont romance while Clark is still married to another is in poor taste, yet this romping love idyll fairly challenges comment. Here respective qualities dovetail nicely. Gable is calculation; Carole is impulse.

Clark, a peasant in plus-fours, could not but find the society of a frillicsome cassepotaye highly diverting. And such is Gable's charm and intelligence that practically any woman would find him a pleasing companion. Still, I cannot imagine these two sticking together through the long middle years of life, and finally going down the sunset slope hand in hand.

The marriage of Charles Buhler and Pat Paterson seems to be of a permanent nature, and with reason. Charles is refuge; Pat is dependency.

Pat will resent this as she feels that a successful acting career is her natural destiny. Thus far, however, she has given nothing to the screen which dozens of other young actresses could not duplicate, and as she admits to being interested in no other sort of work I feel that she is fortunate to have won the love of a kind, protective and liberal husband in whose genius she can take pride and vicarious satisfaction.

Two years ago I sat in an office giving a young actor his first interview. Apparently his mineral properties did not particularly affect me for I was

"This Is My Affair."—20th Century-Fox. Genuine entertainment is here without let-up. The picture is one of the most attractive of the month, with Robert Taylor and Barbara Stanwyck as hero and heroine make doubly sure you won’t pass it up. They do well, too, Mr. Taylor dignified and earnest as the naval lieutenant secretly appointed by President McKinley as a G-man and Miss Stanwyck achieving glamour in the costumes of 1901 and the make-up of 1937. We are told that a series of bank robberies shocked the country and the government at that period and that the president chose young Mr. Taylor among all the men at his command to round up the desperate criminals, the exact moment being a ball in Admiral Dewey’s honor at the White House. His orders are never to communicate with the president except as a last resort. Mr. Taylor’s adventures lead him to St. Paul, Minnesota, and Victor McLaglen’s gambling resort where Miss Stanwyck reigns as star performer and the girl Mr. McLaglen can’t get. She must, of course, keep herself pure for Mr. Taylor. He dares to love her in spite of Mr. McLaglen’s fierce ownership, tricks the gang into believing he is a crook and joins them in a bank robbery. Captured and sentenced to die, he appeals to President McKinley at the very time the latter is assassinated. You must see for yourself how Mr. Taylor faces his doom. All this sounds like crass melodrama in the telling, but it is adroitly embellished with dialogue, suspense, and shrewd character portrayal, not to mention perfect reproduction of the period’s lush decorations and bountiful costumes.

"Kid Galahad."—Warners. I can’t say enough in favor of this rousing prize-fight melodrama, the best that I can recall at the moment and better than any in recent years.

The picture thrills even if one isn’t a fight fan, probably because what takes place is authentic. More than that is the interplay of character, the brilliant acting and cutting dialogue—everything, in fact, to make a racy picture that is true to the best traditions of the screen. I’m cheering on the sidelines in case you hadn’t noticed. Before I give you an inkling of the story, I must rave about Bette Davis a bit. She grows and progresses in each succeeding picture. Given half a chance, she makes the most of it always. In this she gets a full chance and comes through with flying colors, again proclaiming herself a vivid personality and a rare actress, courageous in facing the truth of a character first of all. Here she plays a sympathetic girl for a change. The sweetheart of a fight manager, she accepts defeat without a quiver of self-pity when she finds that her lover’s juvenile protégé respects her as a sister but cares for another. Mere sentimentality has no part in Miss Davis’s understanding of character, nor does she try to make you think she’s a lady mixed up with the sporting world. It’s a hard, coarse, materialistic world, with Edward G. Robinson and Humphrey Bogart rivals and enemies in the business of promoting fights and double-crossing each other. Suddenly comes a youth from a gentler sphere, first as a bellhop to serve drinks at Mr. Robinson’s three-day party, later as Miss Davis’s defender against insult. He uses his fists with such magnificent power that Mr. Robinson sees in him the making of a great fighter. And he becomes one. This part is played by a newcomer, Wayne Morris, who seems to me on the threshold of great popularity. He has uncommon good looks, superb physique, and a kind of Americanism that communicates itself to us all. He is more than a handsome slugger, too, for he moves with ease and speaks with naturalness.
"The Go-getter." — Universal. John Boles and Doris Nolan prove their inability to lift farce comedy above painstaking actuality. Neither has the light touch, or rather the touch light enough. They smile and try to be airily inconsequential, but it is a losing game. I think Mr. Boles had better go back to singing. Miss Nolan is too new to the screen to show where she fits in. At present she is chiefly notable for good looks, Walter Pidgeon, in a secondary rôle, makes more of his lines and situations, giving to them a skimming gaiety that always brings forth laughter from the audience. The trio are concerned in an engaging story that might have been something to cheer about. But it doesn't come off, quite. Mr. Boles, fabulously successful architect, oppressed by income taxes and the high cost of a high life, marries Miss Nolan, his secretary, to reduce expenses and she enters into what she understands is purely a business arrangement. Then she begins to act up because Mr. Boles insists that it is a business contract. Mr. Pidgeon is her suitor who takes his defeat good-naturedly but doesn't give up the chase. It isn't giving away a secret. I hope, to tell you that everything comes out romantically right. The decorations of John Harkrider are arresting and distinctive, if the writing and the acting are not.

"They Gave Him a Gun." — MGM. Like most anti-war documents, this pulls its punches after it has stated a strong case, and asks you to get wrought up over a love affair. The love business is tepid after what has gone before. But there is enough strength and originality, to say nothing of capital acting, to place the picture above the average of courage. It isn't the first time that a fine idea has failed to achieve its utmost power. We have a timid clerk frightened to tears by military training after he has been drafted. He is definitely afraid of a gun. Once on the firing line, however, safely ambushed in a church, he fires his gun and sees the enemy go down. Frenzied by his sudden power, he shoots again and again, thrilling at the sight of men falling before the gun in his hand. Mustered out of the army, he becomes a gangster still fascinated by the power of the weapon in his hands. Until finally he meets inevitable death. Unfortunately, he has fallen in love with and married a blond nurse who, contentedly sitting at home with her sewing, hasn't the least suspicion that her husband is not a hard-working business man. It is she who informs on him, shocked by the truth. Gladys George plays this part. An excellent character actress, she loses force and individuality when she plays an emotional ingénue. You feel that her platinum curls are her first concern. Franchot Tone is finely effective as the coward and again Spencer Tracy triumphs over a secondary part as his hard-boiled friend who stands by ready to marry his widow.

"Wings Over Honolulu."— Warners. George Brent loses a leg in the crash of an army dirigible and mistakes the elegant, mannered Anita Louise for a housemaid. Somehow you think that such lack of perceptiveness might have been responsible for the accident. He says to her, "Do you like me like I like you?" That will give you an idea of his juvenility. He forces himself into a job with the lumber and shipping concern of which Miss Louise's father is the blustering head. Mr. Brent is so darning likable, such a go-getter, that the old man gives him a chance against the advice of his associates, and to test his ability to remain with the business he is told to sell a quantity of "skunk" lumber. Apparently the ob-

"BATHINGSUIT BEAUTY"—Paramount. Original story and screen play by Oscar D. Nef. Directed by Edward Lewis.

"THERE'S A COSMONAUT IN THE BED"—Paramount. From a story by Henry Byrnes. Directed by Robert Florey.

Ah, once it gets you, acting is too hard to suppress. All his life, Jack has burned a lamp before its magic altar. I wanted to hear about it, and him. He raved, instead, about Ruth Draper.

"She has nothing on the stage except a table, a chair and a shawl," he told me—for, to my sorrow, I've never beheld the Draper genius. "She creates drama, or comedy, and sometimes you feel you see and hear crowds about her. How does she do it?"

I decided that she had the gift of the old Greek actor who all but strangulated his audience with the suggestive power he used when strangling some one in the play. Henry Irving was reputed to have had hypnotic power. Bernhardt stabbed the entire audience in "La Tosca," along with poor "Baron Scarpia."

"How do you think they did it?" I asked Mr. Haley, planning a break of his personal modesty.

"Yes, Irving and Bernhardt were great till the day of their death," he replied, which really wasn't a reply at all. "That's what every actor likes about an English following. Once you become a favorite, you're there forever. Here it isn't so. Any Broadway actor will tell you that. I was placed in what was a hit—"Follow Through." When it ended, after a year or more, I found myself right back where I started, and had to begin all over again. American audiences say: 'Show us! Why that is I can't say. Can you?'"

I could, but it wasn't my interview.

Jack started out to show people at the age of five. He sang a song at a church festival in his native town of Boston. After graduating from the Boston English High School, his parents wanted him to go to work, like any ordinary individual. Jack was no ordinary individual. He wanted to act. At eighteen, with the sum of fifteen dollars, he ran away from home.

At Philadelphia, he plugged songs for a music publisher. A leader of a small-time vaudeville act, needing a light comedian, found him in Mr. Haley.

The career had started! To this day Hoboken can say with pride that Haley made his stage debut there. New York can't say that.

It was no while before he landed in big time—the goal of all vaudevilleans before the talkies vanished it. Jack found himself on the same bill with the Lightner girls and Alexander, the magician. There was magic in the air, all right. One of the girls, Florence, was eventually to become his wife.

"I went with my first car to take her sister for a ride," he related. Winnie happened to be out. So Jack took Flo. "And from that moment on there's been no one else," he assured me. And I believed him.

Perhaps Jack does not bother to talk much about himself because his life has been a constant jostling against unrecognized talent.

In a musical called "Around the Town" he found the later-to-be famous columnist, Heywood Broun, in the cast. In "Gay Paree" there was a bold beauty in the chorus, named Ruby Stevens. That Ruby is now Barbara Stanwyck. Mae Clark was also present.

Despite the rushing about, Jack found time between a matinée and an evening performance to marry Flo. They went on tour and finally wound up at no less a place than the Palace in New York, once famous to all big-timers.

After vaudeville heights, Jack turned to musical comedy. He was offered the lead in the Chicago production of "Good News." New York scouts now gazed at Jack Haley. "Follow Through" was written for him, in which he became a Broadway success with his famous song, "Button Up Your Overcoat."

As usual, he found outstanding talent in the ranks. There was a young dancer who never ceased practicing. Her name was Eleanor Powell. Later, while master of ceremonies at St. Louis, Jack persuaded a studio scout to give a little girl named Betty Grable a contract.

Hollywood's talkies had taken most of Broadway's tops. Producers lost their fortunes in the slump. Theaters darkened—the crime of crimes! Jack, however, was sitting pretty. "Take a Chance" was another hit for him.

He did not follow the title's advice when, later, urged to produce and star in a piece called "Three Men on a Horse," he turned down the offer. Hollywood beckoned, and Jack thought he'd better cash in while the movie gods called. What with the depression and darkened theaters, he did not think the men or the horse would go far. For once he was wrong.

Hollywood did not turn out to be so blazing as the producers' prospectus suggested. Jack made fifteen two-reelers for Warners. Later came feature pictures for Paramount and Universal. Then Twentieth Century-Fox obtained the Haley services, and are not at all sorry over the deal. In fact, Mr. Zanuck has taken up the comedian's option, and Producer Zanuck is no fool.

With all that California has to offer, I have an inkling that Jack pines for dear old Broadway. The old theaters, the old faces.

Why didn't he talk about himself? Well, because beneath his humorous veneer he is a sensitive individual, and almost timid when it comes to making personal remarks about Jack Haley.

I thought I'd start the interview over again. "Where were you born, Mr. Haley?" I inquired.

"Ask me why I was born," he said. I can answer that one myself. He was born because Hollywood needs him. And dear old Hollywood, with all her sins and backslidings, seems to be in a happy mood about her prize.
On and Off the Set

FRANKIE ASTORRE has driven every one nearly crazy by playing his favorite tune persistently on the piano at every possible opportunity, both on and off the set. The piece is "Rap Tap on Wood" from the MGM musical which is the chief rival at his own "Shall We Dance?"

When the colt which was born four weeks ago to Irene Hervey's saddle mare, climbed a fence and ran amuck, winding up on Pat O'Brien's front lawn, in an unsuccessful battle with a rosebush, Pat picked it up, tucked it into the back seat of his sedan and trundled it home.

JOBYNA RALSTON ARLEN entertained twenty mothers and their young offsprings at a party on the occasion of "Ricky" Arlen's fourth birthday. Three daffy fathers invaded the gathering, each intent on showing the other how smart his child was—the new words it knew, or the piece it could say. Dick Arlen, Stuart Erwin, and Pat O'Brien all coaxed, cajoled and threatened their young hopefuls, trying to persuade them to show off. Not one of the youngsters would open its mouth. "I would be kinder not to report the chagrin of the young fathers or the covert smiles of the mothers, we guess.

FRANCIS LEDERER'S Chinese cook thinks his employer has many admirable habits. "But," he complains, "when I call him to dinner he must chin himself so many times before he will enter the dining room. And while he chins dinner gets cold."

Every one on the set was mildly curious when Otta Kruger rushed to his dressing room at the conclusion of each scene and sat listening intently to his radio. Each time he returned to the set he wore a glum expression which prompted some one to ask if he had bet on the wrong horse.

"No!" he shouted testily. "I'm waiting for the King's speech." Whereupon every one howled, for the King's speech had been broadcast the day before.

When Mischa Auer wants to get away from it all these days he instructs his wife to tell any callers that he is in conference and disappears in his swimming pool.

Using a five-gallon tin can, he has contrived a diving bell. On one side is an isinglass window; around the bottom is a rubber collar which is tightly around Mr. Auer's neck and a rubber hose runs from the top of the thing to the side of the pool where willing or unwilling hands pump air to him with a bicycle pump. With a heavy weight around his waist, the actor can sit on the bottom of the pool as long as some one will wield the bicycle pump.

Beside the pool, "just for convenience," the owner airily explains, is a big refrigerator packed with everything necessary for the inner comfort of a big deep-sea diver.

HUGH HERBERT went to the hospital last ago, suffering, his physicians said, from "fatigue and strain." Patsy Kelly opined that the strain came from Hugh's having to "carry all these pictures he's been appearing in lately!"

BUDDY EBSEN loves boats. He has loved them with such apparent and engaging intensity that every one who owned even a skiff has entertained Buddy aboard it in the past few years. Came the prosperous day when Buddy bought a boat of his own. It has just dawned upon him, appallingly, that he must reciprocate with invitations to be his guest aboard his floating palace. "It will accommodate just two guests at a time," he reported, looking woe-begone. "I'm going to have an all-summer and all-winter boating party, seems like."

CHESTER MORRIS, who dabbles in amateur magic, has a trick in which he appears to pull yards and yards of string from his mouth. He shouldn't have been surprised—but he was—when his eight-year-old son, Brooks, walked into Chef's study unreeeling yards and yards of silk thread from his mouth. "I can do it, too, daddy!" he announced with huge pride. The kid had actually swallowed a small spool of silk and in unreeeling it, had cut his palate and one tansil rather severely. The doctor fixed matters up for the youngster but he was awfully stem with Chester!

Picture of a truly devoted father: Pat O'Brien and his little daughter, beautifully named Mavourneen, who is intent on putting her dolly to bed. Daddy's next film is "Angle Shooter," with Joan Blondell, for Warners.
On and Off the Set

It is rumored that Gonzaga College, Bing Crosby's alma mater, will bestow a degree on the crooner this fall. They haven't announced for what.

The other morning Frances Langford and Ken Dolan, her manager, were driving out Sunset Boulevard when a speed cop halted them. As he was writing out a ticket, an alert news cameraman spied them and hopped out to take their picture. A few minutes later they passed the photographer.

"How'd you make out?" the latter grinned.

"Oh," said Ken, "when he saw you taking our pictures he decided we must be big shots so he let us go."

Ray Milland was lunching with a writer friend. "All you want of me," the friend gibed, "is the publicity you give me."

"Listen," Ray flared, "I don't give a hoot if you never mention my name in your putrid column—as long as you spell it right."

While working on "Turn Off the Moon," Eleanor Whitney and Johnny Downs had a lovers' spat. Eleanor decided she would never speak to Johnny again, other than to play her scenes with him. The whole company knew of the momentous decision.

Director William Seiter, who is quite a tease, decided to play Cupid. "Now, Eleanor and Johnny," he directed, "you come out of the bungalow and go into an embrace. Cameramen!"

So Eleanor and Johnny dutifully went into the embrace. It went on and on with never a "Cut!" from Seiter. They didn't dare separate for fear of spoiling a take. But when five minutes had passed—and five minutes is a long time for a hug and a kiss—they broke away and looked around. There wasn't another soul on the stage. They looked at each other sheepishly and grinned. You can't kiss for five minutes and not speak afterward.

Irene Dunne paused outside of a projection booth at Paramount Studio, and asked to be shown the daily rushes of "High, Wide and Handsome." Blank stares greeted her request. Finally one said, "But who ordered them shown?" Just then the boss projectionist came out.

"Holy smoke!" he cried. "Hey, you lugs, it's Irene Dunne! Trot out those rushes!" As Irene, amused, entered the projection room, she heard a drawl which might have come from Bob Burns, if he hadn't that minute been working on Stage 9: "Well, how wuz I to tell? She looks just like anybody!"

Recently a woman sat quietly dining in the Warner café. At the next table a writer was interviewing Dick Foran. The talk drifted to "The Black Legion" in which Dick and Humphrey Bogart appeared. "I wonder if Humphrey and Maya Methot will marry?" the writer wondered. "I hear they're on fire."

The woman at the next table quietly rose and left. It was Mrs. Bogart, from whom he is separated.

Part of Joan Crawford's bright genius is ability to remain gracious under trying conditions. At a recent sporting event which she was particularly keen to watch, for example, fans clustered thickly, demanding autographs. Candid camera flashbulbs blinded her constantly. Fellow movieites, thinking she, like themselves, didn't care for the rôle of mere spectator, kept obstructing her view.

But Joan showed no annoyance. Finally, when she was spotlighted and asked to stand up, she did so. On the bronzed Crawford countenance was a pleased grin. And the quick, seemingly awkward, almost bashful bow she made brought a roar of applause from the audience.

On the set of "Easy Living," Jean Arthur was being flattered extravagantly by a movie official from another lot. Some of the star's friends noticed that her responses were rather brusque. After he had gone, they charged her with being unappreciative.

Jean merely smiled in reply. What her friends didn't know was that the flatterer, several years before, had proclaimed loudly to any one who would listen that Jean lacked personality and talent, and should give up pictures.

Bette Davis was asked to contribute an article, not on a movie subject, to one of the big magazines. She had never written for publication, but did she turn in a panic to the ghost writers? Not Bette!

Instead, although she was working in a picture at the time, she sat up until after midnight for four nights in a row, writing feverishly. That weekend she spent rewriting. Several times she threw down her pencil in despair, and more than once complained of a headache. But the resulting article turned out to be very much worth while—we've read the finished manuscript—and already Bette is planning further literary homework.

Nowadays actresses have portable dressing rooms when they go on location. Terry Walker recruits John Howard and Larry Crabbe for help before she starts work in "Mountain Music," the Burns-Raye comedy. insistence, Paramount signed her to a contract. He wanted her for the next Bing Crosby picture—"Rhythm on the Range."

Incidentally, it was this same Tau-rog who kept after Bing years ago to leave the Coconut Grove and go to New York to appear on the radio.

During the interval that elapsed between the signing of the contract and the start of the picture, John Arledge gave a party at the Troc. We gathered at Una Merkel's home for cocktails and hors d'oeuvres. There were Una and her husband, Ronnie Burl, a beautiful girl from the East who was visiting Una, Rochelle Hudson, Anne Shirley, Paula Stone, Owen Davis, Jr., John Howard, and numerous others, including Martha.

I have never seen more beautiful girls at a small party. They all wore evening dress except Martha. She hadn't any. She wore a gray tailored suit. But the fact that she hadn't a gown suitable for the occasion didn't faze Martha. She was the life of the party. I'll never forget during one dance when she and her partner were alongside our table, Martha started trucking, doing bumps and snake-hips and Heaven only knows what else, to our vast amusement and the discomfort of her partner, who couldn't keep up with her.

Once, as we sat out a dance, she turned to me suddenly and said, "This all seems like a dream. I can't understand why Paramount signed me for this picture. There are dozens of comédiennes in Hollywood who could play that part as well or better than I can—and they're known. Don't misunderstand me. I'm grateful—but I can't understand it."

The hit she made in that picture is now history. And with that hit, Martha blossomed. She works twenty-four hours a day at being an actress. When she isn't selling herself to the public in pictures, she's selling herself to whoever she's talking to—be it writer, director, or visitor.

It wasn't long after her hit that she suddenly appeared around town in an expensive white roadster. Immediately the cry went up, "She's gone Hollywood!"

Martha was blissfully unconcerned. "All my life I've wanted a white car like this," she said. "I know I can't afford it but I'm closer to being able to afford it now than I may ever be again and I'm going to have it."

"I saw the car at the auto show and said to the salesman, 'I want this car,'" he said, "We can't let you have it until the show's over." I said, 'I don't care when you deliver it but I want it—and my mother can worry about the payments.'"

The only other snow-white cars in town are those of Sonja Henie and Tyrone Power, Jr.

As a child she had four consuming ambitions. The white car was one. The others were, a mink coat for her mother, a town car and chauffeur for herself, and a secretary. They have all been achieved. I can't help but wonder when her dearest desires have been attained so soon after twenty, what is there for her to look forward to?

It wasn't long after her hit in "Rhythm on the Range" that she was mouths when it's in repose. I told her so.

"I know," she nodded, "but when people are always commenting on the size of it, it makes me wonder—and worry about it. I kid about it and make fun of myself because I don't want people to know how I feel."

When she was working on "Mountain Music" she confided to me, "I feel self-conscious when I'm working with a good-looking director."

"Why?" I asked.

"Oh, on account of all this talk about my mouth. It makes me feel they never regard me as a woman at all—merely as a sort of freak to laugh at."

"But," I exclaimed, "you don't call Robert Florey good-looking, do you? He's one of the nicest fellows I know—a good director and highly presentable but I wouldn't nominate him for a runner-up in any handsome-man contest."

"I think he's grand," Martha enthused: "I wish I could know him socially instead of working with him."

A few days later the papers chronicled the fact that Martha and Mr. Florey were at the Coconut Grove together. What the papers didn't chronicle was the fact that when they left the Grove they drove down to Venice, fifteen miles distant, rode the chutes, the whip, went into the crazy house and played every game on the midway. In the wee sma' hours of the morning, Mr. Florey, his arms loaded with plaster dolls of every sort and description, which they had won, staggered back to his car with Martha, who was looking for new fields to conquer.

Recently there have been more persistent rumors of the change in Martha.

"Please," I begged her once, "whatever happens, don't ever be a lady. If you go refined on us, you won't be you."

"Don't worry," she consoled me, "I'm not the type. I'll probably quiet down as I grow older but at heart there'll always be that problem that confronted me in a song I sang on the radio not long ago—'Should I be sweet—and sing of roses—or should I be a razz-ma-tazz—'"

And there's Martha Raye for you. The "Should-I-Be-Sweet" type who discusses Debussy and Bach—and the "Razz-Ma-Tazz" who wants an expensive snow-white roadster with a town car and chauffeur on the side.

Take your choice. She's pretty swell either way.

The Flashlight On Walter Winchell

He is utterly fearless, holds no cow sacred, refuses to retract the truth, strives endlessly for accuracy, and is ever alert for a "story." Knowingly, Winchell has never done an injustice. When he errs, which is seldom, no one suffers more.

Regarded as a retailer of trivia, he has proved a great power for the accomplishment of good in the nation, the State and the city. Yet he carries a gun and a bodyguard, and both are primed to protect him in a pinch. With a fair shake he can do all right without them. But he's been hit from behind, physically as well as figuratively, too often to count on a square deal.

Cecilia Parker sets out gayly for a date with Eric Linden to see their latest picture together, "Girl Loves Boy."

Rising at dusk, breakfasting at dinner time, playing the rôle of a routabout until long after sun-up, Walter's hindsight-before life isn't calculated to bring him in touch with either sweetness or light. Those encountered in the watches of a New York night aren't characters peopling the pages of books for tiny tots.

It's an interesting commentary, therefore, that despite his contact with the seamy side rather than the sunny one his favorite companion is Doctor Dacie. When the good doctor visits town, he and Walter are inseparable. Amid the garish glitter of Gomorrah they talk of the quintuplets! When he reaches home his own youngster are just getting up. He's never too tired for a romp with them before shutting out the sun for a good day's sleep.

Surrounded by a variety of temptations, Winchell is a model of discretion. There has been nothing really approaching scandal in his life, although he was once divorced, once blackmailed, often traduced, accused, threatened. He has two ideas of a good time. One is a café corner with congenial friends. The other is the more exciting pastime of chasing police calls in his short-wave-radio-equipped roadster. Sometimes he bears the caps to the scene of the crime. But his discretion also dictates the wisdom of not interfering with their work. The caps don't do his columns. Neither, indeed does any one but Winchell. In reality he is even his own "Girl Friday," although he has a knack of acquiring competent secretaries who, of course, adore the Great Man even when he goes a bit boisterous.

Ruth Cambridge, is now Mrs. Buddy Ebsen. The present one, Rose Bigman, Walter is guarding against romance.

In Hollywood the well-ordered disorder of Walter's life was sadly upset. He worked daytimes, and that means from nine to five. He never read the script of "Wake Up and Live" until the picture was completed, contenting himself with memorizing his own lines. He left the Coast without seeing the picture. However, he did get records of the orchestrated score, and when he's pretty sure no one's around he plays the disks and does a dance routine to the music. It is interesting that Winchell first called the excellence of the Mack Gordon-Harry Revel words and music to the attention of the public. He has a Midas touch with the column as a magic wand. He pyramided dollars for Bernie through their "lead."

It's a long cry from Public School 184, a theater in Chicago, and the days of the "Newsense" to Walter's present spot in the public consciousness. But he'll stay at the top so long as the women of the nation consult his column instead of a doctor to find whether they are "infanticipating"! Which means that Walter Winchell will endure while the vital statistics of births, deaths and marriages continue to be chronicled in printer's ink.

DON'T LET YOUR GOOD LOOKS TAKE A VACATION DURING THE SUMMER.
HERE ARE SOME HELPFUL HINTS.

ARE you "organized" for your summer-vacation? And by summer-vacation I mean exactly that, with the two words right together and inseparable. For while the travel folders paint alluring pictures of foreign ports o' call and make us dream of nights under the Mediterranean moon, the sad truth is that most of us have to content ourselves with a brief week or two away from our jobs, or even with a few scattered week-ends at some near-by resort. That's what "vacation" means.

But "summer-vacation" means the whole of summer, with its informality and general air of freedom, when extra hours of daylight give us chance for a swim or game of tennis, or just a good rest on the shaded porch before dinner, when soft, balmy evenings mean drives along open roads and dances under the stars. And there's nothing to prevent our taking advantage of the whole long summer-vacation as a time for fun.

In fact, summer is the one season of the year, besides Christmas, when people really plan to have fun and be happy, when a girl wakes up, looks in her mirror and says to herself, "Anything exciting might happen to me to-day!" And so it might.

But there's no getting around the fact that a girl's good times are going to depend largely upon how she looks. The noblest heart of gold doesn't show—but a shiny nose does. The people you meet judge you by what they see at first glance, and if that isn't pleasing, they won't take a second to discover what sterling qualities may lurk beneath an unprepossessing exterior.

So it's to help you look your best at first—and every—glance, with the least possible trouble, that a well-organized beauty routine is so essential. For once you've systematized your beauty habits, you can forget them and they'll soon be almost automatic gestures, requiring little thought and almost no effort. But they'll pay you large dividends of loveliness not only for the week or two that you are away, but throughout the entire summer as well.

Now, I think that any summer beauty program begins with the skin, don't you? The skin is the most noticeably affected of any of our features, by change of climate or water, by sun, by wind. And the question of "to tan or not to tan" is one we always have with us.

This year the sun-tan vogue has waned somewhat, and while it's still fashionable to acquire a skin of gold if you wish, it's just as smart to cherish your natural pale complexion. But remember, blisters are never smart—or comfortable.

Therefore, protect your skin regardless of which vogue you elect to follow. If you're "going native" you can safely rely upon one of the splendid sun-tan oils which, if used all over the areas to be exposed, will assure you a smooth, even coat of tan with no unsightly, uncomfortable blisters to ruin your looks and disposition. While if you prefer to remain fair and romantic, cover yourself thoroughly with one of the preventive creams which will serve as a film between you and the sun, filtering the rays that burn and darken and giving you complete protection from any tint of tan.

Of course, there's still another skin problem in the summer for the girl with such a fair, delicate complexion that she freckles every time she sticks her head out of doors. She doesn't need to go to the beach or for a long motor drive—all she needs is to walk from her home to the corner drug store and she has a sprinkling of freckles on her nose, her forehead, her arms, and maybe even her hands. Skins of that texture need special attention.

If this is your problem, you’ll find the answer in the freckle cream made by one of our oldest and most reliable manufacturers. This cream, soothing and with a pleasant fragrance, should be applied to the freckled areas at night and allowed to remain until morning.

After a few nights the freckles will have faded noticeably, and by the end of the week will have disappeared entirely. Of course, in advanced cases where the freckles have existed for several years, it may take a bit longer to get rid of them altogether, but this cream will certainly do it if used faithfully according to directions. Just be patient and you will see wonderful results.

Another thing that we must remember about the skin in summer is that certain delicate areas are definitely affected by the sun than any others. Thus the skin around the eyes should be given special attention if we would avoid tiny wrinkles and squint lines formed when we unconsciously try to shield our eyes from too much brightness.

For this purpose there’s a new eye cream compounded of special soothing and lubricating oils, and it’s fine for smoothing out squint lines and laugh lines and for keeping the skin velvety and youthful. It should be gently patted around the eyes and on the eyelids every night. It’s a good idea, too, to use it after you come in from the beach, while you’re resting in your room or taking a hot bath.

Not only the skin around the eyes, but the eyes themselves need special attention during the summer. For certainly their delicate tissues do not benefit from the glare of the sun. Even if you’ve protected them with dark glasses while out of doors, the heat has reached them and they should be given a beauty bath of their own.

There’s a grand eyewash for this that has been approved by prominent physicians all over the country. A few drops from this squat blue bottle several times a day and your eyes will be bright and clear. What’s more, they’ll feel so easy and rested, too. Not only is this eyewash fine for countering the effect of sun and wind, but it will do wonders for eyes that are red from loss of sleep or weepy from strain. So, be sure to give your eyes this beauty bath before starting out for a gay evening—you’ll be delighted with how much better your eyes both look and feel.

The skin, the skin around the eyes, and the eyes themselves, are the three features needing the most protection during the summer. But there are other beauty details that belong on your schedule if you would look your best at all times.

The first of these is a nonperspirant, of course. One of the finest is a cream made by the firm famous for its liquid nonperspirants. This cream is a pale ivory in color, and should be patted gently beneath the arms. It dries almost instantly, and should then be washed away with lukewarm water. It can be used every day, if necessary, or every other day, and it affords complete protection from perspiration and perspiration odor. It is nongreasy, and will not injure the most delicate skin if used according to directions.

Another grand vacation item is the new powder cologne, a real two-purpose toiletry, for it combines a delightfully scented eau de cologne with a fine dusting powder. Splash it on when you step from your tub or shower; it dries almost instantly, and with one motion you have bath anointed and powdered yourself. An economical item to possess.

This is a grand time saver, and a space saver, too, when you’re traveling, as it obviates the necessity of packing both an eau de cologne and a dusting powder. It’s most reasonably priced, too, and the bottle it comes in is most attractive and decorative.

This idea of one item that combines several uses is a fine one, and that’s why you’ll like the all-purpose cream I’m going to tell you about. Modeled by an old French house famous for its beauty preparations, it is penetrating enough for cleansing, rich enough for nourishing, and light enough to use as a foundation. So, you can simplify your summer beauty routine by using this cream and thus doing away with so many jars on your dressing table or in your suitcase.

When it comes to make-up, it’s a good idea to choose items that were designed to be used together. Thus, you get the same tone and quality in powder, rouge, and lipstick. And one of the finest make-up ensembles is one that designed to the color-change principle. The powder is soft and clinging, and comes in several shade, white, the rouge and lipstick are pale and creamy, but deepen to natural skin-blush tones when applied. The rouge comes in either dry or cream form, and is noted for its staying power. The lipstick, too, is famous for its permanence; it survives long hours doesn’t rub off on napkin or handkerchief, either.

Carrying this make-up ensemble idea even further, it’s now possible to secure eye shadow, mascara, and a thin lead eyebrow pencil that were made to be used together, thus assuring perfectly blended eye make-up. This eye trio specializes in soft, feminine tones that never look hord and coarse. The eye shadow comes in soft shades of black, brown, blue and green, as does the mascara to match. And you may get the mascara in either solid, cream, or liquid form, any of which are nonsmearing and tear-proof. Naturally, they are absolutely harmless to the eyes. The eyebrow pencil comes in shades to match these other two items and should be used with a firm but delicate hand.

And if an actor resisted joining she would get him in a corner and lecture him on becoming a member, keeping her knitting needles going all the time. Maybe she borrowed that idea from "A Tale of Two Cities." Remember that violent revolutionary leader, Madame De Farge?

Too Much Papa Dionne.—Quintessential case of a rôle hitting an actor in a reverse manner in Hollywood is the Papa Dionne character played by John Qualen in the two Qabituple pictures. Qualen proved himself a very amusing addition to the ensemble in "The Country Doctor" and "Reunion." Yet recently 20th Century-Fox discontinued his contract, and after what appeared to be several successful years for Qualen as a character player.

It is learned that since he appeared as the father of the quint, Qualen has had the very deuce of a time getting audiences to take him seriously. So that's limited the range of his efforts, and as a consequence the company did not feel that it could keep him on permanently.

It's like those other strange cases where an actor has appeared as Lincoln, or some other historical character, and never been accepted for anything else thereafter. However, this comical boomerang will probably not prove that serious.

Controversy Over Stork.—The "act of God" theory was almost called into being again when Jane Wyatt had legal troubles with Universal recently over her film contract. Miss Wyatt argued that the company owed her some $13,000 on her agreement with them, and the company denied this because she has been away from the screen since January, owing to a stork visit. The case was finally settled without court trial.

It was Helen Hayes who several years ago started that "act of God" idea in connection with infant arrivals. However, Miss Wyatt spared the public the phrase in relation to her difficulties. She will return to the screen this fall.

An Indian-giver.—Miriam Hopkins gave a big birthday party, Russian style, for Anatol Litvak, the director. The cake, which had more colors on it than Joseph's coat, was inscribed to "Tola." Furthermore, Miriam presented her great admirer with an elegant auto trailer, but there's an amusing angle to that.

Hollywood High Lights

Miriam has been talking of possessing a trailer for herself for a year or more. But she just simply couldn't seem to get around to buying it. Now with prospects of an early wedding to "Tola," it will probably come back into "the family" again. Grace Moore, we should mention, is another keen trailer advocate, and really sold the idea to Miriam.

Relives "Informer."—Maybe you thought it was all fiction when you saw the wild course of events in "The Informer," with the brawl in the fish-and-chips place, and other riotous proceedings, with Victor McLaglen as their hero. Well, you probably read of the recent hullabaloo in which Vic became involved near San Diego, when beer bottles were flying thick and fast around him.

To all appearances, Vic was just the poor innocent victim of a kind of riot that broke out in the home of a friend whom he was visiting. He played Galahad in rushing one of the women present to a receiving hospital after she had been hit with one of the brew containers. "Nice party!"

Saluté—Novarro!—Ramon Novarro talked very enthusiastically to us about his new contract with Republic, which will bring him back to the screen either late this summer or early in the fall. Just think, it's all of two and a half years since Ramon starred in his last film, "The Night Is Young," with Evelyn Laye for MGM. Ramon mentioned that his first rôle in "She Didn't Want a Sheik," which is rather a poor title, will be like "Rupert of Hentzau." Lola Lane is his leading woman.

Garbo's Troubled Life.—Greta Garbo's efforts to dodge process servers, now that an effort is being made to force her to come to court to defend a suit over an old debt, would make Nimble Dixie Dunbar—Dixie Dunbar was the girl who captured June Lang's bridal bouquet when it was hurled following June's vowing to love honor and obey Vic Oros. What's more Dixie made a wild dive for the lilies of the valley after they had hit the ceiling of the Trocadero and fallen to the floor. Nobody else had a chance to get within reach of them. Alice Faye, Claire Trevor, and Shirley Deane were other bridesmaids.

The Passing Parade—Charles Chaplin, Mary Pickford, and Douglas Fairbanks can now find additional reasons to live on easy street. When they sold their interest in United Artists they were due to receive about $1,000,000 apiece in cash, and then get another $1,000,000 each later on, or else take stock for that amount in a new company.

Samuel Goldwyn and Alexander Korda arranged the deal to buy them out.

It was but logical that Mary and Doug should step out of the scene, as they have made no pictures lately, except for Miss Pickford's venture with Jesse L. Lasky, which produced "One Rainy Afternoon" and "The Gay Desperado."

Chaplin's movies are very infrequent. There's nothing really started as yet with that picture starring Paulette Goddard, but she may play "Scarlett O'Hara" in "Gone with the Wind."

Songbird by Proxy—Pity the plight of Jack Haley, yet what's he to do about it?

Right after the showings of "Wake Up and Live," in which Jack seemed to sing that number "Never in a Million Years" with such huge success, a radio company offered him a dazzling contract to broadcast his vocal talents. Haley had to do some quick side-stepping of writing his signature. You see, Jack can worry a little bit. But then it was a chip by the name of Buddy Clark who really did the expert singing in the film.

Fitful and Temperamental—Anyway, Martha Raye won't have to worry about her make-up. She has an artist from that field in the family now. Buddy Westmore, whom she married during a Las Vegas elopement. And Martha didn't even tell her own mother, which caused quite a disturbance.

Strange young girl, this one. A capital trooper much of the time, but temperamental to the last degree. If she doesn't flare up a few times during a film production, then it's just no film production. It's to be hoped Hollywood doesn't spoil her with success.

The Old Familiar Story—Earl of Warwick's contract with MGM finally ended in a suit. The British nobleman asked $7,188 from the company for alleged unpaid salary. He asserted the studio canceled a six months' agreement after about four months. He was receiving $750 a week.

There's never been a peer yet who could get along with banners flying in the movie colony, though possibly Warwick, as Michael Brooke, may yet be the exception.

quite a saga. She is said to have asked even for a special entrance and exit in a remote portion of the MGM lot pending this vexing situation of the bailiffs pursuing her.

Also she drives various cars to the studio—that is she rides in them, generally lying down on the floor of the rear compartment, until she is sure she is safe. The law has given the Swedish recluse a real time of it. But it took one process server a full month to catch up with her, and even then she dodged actually going to court for a while longer.

Social Security for Beasties—Funniest of events during the past few weeks was when one discovered that deductions were being made in pay checks for animals to cover their old-age wants and needs. Most animals don't attain the venerable sixty-five when they would come into their government inheritances. Of course, it's the owners who are really being considered.

Rosalind Russell rides high these days as she is lauded more and more by critics for her honest acting. As if "Craig's Wife" was not enough to prove it, she topped that picture with "Night Must Fall," her latest.

Why They Love Each Other conscious only of a pleasant, good-looking individual with conspicuous white teeth whom I expected to do very well for himself in pictures. Robert Taylor had something, however, which was destined to hit the cash customers right between the eyes. It was also something that was to attract a restless, meltable young woman who had been unhappy and unfortunate in her love affairs; Barbara Stanwyck.

Taylor in conformity; Barbara is resistance. This is not to say that Miss Stanwyck is difficult to work with, but her resistance to unfair treatment and the disagreeable features of life is very evident. The circumstances of her life have been such that only a determined and combative person could have successfully overcome them. It is natural that she should take comfort from the society of a stalwart, amiable, unscarred youth just as it follows that he, in his inexperience, should be stimulated by contact with a spirited, hard-driven young woman who has learned most of the answers.

Sentimental fans have been unable to understand why a real life romance did not develop between Nelson Eddy and Jeanette MacDonald, two of my favorite people both off screen and on. Reason: both represent conservatism. The stimulus of contrast was lacking, a quality which Jeanette seems to have found in Gene Raymond.

Contrasting qualities are readily observed in Claudette Colbert and her bridegroom. He is science; she is imagination. This marriage, from all I can learn, stands an excellent chance of survival.

So also does the union of Gary Cooper and Veronica Balfe, although busybodies have whispered from time to time, as they always do. Gary is strength; Mrs. Cooper is fragility.

That too great a contrast in character is as detrimental to romance as too little was proved by the hectic interlude of Lupe Velez and Gary. Lupe’s primitive nature found its complement in that of Johnny Weissmuller, an athlete whose nerves are insulated by hawserlike muscles and kept in the pink of condition by plenty of swimming.

It is not surprising that trouble brews in the Errol Flynn-Lili Damita household. Both of these attractive and interesting people represent arrogance. One such person in a home creates a problem; two create a divorce.
Errol’s arrogance is the common garden variety frequently found in Irishmen. At times he threatens to abandon civilization to its fate and return to jungle life. This threat is beginning to lose its effectiveness. As a mere Jane ion expressed it: “I wish Errol Flynn would stop talking about going to Borneo; or else go to Borneo.”

Lili’s arrogance seems not to be inherent, but of the type which a charmer develops after many conquests in the field of romance. Spoiled-beauty stuff, you know. At any rate, there seems to be a definite lack of chemical balance here.

“Yes, surely the mineral properties in the body direct the arrows of Cupid. So before you come to Hollywood, expecting to meet Robert Taylor and drop him in his tracks, give a thought to your chemical composition.

They Say in New York—

We talked about Miss Sondergaard’s husband—Herbert Biberman—and our confidence that he will direct outstanding pictures, because even on the Theater Guild stage he suggested such scope in “Roor China” and “Valley Forge.”

We—or, rather, I—held forth about the importance of her next playing a modern rôle, now that she has done so many costume pictures. She is crisp and vivid, quick in her movements, pleasantly agreeable in all her comments. I left her most reluctantly after staying much too long.

Career or Career.—Many a girl is faced with the problem of deciding between husband and career, but all that bothers Eleanor Hunt is trying to decide between a career as actress and one as writer.

She is doing right well with both, starring in a series of pictures for Grand National and busily selling sce-} narios written under the name of Cynthia Meade. And her husband, George Hirliman, a producer, finds her a swell companion through it all.

She finds it a little strenuous, though, and intends to drop one career. Thinks, perhaps, that she likes writing best, but she kinda likes her next picture “Bank Almam.”

Dropping both careers for two or three days, she flew into New York, bought a slinky block satin gown and a spectacular suit of tan skirt, clayed jacket with gloves to match, and a perky black hat with varicolored ribbons. Tried to get around to see her old friends of Ziegfeld’s “Follies” days, and suddenly was off to the airport, pencil and paper in hand.

Enough Is Enough.—If the stars don’t curb their talent for writing, there won’t be any room in Hollywood for mere writers. Anna May Wong has sold Paramount an idea for a series of pictures in which she will play a sort of female “Charlie Chan.” While they are in preparation, she is playing a few weeks in vaudeville. Not long ago, Anna May returned from Paris, a fashion plate to her finger tips, sleek, urbane, exquisite in the manner of a poster. Now she has just come from her first visit to China, and she has gone native in her dress. Wears lovely old Chinese brocades made in boxlike dresses. Such a sensation in the Algonquin lobby.

Two Love Scores Seems Permanent.

—in spite of the wry predictions of pessimists, the marriage of Helen Vincent and Fred Perry is working out beautifully. that future together if Helen doesn't curb her impetuous whim for every fine old English antique she sees.

As always, Helen dresses beautifully. She is all for the new hats with tricky veils—has veils going under, over, and around a confeu-straw toque that she wears with a slate-blue dress. Perhaps the most interesting on-looker at the Vinson-Perry experiment is Loretta Young, who has been seeing a lot of Gregory Marnin, the tennis player. If semidetached marriage works so well for one, it may for another.

Heart Room for More Favorites?—There is talk that Katharine Cornell has at last succumbed to picture offers. You will be interested, too, in a newcomer named Louise Platt, for whom Broadway predicts a brilliant film future. You will see her in Walter Wanger's "Summer Lightning."

What Is Glamour?—Ever since James Montgomery Flagg said that Madeleine Carroll is the most glamorous girl in pictures she has been trying modestly to explain what he meant. "Any woman can be glamorous," she insists, "if she will just be natural and have good old-fashioned manners. My idea of glamour is what used to be called charm, and it is based on consideration for others."

Miss Carroll came to New York for just four days, to meet her husband who is dashing over from England to see her, and to buy hats, loads and loads of hats for her picture "Lovers on Parole." When last seen, Miss Carroll was trying to commandeer all the hats at Madame Nicole's, but some of them had already been ordered by Kay Francis. She remained pleasant and charming even under that strain.

Frankly, I don't find Miss Carroll glamorous. The word always suggests aloofness and mystery, something a little phony, to me. And Miss Carroll is candid, breezy, healthy, humorous, and very friendly.

Errand of Mercy.—The record for hurried trips to town is held by Kay Francis. She came for just one day to offer consolation to Mrs. Richard Barthelmess, who had left her husband in a London hospital, suffering from sinus, while she came to New York to conduct his mother's funeral. Kay isn't always agreeable about joining her friends at parties, but she is always the one they can count on when they are in trouble.

They Say in New York—

Styles Go West Again.—When she became suddenly popular some three years ago, Mae West launched a vogue of fulsome-curved fashions, and she was a little hurt that the vogue died almost as soon as it started. Now she intends to make us take Mae West fashions and like them, and to that end has engaged Schiaparelli to design costumes for her. The same fashions that will be launched in "Frivolous Sally" were shown at Schiaparelli's Paris opening. There were huge hats with brims sweeping abruptly up one side or at the back, great padded flowers appliquéd around necklines.

Imported By Request.—When the Gaumont-British picture "Rhodes, the Diamond Master," was shown in America, our own Walter Huston, whom we thought the greatest of all actors up to that point, was overshadowed by a European named Oscar Homolka. Later, in "The Woman Alone," this same Homolka menaced Sylvia Sidney, and I didn't approve at all when she killed him. "Give the arch-villain whatever he wants" was my wish. Paramount sent for him to go to Hollywood to play in "Ebb Tide," and an admiring throng of us met him en route. Mr. Homolka was a little sheepish about compliments lavished on him for "Rhodes" because he loathed the part of "Kruger," and played it against his will. He won't play an old man again if he can avoid it.

Asked if he would not prefer playing sinister old men to being a dimpled juvenile, he retorted that he could imagine nothing more pleasant than to be Robert Taylor or Tyrone Power, surrounded by admiring women all the time. At the moment he was thus surrounded and beaming over it. But on the sidelines, and trying to brush us away, were foreign correspondents familiar with his work in the theater in Vienna and London. They switched the conversation to the higher plane of art and technique, and affable Mr. Homolka pretended to be just as annoyed as we languishing gals were.

Greatest, Greatest Is Filmed.—Kirsten Flagstad, neither young nor beautiful, according to film standards, came from Norway and conquered musical America, brought prosperity and electric excitement back to the stagnant Metropolitan Opera, and has at last consented to sing in a picture. Paramount has recorded her voice for "The Big Broadcast" in a modern song and in her most famous number, the battle cry of "Brunnhilde" in "Die Walküre."

She is a joy to her fellow workers everywhere, because she thrives on hard work, maintains a goddesslike calm through a strenuous season, and never suffers from the commonest of prima-donna complaints, hurt pride.

For instance, one night she volunteered to sing at a banquet given by a radio executive. The room grew black with smoke, and the speeches went on and on. The host dispatched a young man to take Madame Flagstad somewhere during the delay and try to pacify her. Fearing the sort of screaming indignation he is accustomed to when singers encounter either smoke or delay, the host went to meet her with some misgivings. But Flagstad was beaming. "I had a glass of champagne," she announced gleefully. "I think I am drunk! It is fun!"

knowing that she was terrified of being left alone in the house and that she didn’t want any one to know she was alone.

"Half of our friends wouldn’t speak to us when we returned," said Mrs. Nolan, "and after checking things we found that in our absence our friends had phoned, left messages of importance, and asked to have me call them at the first possible moment. Instead of telling them where we were she merely replied, ‘All right, but she’s too busy to come to the phone now. She’ll call you to-morrow.’ As this went on for days, you can imagine their feelings! It’s funny in retrospect, but it might easily have had unpleasant consequences."

In addition to other matters a secretary should know not only who her employer’s personal friends are, but also the names of persons close to him in his work.

The solution? Let the star choose his secretary with the some care that the business executive does. Let him employ not just one, but as many as are needed, and let them do secretarial work only. This may not bring about the millenium but it will go a long way toward preserving a cordial relationship between the star and his public, and what, after all, could be more important to a star?

Shirley: A $1,000,000 Industry and battle scenes. A real railroad a hundred yards long was built.

To recreate the Afghan frontier, forty miles from Hollywood in the Santa Susanna range, the studio built thirty-four sets, everything from forts to palaces. Cost of these sets, including the wages paid to carpenters and painters, exceeded one hundred thousand dollars.
Salaries are a big item, but dwarf beside the cost of crews and sets, scripts and overhead. Even Anna May, veteran elephant of the movies, collected her share of the stream of money loosened by Shirley Temple.
Any discussion of an industry must inevitably turn to the item marked depreciation. Is Shirley gaining or declining as an industry?

Barbara Read's orange-and-white bathing suit combines rubber and fishnet in unusual treatment, we think.
The books show that her value goes up every year—yes, every day and hour. As products bearing her name go out over the world, the name Shirley Temple is becoming established as representing an article of proved quality. In this way the Temples build for her future. The demand for her services on the radio increases. Each offer is larger than the last.
As for her pictures, she is leaving the baby stage behind her and has emerged definitely as an actress. Beginning with "The Littlest Rebel," more scope has been given her talents, until now scripts are written for her as an actress, not as a novelty. And since "Dimples," the crew of script writers have been careful to give her more and more opportunities for comedy, seeing how she excelled in the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" sequence.
Mrs. Temple does not like gooey sentiment and has never talked baby talk with Shirley. Consequently her dictation is excellent. Her way of putting a scene across, however, is her own.
She can pronounce hard words, if she wants, or mispronounce them if desired. In rehearsing the song, "But Definitely," for "The Poor Little Rich Girl," Mrs. Temple asked Shirley how she pronounced the title of the song. Shirley looked, "But Definately," she said. Gordon and Revel chuckled, and though on her next try Shirley gave the correct pronunciation of the word, they left in "definately."
However, she does pronounce "desert" as "besert" and "napkin" is "naffin" to her. These little idiosyncrasies her mother lets her keep.
The management of the Temple industry must, perforce, fall to her parents. George Temple, fortunately, was a banker and so can conduct the business with ability. That was a stroke of luck. She was just as lucky in her choice of mothers.
The Temple home naturally revolves about Shirley. Here the child who holds a financial empire in one moist little palm, is just a little girl having a good time. She thinks her guard is just the chauffeur, if she thinks of it at all. The huge electrically controlled gates are a convenience in her mind, not a safeguard.
But it's her empire, just the same. She even chose the land on which the house was built.
Driving out Sunset Boulevard the Temples often stopped to stroll along a beautifully wooded hill. Running ahead through the trees one day, Shirley suddenly stooped down.
When her parents came up to her, they saw two baby quails nestled contently on Shirley's outstretched hand. "This is where I want to live!" cried Shirley.
Since wishes have a way of coming true for a fairy princess, it turned out that they were able to buy the very spot. To-day the house is built around that clump of brush, and carpenters were warned not to disturb a single branch.
The Temples never fail to remember that little girls are sentimental, even though this particular one happens to rule an empire of high finance.
dozen lesser figures. The contract list has been bolstered during the year with such standbys as Herbert Marshall, Gene Raymond, Preston Foster, and John Beal, but for the most part this starless studio depends on antried newcomers like Smith Ballew, Owen Davis, Jr., and Philip Huston.

Paramount, reverting to a policy of the Clara Bow days, seems to be pinning its faith on youth, youth, and more youth. About the only first-rank star at this studio now that Cooper is departing for the Goldwyn lot, is Bing Crosby. George Raft's salary is out of all proportion to his drawing power, but the studio can't be choasy these days. Fred MacMurray has made great gains in the past year and should be a tap-rank star in 1937. But for the most part Paramount offers us, in nearly every picture, Robert Cummings, Johnny Downs, Tam Brawn, Bus ter Crabbe, Randolph Scott, Ray Milland, John Howard, Jaha Trent, and Leif Erikson, not all of whom seem to have reached voting age.

In the United Artists group, the name of Fredric March shines forth from Selznick International's astute list as sale contender. Freddie floats along unchallenged, with hand-picked stories and directors, and a legion of fans to pulverize his critics. At the Goldwyn Studio, the field is almost as sparse. Brian Aherne, last came into his own as a romantic actor in "Beloved Enemy." If he will just stick to the movies for more than three months of the year, we who admire him can trust Samuel Goldwyn to keep him on top. Goldwyn has done wonders for the hardily limited Joel McCrea, in demand now as never before.

Besides Charles Beyer, the Walter Wanger studio owns the popular, but not yet stellar, Henry Fonda, and other besides William Gargan and Alan Baxter. The studio is missing a bet by casting the latter in gangster roles. His naturalness and gift for expression would make him a favorite if properly handled.

All the lads who crowd the screen to-day can't reach the heights. Less than two years ago, Cesare Romero was the leading candidate for stardom. Before him there were Ralph Bellamy, Phillips Holmes, John Wayne—oh, you fill in the rest. Yes, they're still in pictures. You see their names in many a cast. But not in lights.

What the Fans Think

Cristo." Richard Dix is always excellent as a heroic war ace, and the actor who is very much at home, being quite mad, is John Barrymore. William Powell and Rudolph Valentino have both shone as a lawyer and a lover, respectively. Boris Karloff is a master of make-up, and Brian Aherne is one of the few screen stars able to play a poet.

Roll all these qualities into one and you have a description of Fredric March.

I am not his publicity agent. I am merely trying to give him a small part of the unlimited credit that he deserves. Every one has his or her favorite star. I have mine. He is Fredric March and long after the Taylors and Powers have come and gone I shall still carry the torch for him.

Play Fair.

As Picture Play seems unbiased, I find it a good place to air a grievance, so I hope this letter will be noticed by some enterprising producer.

Ever since Basil Rathbone scored such a success with his brilliant lifelike portrayal of Mr. Murdstone, in "David Copperfield," he has, with the exception of his role in "The Last Days of Pompeii," been typed as a sinister and unsympathetic character. Admittedly there has been some difference in the type of villain he has played, but at the bottom they were essentially heavies.

He may be a very fine villain, but why confine him to these roles? Wasn't his clever acting as Philo Vance in "The Bishop Murder Case" sufficient proof that he could play a variety of characters? It is my opinion that he would have made an ideal Parnell as he resembles him more than Clark Gable does. More important, Parnell was known as a splendid orator and surely Mr. Rathbone's clear, beautifully controlled voice would be perfect for such a film besides giving him a really sympathetic rôle which would delight all his fans.

Personalities are ten a penny—actors rare—so why not play fair with Basil Rathbone, producers?

Hard to Believe.

In May Picture Play, under the title, "Forced Popularity," Louise Gahson apparently doesn't approve of Fred MacMurray, which is something hard to believe. I should think any liberal-minded person would give credit where credit is due, and credit certainly is due Fred MacMurray who is on a level with Gable and Taylor. Imagine any one going to see MacMurray in his hit show, and saying that they can't see how he got into pictures.

Let's go back to Fred's start in Hollywood. Perhaps Miss Gahson doesn't know that he was chosen by Director Wesley Ruggles and Claudette Colbert to play opposite Miss Colbert in "The Gilded Lily." He was picked because he made a very good impression upon them, not because he was merely "next in line," at the studio.

The facts are before us, it can't be denied, MacMurray certainly does have what it takes to succeed in Hollywood.

First Choice.

I HAVE long been an ardent fan and my favorite stars are well established. Nelson Eddy is king of all. His glorious voice, looks, and sense of humor; his catchy grin, and rich speaking voice send me into raptures. Errol Flynn, handsome, arrogant, and swashbuckling he-man is next. There is no other like him in pictures.

Robert Donat's cultured and refined yet humorous portrayal of all rôles he undertakes puts him third.

Tyrene Frewer, the woman of thinking, beats Taylor by a mile. Helen Dunn.

Box 64, Mitchel Field, Hempstead, New York.

Faithful to Old-timers.

I AGREE with those who say we have had enough of newcomers. The screen is now overrun with new faces and yet producers continue their "search for talent" without taking the trouble to develop what already has been recruited. I must deplore, too, the type of player they have foisted upon us for, with the exception of a few, these discoveries have been practically all the same—youthful, superficially good looking, inexperienced and dull—indescribably dull. I admit that these new stars satisfy a large number of fickle fans who insist upon a new favorite every week, but for any one with half a mind, they could never replace old favorites.

Personally, Marlene Dietrich is my favorite star. She always has been and it would most certainly take more than a pair of eyebrows I disliked to make me lose faith.

Recently letters have appeared opining that many of the older favorites should retire and give newcomers a chance. I disagree. Why should they retire when they are still able to give the finest and most interesting performances? I, for one, refuse to believe that the old stars are limited to five years. And I think this has been discounted by the long reign of such screen notables as Garbo, Ronald Coleman, Ann Harding, Joan Crawford, Warner Baxter, Norma Shearer, and Fredric March, who have all been topnotch stars for more than five years.

About "Maytime.

For any one to miss "Maytime" is to miss seeing as splendid, lovely, and beautiful a picture as ever will be produced.

We knew Nelson Eddy's singing was the finest the screen has to offer, but did we know he was such a fine actor? Surely, after "Maytime" there'll be no more doubts concerning this artist's acting ability. He was so buoyant, gay, romantic, and so splendid in the more serious sequences of the film also.

The pinkish tint used for the May Day scenes made them breathtakingly beautiful. There do not seem to be adjectives enough to describe these sequences. Nelson and MacDonald need have no fear of being photographed in color. It is hard to imagine how truly wonderful these scenes would have been had they been made in Technicolor.

One could hardly mention "Maytime" without praising that very good actor, Herman Bing, who certainly proves he is "tops" as a comedian, by his fine work in this picture. Also, praise to John Barrymore, who was more than adequate in his rôle.

stalaces to lasting success are now negotiable, for the old man thinks of something quite different as a test for Mr. Brent. He is told to buy a certain Chinese vase and deliver it to his employer on the train that is to take him to a wedding. Mr. Brent's trouble in forcing the proprietor to open a closed shop and sell him the vase takes up most of the picture.

"Slim."—Warners. This attempt to dramatize the work of electrical line-me proves that it is the dullest and least attractive calling a man can take up. But to hear Henry Fonda talk of it you might think it as romantic as movie acting, as noble as philanthropy and as fascinating as airplaning. But then he plays a simple-minded character, a farm boy whose head is turned by seeing men aloft. Bluff Pat O'Brien, veteran of the aerial wires, familiarizes and befriends him. Then, in case you should find yourself sharing Mr. Fonda's adolescent enthusiasm for the dreary work, Mr. O'Brien succeeds to disillusion him so that you will not by any chance go out and try to get a similar job. A bearing bit of Hollywood in-terludes in Margaret Lindsay, a chic nurse, Mr. O'Brien's platonic friend of years, who, of course, falls in love with him, after which Mr. O'Brien's nobility is now so ingrained that it is no surprise that he doesn't resist Miss Lindsay's transfer of affections. What with birth, sacrifice, and the death of Mr. O'Brien, the end of the picture is the most

"Wings Over Honolulu."—Universal. Pity an aviator's bride! She is left alone days at a time while her husband pursues his duty as a naval av-man. It is only natural, according to the tenets of the cinema, that she should become involved in a barroom brawl that she should try to escape from her miserable existence aboard the yacht of a former sweetheart. Only natural, too, that her husband should pursue her in a stolen plane and that it should crack up in punishment for his thinking he could make personal use of government property. Trite as all this seems, and is, it is disguised by sensitive speech, good acting and quite distinguished photography. As usual, the shots of planes in formation are striking. Ray Milland, who is popular with Picture Play readers, is dashing and credible as the distraught aviator, and Wendy Barrie is still right as the Southern belle who falls in love at sight of Mr. Milland when he drops from the skies into her birthday party.

"Pick a Star."—MGM. Any slapstick comedy with Patsy Kelly, Jack Davey, Lyda Robert, Mischa Auer, and Laurel and Hardy is worth seeing. This certainly is although it is haphazard, formless, a series of unrelated gags more than a carefully dove-tailed play, but it is continuously funny and that, of course, is the purpose of any comedy. Much of it takes place in a motion-picture studio where Mr. Auer holds forth as the temperamental, foreign star and Rosina Lawrrence is the ingenue "who goes to his rooms" to be rescued by Jack Haley in the nick of time. There is considerable broad satire in the telling of this without expert guidance and there is virtually nothing to draw the various specialties together. The story, featuring Phil Regan and Frances Langford, hardly serves this purpose. They sing well when not chasing around cabaret watching other members of the cast enjoying the spotlight.

“The Girl Said No.”—Grand National. Modest, pleasing, this picture is more. It blazes a trail in offering the melodies of Gilbert and Sullivan for the first time on the screen, the major selections being from "Ruddigore," "Patience," "The Pirates of Penzance," "Pinafore," and a great deal of "The Mikado." The music is sung and acted by stage veterans long identified with the operettas in this country, and it is, of course, delightful. Just how Gilbert and Sullivan's delicate fun is combined with a modern, slangy comedy is another of the picture's interesting features. The conjunction is never painful, either, although it may give dyed-in-the-wool Savoyards to hear Robert Armstrong even speak to one of the sacred Gilbert and Sullivan characters. They are supposed to be a group of Thespians out of an engagement until Mr. Armstrong hoaxes them into putting on a performance for a wealthy amateur actress. Actually, she is a dance-hall hostess who is deceived by Mr. Armstrong into believing that he can make her a star. I admit all this is complicated, even fantastic, but it makes for excellent entertainment. Besides Mr. Armstrong, who is always a capital actor, Irene Hervey distinguishes herself as the girl who knows all the answers except the one that accounts for Mr. Armstrong's fascination.

"Turn Off the Moon."—Paramount. For a pleasant musical stop right here. You are not likely to find a nicer one this month, or next one, either, for the summer doldrums are here. So let's accept minor blessings with thanksgiving. This is gay, amusing, unpretentious, and it offers any number of clever people in attractive moments, all in excellent taste. Charles Ruggles heads the cast as an eccentric character, a department-store owner who runs his business and its personnel by the rules of astrology. If a salesman's horoscope indicates that he is uncongenial with vacuum cleaners he is transferred elsewhere. So, when Mr. Ruggles learns from his own horoscope that the stars will smile on him only when he brings the juvenile lovers together, you know that Johnny Downs and Eleanor Whitney will be united in the fade-out after all. Around this slender plot is built a merry structure of odds and ends of talent, including Ben Blue, that goofy comedian, Kenny Baker, whose tenor is one of the most agreeable I have heard on the screen, Phil Harris and his orchestra, and many others. Mr. Downs and Miss Whitney are likable and expert in their singing and dancing duets and Mr. Ruggles is, of course, one of the most adroit and unfailing artists that the screen has to offer.

Foundations of Beauty

There’s just one more thought for summer beauty—and it’s a generous thought about the perfect going-away gift for some one else.

You know, it’s easy enough, and fun, besides, to try out various cosmetics for ourselves, to decide exactly which one looks the best, which one smells the best, and which one is exactly suited to one’s own type. But it wouldn’t do to use this method in selecting a gift for some one else, and that’s why, it’s better to choose one of the complete kits of cosmetics, selected by experts, for a farewell gift for a traveling friend.

One of the best and most complete of these travel kits comes in a soft shade of grey lettered in dark-blue script. It contains every cosmetic a girl could possibly need, even including a lovely golden cleansing cream made from pure colloidal gold.

So, if you can bear to part with this swell kit after buying it, give it to your best friend to make her vacation happy. And stick to your own well-planned beauty routine so that you’ll look your best at all times and thus will have a very happy vacation yourself.

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE Without Calomel!—And You’ll Jump Out of Bed in the Morning Karin’ to Go

The liver should pour out two pounds of fluid bile into your bowels each day. But if it’s not flowing freely, your food doesn’t digest. It just decays in the bowels. Gas builds up your stomach. You get constipated. Your whole system is poisoned and you feel sour, sick and the world looks punk.

Laxatives are only makeshifts. A mere bowel movement doesn’t get at the cause. It takes those good, old Carter’s Little Liver Pills to get those two pounds of bile flowing freely and make you feel “up and up.” Harmless, gentle, yet amazing in making bile flow freely. "The Cream of the Crop"

"A little over a year ago I changed to Luckies because I enjoy their flavor. Ever since, my throat has been in fine shape. As my throat means so much to me in my business, it's plain common sense for me to prefer this light smoke. So I'm strong for Luckies!"

We recently told a smoker what Gary Cooper says about Luckies. The smoker replied: "Then they ought to be easy on my throat, too!" We told him how other leading artists of the screen, stage, radio and opera—together with professional people such as doctors, lawyers and lecturers—also prefer Luckies. We explained that Luckies are a light smoke because the process "It's Toasted" removes certain throat irritants naturally present in all tobacco. The smoker said: "That sounds sensible. I'll try Luckies!" . . . Why don't you try them, too?

I have recently returned from a season of theater-going in New York and I have yet to see such conditions existing in a high-class theater where great plays with great players are in progress.

The people who attend stage plays are intelligent, well-bred persons and not the gum-chewing, noisy, talkative persons who attend the cinema, nor do they make such remarks as "Ain't he just too cute," "Don't she look pretty when she smiles," et cetera.

Also in the theater there are no noisy brats running up and down the aisles or a crowd of silly school kids going into swoons whenever Robert Taylor or Tyrone Power appears.

I have recently seen Katharine Cornell, Helen Hayes, John Gielgud, and Maurice Evans, and I would like to say that there is not one Hollywood star who can equal them.

Yes, the freedom of subject matter on the stage is far ahead of the screen, and why not? Only adults attend stage plays, so they know what to expect. At the cinema, the audience is composed of many children, and most of the stage plays are too strong for them.

The movie version of "The Children's Hour" was a disappointment to me. On the screen one never got the real plot because it was too strong for movie-goers. If it were not for the superb acting of Bonita Granville in "These Three" it would have been just another Hollywood picture.

In the original play "Karen"—Miriam Hopkins on the screen—committed suicide, but of course such a sad thing could never happen on the screen.

I suppose when "Dead End" is presented on the screen the title will be changed, and the tough waterfront boys will be sissies using such words as "heck" and "dern" to express themselves.

Yes, the stage deserves the adjective "legitimate"—it is superior to the screen in every way.

The stage is the place where true talent exists. Hollywood is the place where hams exist.

Despite Bad Publicity.

I AM amazed at the progress that Alice Faye has made in the short time she has been in Hollywood. From rather a carbon copy of Jean Harlow she has developed into a girl of wholesome charm and beauty. Sincerity seems to be her keynote. She sings the music of Irving Berlin and Gordon and Revel in a manner that makes them American folk songs. With her tilted nose, Continued on page 6

What the Fans Think

Gideon may be everything Emiee Gideon says she is, but the fans of whom she is not a favorite are quite justified in criticizing her.

Justified Criticism.

What right has she to refuse interviews and fan mail when it was her choice, not ours, that she came to America and be a star instead of staying in Sweden where she belongs?

Because of this she should be willing to do whatever goes with fame and fortune. Since she thinks so little of us we are not unjustified in thinking the same of her—that she is of no importance and that we could get along beautifully without her.

What would Joan Crawford, who weeps at the slightest criticism, have done had she been set down in a strange land where people who spoke a strange tongue openly derided her? asks Emiee Gideon.

First of all, Joan does not cry at the slightest criticism. Second, this is what Joan would have done: Cried about unjust criticism because it was unjust, appreciated helpful criticism, adjusted herself to the unfamiliar land, given interviews, accepted and answered or had some one answer her fan mail, posed for photographs and proceeded to be the greatest of all actresses. It makes no difference where Joan would have gone to be an actress. She would have succeeded in any other country just as she did here because of her ability as an actress, and her ambition.

Jean Crawford is truly our greatest actress and the most sincere person in the world. It is for these things, Joan, that we admire and respect you most.

Jungle Morals of the Movies.

We all go to the movies and sympathize with the heroine, but I wonder how often we stop to think whether we should sympathize with her?

Puritan societies are always making attacks on Hollywood for bad morals, but it is not their idea of bad morals that I mean. I mean bad ethics. This does not concern whether the heroine is chaste or not, whether she drinks or smokes, but whether she is honest and loyal and fair. I have a feeling scenario writers let heroines get away with too much, and I wonder if you feel the same way about it.

A recent example that comes to mind occurred in "That Girl from Paris." Remember when Gene Raymond got off the boat and his old girl friend was there to meet him, and had lined up a job for Gene and his band? You couldn't blame her for that loyalty and, if you were that girl and saw a French intruder popping up to try and steal your boy friend, you wouldn't feel any too friendly toward her, either. You couldn't blame Lucille Ball for wanting to hang on to Gene against opposition. But Lucille isn't the heroine of the film; Lily Pons is, and Lily has to get Gene. What does she do?

The night of the opening at the café, when Lucille is going to do her dance, Lily rubs soap on the soles of her shoes, so she's a failure. An awfully funny failure, but a failure, and Lucille gets denoted to being a walk-on for Jack Oakie. And no one says much to criticize Lily for this cute little trick.

As far as the scenario writer is concerned, Lily is justified in doing this in order to win Gene; Lucille vanishes from the picture and eventually Lily gets Gene. What does the audience get? The audience gets the idea that all's fair in love, and when I say "all" I mean all.

Such behavior isn't limited to the girls. Remember "Follow the Fleet," the best of the Astaire-Rogers pictures? Remember the scene in which Ginger is to have a most important audition with a producer. She's just done her dance and sends out for a glass of water. Fred thinks some other girl is in there and puts bicarbonate of soda in the water so the girl's audition will be ruined. It is. Another very funny scene. In this case, Fred pays plenty for his trick. But the point is, if the girl in the producer's office had been some one else, Fred's little stunt would have been O. K.

In the movies certain motifs will apparently justify anything. Love is the most important, and the most forceful form of love is mother love. Barbara Stanwyck in "I Remember Mama," can't take money. She's prepared to steal to sell herself to a man she loathes, because of mother love. And any one who tries to stop her, including Joel McCrea as the kindly doctor whom she attempts to rob, is a skunk and a fool. Where did the movies get this morality?

Maybe the movies have fooled you, and maybe you like to be fooled. In any case, I wonder what you think about the jungle morals of the movies. Only your voices have any influence in Hollywood.

No More Screams, Barbara!

If there was ever any one who is definitely a "type" actress that one is Barbara Stanwyck. Why this lovely star should resort to the same antics in every film is beyond me. I am sure that so talented and versatile a person is capable of more varied characterizations.

Why does she go into a fit of screaming in every film? Every time I see one of her pictures I sit in my seat ill at ease waiting for her outburst of yells. When that is finished I can then relax and enjoy the remainder of the picture. So please, Barbara, no more screams.

The Whole World Listens.

In the May issue Tommy Capizzi expressed his thoughts and ideas on the subject of whether Grace Moore should have "Miss" in front of her name when the picture reads "Starring Miss Grace Moore." I heartily concur and I was just wondering when some one was going to bring that subject to every one's attention. He was the first to do so. I say, too, why shouldn't she be called "Miss"? She certainly deserves it.

A. G.—Jean Arthur's right name is Gladys Greene; Martha Raye's, Marjorie Reed. Elizabeth Allan and Josephine Hutchinson and, as far as I know, so do Grace Bradley, Claire Dodd, Miriam Hopkins, Valerie Hobson, Claire Trevor, and Jane Wyatt.

Another Fan.—Yes, it is true that Ross Alexander is dead. He committed suicide on January 2nd. His last picture was "Ready, Willing and Able."

M. M. M.—Still are photographs showing scenes from a film. You'll find them in theater lobbies advertising current and forthcoming productions. We use them in our Preview section. "Naughty Marietta" was represented in this way in May, 1933, and "Maytime" in March, 1937. The frontispiece of the January, 1936, issue carried a full-page black and white photo of Jeanette MacDonald and Nelson Eddy from "Rose-Marie." Stories about Miss MacDonald appeared in August, 1931; July, 1932; August, 1933; September, 1934; January and December, 1936. Stories about Mr. Eddy in January, June, October, and December, 1936.

Eva Chang.—Only stills of recent pictures are supposed to be available. The address of Columbia Pictures' Publicity Dept. is 729 Seventh Avenue, New York.

Rolly Nable.—Frankie Darro's next picture is "Saratoga." Judy Garland appeared with Deanna Durbin in a MGM short entitled "Every Sunday." Judy's latest is "Broadway Melody of 1938."

M. M.—Frances Langford was born in Lakeland, Florida, April 4, 1916; five feet three and a half, weighs 100, and has black hair and blue eyes. Her mother, Annie Newbern, was a concert pianist. As a young girl, Frances gained local popularity by singing at school and church affairs. Later she attended Southern College where she sang soprano in the Glee Club. Then she had her tonsils removed, emerging from the hospital a contralto. During school vacation she went to Florida and appeared on a commercial radio program. Rudy Vallée happened to be there and heard one of her programs. He arranged for her to appear as a guest star on his next broadcast. She came to New York in June, 1931, where she sang on commercial programs and took a whirl at the stage in "There Goes the Bride," which failed. Next she tried vaudeville and was a great success. The result was a really good radio contract, which she supplemented by work in New York vaudeville and cabarets. Then came her Hollywood contract with Paramount. Her latest is "The Hit Parade." Due to illness she was forced out of the cast of "Vogues of 1938." Next is with James Cagney, in "Something to Sing About."

Cooper- Bartholomew Fan.—The last interview we had with Jackie Cooper was published in October, 1931. Freddie Bartholomew was born in London, England, April 28, 1921. There is no fan club in his honor on my list.

Gale Scott.—Bonita Granville was born in Chicago, Illinois, in 1923. She is the daughter of a stage actor, the late Bernard "Bunny" Granville. Her latest is "The Life of Zola." Lionel Barrymore's latest are "A Family Affair" and "Captains Courageous," with "Saratoga" to follow.

Marvin Howell.—Mar West gives her birthdate as August 17, 1892. Clark Gable has been married to Josephine Gable and Rita Hayworth. Marvin Knowelden played the role of Lucille Layton in "Rainbow on the River."

Bobby Hood.—Desmond Tester, who played with Nova Pilbeam, in "Nine Days a Queen," was born in London, England, February 17, 1909; five feet one, with auburn hair and hazel eyes. His parents are nonprofessionals. He has had stage experience. He is currently appearing in Maurice Chevalier's latest picture, "The Beloved Vagabond." Peggy Wood recently appeared on Broadway in "Miss Quis."

Virginia Rich.—Although "The Rogue Song" was not represented in our preview section, two stills from the film were used to illustrate a story about Lawrence Tibbett entitled "Enter an Opera Star" in the issue of January, 1930. The picture was reviewed in May, 1930, accompanied by a still of Mr. Tibbett with Catherine Dale Owen. Although the magazine sold for twenty-five cents at that time, they will now cost you fifty cents if you wish to order them from our Subscription Department.

Langford Fan.—Frances Langford has recovered from her recent illness, the cause of which I do not know, and will resume her movie career.

A. F. K.—Felix Knight Assembly.—When the cast of "Pick a Star" was assembled, Felix Knight was included in the cast, but for some reason or other he was not in the picture when it finally was released. He has been mentioned for no immediate picture. If MGM is unable to supply his photograph, I am unable to suggest who might.

E. M.—John Mack Brown was born September 1, 1904; Ray Corrigan, February 14, 1909. They are both with Republic Pictures, 4801 Radford Avenue, North Hollywood, California.

she is by far the screen's greatest and most natural actress and the world's greatest singer, else she wouldn't have come by the title of "Prima Donna" which makes her different from the others and sets her on the highest pinnacle.

I, too, have never missed any of her pictures and never shall, but I am inclined to disagree with Mr. Capizola on playing bit parts or none at all. Her hair dress, too, is particularly unbecoming. And she would look younger and prettier if she would revert to her original hair shade.

I adore Greta Garbo on the screen but cannot understand how she gets away with ignoring her fans as she does. Is there any excuse for Robert Taylor and that pretty widow's peak that becomes more pronounced with every picture?

Marlene Dietrich is losing droves of fans by her bad taste in publicity—i.e., appearing everywhere with every man except her husband.

We fans will not have Sonja Henie, Simone Simon, or Eleanor Powell thrust upon us. Sonja is a good skater, Eleanor a fine dancer with no personality, and Simone of the Simons an inferior actress. Why not give the experienced people a chance, and stop looking for "new faces"?

I predict that Mervyn Douglas will be our next big sensation if given the right roles. He stole "The Gorgeous Hussy" right from under Joan Crawford's girl, and in spite of that "entrance" she made. DIANE KANE.

Not Enough of Nelson Eddy.

AFTER seeing "Maytime" twice, I am reminded of what Norbert Lask wrote of Nelson Eddy more than a year ago—that his acting career was only just beginning. It is, indeed, and gloriously continuing.

Truly, no artist has so completely justified the acclaim of his fans as Nelson Eddy. It's hard not to fall back on schoolgirl extravagance in speaking of him. He satisfies every human emotion and even puts your favorite dream to shame. To find words adequate to describe the physical man and his voice would bankrupt the dictionaries. There is something about him that tingles the air with splendor, and you associate him immediately with nobility and the sort of grandeur you have to be born with.

Audiences gasped with delight when he was revealed as a master of comedy, particularly in facial expression, which was inimitable. He is just as uniquely Nelson Eddy in this field as he is the Prince Charming of romance, the baritone of the age. In his brief dramatic encounter with John Barrymore, he suffered not the least by comparison.

I wonder if I am speaking out of turn by saying there has been altogether too much of Jeanette MacDonald in all the Eddy films? Jeanette is a pretty and amusing partner but I noticed the crowd was rather restive in "Rose-Marie" and "Maytime" until Mr. Eddy appeared, and I heard whispers all around, "When does Nelson come on?"

I repeatedly felt in this latest picture that Jeanette deliberately held the spotlight, and have heard dozens express the same opinion. Certainly Nelson Eddy's voice deserves better treatment than has lutherito been accorded by his studio.

In fact, I am definitely in favor of a new costar for him and a great big robust role that will introduce him in the first reel for a change. CECILE.

Anne Shirley is learning how to dress interestingly as well as girtishly. Her best role to date is in "Stella Dallas."
What the Fans Think

Claude Rains has no equal in portraying a perversion and evil character. His next picture is "They Won't Forget."

handsome man in the world, but we do not overlook his acting, which we think is marvelous. I do not think his photographs reflect overdeveloped egotism. You are absolutely right about Marlene Dietrich and Janet Gaynor.

VICTORIA GARCIA VICTORICA,

I WOULDN'T like to add my nickel's worth to this controversy about music in the movies. Once more it's been proved that, as Shakespeare said, "The play's the thing," or rather, in movies we say the story's the thing. I'm referring to "Maytime." It has been done for Jeannette MacDonald what "One Night of Love" did for Grace Moore, who, I'm afraid, has suffered from lack of poor stories rather than ability.

I must say I don't think Norbert Lusk in his review was quite right when he said that Grace Moore and Lily Pons can take second place to Jeannette MacDonald since "Maytime," because the star is hardly better than her story or vehicle. Take any player, even though he is not a star, and give him a good story, good direction, cast, and beautiful mounting, and, if he has the ability that it takes, he will turn in a good performance in a good picture. On the other hand, take away any of these requisites from the player, and he finds it difficult to come through.

Both Miss Moore and Miss Pons, as well as Miss Swarthout, and other Metropolitan Opera stars, have proved their ability to sing else they wouldn't have made the "Met," something that Miss MacDonald has yet to accomplish.

It is quite a different thing to sing on the sound track, with technicians on every hand to aid you, take out what is bad, and build up the good points, than it is to fill the concert hall from orchestra pit to balcony with one's voice so that it can be heard to its best advantage over that span of space.

Of course, as this magazine deals with movies, we should stick to that point, but what I'm trying to put across is the idea that the stars your reviewer thinks ought to take second place are superior in voice to Miss MacDonald, but have not had the stories handed to them by their studios that Miss MacDonald has been fortunate enough to get.

I feel, too, that Nelson Eddy has added much to the popularity of Miss MacDonald, despite the fact that we read that the two do not get on together so well, due, perhaps, to professional jealousy.

What Miss MacDonald has yet to learn is to mouth her words beautifully, as Miss Moore does, instead of letting them come through what appears to be a gash in her face with a row of teeth showing. She doesn't fit her lips to her words, and therefore, sings as though it were an effort, rather than a pleasure, as Miss Moore's laughing twinkling personality always indicates.

Miss Swarthout gives the same impression of being pleased to sing for us, and Lily Pons doesn't have to make an effort. Miss Moore's full, resonant voice, considered by many the best dramatic soprano of the day, couldn't be compared with Miss MacDonald's lyric soprano. The latter has just a pleasant high voice, such as is possessed by many young singers on the radio to-day. As for quality, I'm afraid she falls short.

Gross Injustice.

A LETTER like E. T. C.'s, of Chicago, in the June issue, is really just plain nasty.

As far as Garbo, in "Camille" overshadowing Robert Taylor—it is true. She did not, Taylor, for a beginner, and one so young, give a fine, sensitive portrayal but Garbo also was very convincing, full of depth and intensely human. Those last scenes of hers, before the death of Marguerite, were truly magnificent. Any one who could see the picture and not be moved must have a heart of stone.

To attribute her success in that role to the fact that she has, according to E. T. C., one foot in the grave, is about the most irrelevant, callous remark I've ever heard.

The writer claims to know and appreciate the meaning of depth of character in referring to Robert Taylor. Why not practice a bit of the analytical on yourself—ask yourself why you don't see realness and grand characterization when it's right before your eyes?

E. T. C. obviously is so wrapped up in the Taylor boy that any one getting quite so close to him as Greta does—and does she do it beautifully!—would sicken with envy. Uncontrolled emotions can be understood, but what childishness toward a human being?

Simpering, consumptive Greta—what shameful injustice! ESLIE DIAN.

Sing, John Boles, Sing.

I WAS delighted to read the very nice things in the interesting article on John Boles in the April issue, but there was some pain mixed with the pleasure.

It said that he may never sing again on the screen, but confine his singing to the radio. Now that may be all very well for Mr. and Mrs. Junior America, but it's no good for us in Australia. Since the general listener is unable to hear Mr. Boles's program, we would thus have no opportunity of hearing one of the finest voices I have ever heard on the screen, radio, or concert platform.

John Boles has proved himself a splen-
What the Fans Think

I HAVE just finished reading "What the Fans Think" for May and I thought I'd like to say my two cents' worth.

First, to Tommy Hale: I agree with him on some things but when he wrote "She's awful," meaning Sybil Jason, I really hit the ceiling. How in the name can one say such a thing about a child as sweet and lovable as Sybil? Saying such a thing is absolutely excusable.

To Joan Drummond:

In defense of lovely Ann Harding—you call her "hard as Harding." Of course, that is only her screen name—my advice to you, Joan, is to get a good photo of Miss Harding and study it and if you still think her "hard" then I guess you can't help being that way. Also any woman who will fight for her child, as Miss Harding did, is not so "hard"—there's something tender somewhere.

To "Chico" and Ennie Gideon:

Good for you two for saying such nice things about the lovely Garbo. I wish people would let her have some peace. She has well earned a bit of comfort for her fine work in pictures, only there are a few brainless blabbers who wouldn't give their own mothers a hand of appreciation. I think Garbo is the finest person I have ever seen on the screen. I, too, admire her courage in living as she pleases, shows she's got intelligence and backbone.

To Nell Lutjic:

What's this you say of Jane Withers, about watching her waistline? Well, of all the—oh, never mind! For goodness' sake, can't you leave the child alone? It isn't time for her to start worrying about her figure and, besides, who can object to seeing a perfectly healthy child on the screen as long as you get your money's worth? You say Shirley Temple has a streamlined figure. Wouldn't it have been better taste if you had said Shirley is a well-formed child, or words to that effect? Sure, Shirley can dance—but so can Jane—Shirley can act—but so can Jane—Shirley can sing—but so can Jane. And Jane is a budding young comédienne and, believe me, that is something.

Guess that's all except to tell you that I've got a couple of extra special favorite comedians—one is a comédienne—Bob Burns and Martha Raye. Oh, boy! They're what I call real people. And believe me, Dietrich has nothing on the Raye legs. They're beautiful. As for Bob Burns, all I can say is I wouldn't miss a picture that he's in for love or money.

Not an Animated Dummy.

HAVE just read Mildred Post's letter in the June issue. I do not think Nelson Eddy overrated. He deserves all the praise he gets. His voice is perfectly grand. Have seen him twice on the concert stage. It is inspiring just to be in his presence.

I'm sure many of Mr. Eddy's fans will want to defend him against being called an "animated dummy." How could Miss Post say anything so cruel about a grand person like Mr. Eddy? She says he is not an actor but a singer. Some folks forget that the rest of us love to see his pictures, I see them over and over again. I think he is perfect. He wouldn't need to do any acting for me. I'm satisfied just to see him smile and hear his wonderful voice.

Nino Martini is my favorite tenor, but I do not think he would be as well teamed with Jeannette MacDonald as Nelson Eddy. They're so charming together. I hope to see and hear them in more pictures like 'Naughty Marietta,' "Rose-Marie" and especially "Maytime." Marie Schallflieger, 233 West Center Street, Fostoria, Ohio.

Why Not Foreigners?

I GO to the movies four and sometimes six times a week. I take six to eight movie magazines and listen to all radio programs connected with the movies. So I guess I know a little about the stars,

In May Picture Play I read a letter headed "Why Foreigners?" I felt sorry for the writer of that letter. Mrs. W. G. Bassett referred to Simone Simon particularly. Poor Simone! Many people don't like her but I, for one, would rather have her than Robert Taylor. I have seen all Simone's pictures two and three times, and intend to see every one she makes. I cannot wait until her pictures come out. I never liked Garbo and I wouldn't care when she went home, but after seeing her in "Camillo," I don't ever want her to go home.

As far as giving our boys and girls a chance, they have all the opportunity in the world, but they just can't make the grade. I think Simone, Sonja Henie, Garbo, Luise Rainer, Fernand Gravet, Brian Aherne, and Merle Oberon are just a few foreign stars who are as good, if not better, than some of our own. When American actresses or actors go abroad to make pictures, they are not treated with kindness. Why shouldn't the foreign actresses be treated equally? If the other countries don't object to our stars, why should we object to theirs?

I know only one reason to send foreign stars back. It is because some of them are better than American actresses and actors. We haven't enough sportsmanship to admit it. The foreign stars are just stepping ahead of ours. I can't see how some of our actresses and actors ever got in the movies. To some of our American stars I say, "Wake up or you will be left behind."

Garbo is synonymous with: Glamour
And since Garbo’s name spells money we might add countless: “Grands”
If you don’t believe it ask: Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer
NEVER was the death of a star more widely and sincerely mourned than the passing of Jean Harlow. Her youth, beauty, fame, made her name a household word. Her simplicity and innate kindness endeared her to those who knew her personally and shone out from the characters she played, reaching and warming those who only knew her on the screen. She died more truly beloved than many a queen.

YOUNG as she was, she had stood the test of character. Her career was the triumph of character over public opinion. Had she not been possessed of strength, fineness and sincerity she could never have survived criticism, prejudice and hostility. Yet, she conducted no campaign, instigated no publicity to acquaint the world at large with her true worth as a woman, did not proclaim to any one her virtues which were strongly at variance with general opinion. Instead, she practiced, but did not preach, and presently those who doubted became believers in one of the screen’s strangest anomalies—Jean Harlow, actress, and the lovable contradiction known as “Baby” to her friends.

SHE waged a long, slow fight to reveal the character that was hers. At the outset of her career, following her appearance in “Hell’s Angels,” she aroused prejudice in Hollywood because of her flamboyant personality which then included the famous platinum hair and an apparently uninhibited sex appeal. Even when she was signed by Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer and groomed in make-up, contour and dressing, she met with no warm welcome from those stars already sure of themselves at the studio. Far from it! No foreigner ever faced more antagonistic fellow players than Jean Harlow. But instead of thinking of ways to defy them or show them at a disadvantage, she tried to improve herself, to express her inner self to those with whom she came in contact and, of course, to polish her acting on the screen.

HERS was not an overnight success. It was not until her sense of humor was permitted to show itself in her roles that she became one of our first comedienne. “Red-headed Woman” was the turning point and the most acute critics of acting regard “Dinner at Eight,” “Bombshell,” and “Libeled Lady” as the pictures that revealed her at her brilliant best. Their popularity was a boon to Jean Harlow and a hurt at the same time. For in each of them she was the familiar wise-cracking, materialistic girl every one enjoyed and understood and unthinkingly accepted as a good deal like Jean Harlow, herself. That is, her characters became a reflection of herself to all except those who knew her personally. She smaried under the unfairness of this even while enjoying the popularity that her work brought her. She was too sensible to be ungrateful, too amiable and well disposed toward every one to blame any one.

THERE is no record of even a word, and certainly not an action, unworthy of the well-born, educated girl that Jean Harlow was from the beginning of her work in Hollywood until the end. There likewise is no record of a disappointed or disillusioned fan. She met her obligations to life, work, friends and the public with a conscientious thoroughness that in itself underscored a character as extraordinary as we are ever likely to find among the stars.

NO star ever had to contend with as much as she did. The notoriety forced upon her was not of her choosing nor was it the consequence of any rashness of hers. It was what life and fate meted out to try her spirit and solidify her character, to test her for that succor from turmoil which we cannot but believe she now enjoys.
Soft and Sharp Focus

SOMETHING new—besides new faces—in Hollywood at last! A Paramount publicity bulletin informs us of something nothing short of revolutionary. It describes the effect of perfumes on the acting of stars. Theodore Reed, directing Bing Crosby’s “Double Or Nothing,” believes that perfumes may be used to stimulate players and cause them to react emotionally in various ways. So he says he has odors injected through ventilators into sound stages where Mr. Crosby, Mary Carlisle, Andy Devine, Martha Raye, and Benny Baker are working.

MR. REED submits an account of his first experiment. “An odor of mint has a stimulating effect. It seemed to revive players and worked well about four p.m., when energies were low,” he states. Our suggestion is to accompany the fragrance of mint with the sound of tinkling ice when acting energy is ebbing. The association of ideas will be so great that nothing short of genius will flame. Mr. Reed further informs that Mr. Crosby and Miss Carlisle react best in love scenes when heliotrope is wafted on the air, that Miss Raye’s art is aided by the odor of geranium, and so on.

BUT all this is elemental. The possibility of perfume blends is what intrigues. If Mr. Crosby and Miss Carlisle respond to simple heliotrope, think what their reaction to “Indiscreet” would be! Or “My Sin” or “Foolish Virgin”! Just what “aid” Miss Raye can derive from mere geranium is beyond us when we consider the unlimited possibilities held by a whiff of “Moment Supreme” or “Now or Never.” The use of perfume should not be confined to the expensive stars, either. It can inspire extras, too. For a horse-racing drama, the breezes should envelop the grand stand with “Blue Grass” to spur the crowd to the right reaction. Even the nags themselves would give all they had under the added stimulus.

NOW that the silly season is officially opened we must let one of our leading stage dramatists carry it on. Maxwell Anderson speaking. Ladies and gentlemen, Mr. Anderson shares with Eugene O’Neill the pedestal of greatness in the theater. Not this season, but for many seasons he has contributed solid achievement to the American stage. His poetic dramas include “High Tor,” “Winterset,” “Wingless Victory,” “Mary of Scotland,” “Elizabeth and Essex,” and other substantial plays. Like many others, he hasn’t a high opinion of the screen. Far from tolerant, he excoriates the cinema in terms that reach a new high in furious contempt. The screen has never harmed him nor lessened his prestige. In fact, it filmed two of his plays, “Mary of Scotland” and “Winterset.” Nevertheless, Mr. Anderson says that pictures are a “simulacrum of the real thing, a reprint series, a line of glossy, refurbished second-hand clothes. They are too ephemeral in time and materials to create an art. The test of an art is endurance, and in any endurance contest the films have as much chance against the stage as the celluloid cat chasing the asbestos rat through hell.” I just thought I’d tell you what Mr. Anderson thinks about the movies when he isn’t writing poetic drama.

THERE are later developments in the “case” of Simone Simon than you will find on following pages of Picture Play which were printed sooner than this. Instead of taking an indefinite vacation abroad, the French minx—and most captivating little artist—has been recalled by 20th Century-Fox and even now is in Hollywood filming “Love and Kisses,” with Walter Winchell and Ben Bernie. Of course, there’s no knowing if she will finish her stint or be stricken ill or withdraw from the cast because of “unsuitability.” All these reputed causes have stood in the way of her appearance in pictures for which she has been announced. But at least her critics can’t say that she wasn’t wanted for “Love and Kisses.”

PRODUCERS had better do something about voice doubling before it is too late. I take my cue from letters addressed to The Oracle, “What the Fans Think,” and The Editor. Fans doubt every player who sings nowadays except topnotch warblers. Either they are openly skeptical or come right out and ask who sang for the star. Latest example is Jack Haley in “Wake Up and Live.” His reputation has been impaired by the discovery that another song “Never in a Million Years” for him. It wasn’t the fan magazines that let out the secret, either, but newspaper columnists who gloated over the discovery of a rare item of inside information. They broadcast the fact more speedily than any monthly magazine could have done. This means that every star who sings will be doubted, and if he or she sings well the success will be discounted. Either stars should refuse to use doubles, or if a singing voice is necessary for the fullest effect of a rôle, the owner should be given credit. Then the curiosity of fans would be satisfied, the star would gain from being honest, and just so much more cynical doubt would be eradicated from public consciousness.
THE whole world of fans showers joyful good wishes on Gene Raymond and Jeanette MacDonald as the favorite bride and groom of the year—and many years! They were married June 16th at the Wilshire Methodist Episcopal Church, and received their friends under a bower of pink roses afterward.
Mr. Powell paid $25,000 for the crypt in which Miss Harlow rests, entrance to which is marked by the distant statue on the left side of the corridor. The bronze casket is sealed in the wall.

"And neither the angels in heaven above,
Nor the demons down under the sea,
Can ever dissemble my soul from the soul
Of the beautiful Annabel Lee."

VERS in that Edgar Allan Poe penned to a lost romantic ideal nearly one hundred years ago might be written again to-day to typify the strange love in death of William Powell for Jean Harlow.

Most curious of all Hollywood elegies of devotion—and elegies of devotion are singularly rare in movieland—is the dedication of an actor's sentiment in visible and spiritual farm to a woman vanished into another realm.

Poe feverishly sung threnodies of sorrow to his Leanare, his Eleanora, his Ligeia and his Ulalume; Powell offers tribute in marble, bronze, and white perpetual blossoms to the memory of a beauteous Jean.

The spectral loves of Edgar Allan Poe find a match in the spirit bride of a modern actor. For how else but as a bride of the spirit to Bill is Jean to be considered in the light of all that happened surrounding her death, and the actions of the man by whom she was captivated, during that sadly eventful time?

Bill Powell bought the tomb in which Jean Harlow's body now lies, following her passing the seventh of June. He was a broken man after her death. No one who saw him at the funeral would ever deny that.

Eyes covered with dark glasses, hands clenched, he stumbled up the pathway that led to the mourners' entrance to the church. On one arm was his mother, Mrs. Nettie Powell, and on the other Otis Wiles, an MGM employee who knows him well. Close behind and with Bill part of the time was Nall Gurney, agent and friend for many years.

Nor the demons down under the sea,
Can ever dissemble my soul from the soul
Of the beautiful Annabel Lee."

Bill was no less affected than Jean's own mother. It seemed too bitterly tragic to both of them—death striking at the girl whom they both had known as "Baby," the woman who, after all, was just in her twenties, and therefore but little more than a child.

There were many unhappy rumors just before Jean's death. Gossips said she and Bill had broken up. Because Jean was seen in public with Donald Friede, the publisher—they probably were discussing a book she had written—it was assumed that she had a new interest, a new flame.

There was gossip in one column to the effect that Bill had been at a night club the evening before Jean's death. His friends were furious at the report. "It had absolutely no substance," they said.

One of Bill's closest associates told me: "I know that he hasn't had a chance to read anything like that. One of his friends has kept all newspapers from him. Those things would hurt him deeply if he knew. Bill really regarded Jean as something sacred in his life. It was as if she were really his wife."

When Bill made the gift of the crypt in which Jean was to repose, Mrs. Jean Bello, her mother, stated: "We appreciate Mr. Powell's farewell gesture of love, and we believe that it is only fair to him to disclose that as a shrine for Jean he bought the room where she will lie forever, and with us he will be enabled to visit it, knowing that in spirit she is not far away."

Right after this, two commentators, ignoring the significance of this amazing tribute, said that while such and such might be the case, a certain white gardenia which was clasped in Jean's hand as she lay in the casket was not from Powell but from Friede. Yet there is absolutely no question that it was Powell's last token and message to the star. I verified that. On the unsigned card were the words, "Good night, my dearest darling."

From close friends I understood at the time that Bill did not expect this to receive the notoriety of publicity. It was a thought from him to Jean alone. Bill tendered no other floral tribute. That was his intimate one to the woman he loved.

The blanket of lilies of the valley and gardenias that covered the casket were from Mrs. Bello and from Bill's father, William Powell, Sr., and his mother.

Jean's crypt is in the Sanctuary of Benedict of Forest Lawn Cemetery, where many stars have found their final resting place. John Gilbert is on a hillside under a whispering pine tree. Ross Alexander is not far away. Lon Chaney, Will Rogers, Fred Thomson—but not Rudolph Valentino, who lies in the Hollywood Cemetery—are others sequestered in vaults, or whose ashes are to be found in the Glendale burying place.

Right next to Jean's room is that of Irving Thalberg. Norma Shearer visits it constantly, just as Marlene Dietrich even to-day keeps red roses on the Gilbert grave. Telling examples of a loyalty that goes beyond mortal separation.

Jean's room, like many others, is an open one, though entrance is forbidden into the sanctuary itself. Her casket

"THE HURRICANE."
KAY FRANCIS, singer in a cheap café, is held for the murder of Basil Rathbone, concert pianist. Forced out of her silence, she admits the reason for her act. Once a great star, she deserted the stage to marry Ian Hunter. While he is at war, she meets the pianist who forces his attentions upon her. The husband returns, divorces her, and takes their child, who grows up to be Jane Bryan.
JEANETTE MacDONALD, in her latest musical, is Spain's most popular entertainer of the early Napoleonic period. In reality she is a Spanish spy. In this Rudolf Friml operetta, she is teamed with tenor Allan Jones, a French spy posing as a wealthy young Spaniard. Outer left, "The Firefly" sings for Warren William, one of Napoleon's staff officers.
PAUL MUNI, in the title rôle, is a struggling French novelist who has a passion for truth. A woman of the streets, Erin O'Brien-Moore, with "Zola" on the left page, inspires him to write a novel which is a great success, and which saves him and his wife, Gloria Holden, above, from poverty. While trying to save the life of "Captain Alfred Dreyfus," played by Joseph Schildkraut, left, shown with his wife, Gale Sondergaard, he is himself sentenced to prison.
WILD AND WOOLLY

JANE WITHERS continues to be a cute little troublemaker, and in this she serves to bring about a reconciliation between her grandfather and the president of the Mesa City Bank, who have been feuding for years. Top, Robert Wilcox, playboy son of a wealthy Eastern newspaper publisher, and Pauline Moore, Jane's school-teacher, plead with "Gramp Flynn," Walter Brennan, to abandon his idea for a duel. Above, Carl "Alfalfa" Switzer.
MARLENE DIETRICH, wife of Herbert Marshall, English diplomat, who unthinkingly neglects her, meets Melvyn Douglas. Later the two men meet and the husband brings his new friend home to meet his wife. Forced to cancel a "second honeymoon," Miss Dietrich goes to Paris to keep a date with Mr. Douglas. Suspicious, the husband follows. There is a show-down, with a surprise ending. The butler is Ernest Cossart.

Garbo
GRETA GARBO has Charles Boyer for her leading man in "Marie Walewska," the title of which is subject to change, a historical romance of Napoleon and his great love for the Polish countess. Forced to marry a royal princess for state reasons, the great man was separated from the woman he loved. Right, he and Reginald Owen, as "Talleyrand," receive some Turkish diplomats.
HENRY STEPHENSON, right, proposes to his young wife that she try to save Poland by trading on Napoleon's infatuation for her and by appealing to him. But when she realizes that she loves Napoleon for himself, and tells her husband the truth, he warns her that the emperor is doomed to fail; that he will forget her; that she could never be his wife or empress. Bottom, Boyer visits the old countess, Maria Ouspenskaya.

The BOX OFFICE

The team of Nelson Eddy-Jeanette MacDonald is tops in romance as well as charm.

Exhibitors say Katharine Hepburn's popularity was forced, even exaggerated.

Like by you and me, Tyrone Power doesn't congest the nation's theater lobbies—yet.

At a standstill two years ago, Gary Cooper has shot upwards amazingly of late.

Marlene Dietrich, say the exhibitors, never meant much at the box office. Just so-so.

WHAT STARS DOES THE NATION

WHO are the money stars of America as of noon to-day?

Let's look into the box offices of the country to find out the real, honest-to-goodness answer. The Box offices at Average Town, U. S. A., tell all the answers.

The tap flight ten favorites, os we go ta press, turn out to be: Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers, Nelson Eddy and Jeanette MacDonald, Shirley Temple, Robert Taylor, Clark Gable, Claudette Colbert, Gary Cooper, Dick Powell.

By twelve o'clock tomorrow there may be variations. Things happen that quickly when you're playing with fickle thing, public favor.

Don't think I'm guessing. In getting the facts for this story I had, first, the help of Terry Ramsaye, who edits the chief trade publication in the movie field, "The Motion Picture Herald." I had the benefit of his "What the Picture Did for Me" department, which studies, assimilates, and reports the findings of the nation's exhibitors, the men who present the pictures to you. Eight thousand six hundred exhibitors reported to "The Herald" and 8,600 exhibitors certainly ought to know the answers. And I had the benefit of inside information at various film companies. These sources are secret, of course, but they are reliable, honest and, I believe, accurate.

Let me go back to the first ten and give you a few details about them.

Robert Taylor, of course, is the outstanding personality. "Camille," which did business but was not very popular, did not help or hurt him. Neither did it help Garbo who, exhibitors report, has been away fom the screen too long. The public forgets quickly these days. Taylor, the exhibitors say, needs modern, young-man stories. Not comedies, such as "Personal Property," in which you laugh at him. No, they say, he should have breezy, personable yarns to insure his popularity.

The Astaire-Rogers combination is hotter than hot. Each new film sets new records. Will the plan to feature somebody else with Fred hurt, when Ginger stars by herself? We'll see. The exhibitors are apprehensive, however.

Hot, too, is the Eddy-MacDonald team, in a different way. Theirs is the field of romance and charm. "Naughty Marietta," "Rose-Marie," and "Maytime" were exactly right—and box-office records resulted.

Little Shirley Temple, poor dear, is slipping just a bit, if I may believe my reports. Her last film was good, the two before that pretty weak. Result: The Temple stock is down a bit. "Wee Willie Winkie," of which there are pleasant advance reports, may help little Shirley back again. We'll see.

Gary Cooper has climbed a lot during the year. Indeed, two years ago exhibitors thought he was all through. He was helped greatly by both "Mr. Deeds Goes to Town" and "The Plainsman." This last violated all advance predictions—costume Westerns were taboo—by being an outstanding box-office smash.

Dick Powell and Claudette Colbert maintain a steady pace. Clark Gable—well, up a little if anything. And, let me whisper, exhibitors are not afraid of what his recent unpleasant court experiences may do to his popularity. They think it will help him, in fact.

Now let us get around to some of the other outstanding stars. Jean Crawford possibly ought to be rated among the first-run luminaries. She has done nothing outstanding in the last eight months—"The Gorgeous Hussy" and "The Last of Mrs. Cheyney" were positive blamers—but Joan holds her own.

Bill Pawell has been helped a great deal by "The Great Ziegfeld," strongly received everywhere. The only complaint about this lavish musical is that it is pretty long for the small city and town theater to handle. "My Man Godfrey," one of the season's outstanding smashes, was another first aid to the Pawell popularity.

Errol Flynn has been moving up all year, slow but sure. That suave comic, Robert Montgomery, on the other hand, has been moving down a bit. Which probably accounts for his efforts to get away from smooth, flip comedy such as "Piccadilly Jim," with his earnest acting in "Night Must Fall."

Paul Muni stays about the same, recognized as a good actor but not meaning a great deal at the box office. Muni's draw depends entirely upon his vehicle.

Janet Gaynor fell off definitely during the last twelve months but "A Star Is Born" may lift her back. One picture can change a player's whole career, either far better or for worse, as you know.

Wallace Beery is way off, largely due to lack of appearances on the screen. Beery does not seem anxious to work.

Check a lot of steady progress upward for Charles Boyer. The lad is coming along. Jean Arthur has been in a lot of hits—"Mr. Deeds," "The Plainsman," "History Is Made at Night"—yet the exhibitors say she doesn't mean a nickel at the till. A pleasant personality but no draw.

Marlene Dietrich, say the nation's exhibitors, never meant much at the box office. She never was high in favor; she isn't now. Just so-so. Dolores del Rio is way off, almost forgotten.

The exhibitors believe that Katharine Hepburn's vague was manufactured, at least that it was exaggerated. She means little at nothing at the box office and her recent excursion into Barrie, "Quality Street," has not helped.

Young Tyrone Power is a cameral-upper but he doesn't congest the nation's lobbies yet. Just a nice draw—yet. But, despite what you and I may have thought, he is no Taylor—yet.

Fred MacMurray climbed during the year. Not a sensational climb but a definite one.

That casual, wah-wah singer, Bing Crosby, holds a pretty strong spot on the screen, as he does on the radio. His films have a definite, ingratiating quality.
Irene Dunne and Myrna Loy did nice work during the past year but they are not great draws, by any means. Exhibitors report that fans like Miss Loy with Bill Powell. The team is a natural, they say.

Let us turn to the opera stars on the screen. Grace Moore is strong—if her picture is strong. The same goes for Lily Pons. Exhibitors report a strong draw for her “That Girl From Paris.” Gladys Swarthout has had a lot of opportunity but, up to now, she hasn’t landed. Her personality lacks warmth, exhibitors report.

Now let’s swing to pictures rather than personalities for a moment. There is a surprising trend toward Westerns. It should be noted that there has been an astonishing revival in their popularity. The Western was pretty dead for some years. Now it’s back. But the trend is toward Westerns with a background of music. Bullets and banjos! Now the hard-riding star has to be strum a mean mandolin and yodel, as well as shoot from the waist.

The outstanding hit right now is an independent star, Gene Autry, featured by Republic Pictures, who can vocalize, gallop, and strum a nasty guitar. Autry had experienced riding the radio waves, which appears to have helped. Anyway, he’s pushing the Hoot Gibbons, the Ken Maynards, and the Buck Joneses pretty hard. Autry, let me note, is the difference between profit and loss to a lot of exhibitors right now.

Exhibitors report their troubles with “Romeo and Juliet” and “A Midsummer Night’s Dream.” As a whole, America does not want Shakespeare; it would appear. With special exploitation in key spots, these films did big business. Played cold in the average theater, the result was different. Norma Shearer neither lost nor gained by her “Juliet,” Sonja Henie, the ice skater, is what the exhibitors term a freak hit. She may develop into a steady pulling star. Anyway, her “One in a Million” was one of the really big smashes of the year. This, it is pointed out, may have been due to the nation-wide wave of interest in fancy skating and in winter sports. This vogue lasted through the cold months and carried from coast to coast. But it remains to be seen how her next picture fares.

Maybe “One in a Million” created the vogue, maybe it happened to be swept to popularity. Anyhow, we are in for more skating films next fall, a whole lot of them. And Sonja’s next picture will tell the story as to her own popularity.

There are a score of second-flight stars—Barbara Stanwyck, Carole Lombard, Miriam Hopkins, Loretta Young, Adolphe Menjou, Joel McCrea, Ann Harding, Herbert Marshall, Kay Francis, Sylvia Sidney, Madge Evans. No great pull, just help. It all depends upon how good the picture is.

Luise Rainer, hit of “The Great Ziegfeld,” may mean a lot—soon. Not yet. But America was deeply impressed with her work as “Anno Held.”

Fredric March, for all his big roles, is just a moderate draw. Ronald Colman has a steady pull at the till. He is universally liked, looked upon as a good actor. Bette Davis was off the screen too much of the year to get anything like a real rating. This is true, too, of James Cagney and Edward G. Robinson. Constance Bennett has faded a great deal.

Exhibitors report a moderate but noticeable gain in Jane Withers’s popularity. The country apparently likes children in films. But it won’t go to see elderly women featured. At least not since Marie Dressler. Note the waning of May Robson, who looked like a real star after “Lady For a Day.” Still Metro-Goldwyn is trying to produce another Dressler in Sophie Tucker, veteran of night clubs and vaudeville.

Some of the old-timers still mean quite a bit at the box office. As, for instance, Ricardo Cortez, Victor McLaglen, Edmund Lowe, and Warner Baxter.

The comics have a tough time. Harold Lloyd still is miles out in front in this division. Bob Burns, the bazooka man, may develop along homy, close-to-the-soil comedy lines. His great radio following helps, of course. The farce comedy combination of Victor Moore-Helen Braden-erick has not reached the point where it has any particular box-office pull. These two experienced funmakers need material.

Boris Karloff, the horror man, has been waning at the box office. Karloff is up against a tough proposition, getting the right sort of chill and fear stuff. Humphrey Bogart, the expert in bad men, may go up further, although the trend seems away from the sort of story likely to make him a sensation.

Leslie Howard is appreciated as a good actor but he means little at the theater till. Even his "Romeo" has not helped him, the exhibitors report.

Metro has a lot invested in Eleanor Powell, but so far the exhibitors report no wild stampede to see her. In a good picture, she draws. But who doesn't?

Henry Fonda, who was so potentially promising a few seasons ago, has faded away to nothing. The exhibitors report no demand for Simone Simon. Ruby Keeler has charm and personality but there is no jam at the box office to watch her. She is, they say, just a minor help in attracting attendance.

With the hit of "Wake Up and Live," Walter Winchell, the gossip columnist, may grow into a box-office bet. Stranger things have happened on the screen.

The Marx Brothers' "A Day at the Races" was amusing, a good audience draw, but it has not raised their movie stock perceptibly. The Ritz Brothers? They help at the box office some, not a great deal. There again I am quoting the boys who own the nation's theaters and who ought to know.

Now I come to some questions the exhibitors ask themselves—and nobody seems to know the right answers. Number One: Does radio hurt a screen personality by featuring it on the air? Most exhibitors think too many air appearances hurt film stars and they are positive that their broadcasts injure theater business on the nights in question. Number Two: Does the continuous advance playing of a musical film's songs over the air hurt a picture? The vote is fifty-fifty on this. Some think it takes the edge off the musical, others that it builds interest. And who knows the right answer?

Here's another definite conclusion. Male actors wear better than female favorites. Maybe the girls show the wear and tear quicker and sharper. Anyway, this is obviously true.

Outstanding hits of the last six months? That's easy, Exhibitors' reports reveal them at a glance. Sonja Henie's "One in a Million," Bill Powell's "After the Thin Man," the Eddy-MacDonald musical, "Maytime," "History Is Made at Night," "A Star Is Born," and "Wake Up and Live. "Waikiki Wedding" was right up close to these smashers, too, and a moderately expensive Universal film, "Three Smart Girls."

Is it possible to summarize the country? Yes, in a way. In spite of various natural variations, in spite of varieties of tastes and thought, the box offices of the nation react surprisingly alike. The nation likes good drama and pleasant musicals. Just one difference may be noted. As one moves farther west, it is possible to detect a trend toward less sophistication.

The big trends can be summarized this way: The nation isn't strong for farce comedy and hasn't been for two years or more.

It likes whimsy, as, for example, "My Man Godfrey," it is strong for romantic musicals. Note the hit of "Maytime." And last, topical song-and-dancicals such as "Swing Time." It has been a man's year—and still is. Observe Robert Taylor.

The public won't go for Shakespeare.

Speculation about the top-flight stars of two years from now always is interesting. Exhibitors like to try the game, too. Glance at their reports and you will list the hot boys and girls of 1939 as something like this:

Robert Taylor, Tyrone Power, Bette Davis, Fernand Gravet, Deanna Durbin, Charles Boyer. An interesting six. But even an exhibitor can't tell what you will do under any given set of circumstances. Probably you can't yourself. Now be honest, can you?

The Box Office Tells the Story

Theater Men Say Top-Flight Stars Two Years From Now Will Be:

Robert Taylor
Tyrone Power
Bette Davis
Fernand Gravet
Deanna Durbin
Charles Boyer

---

Dolores del Rio, with few pictures lately, is all but forgotten at the fickle box office.

Fredric March, for all his big choice roles, is just a moderate draw, it seems.

Exhibitors say Garbo was not helped by "Camille." She was away too long.

Spencer Tracy, in one strong film after another, is making for the top, it appears.

Dick Powell dropped from sixth to eighth place since the first of January.
Maybe you want to go to Hollywood and be a star, but if you will take the advice of the stars themselves, of their lawyers, directors, and friends in ringside seats, it is the life of a featured player you should crave.

These lucky ones get their fame and fortune in moderate doses that can be enjoyed. No super-super income tax, no police to get them through crowds, no race to outdo the rest of Hollywood yachts and racehorses and jewels. They can wear old hats and shoes without being accused of superstition or posing.

The supporting players even get more interesting and varied roles than most of the stars do. It is not surprising then that they are a happy lot. Not one sad story have I heard from the swarm of featured players who have recently blown in from Hollywood, only to be summoned right back again for more work.

This blithely crew of Marjorie Gateson, Herman Bing, Patsy Kelly, C. Henry Gordon—that old master of slick villainy—Patricia Ellis, Fritz Leiber, and Bruce Cabot are the ones to be envied. Never did such as Gary Cooper, Joan Crawford, Robert Taylor, or Clouette Colbert succeed in escaping their screen selves and enjoying a New York vocation as these lesser lights have.

She's Welcome Now.—Marjorie Gateson is enjoying every minute of an Eastern vacation now, because the next one may not be so good. Some of her Social Register friends may be aghast when they see the part she plays in "Vogues of 1938"—may even think that she issatirizing them.

Miss Gateson scorned hotels in favor of her own house in Kew Gardens. She walks to the station to entrain for New York, even though the butcher, the baker, and the postman feel a little let down that she doesn't put on swank. They are startled that she still has her natural-colored, light-reddish hair and that no tightly plastered permanent has supplanted her soft, natural curls. But they are pleased that she still knows them.

Completely untheatrical in appearance, wearing very little make-up and very subdued clothes, she is not often recognized by strangers. She was once. Her hostess at a NEW YORK—

Joan Bennett will try summer stock at Dennis, Massachusetts, between picture engagements.

Every one likes Milton Berle—eventually—and probably you will too when you see him in his first picture, "New Faces." He’s been an entertainer since he was a mere kid.

She has made so many in the last four years at Warners, following each other in such dizzy succession, sometimes overlapping, that taking time really to think about a rôle is the realization of a dream. Not that she is complaining. Far from it.

She figures she is a lucky girl to have been around the theater since she was an infant—her stepfather was a theatrical producer—and fortunate to have started in "B" pictures and so many of them that if one was bad, she immediately had a chance to make a better impression. Larger than most screen ingénues, a curious mixture of girlish impulsiveness and veteran trouper, she threatens to develop into a beauty.

Quarter Century of Trouping.—Recently I met, only a few hours apart, two men who had each rounded out twenty-five years of troup ing in theater, radio, and just recently, pictures. And if you are ever so foolish as to try to ferret out one trait that successful actors have in common, I give you the extreme opposites—Fritz Leiber and Milton Berle.

ONE notes in the public prints that the Burlington, Vermont, "Free Press" has isolated the "average college freshman" and has discovered that his favorite stars are W. C. Fields and Jean Arthur. Further light is thrown upon the gentleman by his choice of authors: Edgar Allan Poe and Charles Dickens. Now, in just what category, one wonders, does this place Miss Arthur? In good company, to be sure. But somewhat varied.

Jean is one of Hollywood’s most emphatic anomalies. I met her years ago when she was playing the lead with Tom Tyler in a Western. She seemed an anomaly then. The fringed leggings, brass-studded belt and wide felt hat simply didn’t belong to that slight, arrogant figure. She should, one was convinced, be treading deep carpets through dim-lit drawing rooms, pausing to lift a fragile teacup and to murmur a subtle line from a Philip Barry play. She didn’t belong in those rootin’-tootin’ early Westerns.

It took the astute Cecil DeMille to see, after she had had years of experience in acting, that Jean was admirably fitted to play the rootin’-tootin’ “Calamity Jane” in “The Plainsman.” “Calamity Jane,” of course, was a character to titivate the imagination of any experienced actress.

It had been a long hard pull gaining that experience and it hadn’t been fun. But she was ready. You have no doubt seen that picture and you have seen her in several others and you know that she was ready.

But the long hard pull had done something more to Jean than just to mature her for some parts with meat in them. Mention her at a Hollywood gathering and people throw up their hands, shuddering, “She’s so temperamental, so difficult to deal with! You’d think that all these years in show business would have taught her.”

When you encounter her it is different. After the first few difficult moments of trying to establish some friendly contact, you discover that she has incised herself in a hard, tight little shell of defensive reserve. She is frightened. Afraid of you, of what you may think of her, say of her, afraid of what she may say which may be construed to her disadvantage. She cores so terribly about this budding career, she is so dreadfully ambitious.

After a short time you are sorry for her and you want to go away and leave her in peace. Only, if you do this too soon, she will moan afterward, “Oh, they didn’t like me! What did I do that was wrong?”

Suffering thus, she has tried to tell herself that publicity is not important, personal contacts are not important, that it is her performance and what she puts into it which counts. But she is quite as self-conscious in her professional relationships with directors, producers, et cetera, as she is in these others.

She suffers agonies of self-doubt and just plain stage fright when she must start a new picture, especially if it is at a studio which is strange to her and with people whom she has not met before. It sometimes takes days of patient tact on the part of the director before she can relax sufficiently to do what is required of her.

This wasn’t true when she played in Westerns and tworeel comedies. Then she had not glimpsed the goal of being a great actress. It is excess ambition, fear of failing, which makes her self-conscious now. In casual social contacts which have nothing to do with her job she is at ease, gay, cordial.

In 1932 she married Frank J. Ross, Jr., of New York. The pair lead a healthy, sun-tanned, if somewhat interrupted and haphazard existence at Malibu. Their house is sprawling and comfortable, with about an acre of living room overlooking the Pacific. There is a glass-protected patio for games and sun bathing and there are four large bedrooms.

“When people come to see you at the beach,” Jean explains, “you never know how long they will stay.”

The interior is all chintz and maple furniture and rugss so that it is not a serious offense if you come in sandy and salty from the sea and sit down on something. There are books and books and books. All the modern plays which have been published and nearly all the best-selling novels for years past. Jean orders best sellers in lots of two or three so that she may pass them on to others.

Here she entertains without a trace of self-consciousness people whom she likes and trusts. These include a lot of Hollywood’s bigwigs, but almost never any one who may have any potential influence on her career. They swim, play tennis, gather round the table games. They help themselves to a hearty buffet supper—small steaks, cold turkey, salads, sandwiches, cheese—and then they gather round the enormous fireplace for conversation or more games.

On these occasions Jean wears blue denim beach pajamas and hides her bright hair under a bandanna kerchief. She looks like a pert and very pretty “Topsy.” She looks tinier than she really is. Actually she is a rather tall girl.

When she feels like being formal, she is very, very formal. She will confer for hours, far days, with her favori-

THIS CAREFUL, SENSITIVE APPRAISAL OF JEAN ARTHUR TELLS MORE ABOUT HER INNER SELF THAN ANY STORY EVER WRITTEN.

It's designer over the austere evening frock she plans to wear for some special occasion. It must be severely cut. It must have not a touch of color or garish ornament. It must be subtly perfect of its kind, and she is willing to pay whatever she must pay for this perfection. She owns few jewels, wears them rarely and scarcely knows the names of them. She is indifferent about furs but acquired some silver fox skins late last winter when some one told her "every one was wearing silver fox."

All this brings me to her feelings about the theater. The bitterness that is in her soul, the frustration that has troubled her nerves, these things were induced by her early failures to accomplish in pictures what she felt that she had in her to accomplish. When she returned to New York after having tasted these failures, Broadway picked her up, dusted her off, as it were, and gave her a chance to prove herself in a number of successful hits. Her reverence for the theater, far all it stands for, amounts to a sort of mania.

Thus, when Jean goes to the theater she "gets all dressed up." It is a sort of homage she pays the stage.

"I feel that I have to play a stage role once in a while," she told me. "It doesn't matter, really, whether it's a success

Jean Arthur has incased herself in a hard, tight little shell of defensive reserve. She is frightened. Afraid of what people may think of her, say of her. It is excess ambition, fear of failing, which makes her self-conscious. The bitterness in her soul is because of past rebuffs and failures in Hollywood.

INTIMATE, REVEALING OBSERVATIONS GLEANED BY PICTURE PLAY'S UNSUNG REPORTERS WHO KNOW THEIR WAY ABOUT HOLLYWOOD AS FEW OTHERS DO.

CLAIRE TREVOR knew that remarks she overheard while playing tennis were directed at her. She was the only star present.
"It's a wonder she isn't using a double," said some one. "These movie softies are afraid to do anything."

Shortly an unseasonable drizzle began. It made the courts slippery, and the players skidded dangerously. Claire visualized broken bones, costly picture delays, blame from her employers, but kept grimly playing.
It was Frank Shields and Wilmer Hines, famous tennis players, who finally cried quits. But in vain had Claire proved she wasn't a softie—her critics had fled for shelter from the misty rain.

FRANCIS LEDERER was shamelessly making love to a pretty script girl on the set. We were about to call it a new romance, when the star asked in a businesslike tone, "That's not bad, is it? Did I omit anything?"
"I think you've got it, Mr. Lederer! But perhaps you should do it just once more," the girl suggested.

Despite the fact it was only a dialogue rehearsal, we detected a distinct gleam of enjoyment in the girl's eyes. Lederer's fans will understand.

THE sinister-looking bruiser at the adjoining table was covertly watching Robert Montgomery's every move. His gaze was so frowningly intent, and the man himself appeared so villainous that Bob became worried.
So when the stranger abruptly started toward the star's table Bob nerved himself for the worst.
"Pardon me, Mr. Montgomery," the menace said saltily. "What is that you're eating? When I go back home, I do want to be able to say that I saw you and ate the same food you did."
KAY FRANCIS was having trouble with her "r's" in some dialogue of "First Lady." As she often does, she was sounding them as "w's"—thus " outrageous" become "outwageous."

After she had spoiled several takes, she suddenly noticed the silence of the spectators, extras, and others on the set. Their faces were long and sad, for they expected the allegedly temperamental star to blow up. Kay tilted back her head and laughed.

"I don't care what you people think, I think it's funny!" she said. "The way I'm going to-day, I'd pronounce my own name Francis!"

FREDRIC MARCH narrowly escaped electrocution in his own home the other day. He grabbed a live wire with a pair of pliers and got a terrific jolt.

But, according to his wife Florence, that didn't cure him of his passion for tinkering with electrical appliances. It merely gave him an excuse to do same mare. He found that the accident had been caused by a servant who had turned on the house current after he had turned it off. So he installed a locked safety switch.

MAE WEST was standing on a busy Hollywood corner talking to a friend. Her hair was hidden by a modish bandanna, her eyes by dark glasses.

"You see," Mae was saying, "in this rig nobody knows me."

The friend laughed. "Then you will—before you get a block down the Boulevard," she challenged.

Mae promptly started walking. And the hitherto unheeding spectators stared. Presently she was at the head of a polite, unobtrusive but well-defined parade. "It's Mae West!" the whispers ran.

Which goes to prove some one's quip, "In all the world no walk like Mae's."

THE most energetic acting at Paramount is not contributed by any of the stars but is offered daily in the commissary by Jane Weir, a minor stock actress.
On and Off the Set

Miss Weir covers more tables than the head waitress and the play of emotions across her face as she greets acquaintances or asks for a glass of water would keep Garbo in death scenes for a year. In fact, her daily engagement would make one of the funniest shorts of the season.

THE Brown Derby restaurants park their customers’ cars free. It is their boast that their boys remember every car without the use of checks. A few days ago Clark Gable and Corole Lombard dined there. When they came out a new boy was on the door. "What kind of cor, Mr. Gable?" he asked.

"Son," Corole drawled to Clark, "when they don’t know your car at this place you may know you’re slipping and your next option will not be taken up."

THE biggest laugh of the month came in the Paramount publicity offices when one of the men in the department picked up one of Jimmie Fidler’s columns and read, "The size of Martha Raye’s mouth is a trick of make-up." We can only echo "Ho!"

ONE of the shortest engagements on record was played by Shirley Ross in “This Way, Please.” Shirley started the picture one morning and was replaced the same night. Seems she and Mary Livingstone, who makes her screen début in this opus, had different ideas about which was the star of the picture.

GLENDAY FARRELL tells this one on herself. When she was in Italy on her recent trip she was enthralled with the old buildings. "Only they were all in ruins," she lamented. "Beautiful ruins but nevertheless ruins. Now," she complained, "look at that lovely old thing. It’s going to fall completely in a couple of years. Why don’t they restore it or prop it up?"

"Lady," the guide assured her, "it’s been on awfully long time falling. That’s the Leaning Tower of Pisa."

If you want to know what a player is really like, ask the technicians on the set where she works. When Frances Dee was out of the cast of "Souls at Sea" for a couple of days the boys chipped in and sent her a huge bunch of roses. And that, my friends, is almost without precedent.
AS Mary Pickford left the church after the Jeanette MacDonald-Gene Raymond wedding, she picked a rosebud from an arbor decoration. “For luck,” she said, probably referring to her own wedding to Buddy Rogers ten days later.

A number of Jeanette’s friends are of the opinion that it was a little mean of Mary to arrange her honeymoon on the same boat Honolulu-bound that Gene and Jeanette had planned for months to take. But other MacDonald loyalists are satisfied that Jeanette will be able to hold the spotlight against any competition.

Gertrude Niesen is doing all right if her ambition is to be Hollywood’s next glamour girl. Her new home, which she “wants with a cocktail party, is as attention-attracting as its owner. Started the moment he enters the front door for the most prominent piece in the entrance hall is a huge bronze head of a Negro.

But Gertrude’s bedroom is the thing—all in a delicate shade of blue. One entire wall is a mirror; the Venetian blinds are made of mirrors on which rest bottles holding perfumes. Besides a tall silver vase holding a singing bird, there are no other decorations in the room and very little furniture.

Against the huge mirror, like a jewel in a frame, is her round! Fully six feet in diameter and covered with a satin isle like a huge powder puff. She couldn’t possibly get out of it because no one would ever know which is the right side.

Adolphe Menjou made the remark unconsciously, of a remark so typical of Hollywood that it bears repeating. It was made at Actors’ Guild meetings when they were deciding whether to strike that Adolphe made a very neat speech and a plea for the “little fellow” in the acting business.

“Most of us rose from the extra ranks,” he said, “and let the little fellows we used to work with and who used to be us help out a little fellow, too.

A SKED by an interviewer if his family were really early Swedes in California, Leo Carrillo replied: “Oh my, yes. My family the si, si, si camps.”
IN MEMORIAM

OUR READERS PAY TRIBUTE TO THE MEMORY OF JEAN HARLOW

LEAF shadows quivering over her breast,
Serenely aloof she is taking her rest;
Poppies bloom talk to her all the day long,
Caught in a swirling of oriole song;
Wind harpers fingering strings of the grass
Legend and poesy breathe as they pass—
Oh, is she listening in her dark bed
Where the thick earth-sodden silence is spread?

She was an exquisite idyl of earth
Timed to quicksilver of music and mirth,
Fingers of thatched down, throat of a lark,
Feet that found wavering out of the dark,
And the glad eyes that no peril could school
Were moods of blue iris bent over a pool.

Haply her scintillant tresses will fly
Signals of starlight from towers of the sky,
Midsummer mornings will pulse with her song,
Noon with her womanhood valiant and strong,
And on tides of cerulean seas
Will the blithe soul of her chant its release.

Lucia Clark Markham.

WITH the blue-green hills in the blue of the sky,
And the sun at meridian height,
She slipped off the claims which bound her and life
To release herself into the night.
Where a deep sweet stillness in the silence of space,
Could quiet and enter her soul.
To calm and reform and fashion it there
Again to the heavenly mold.
A moment alone in that steel-firm peace,
A mortal, a soul or a name.
Then back into light to shine once again
With the stars from whence she came.

Rector Lee.

LET her wander where the golden stream
Of joy and laughter fill her fondest dreams,
Beyond the sorrow and the sordid pain
That filled her lovely youth.
With undeserved rain.
And if these eyes of ours
Are filled with futile mist for one so young,
Whose soul within her cried,
May God forgive us for the sacrifice—
Forgive us that she died.

Goodrich Bennett.

SHE was so young, so gay, so bright,
So vivid, that no stranger might,
First seeing her, escape her sway;
And now that she has slipped away,
One distant star is dim each night.

Our deep affection was her right;
She cheered us, made our burdens light,
Yet made her work seem just like play,
She was so young.

Though she is gone upon some flight
That carries her beyond all sight,
We who still love her won't betray
Her memory, We'll always say
While sorrow tugs our heartstrings tight,
She was so young.

Brock Milton.
MEN ALWAYS ARE TRYING TO DO SOMETHING NICE FOR ALICE FAYE. MANY HAVE HELPED HER ALONG THE PATH TO SUCCESS.

BY JACK SMALLEY

THERE'S something about Alice Faye that brings out the "Sir Galahad" in a man, and makes him feel noble just to win her shy and grateful smile. She's like the girl who sat on the porch steps back home, and you rode by on your bike with hands off the handle bars to show off, and on whose door you hung your best May basket.

Then she moved away and you grew up and married somebody else, but you never quite forgot the girl on the porch steps. You think of her when you see Alice Faye.
She is, in short, the girl men don’t forget.

If you would know what makes her that way, and why she has so stanch an array of loyal knights to do battle for her, perhaps this story of the men in her life contains an answer.

Despite the fact that she has more than her share of feminine appeal, almost all the men who have helped her along have been just friends, so you can rule out any ulterior motives in their generous efforts. They weren’t in love with her, and she wasn’t in love with them, so don’t expect an answer as simple as that.

Yet each man has played a vital part in her life. They mark her career as definitely as milestones on a turnpike. Remove any one of them and you have lost one of the links that hold her career together.

She started as a dancer in Chester Hale’s school, a grave-faced little thing from the Bronx, forced to earn some money for the family.

“I had a terrible inferiority complex,” she told me. “I still suffer from it. Mother has always been the same way. When I go into a public place and some one says ‘There’s Alice Faye,’ I just wilt.”

How she got up enough nerve to try out for the Chester Hale dance units which toured the Loew theaters, she still can’t figure out. If Hale had said ‘Boa’ to her, she’d have run and never returned. But he taught her to dance. Alice worked hard, earned a spot in his traveling units and spent four years on the road.

Like other chorus girls, she got jobs where jobs could be much better future,” Alice said. “And I needed more than my small salary to help the family. But I didn’t know what to do about it.

“I suppose it sounds funny to say that a chorus girl is too shy to ask for a break, but that was the case with me. Rudy Vallée was the star of the show and of course our idol, but I never even dared speak to him. Yet I was sure that if I asked him how I might become a singer, he would have been glad to give me some tips.

“Rudy’s attorney, Judge Bushel, was often backstage, and when he learned how ambitious I was to get a job singing, he said he’d help me. He was sure Rudy would give me an audition.

“But I wouldn’t try it. The very thought sent chills up my back. Me, sing before Rudy? Impossible!”

Yet, Judge Bushel persisted, and so became the second man to play a crucial rôle in Alice’s career. If Alice was too shy to try an audition, then he had the solution. She could sing in one of those voice-recording shops for two bits, and he’d play the record for Rudy. Alice consented to this plan, singing “Mimi.”

But nothing came of it—nor a long while. Rudy heard the record and then apparently forgot it. The company went on the road, returned to New York and disbanded. Rudy was ready to sign a singer for his radio program when he remembered the recording, and Judge Bushel’s recommendation. He sent for Alice.

Rudy listened to her tell of her ambitions, heard her Continued on page 62

One man made Alice Faye into a dancer, another into a singer, and still a third into a successful movie star.

Among the men to whom Alice is grateful is Rudy Vallée, who gave her a chance to get out of the chorus.

Beamimg Happenings and Bright Caprices of the Movie Town Are Captured Here.

Now we knew Hollywood's a crazy town. Or should one say Culver City?
The old question of what and where Hollywood is, cropped up in recent weeks with a vengeance—reason being that the municipality known as Culver City wanted to be called Hollywood.

Culver City is where the MGM Studio is situated, as most folks know, and where David Selznick, who produced "Little Lord Fauntleroy," "Garden of Allah," and "A Star Is Born," flourishes. These pictures and the MGM output certainly should entitle the town to some sort of acclaim.

This Culver City is five or six miles away from even West Hollywood, and between the two lies West Los Angeles. It's all very complicated, to say the least, but then the geography of the movies has always been crazier than the movie colony itself.
The best remarks we heard apropos of the whole thing came from Edward Arnold and Groucho Marx. Groucho, who lives over Hollywood way and works in Culver City, said, in that daffily innocent manner of his: "I favor the name change. If they call Culver City Hollywood then I'll be much nearer the studio." "Huh—just another one of those title changes!" exclaimed Eddie Arnold.

The Golden Baby Girl.—Shirley Temple is now rated the $5,000,000 baby of the movies. That's the value Darryl Zanuck recently put on this star. And he says her worth is soaring so rapidly it will be clear out of sight in a year.

It sounds fantastic. But Zanuck, who's a pretty smart showman as head of 20th Century-Fox, believes that Shirley is the one child exception who will grow up gracefully. He thinks the reason is because Shirley is such a versatile young miss, and because she's being given such careful guidance by her mother.
"Wee Willie Winkie" is the picture that is testing how much of a big-time star the little girl is. The cost was about double any previous feature, and Shirley is required to be more of an actress. "Heidi" is to be another big test.

We're impressed with one thing—and that is the sweetness and softness that Shirley is developing, along with a peculiar and individual reserve.

She's eating yeast these days, incidentally, and says, "Ugh! It tastes just like old nuts!"

The Same Old Story.—"We can't live together; can't live apart." That seems to be the wild hysterical cry of John and Elaine Barrymore whose reconciliation—or are they reconciled right at this minute?—was the latest more or less authentic news about them.

Anyway, they staged a frantically enamored meeting at the railroad station when Elaine returned from a personal-appearance trip. And even Elaine's adventure into a film, titled "How to Undress in Front of Your Husband," did not dampen the ardor of their greetings.

Lionel Barrymore, it was reported, was up in arms about that picture.

John and Elaine kissed each other for the benefit of the cameramen, and proclaimed that they were back together again. Divorce was only in the interlocutory stage, so no remarriage was necessary.

One of the inducements John offered for Elaine's return was a house, procured he said in a wire, after he had looked over every "almshouse, pothouse, smokehouse, tea-house, blank-blank house, in the Hollywood vicinity."

He telegraphed words to that effect anyhow.

Harlow Successors.—"The queen is dead; long live the queen!"

Once Jean Harlow was laid to rest the studios proceeded to determine who might succeed her in the pictures in work or scheduled. 20th Century-Fox replaced Jean with Alice Faye in their "In Old Chicago," while MGM made long shots for the incomplete "Saratoga" with a Harlow stand-in, Mary Dees. The work proceeded with enormous secrecy, quite typical of the plant, although almost everybody in town knew about it.

Alice was overwhelmed at the vote of confidence placed in her when she was selected for the "In Old Chicago" part. She left the executive offices of the studio drenched in tears. It was a big emotional moment for the little song-and-dance girl, who seems to be going places.

Fields to Fight Again.—It's of some importance, perhaps, that W. C. Fields is going to battle out the suit with the doctor, who demanded a $12,000 fee, all over again. The initial trial was pretty much of a mess, as far as Bill was concerned, and at a time when he was just beginning his comeback, mainly through his radio work.

In the trial much to-do was made about Bill's conduct and his alleged consumption of liquor. It looked like one of those Roman holiday celebrations, which are so disturbing to careers.

So Bill is putting up a new fight, and maybe things will take a different course.

Incidentally, we think his friend Charlie McCarthy may come to the rescue as a witness. Or would that be for the best?

Romantic Contagion.—Love is surely catching. It must be when two comics like Bob Burns and Martha Raye are married within twenty-four hours of each other. Martha was given a great welcome home by her friends following her elopement with Hamilton Westmore, often called Buddy, while Burns was showered, too, but mostly with old shoes as soon as his associates could catch up with him.

With the enthusiasm of a novice, William Boyd smilingly prepares for his latest marriage. Grace Bradley became his fifth bride June 5th in her first matrimonial attempt.

Carole Lombard and Sally Eilers share Clark Gable in ringside seats at one of those fights that the stars constantly attend. Clark's next film will be the ill-fated "Saratoga."
We are often told that the surest way to crash Hollywood is to stay away from it.

For every celebrity who deliberately set out to become a star there are a half dozen who just drifted in by accident, or who were snatched from other fields of endeavor by talent scouts who saw their possibilities even though they themselves cherished no such daring dreams.

To this latter group belongs Dorothy Lamour, Hollywood's newest "Cinderella" girl.

She has been in the movie capital only a year, yet in that time she has made five pictures. Her very first film, "The Jungle Princess," gave her the leading rôle. Next came an important rôle in "Swing High, Swing Low," then one in "High, Wide and Handsome," and another in "The Last Train from Madrid." Without pausing for breath she topped this interesting record with the lead in "The Hurricane."

Truly, I thought, a girl who can do that well for herself must be exceptional. She'd have to be. In fact, I had already come to this conclusion during the press preview of "The Jungle Princess," when her native charm and warm sincerity impressed us all very forcibly. If she can do such an impossible rôle so convincingly, what would she do with a really good one, we wondered.

As luck would have it, Samuel Goldwyn happened to be there, and he wondered too; and when Goldwyn wondered he generally does something about it.

"That girl is star stuff," he whispered to a friend. "Paramount don't know what they've got. I only hope I can get her before they find out!"

He could and he did. And that is how stars are born.

Do you wonder that I imprinted Picture Play's editor to let me interview her? "Very well," he replied. "but no gush! Give the girl credit, but don't let your enthusiasm run away with your judgment!" So, solemnly restrained and judicious, I sallied forth.

Our appointment took place on Dorothy's very first day on the "Hurricane" set. "And I'm all jittery inside," she confided. "A new rôle, a new director, a new studio, and me so terribly new myself! It's a little too much to face calmly."

"And an interview on top of all that," I prompted.

"Oh, I don't mind that," she answered, hastily, "and besides, every one tells me you're nice to talk to, so I'm very grateful for your interest. I know that I really should be very happy about it all, because from the moment I first walked through that gate I felt an atmosphere of friendliness and good will. That's just why I want so desperately to make good. I want to justify the faith every one has shown in me."

We were having lunch, but there was no time for a leisurely meal, so our storied did what she could with a dry-looking egg-and-tomato sandwich and a glass of cocoa between questions.

"My greatest difficulty is an inferiority complex," she went on. "It's almost too much for me at times and I doubt if I'll ever outgrow it. I used to be a radio singer, and at first I had mike-fright so badly that it almost made me ill.

"Even after I got used to singing on the air I still couldn't speak dialogue or read an announcement. I just couldn't! My knees would buckle and my throat would tighten until I could hardly breathe.

"The same thing still happens when I have to make a screen test. I don't see how any one survives auditions or tests. If, in the course of a regular performance, one makes a poor showing, well, it's too bad, but it isn't a matter of life and death. But in a test every moment is precious, and every flicker of an eyelash counts for or against you. It's awful!"

It was her inferiority complex that induced her to tackle the radio instead of making a try for films. "It seemed easier to face the mike than an audience," she explained. "So I began in my home town, New Orleans. Later I did cabaret work. Having the audience so close to me wasn't as bad as I expected, because, until they know you, people at a night club are primarily interested in their food and the members of their own party; they don't pay much attention to the performers.

"Later I went to Hollywood for a radio engagement, followed by one at the Clover Club, but wholly without any hope of picture work. It was during my cabaret engagement that some one from the studio sowed me and asked me to make a test for Paramount.

"I was scared to death, but I tried to go through with it. The sight of both the mike and the camera almost Basil Rathbone, with his fiery enthusiasm, has the knack of adapting himself to any environment. He lives every moment.

I was unfashionably early when I arrived at Basil Rathbone’s home. A servant showed me into the living room, begged my acceptance of a glass of sherry, and left me. I sipped the wine and looked through the windows over a tree-shaded lawn. I felt that I was home in England—relaxed and placid. In fact, I was loosening a tight shoe lace when the door opened and Rathbone erupted from somewhere. “Erupted” is the word. Sports-coated, flanneled, sun-bronzedit, he erupted into the room with a sort of zumph!

“Awfully sorry to keep you waiting. Have they brought you something to drink? Ha! Sherry! Think I’ll join you!”

He joined me, and we settled down—as much as one can settle down with Rathbone. From the moment he erupted, I felt a crackling in the room, something electric. It behooved your interviewer to keep on his toes. I would have felt easier could I have reached for my blunderbuss, broadsword, claymore, buckler, or whatnot, and shouted “S’Death” or “S’Blood,” or, maybe, merely “Hola!” Not having any of these weapons of mayhem at my finger tips, or any interjections at my tongue tip, I contented myself with sipping my sherry and complimenting him upon his gustatory eclecticism.

But, really, so help me, I seemed to see knights in shining armor, Roman statesmen, centurions, lictors, Montagues, Capulets, scribes, pharisées, and even Bards of Avon floating all over the place.

And now I’m afraid I’ve made him sound as though he were an uncomfortable kind of fellow with whom to pass the declining hours of daylight. He isn’t at all. I knew I was going to like him from the moment he erupted. His firm handclasp, his warm welcome, were sufficient to warm the cockles of the heart. It was with an effort that I reminded Basil Rathbone convinces us that there are no more so-called villains or heavies on the screen.

Pictures are rapidly progressing to the point where there will be no leading man, no leading woman, no heavy, sums up the experienced Mr. Rathbone.
Luis Alberni, who started out in life to be a lawyer, and turned to acting, has been before the public since 1910. This tells all about him.

By Alyce Shupper

Luis Alberni is another of those Hollywood paradoxes. He was born in Spain, yet he has played every other Latin personality on the screen except a Spaniard. His specialty is, of course, provoking laughs and relieving the tension of melodramatic moments between Grace Moore’s songs as an Italian comic. He has appeared in all her pictures except, as he says: “The ‘stinkarola’ she made with Franchot Tone called ‘The King Steps Out’.”

But that is getting ahead of my story.

In a little Hollywood delicatessen where I had stopped for a hurried sandwich, I saw Luis Alberni lunching with his agent. I sent a note asking him where I might call to make an appointment to interview him. Upon the same scrap of paper he wrote “Come and get it.” So, taking the bull by the horns, I went over.

I learned he was preparing for a trip to Palm Springs before stepping into a new picture, “Easy Living,” with Edward Arnold, Jean Arthur, and Ray Milland.

He was born in Barcelona, where his parents are still living—he hopes! In these days of stress, strife, and civil war, nobody can be certain or find out actually what is going on in the once romantic land of guitars, caballeras, and señoritas behind their wrought-iron balconies.

“I don’t understand why everybody thinks I am Italian,” he complains. “Except maybe an account of my accent. The only whiff of Italy I ever had was a French sweetheart in Paris who spoke Italian.”

The son of a civil magistrate, young Luis was destined to follow the paternal footsteps with law as a career, until he rebelled—perhaps in the modern Spanish manner—joined a circus and traveled all over Europe as a clown.

“Two years later, however,” he recalled, “I went home dragging my tail behind me and almost became reconciled to a legal career. At least I attended classes at the University of Barcelona. That seemed to satisfy everybody for a while.

"Knight Without Armor."—United Artists. Marlene Dietrich went to England to act with the spirited Robert Donat, gaining great financial reward thereby; but she is the same Dietrich though this picture is a one hundred per cent more worth while than most of her Hollywood ventures. The question is, however, not what does she give to it but what does she take away. She smiles, she swoons, she bares in a tub and in a forest pool, but no feeling comes from within. All of which is by way of saying that she is, to me, one of the most uninteresting actresses I have ever seen and holds the title of the highest paid manikin in the world in my catalogue. Mr. Donat is, as every one knows, one of the screen's distinguished young actors. He can catch a mood and sustain it as few can. Minus the least tinge of theatricality, he is never the cinema hero but always first an artist who never permits personality to stand in the way of achieving character. He and Miss Dietrich are involved in a complicated story of the revolution in Russia, she an aristocrat, he an Englishman who joins the secret service of his country to spy on the Reds. Once he and Miss Dietrich are brought together, they go through a long series of adventures, pursued, captured, outwitting and escaping the enemy. They are colorful adventures, some of them exciting and all are staged with imagination, tenseness and rich pictorial effect. But somehow the picture doesn't seem as important as it was meant to be. A young man named John Clements suddenly appears late in the story and lifts it high with his arresting speech and countenance in a brief encounter with Miss Dietrich and Mr. Donat. He is called Pouschkoff; he knows Miss Dietrich is an aristocrat and kills himself rather than betray her. Watch for Mr. Clements. He dominates an episode that becomes the best in a long picture.

"The Road Back."—Universal. Disappointment must be felt by all who have read the corrosive book from which this picture was made, and disappointment of another kind will come to those who have not. The second group will, I fear, dismiss it as just another war film. The others will wax bitter about what has happened in the transition from print to the screen. Yet, there is much that is fine and splendid about it; much that shows the superior mind of the director, James Whale, and the acute writing of R. C. Sheriff, author of "Journey's End," who is credited with this adaptation of Erich Maria Remarque's novel. It would seem that a stronger will than theirs dictated changes which turn out to be losses. In short, the despairing story of the aftermath of war has been jazzed up with horseplay and slapstick in an effort, I suppose, to make it "popular" and "human" and "box office." The result is upsetting because it distorts the main issue, weakens the power of the theme and hardly makes filming the book worth while. On the other hand, if pictured with scrupulous fidelity to the original, it is likely that only the critics would have applauded it. For it is a realistic, depressing, hopeless story, a terrible indictment of war from the standpoint of the living dead and their ruined lives. We stand beside a group of German soldiers when the armistice is signed and they return home for their long, painful and futile attempt to adjust themselves to a strange, new life that they do not know. In every instance the acting is first class.

"Mountain Music."—Paramount. Lovers of "art" films will not like this, but larger audiences will go for it in a big way. They have already done so, and I am with them. Bob Burns and Martha Raye may not be virtuosi when it comes to acting, but they have a warmly likable quality that establishes them as human beings with a strong individuality. I consider Mr. Burns unusually talented. Apart from his easy-going, homy personality, rustic wit and unself-consciousness, he is possessed of a kind of talent not shared by every eminent actor. It shows in his sense of emphasis in speech. He knows exactly how to give the proper value to every word, every syllable even. His sense of timing is unusual, too. Seeming just to drawl, he is alertly aware of the value of every line and gets everything out of it. He and Miss Raye are teamed in a hodgepodge of nonsense that is never dull and often is very funny. Mr. Burns is a hill-billy idler about to be forced into marriage with a girl he doesn't love in order to stop a feud. So he runs away and meets Miss Raye, an amateur actress in a small town who is twitted by her rivals because she has no beau. Preposterous complications follow. They wouldn't make sense if described, but they do make good fun of a kind.

"Parnell."—MGM. It is strange and sad to find Clark Gable so miscast in the title rôle of this ambitious picture that he is not only a personal loss but a handicap to the film. He never suggests either the fiery patriot that was Charles Stewart Parnell or the impulsive lover that the story insists he is. Always he is the carefully tailored star who wears sideburns as a concession to the period—never the beard that the Irishman wore in real life—and stops his characterization right there. Mr. Gable is reserved on the surface but swings his arms in a jaunty Hollywood walk when he gets a chance. More grievous is his apparent insensitivity to the speeches of the character. They are beautifully written, but he just skims over them. All in all, I cannot remember an important rôle so eluding a leading actor. However, the picture is no great shakes, either, for all its pretensions. Interesting, not gripping; unemotional when it should be poignant. It would seem that the stage play, combined with additional documentation in the case of Parnell and Kitty O'Shea, was not the stuff that good movie biographies are made of. I felt no sympathy for either and thought they brought on themselves all that happened to frustrate their overrated love. In fact, I thought that the husband of Mrs. O'Shea had good cause to act the villain of the piece, probably because Alan Marshal in this ungrateful rôle was so much more interesting than Mr. Gable as the nominal hero. Anyway, the story as we see it here is about Parnell's championship of the Irish people and his fight for home rule, with Mrs. O'Shea cheering him from the side lines and taking him into her home for months to cheer him some more. Myrna Loy is graciously feminine as the doubtful Mrs. O'Shea but the part is secondary and monotonous. It is the minor characters that stimulate the spectator when he tires of the leading ones.

"The Singing Marine."—Warners. Dick Powell's new picture is pleasant run-of-the-mill stuff, a picture that one cannot become enthusiastic about nor can one get mad at. Like most long films, it has good moments and undoubtedly will please all who are attracted to it. But it certainly is slight and at times silly. Mr. Powell is a boshful marine whose mates contribute two dollars each to defray his expenses by bus to New York and a tryout on an amateur radio hour. He is a colossal success, is taken in hand by agents and dubbed "The Singing Marine." Immediately his head is turned by popularity...

paralyzed me. I forgot my lines. I forgot everything I’d been told. I—oh, I must have been terrible! I still turn cold when I think of it.

"When it was over no one said very much. Just the usual ‘thank you, nice to have met you, g’bye.’ A few days later, having had no word from the studio, I took a train to Denver. ‘Good-by, Hollywood,’ I murmured. ‘I’ll never see you again!’

“My husband is an orchestra leader, Herb Kaye, and he was working in Denver at the time. I felt so bad about my test that I didn’t even tell him about it. Then, just three days later, there came a telegram from Paramount asking me to come back.

“At first I couldn’t believe it. I thought it was a gag. But it wasn’t. And the moment I got back they put me into ‘The Jungle Princess.’ I should have been flattered, but that old inferiority complex was back on the job, stronger than ever.

“You see, if I had worked my way up by bits, or even extra work, it wouldn’t have seemed so bad, but I had never read lines at all. I had never even appeared in amateur theatricals. I was almost ill over it. To think that the chance of a lifetime had come my way, and that I might so easily bungle it!” She paused and sighed deeply. “I got by, yes, but no one will ever know what mental torture I suffered.

“I don’t want to sound smug, but I’ve always had a great respect for acting. In music, painting, or sculpture no one expects to make a career without lengthy and thorough preparation; and I think it should be that way with acting. I even think that film acting should be finer than stage acting, if only because more people see it and are influenced by it.

“If I had it to do over again I would go into some good stock company or little theater group; I think that would be fine. Bluff may carry some people through thick and thin, but I’d rather rest on something more substantial.”

“Then you think luck was the principal factor in your success?” I asked.

“Yes, or maybe we should call it fate. I believe in destiny. Don’t you? All about us we see people with apparently every qualification for success, yet the years pass without their getting anywhere. Why? Others who seem to have no qualifications at all, not even tenacity of purpose, are pushed into things, molded, groomed, helped in every way. Again, why? There must be a great unknowable

Thank You, Gentlemen

Hollywood to appear in the "Scandals" picture, Alice Faye was with them. They figured it would take about six weeks to wind up the job, and then they’d return to New York and go on with the band.

That’s what Alice would have done—except that another man stepped into the picture and changed everything.

Winfield Sheehan was then boss of the Fox Studio, and had assigned Lilian Harvey to play the lead in "Scandals." But a series of disappointments had changed Lilian’s mind about making pictures in Hollywood, and making them for Fox in particular. She tossed that pretty head of hers and walked out on Sheehan.

In desperation he scanned the Hollywood horizon for a singer, happened to glance at Alice Faye—and to her complete astonishment and considerable dismay, he told her he was going to make a star of her.

She had been in town only three days. She was unknown to films. And she was expected to take the place of the then well-known Harvey!

For a girl with an inferiority complex the size of Alice’s, this was overwhelming. Even for Hollywood, the whole affair sounds too bizarre for belief.

One man had made her into a dancer, another into a singer, and a third was now turning her into a movie star. Still in a daze, Alice signed a contract.

Maybe Winnie Sheehan made this generous gesture partly to show Miss Harvey what he thought of her, but that’s too far-fetched in spite of what gossip said at the time. A producer doesn’t toss a million-dollar picture into the lap of an unknown girl just because he’s preeved. He saw that Alice had something about her that people liked. He gambled that she could exert that same magnetism on the screen. And he won.

Alice made more pictures, and starred in the second "Scandals" the following year.

When Sheehan left the studio and it became 20th Century-Fox, with Darryl Zanuck the new chief, Alice was for a time neglected. There was no reason why Zanuck should push a girl discovered by Sheehan. Yet he did.

He talked her into taking a spot in "On the Avenue" which didn’t appeal to Alice, and she was a hit. Many say she stole the show from Madeleine Carroll.

Ever since Alice was in the line-up of the chorus in the "Scandals" in New York, Walter Winchell has been her friend and constant booster.

When Zanuck signed him and Ben Bernie for "Wake Up and Live," Winchell said he wanted Alice Faye for the feminine lead.

"I didn’t expect to get any notices from my performance in that picture," Alice told me. "It was an unexpected success, and I’m not fooling. I didn’t think they’d have any room left in the reviews to mention me after giving credit to Winchell, Bernie, and Jack Haley, yet the critics handed me some lovely bouquets.

"People are nice to me for no particular reason. I don’t know why. I don’t think I’m pretty, and I make awful faces when I sing. Oh, don’t try to deny it! And yet, I do have a lot of faithful boosters. Walter Winchell has always put in a good word for me. He sort of regards me as one of the old Broadway bunch, the 52nd Street fraternity, you might call it. He always warns us: ‘Don’t tell me anything you don’t want published,’ which is fair enough.

"Buddy De Sylva should be added to the list of men who seem to belong to the Help Alice Faye Club. He has always wanted me in his pictures, and to have a famous song composer and movie producer put in a boost certainly helps. He has arranged for me to play the lead in ‘Young Man’s Fancy’ which will be a big Universal musical.

"I’m grateful to all of them, to Rudy who gave me a chance to get out of the chorus, to Mr. Zanuck for the way he has built me up as an actress, refusing to shove me along too fast and always giving me well-chosen roles,
Thank You, Gentlemen

and to all the others. I don’t know why they’re so nice to me, but they are, and I’m grateful.”

It’s that very quality which makes you want to do things for Alice. She is appreciative. She doesn’t act as though all men should just naturally want to do her favors. Again, that shyness of hers brings out the protective instinct in men. By nature it’s impossible for her to thrust herself forward. Men either don’t like or are afraid of aggressive women. They much prefer to be gallant to girls like Alice, and honestly enjoy basking in her grateful smile.

I’ve mentioned the important men in her life: Hale, for her dancing career, Rudy for her singing, Sheehan and Zonuck for her movie career, Winchell for giving her generous publicity.

There’s still one very important man to add to the list: Tony Martin—for romance.

For her birthday he gave her a lovely watch. So did Norman Tourag, so did Bill Robinson, the dancer. For three days Alice had been shooting a scene with Don Ameche in which they stowed away spaghetti. Even Don, who loves spaghetti, was getting tired of it.

And then the entire cast gathered around Alice on her birthday, announced they were going to serve lunch and have a party, and brought in—spaghetti! Along with it was a funny little cake labelled “Happy Birthday.” Every one yelled “Speech, speech!”

Alice stood up and stuttered out her thanks, painf ully embarrassed by all this attention. Then she put her hand on the cake, which she thought was oph ony made from plaster, and to her horror she felt it give way and squish between her fingers. That made everyone howl with laughter, and Alice sat down covered with confusion and frosting.

Which of the three watches she got for her birthday is the one she likes best, Alice won’t say. But I rather suspect the one from Tony Martin is her favorite, for obvious reasons.

The handsome actor-singer is head man among all the men in her life.

As to whether they’ll marry, it’s too soon to decide that.

“I’ve no intention of the moment of getting married,” Alice told me, “but that’s all I can say. Those things just happen, you know.”

Whether marriage will happen to Alice Foye remains to be seen. Would marriage aim the enthusiasm of the male members of the Help Alice Foye Club? Not a bit of it.

Men always are trying to do something nice for Alice, and they always will. That’s why I’m writing a story about her. I’d like to be a member, too!

Dorothy Lamour and Jon Hall were ordered to stay out in the sunshine to acquire tan for their roles as native South Sea Islanders in “The Hurricane.”

BING CROSBY won’t like to see this in print, but when he walked into the mail room at the studio one morning with a huge bundle under his arm, your snooping reporter happened to be there.

It seems he had received a letter from a man who was about to be released from prison after serving a sentence for manslaughter. He didn’t want any money but said: “I think I am about your size and if you have an old suit you don’t need, I would appreciate having it.”

Of course Bing, and every other star, receives thousands of begging letters, but this one appealed. Bing could easily have asked half a dozen people who work for him to take the suits—four of them—over and mail them, but he did it himself so that no publicity agent would hear of it and put it in the paper.

THE photograph of Robert Taylor that his mother prefers is not one of his newest glamour pases. It’s the picture he had taken when he first went to college and it still reigns in its modest pasteboard frame on her living-room table in Beverly Hills.

A FEW days after Simane left Hollywood for “four months at vacationing,” a perfunctory announcement was given the press that a drama of Suez would be her first film upon her return. All the gossips insist her future parts will be in Paris and that this was the perfect Hollywood let-down to the big build-up that failed.

LONG faithful Navarro fans will be interested to know that Raman is acting as his own secretary as well as an on the screen again. He explains that he is anxious to learn exactly what his friends want him to try now that he can pick his rôles. He may sing on the radio, too.

SOME people think Bobby Breen speaks in a pretty affected manner. They want to aim a custard pie instead of calling rapturously. But Basil Rathbone, having just worked with the prodigy, swears that Bobby actually is the most unaffected child in the movies. So better give the lad another look and listen.

GAIL PATRICK remains the honest interviewee even when her witty efficiency is questioned. When asked if she could cook now that she is a happy matron, she replied, “I’ve only tried custards—because they’re the simplest thing I could think of.”

JOE E. BROWN has become the full-fledged owner of his very own baseball team in Los Angeles. But he’s even prouder of the pass that’s just been presented to him. It is genuine gold and it will admit him to all the baseball games played on the Pacific Coast for the rest of his life. He’s wilder about it than about his private soda fountain.

ROBERT CUMMINGS was bragging that his wife had got her pilot’s license and he, himself, had taught her to fly after two instructors had given her up as hopeless.

“Was she so anxious to learn?” a friend inquired.

“No,” Bab admitted promptly, “she doesn’t care about it at all. But I like to fly and I wanted her to learn so she could relieve me when we go on trips. It took thirty-four hours at instruction before she saluted instead of the customary five or ten. But I wouldn’t let her go to picture shows until she learned. She likes movies so she stuck to it.”

DURING the final scene of “Souls at Sea,” when the survivors of the shipwreck are drifting about in a small boat, one of the extras persisted in sitting on Gary Cooper’s lap.

“Don’t sit on Gary’s lap,” Director Henry Hathaway screamed at her. “He couldn’t possibly steer the boat and hold you on his lap for as long as you’re supposed to be adrift.”

“But there’s a bump where I’m supposed to sit,” she whined.

“Well, sit on it anyhow,” he stormed. “Do you think we can send a man along with the picture wherever it’s continued on page 66

Sophie every year—probably as long as you both shall live. Sophie has one of the largest mailing lists in existence. Every year, on the first of November, she starts mailing greetings to every one she has met and liked, however briefly, through her long, varied and ripe career.

When you consider the number of people Sophie must have met and also consider that she has the knack of liking almost everybody, it does begin to seem something of an undertaking.

Nevertheless, it seems to be so fascinating that people who measure six-feet-something insist upon investigating. We found out that if you just crawl in, sit on the floor and press some buttons, it’s great fun. Gail says, plaintively, “But I thought that it was far too difficult to play with!”

Hollywood is chuckling over the changes in Katherine Hepburn since she was cast in the same picture with Ginger Rogers. Ginger is the studio pet, far her friendliness and charm. Katie probably took one look, saw people falling over themselves to please Ginger and decided her own tactics were all wrong. At any rate, her report is to have said, “Pardon me,” when she bumped into some one on a studio street.

We’re glad to report that Hollywood approves, in its own fashion, of the great governmental changes of this era. Many girls are wearing, with enthusiasm, bracelets from which dangle their Social Security numbers, cut out in gold, mounted with diamonds.

Dick Arlen’s forty-two-foot motorboat, streamlined, made in Finland, complete with radio telephone, is decorated—hold your breath—with Venetian blinds throughout. A friend of Dick’s tells us it is probably the only boat in the world so adorned. Probably.

When Judith Allen announced her intention of adopting a baby, her mother said no. “You have two dogs, and a baby would be just another plaything.” Then she reminded Judith of a few of the things she’d gone through in successfully raising her. Miss Allen announced her intention of not adopting a baby.

Gary Cooper saw a novelty clock in a Hollywood Boulevard shop window. Thinking his wife might like it, he inquired about its price. The shopkeeper hesitated, then blurted out, “Well, Mr. Cooper, it’s the most expensive we have—but it’s only $2.25.” And he started to put the clock back in the window.

“Hey!” Gary exclaimed. “I’m buying that, if you don’t mind.”

The merchant beamed. “I wasn’t afraid the low price would spoil my sale,” he said. Which, opines Gary, throws some light on average stellar shopping psychology.

FOUNTAINS OF BEAUTY

BY LAURA BENHAM

YOU'LL BE LOVELIER THAN EVER THIS AUTUMN WITH THE NEW, SOFTER, MORE GLAMOROUS MAKE-UP.

FASHION is always a step or two ahead of the season and that’s why, weeks before the first leaf has turned, we women are anxious for a new fall hat, and most likely, a new face to go under it.

For autumn is really the most exciting—and most important—season of the year, in a beauty way. It’s the time when most of us are a bit tired of the fine informality of summer. Our once highly prized sun tan has become boring; we can no longer ignore the dried-out, brittle condition of our hair; our faces stare back at us from mirrors with irritating sameness; and we “haven’t a stitch to wear.”

So, it’s with a sigh of relief that we pull a black velvet hat down over one eye, clasp a string of pearls around our throats, reach for a new lipstick and return to town! If we haven’t been away, we at least return to a “town” way of living.

And reaching for the new lipstick is, I think, the most important gesture of all. It means far more than a bit of new color on wan lips. It means we’re ready to plan a new wardrobe, find a smartly different coiffure, start re-conditioning hair and skin and adopt new make-up to go with our new clothes.

For styles in make-up change just as do fashions in frocks. Remember when it was smart to wear bright patches of rouge on our cheeks? And the mode that immediately followed, for startling red lips the only notes of color in unhealthily pallid faces?

This season the mode is one of elegance combined with naturalness, both in clothes and in cosmetics. Of course, this doesn’t mean going without make-up. It means, instead, make-up applied with greater skill than you’ve ever used before, in order to bring out your own best features, and if you’re truly skillful, you won’t have any bad ones. That’s how subtle must be the hand that wields the lipstick.

In fact, the best word to describe the way you’ll look this autumn is one borrowed from the French—‘saignée.’ It means well-groomed, poised, polished, sophisticated. It means you’ll look sleek and shining, with a well-scrubbed, well-brushed, delightfully scented gliter that is in no way harsh or brittle. You’ll have to look this way to live up to the alluring feminine clothes you’ll be wearing.

For clothes will be frankly flattering both in line and color, the latter falling into two equally smart basic categories. First, there will be the clear, vivid tones, the brilliant scarlets, dashing blues, striking greens, that demand the same delicate pastel make-up you’ll wear with black.

Second, there will be the warmer, romantic shades with muted depths, the rich wine reds, lush purples, jewellike greens, with which more radiant, glowing make-up should be chosen.

So, to achieve a saignée appearance, first decide upon the colors you intend wearing during the next few months, then choose your make-up accordingly.

Now, the first item to choose in planning your make-up, old or new, is your foundation. For foundation, meaning base, is in reality the basis of your facial beauty. And the qualities to demand in a foundation are purity, correct shade, ease of application, staying-power, and last but not least, an appearance of naturalness.

A fine foundation that meets all these requirements is one originally intended as a covering for scars. Invented by a gallant young woman whose disfiguring birthmark across the entire side of her face had almost ruined her life, it was placed on sale as a boon to those suffering from facial blemishes. It is a smooth and creamy paste which is worked into the skin with the fingers and will remain, without cracking or peeling off, from the moment it is applied until it is removed with cream.

Address your beauty problems to Laura Bonham, Picture Play, 79 Seventh Avenue, New York, in- closing stamped, self-addressed return envelope.
Foundations of Beauty

Soon after this remarkable product was introduced, its fame spread and even women without facial blemishes began using it as a general make-up foundation. As such, it has become one of the "must have" cosmetics on thousands of dressing tables. It comes in eight flattering shades and is as fine a foundation as you'll ever use.

You'll want a new powder, of course, to go over your smooth foundation and I'm going to tell you about a lovely one that is as soft as the duvetyn for which it is named, and based on exactly the color principal of the new make.

The makers of this powder believe that skin-tones and make-up fall into two general categories, the pastel and warmer tones. And for each of these two classes they have developed three shades of varying but related intensity. To make it even easier for you to find exactly the right shade for your skin, they have inclosed in the top of each box three small test envelopes so that before you open the large box only to find that you have made a mistake in your choice, you can test your shade and if it isn't right for you, the box is still unopened and may be exchanged.

What a boon this is! For how many times have you bought powder that looked perfect in the shop, only to find after reaching home that it is a shade too light or too dark?

Besides the advantage of these test envelopes, this new duvetyn powder is delightfully soft and clinging and is faintly but pleasingly scented. Another good powder that will fit perfectly into even the smallest budget is that made by an-aid Middle-Western firm. It comes in several flattering shades, is fine and soft, and is packaged attractively in flat square boxes with a decorative coronet in the corner.

Of course, every one has her own particular pet among beauty items and mine happens to be lipsticks. That's because I think the lips the loveliest feature of the entire face. And so much of their loveliness depends upon the lipstick you use, for by the color of your lipstick you set the entire color scheme of your face. For that reason, I think it's a good thing to choose your lipstick first, then a rouge that will blend with it, rather than the usual other way around.

One of the newest lipsticks, a clear, brilliant shade called Royalty Red, has just been introduced by a famous cosmetic house. It is such a clear, true red that it goes with almost any shade, is smooth and creamy and has grand lasting power. There's a rouge to go with it, too, in the same shade.

Or, if you're buying your lipstick with one eye on your budget, you'll be wise to choose the large one that comes in four lovely shades for each complexion type: blonde, brunette, fission and natural, and this lipstick costs only a dime.

Now, there are some girls who don't like to match their own cosmetics, but prefer to select their make-up in sets already matched for them. If you're one of these girls, you'll delight in either of the two make-up sets designed by one of America's most famous cosmetic houses.

HAVE YOU TRIED THE—

Wash that is a scientific pore cleanser? It is a granular liquid good for large pores, blackheads, sallowness, and vanishing tan.

Pasteurized milk bath that fluffs the water into millions of milky bubbles? It relaxes you and leaves your skin fine and soft and delicately scented.

Pliant nail polish, that comes in five luscious shades, Rose Mist, Crushed Rose, Rose Tan, Rose Geranium, American Beauty Rose.

Toothbrush Travel Kit? It's a three-inch container inside of which is the head of a toothbrush which screws into one end of the container.

Perfume "sentinel"? It's a small metal case containing a leak-proof glass vial just large enough to hold a few drops of your favorite perfume, to carry in your handbag.

or not. It's that business of hearing the call, 'Curtain!' The business of looking into that sea of faces. If you don't do that now and then you forget what your job really is. You have to keep an being conscious of an audience and sometimes, in pictures, you forget."

That is probably why she doesn't object to visitors on the set where she is working, so long as she doesn't have to meet them and chat. She likes the sense of an audience.

She says that she is moody but that she "tries to overcome it." Her methods seem a trifle strenuous to me. They include rising at six to go hiking over the hills back of her Malibu home.

Sometimes she throws a pail cast over the denim slacks and goes shopping on the Boulevard, bandanna on.

"No one will know me if I wear dark glasses!" she assures herself. If she finds that she is wrong about this and that the autograph hunters are in full cry, she flees, muttering things which I should not like to repeat to you. She is irritated and surprised. For weeks afterward she does all her shopping by telephone.

Her husband manages her business affairs and he has his difficulties with her. She is pretty sensible about money, for the most part, and drives a shrewd bargain. But every now and then a vague sort of check appears and Mr. Ross looks stern. "Not that old lady again!" he admonishes. "Well, this time she really looked hungry. And this time she had a little boy with her, and a dog!"

No matter if the old woman is an obvious fraud, the hunger, the little boy and the dog have done their work with Jean.

She listens to good music rather absent-mindedly, reads about it with concentration. She has never attempted to learn to play the simplest instrument.

She reads books on architecture and interior decoration, tomes on antiques. But she attempts no radical changes in her surroundings. "Same day, perhaps, we shall build a permanent home. Then I shall be glad that I read these things!"

Life has hurt her, embittered her, frightened her."

"But if I had it all to do over," she told me, "I shouldn't change one inch of it. I think that I'd decide everything just as I did before. I shouldn't try to duck the hurts or the disappointments or the rough spots. Every one of them taught me something. It's like going to the dentist. It's horrid while it's happening but it's so fine when it's all over!"

She is sure now of what she wants. But she isn't sure, just yet, of how she is to attain it. But neither, I guess, were W. C. Fields, Edgar Allen Poe, nor Charles Dickens, at Jean's age.
With a sound cultural education and gracious background, Fritz Leiber started his career in Ben Greer's Shakespearean repertory company. For twenty-one years as star and manager he has played—"Hamlet" chiefly—from coast to coast. His voice has the vibrant richness and variety of violins, cellos, trumpets. To him pictures, good ones like "The Great Garrick" which is his next, and "The Story of Louis Pasteur," his first talking picture, are a grand adventure, a bit of rare luck for a man who thought his life had settled into a groove.

Milton Berle went on the stage at the age of four, a theater scout having seen him playing in a Bronx street giving an imitation of Charlie Chaplin. He has played all the vaudeville circuits and night clubs, and in rapid-fire fashion can deliver impromptu jokes in the manner of Jack Benny and Fred Allen, his idols. Naturally, his voice has the clang of a smart-cracking master of ceremonies.

Their Springboards.—Fritz Leiber's career seems to have grown out of an intense interest in literature, painting, music. In his nonworking moments he rereads any of the eight thousand books that live with him, works at sculpture, at painting, at gardening—everything that gives him the feeling of growing.

Milton Berle picks a goal and nothing distracts him from reaching it. First he wanted to be a vaudeville headliner, then a night club master of ceremonies, then a radio comedian. Now he wants stardom in pictures and if RKO's "New Faces" is a hit, he will make a few more, then try the dramatic stage.

First Impression.—Both Mr. Leiber and young Berle have that immediate warmth that is so valuable to salesmen, club leaders, and politicians. But Leiber is relaxed, mellow, while Berle is eager and tense. Leiber holds you spellbound sharing the richness of his experience; Berle is louder and funnier. It takes all kinds of people to make movies and here are two of the best of their kind.

Imitation Better Than the Original.—Couriers from Hollywood report that nostalgic ex-New Yorkers hang around the café sets of "Fifty-second Street," Walter Wanger's saga of Swing Music Alley and grow sentimental about coming back home. They needn't take the trouble. The real Fifty-second Street is practically deserted. Broadwayites having fled to the summer theaters, the golf links, the air-cooled roofs. Only New York's pest Number One, the sidewalk photographers, are encamped there now.

Patsy Kelly did venture there one night, but it was so depressing she went over to see "Make Way For Tomorrow" to cheer her up. It was the only picture she could find that she did not appear in, and it had a devastating effect on her. She rushed out of the theater and telephoned her father, determined that he should never feel neglected as the parents in the picture were. Kelly, père, was not pleased. It was two in the morning and he had been sound asleep. Patsy just can't get a sentimental rôle even in real life.

Misunderstood.—Simone Simon, that problem child of 20th Century-Fox, has gone off to Paris and although company officials insist that she is coming back to make pictures, many people are frankly dubious.

In her most enchanting manner, which is very cute indeed, she explains that she doesn't understand Americans, and they misunderstand her. She sounds very convincing when she explains how good her intentions are, how tractable she is. But she flares up when asked if she is not an actress, if she has to have parts cut and fitted elaborately just to exploit her personality.

She went almost unnoticed, like any pert and pretty young woman, until she began acting like a mischievous child who just cannot stand to be ignored. "Tantrums" is the word New York's suavest head waiter applied to her public manner.

Only a Rumor.—Confirmation is lacking, but it would be interesting, if true, that several people sent Miss Simon on a voyage gift copies of Dale Carnegie's "How to Win Friends and Influence People."

Too Marvelous For Words.—Any day now Warner Brothers will be ready to start work on "Gold Diggers of 1938," so Wini Shaw is taking a last fond look around her beloved Broadway before she goes back to work. She hopes you have forgotten "Broadway Hostess," or rather that you didn't see it. What the critics said about it as nothing compared to the way she tears it to tatters.

Miss Shaw has the same explosive surge of vitality in her speaking voice that she has in her singing. It is grand to hear her talk, particularly when she talks about Bette Davis, which, I am assured, she almost always does. Bette is the greatest actress, the grandest person in all Hollywood, and it won't do you any good to disagree because Wini Shaw could easily drown out your voice.

All Points East.—Fans are getting their pencils sharpened and setting the alarm early enough to get them down to meet the Twentieth Century, for an influx of Hollywood stars is due any day now.

Marlene Dietrich is off to a castle in Austria for a vacation. Madeleine Carroll will drift down the British coast in a yacht, Pat Paterson is going to Paris to make a picture. Joan Bennett is to have that long-promised fling at acting in stock at Dennis, Massachussets, and at Newport if the studio will spare her long enough.

Henry Fonda is coming on, not only to join his old playmates in summer Never To Be Read.—Book stores everywhere have been besieged ever since the tragic death of Jean Harlow by fans who want to know when they can get a copy of the novel she wrote. It will not be published, because at the time of her death she was making extensive revisions—writing a line or two as she rode to the studio, jotting down notes between scenes. Perhaps her family will not mind, since it is not to be published, if I tell a little of the story:

"To-night Is To-day" was the story of a blind man whose courageous young wife worked in a night club in order to support him. Knowing that he could not bear to think of her in such surroundings, she told him she had an office job—making her life one long, dangerous deception. Since she worked at night, she had to pretend to him that night was day—come home in the early dawn to get dinner for him, retire in the morning, get up and serve breakfast in the late afternoon, keep him from ever listening to a radio or talking to outsiders for fear he would learn her secret.

It is a pity that the public can never read it, because it would have given an insight into her understanding of people and compassion for them that her rôles in pictures never suggested.

Coming Attractions.—With suitable farce, and there really couldn't be too much, Dick Merrill, the transatlantic flyer, signed a contract to make a picture based an air adventures only a little more melodramatic than his. Yau probably fell in love with him in the newsreels, and here is your chance to do it all over again. . . .

Lily Pons's only demand on the RKO studio when they phoned to discuss details of her next picture was that she must have Erik Rhades, Eric Blare, and Jack Oakie in the cast. . . . Max Baer is making a picture in England, hoping to make Hollywood realize what they are passing up.

and his erstwhile secretary-wife, Harriet Madelia Foster. It was even bruited about that Bob was to have an old-fashioned charivari, but the couple hid out from that.

Jean Arthur in Wrangle.—Loyalty to the stage on the part of Hollywood actors is a pretty fantasy. Something that they like to talk about each spring. They are always saying then: "Well I'm going back to Broadway next fall." But the fall finds them—with few exceptions like Margaret Sullivan and Katharine Hepburn, who went on a tour anyway—sequestered in the film colony or busy at the studios. The majority are really afraid of the stage.

All that, though, hasn't stopped Jean Arthur from engaging in a vigorous legal battle with Columbia over her right to return to the footlights occasionally. But will she do that when the occasion really arises? Her Columbia salary, it was brought out, ranges from $1,000 to $3,125 during the life of her contract.

Triumph of Dignity.—Formality in weddings was revived in the most highly dignified manner with the Gene Raymond-Jeanette MacDonald nuptials, the first event of that kind in modern days to rival the Vilma Banky-Rod La Rocque knot-tying.

Everybody who was anybody was requested to wear white tie and tails for the occasion. The photographers had more or less to grab-shot the church part of the event, although they went to town with shutter-snapping later at Jeanette's house.

With all the grandeur of the occasion, there was a great deal of unfavorable comment on the whole proceeding, which caused no end of worry for the participants.

The one word that seemed to fix itself on the service was "chilly." It looks as if Hollywood en masse just doesn't like formal weddings.

Van Sternberg Hermit.—Strange changes dose time bring, Josef von Sternberg an almost every occasion now refers reservedly to Marlene Dietrich as "Miss Dietrich." Of course, he probably spoke of her thusly in the past, but those who know him well feel something in the tone or inflection which indicates a curious note of alteration.

Van Sternberg, one of the finest and most individual directors, now devotes his time to art. Even his last English venture, "I, Claudius," with Merle Oberon, was ill-fated due to Merle's being injured while it was in production.

Joe lives in a modernistic steel house in San Fernando Valley.

Guests on Wheels.—Nuttiest party held in a long time was Ann Sothern's for the christening of a new manse in which she is to live. The guests roller-skated from her temporary abode over to the location of the permanent one, and then had a treasure hunt for champagne. What next?

Loretta Invokes Bans.—Loretta Young has turned thumbs down on photographs of her two adopted children, bath girls. It is the customary idea of not wishing to exploit one's children. That's been the slogan of most of the couples who have adopted youngsters.

Certainly Loretta's decision to take the bairns under her wing was a lovely gesture for a young player. The little girls, one nearly four, and the other about two years, are respectively Jane and Judy. Nice homy names.

Don Devils Alice—Don Ameche is the latest champion practical-joker in Hollywood, and he's caused Alice Faye more grief than anybody. The Ritz Brothers used to keep her in stitches, but Don sometimes almost brings her to the verge of tears. He accused her one day of calling him a shirker around the set of "You Can't Have Everything," because it so happened that he was allowed a brief time off, and she had to keep busy. Being a good sport, Alice had never really complained, and she was furious when Don accused her, until she found out it was just a joke.

Another day Don put some smoke pots from a picture set in the rear compartment of Director Normon...
Hollywood High Lights

Taurag’s car, making him think the outa was on fire. Dan then laid the blame at Alice’s door. She was in the dog house until he explained matters.

Finally—a Swanson Film.—Gloria Swanson’s return to the screen seems finally assured, with “The Second Mrs. Draper” under way. Nothing can be foreseen that will wreck the venture at this stage. Rumors circulated that all was not well, but they were emphatically denied.

It was the diligent efforts of Frances Marion, the writer now turned producer, which brought about the opportunity for Gloria. Miss Marion attempted to relaunch the star’s career a year or so ago at MGM, but that didn’t work out. She finally godmothered Gloria at the Columbia Studio. It’s more than three years since Gloria last appeared.

Kings of Swank.—What about this new business of high society marriages for the young men of movieland? Apparently they won’t look at anybody, but a blue-blood or a blue-banker, social registerite, et cetera. Twas Dick Foran’s Mexican elopement, following on the heels of several others, which centered attention on the fact that young leading men are going matrimonially high-hat. For Lyle Talbot, Henry Fonda, Randolph Scott had previously embarked on weddings to fashionable partners.

Foran’s bride was a West Coast social figure, Ruth Piper Hallingsworth, and her divorce from her first husband was made final a day or two after her across-the-border flight with her screen mate.

Weary of Helping Hand.—Paul Muni is beginning to find that he is one of the world’s biggest builders-uppers. After he and Luisa Rainer shared starring honors in “The Good Earth,” he found that Luise as “O-Lan” was receiving all the medals. Partly the reason is that the story literally swirled around this Chinese heroine.

More recently Muni has been playing in “The Story of Emilie Zola,” and in that case, too, the drama all revolves around another personage—namely “Dreyfus,” and that part is enacted by Joseph Schildkraut.

After one day of heavy scenes, Muni took a long look at Joseph, and finally said: “Umpth! Just another ‘O-Lan.’”

Melts FLAKINESS AWAY

—IN ONE APPLICATION

ANN’S made a hit! Any girl does if her skin is smooth and soft, if her make-up looks flawless—stays looking that way.

Popular girls use Pond’s Vanishing Cream. As a famous dermatologist says, “A keratolytic cream (Vanishing Cream) has the ability to melt away harsh, dried-out surface cells when it touches the skin. Instantly the skin becomes fresh and smooth.”

Just one application of Pond’s Vanishing Cream and dry, flaky bits melt away. An instant later, powder goes on smooth as silk. You’ll be delighted with the way it clings!

For powder base—Pond’s Vanishing Cream makes a perfect powder base because it smooths your skin. Make-up goes on with an even finish...stays.

For overnight—Apply after cleansing. Not greasy. It won’t smear. Lovely skin by morning!

Exploding a Myth.—The old "fatal three" myth is just about to be exploded in Hollywood. It's one of the silliest things anyway. It depends on which way the figuring is done. The thing is that every time there's a death of a prominent star people commence counting, and chances are that two lesser players will follow in a short time, especially with the present large actor population in movieland.

In the last series of deaths it was just as easy to count four as three. The passing of Jean Harlow was followed by that of Monroe Owslay, then Colin Clive, then Charles Sellen the character player. These three were all pretty prominent at one time or another, Sellen far his crabby old men especially.

Mal-de-mer Bride.—Little June Long, Venus of the movies, was rushed back from her wedding trip to Honolulu. But June didn't mind that so much. The thing that was terrible was the fact that she was terrifically seasick for two days going over. "Even the sailors suffered mal-de-mer," she told us. "I think a whole turned over at the bottom of the ocean or something."

June is the cutest bride Hollywood has ever seen. A mere child, one might say. She was wed to Victor Orsatti, a brother of whom recently married Jean Chatburn. The Orsattis, in fact, are a numerous family.

Bug Bites McCormack.—Who do you suppose has an eye on the movies as a future career? None other than John McCormack, the famous tenor. John got the yearning when he played in "Wings of the Morning," and now he's settled in Hollywood for an indefinite time. Well, the cinema bug captures them all.

End of Pickfair.—With her marriage to Buddy Rogers, Mary Pickford quit Pickfair, and so the big reception held after the wedding was regarded as signaling the last year of the celebrated estate. However, it may become the residence of some other movie star. For didn't Miriam Hopkins purchase the old home of Jack Gilbert? And she remodeled it pretty completely, except for the exterior.

Emissary to England.—Jaunty young Robert Taylor is to be the first star dispatched to England by MGM. We surmise that Bob will fill the bill because he is a fashion plate. But wasn't Barbara Stanwyck be lonesome unless she is able to arrange that planned trip of hers to Europe at the same time?

Mickey Rooney's idea of resting between film work is lending a helping hand with the housework. His latest screen try is "Hoosier Schoolboy."

Peppery Alberni

long-winded trials, and contracts with their whereases, whereas, and here-in-abouts, I just couldn't take it.

"I was feeling sorry for myself and trying to figure a way out of it one afternoon in a café, when I looked up and suddenly recognized Enrique Barras, the greatest actor in Spain at that time.

"Buoyed up by the effect of vintage wines, I didn't hesitate to approach his table. I told him all my troubles as though I had known him all my life," Alberni recalled. "At great length I explained my distaste for law and my ambitions to be an actor. And, by one of those strange quirks of luck which are supposed to happen only in books, he listened patiently to my woes and offered me a small part in his next play, 'Marta at the Lawlands.' That was in 1910."

Luis remained with a stock company in Spain for a year and the next two years found him still an actor, playing with a company traveling in the south of France. In 1914 he embarked for America and never has returned to Europe professionally since.

"I first came to Hollywood in 1929," he told me, "as a dialogue director on..."
Spanish versions. I arrived here with a letter to Irving Thalberg from Laurence Stallings.

It was inevitable that he couldn't remain long behind the cameras, and we soon found him in his first screen role with Richard Arlen in "The Santa Fe Trail." Since then he has appeared in more than seventy pictures.

"Of course," he confided, "my ultimate goal is that of director of Spanish pictures, and as soon as I find that my popularity with the fans is on the wane, that is what I plan to do."

At this time the waitress approached him with a check.

"Give it to him," he said, pointing to his agent. "He collects ten percent for nothing and he can pay for a lunch for his best client."

Ruby Keeler primly strolls about her garden thus attired, and you couldn't ask for more seemly shorts on a girl.

Leo Gorcey, sixteen, is enacting the same rôle he had on the stage in the screen production of "Dead End."

While visiting the Paramount studio the other day, I was surprised to note upon entering the office of Producer Arthur Hornblow, Jr., that bath he and Director Leisen were garbed in bell hop jackets and caps.

"What's the gag?" I asked.

"We are just preparing for the arrival of Luis Alberni to discuss his rôle in 'Easy Living.'" I was told. "He's playing the part of 'Louis Louis,' the hotel owner."

At that moment Alberni entered the office. In one moment he took in the entire situation. He handed Leisen his hat and cane and turned to the producer. He snapped his fingers and said, "Arthur, my lunch."

Hornblow replied, "Very good, sir," and left the room. And that seemed to settle that.

But within a few minutes, Hornblow was back carrying a tray covered with a large table napkin. Placing it before Alberni, he said "Vaiolo!" while removing the covering to reveal an uncooked ham.

Alberni showed he could take it in gales of laughter.
myself that I was there to talk to Basil about villains, loosely referred to in show business as "heavies." I barged into the subject.

"When I first saw you on the stage in London you were doing romantic leads. You made fair damsels sigh with admiration. How do you like portraying the other side of the picture, the—er—heavies?"

"Heavies?" He smiled amiably.  "What is a heavy? Isn't it merely theatrical jargon?" He blew some smoke rings. "Don't you believe that there is a little of the heavy, the deep-dyed villain in every man? I do. If I had not learned it from life, I would have learned it from my fan mail."

"You get fan mail?" I asked incredulously. "What kind of fan mail? Don't they all hate you?"

"No, as a matter of fact they don't. I get the usual number of obemy letters, of course, but the majority evince interest in the characters I play. They understand them. Between the lines I read a certain yearning to take the same steps as I am made to take in the characterization. 'If only I had the pluck to do the same, I would do it,' they seem to say."

"Heaven forbid!" I put in. "What about the brutal 'Murdstone' in 'David Copperfield'?"

Basil smiled, took up his sherry glass and sipped. "Of course you would pick 'Murdstone'. Dickens used a broad brush in painting 'Murdstone'; and when Dickens used a broad brush on his villains, (which, mind you, he didn't do very often) they were veritable villains. Of course, nobody can have any sympathy for 'Murdstone,' who beats such a nice little boy as 'David'—or should I say Freddie Bartholomew?"

"Well, now, tell me about 'Tybalt.'"

Basil's face lit up. "Now, there's a character, a horse of quite a different color," he gloomed. "I suppose that 'Tybalt' is referred to as the heavy of 'Romeo and Juliet'. But was 'Tybalt' a 'heavy'? Decidedly not! Unless 'esprit de famille' can be called a crime."

"Now look here: 'Tybalt' belonged to the noble family of 'Capulet'—hereditary enemies of the 'Montagues.' To a 'Capulet' party, in barges this upstart 'Montague,' 'Romeo,' disguised in a mask, mind you, seeking to snaffle the loveliest daughter of the 'Capulets,' 'Juliet.'"

"Well, what would you do?" The Rathbone eyes flashed blue lightning. "'Tybalt' behaved as any red-blooded man would behave, as so many of my fans would like to behave had they the opportunity and the pluck. He went right to the point with his hand on the hilt of his sword ready to defend the honor of his family. 'Tybalt' a heavy? Never!"

"No, your true heavy belonged to the dim, dark days of the drama. He was wont to tie the curly-haired hero in the plot of a buzz saw, or upon the railway tracks, where the fast express would make mashed potatoes of him. He was really a very villainous member of the community. Not a nice fellow at all. He was black all the way through.

"Well, the drama eventually got over it. But the word, 'heavy' remains to this day, thanks to pictures. But pictures are getting over it. Pictures are rapidly progressing to the point where there will be no leading man, no leading woman, no heavy, all going through their paces according to pattern. Pictures are getting to the point where these three behave like real characters in everyday life. They acknowledge no pattern. They behave as you and I would behave, not as leading men, leading women, and heavies would behave. In other words, they are true-to-life characters."

"Was Pontius Pilate in 'The Last Days of Pompeii' a true-to-life character?" I inquired meekly. There I had him on the hip, or so I supposed.

"Pontius Pilate? Of course he was true to life. You can't call him a 'heavy! He did his best to prevent the Crucifixion. He was merely overwhelmed by odds. You and I could not have stood up before such opposition. Incidentally, I think that that character was one of the best, if not the best, that I have ever portrayed upon the screen."

"It was only a week's work, and I told my manager that I would not consider a week's work. Anyhow, he persuaded me to read the script. Well, before I had read to the end I felt that I was Pilate, and told him to go ahead and get that part for me."

"What can you do with such a man? I felt that I was getting nowhere very fast. He convinced me that, in these enlightened days, there are no heavies as such. They are ordinary human beings, even as you and I, and they behave on the screen even as you and I would behave in real life. And when this Rathbone sets himself out to be convincing, one stays convinced! And having been convinced that there are no more villains or heavies, I thought that I would guide the conversation through other channels."

"As a good Englishman, tell me what you do to preserve the traditions of your native land in your habits and method of living."

If Basil had had any warning of the question, his answer couldn't have come cleaner, sharper.

"Of course I'm an Englishman, but I'm afraid I'm too much of a tramp to conform to any tradition. I think it's much more interesting to conform to conditions wherever one finds oneself."

Strange talk for an Englishman, who, according to Beatrice Lillie's song, is, with mad dogs, quite likely to "go out in the noontide sun." To say nothing of dressing for dinner in the jungle. All in accordance with tradition.

Not that Basil lacks tradition. For

Gentleman Firebrand

Fernand Gravet made such a favorable impression in "The King and the Chorus Girl" that he is being recalled from France to make another picture. from it. We talked of the beautiful county of Buckinghamshire, where he made his residence on his last visit to his native land. It is a county particularly significant to Americans on account of its association with William Penn. We had both gazed with admiration upon the ceiling in the old mill house at The Jardans painted by Rubens when he sauntered there for a time. We had both visited Beacansfield Churchyard, not far from where Milton wrote "Paradise Lost," and Grey his "Elegy."

But this isn't a travelogue; it's a story about Basil Rathbone. However, I wanted you to know that Basil, when he talks about his homeland, is absorbed in things other than pining upstart "Montagues" in the stomach with a rapier, or putting little Freddie David Bartheslame Capperfield across his knee and wriggling him. He becomes illuminated with the beauty of the English countryside over which, he told me, he liked to walk. I looked out of his window onto Las Feliz Boulevard. I saw the cars go whizzing by in an endless procession.

"But," I inquired lamely, "where can you walk in this part of the country?"

"Just across the Boulevard Griffith Park begins, and one can get all the walking one requires. I walk miles every day when work permits."

Then he became illuminated with the countryside of southern California. And I would like to tell you that between the countryside of England and that of southern California there is a great gulf fixed. They are both beautiful but they are so different. Basil, with his fiery enthusiasm, seems to have the knack of adapting himself, nay, of living to the limit of his capacity in any environment under any circumstances. And Basil has the capacity for living. He lives every moment of his life, intensely, enthusiastically.

Should you have the pleasure of meeting him to-morrow you would not say, "He's an actor always treading the boards," as you would with many screen celebrities. You would say, "He's a great guy."

And, considering the parts he is called upon to play, this is a tribute to Rathbone, the man.

Adolphe Menjou refreshes his memory of the coming scene in "100 Men and a Girl" in a secluded portion of the set.

WINDSTORM

Movie moguls are in despair.

In frenzy, rant and tear their hair.

While scouts are scurrying far and wide

To find a "Scarlett," emerald-eyed.

Who shall play insidious "Rhet"?

"Melanie," "Ashley," too, to get.

Now Gable surely fits the case,

And Leslie Howard, "Ashley's" place.

While blond "Melanies" da abound.

No black-haired "Scarlett" can be found.

And so they're hunting far and wide

To find a "Scarlett," emerald-eyed.

Bill Powell's Spirit Bride

Allan Jones takes a day off from "The Firefly" to work and play at his Brentwood acres. With his actress-wife, Irene Hervey, and daughter, Gail, died. He possibly doesn't feel the conviction of that belief even yet. His friends urged him to leave town for a while after the funeral, and he immediately went to Ronald Colman for companionship aboard the latter's yacht.

Meanwhile the production of "Double Wedding," in which Powell was acting, went on for a time without him, and then work ceased for an interim. Bill had no spirit for anything during those days, nor yet, for it was reiterated again and again, Jean was as a bride to him, a spirit bride.

It was about three years ago that Bill and Jean first were attracted to each other. I can remember them well during that earlier time of romance dancing every dance at the Mayfair Club. Dancing madly, and with consummate grace. For Bill always has a neat—what might almost be called a svelte air about him—while the one adjective that fitted Jean when she was glimpsed in white evening garments was "gorgeous." Literally she filled the whole room.

Nobody thought the Powell-Harlow infatuation—which was the way it was described—would last. Just one of those blazing meteoric things that are bound to happen in Hollywood every so often. However, the principals in the romance fooled everybody. They fooled them just as much about rumors of marriage which began to circulate after they had been seen together a year.

"I don't think it would be advisable for Bill and myself to marry," Jean once said to me. "We've both been married before, and our marriages have turned out unhappily. I know for my part that I wouldn't want to consider married life. It's always difficult to reconcile with a picture career. Consequently Bill and I never discuss the subject. We are happy in our companionship, which I am satisfied should remain just that."

Later, there came a time when Jean perhaps felt differently, but various considerations intruded and prevented. Perhaps Bill and Jean would have married eventually; in fact there seems little doubt of that. Bill probably even felt deep regret that they hadn't after Jean died. However, they had both faced the problem of the divorce courts, and consequently anything like a hasty wedding did not appeal.

One goes back almost automatically to the dream poem, "Annabel Lee," in viewing the whole outcome of this love saga, which could unfold only in the overheated, temperamental domain of Hollywood—to those final words which say:

"For the moon never beams without bringing me dreams
Of the beautiful Annabel Lee;
And the stars never rise but I feel the bright eyes
Of the beautiful Annabel Lee;
And so, all the night tide, I lie down by the side
Of my darling—my darling—my life and my bride,
In the sepulcher there by the sea—
In her tomb by the sounding sea."

And thus, too, Bill Powell has dedicated his love to his spiritual consort, who lies also in a tomb not far from the sounding sea, in the Sanctuary of Benediction in the Memorial Court of Honor. and money, something we have seen on the screen more than once. But Mr. Powell leaves us in doubt whether he is really thrown off his balance or is only pretending, he is that mild about it. Therefore, when his comrades turn up and accuse him of going high-hat one doesn’t know whether they are right or just disapprovable. Anyway, action shifts to Shanghai for every one in the story and Mr. Powell makes sweeping atonement for his enjoyment of success by an act of generosity to Jane Darwell incredibly known as “Ma Marine.” The picture ends with a great big number made up of marching men in uniform with Mr.
Powell at their head, all singing for dear life in a Chinese night club. Mr. Powell has some nice songs and Doris Weston, a newcomer, is a soft, sweet heroine.

“Slave Ship”—20th Century-Fox. Meaning to produce a stark epic of the slave trade with Africa as it existed in 1860, those who wrote and directed the resulting picture hadn’t the nerve to go through with it. Instead, they lose sight of the main issue and go in for romantic fable, with several hundred Hollywood blacks in chains to supply atmosphere. The picture is produced on a large scale, too, with some fine photography and a number of good actors waiting to step out of their cardboard characters. But they never do, except for Mickey Rooney who is the only realistic member of the crew. As a sly cabin boy he is entirely plausible and, as always, a perfect actor. I consider him one of the best in Hollywood regardless of age or looks. Unfortunately, he is only incidents to the goings on here. Warner

Baxter, Wallace Beery, and Elizabeth Allan are the stars. All have been better, especially Miss Allan who is a total loss in expressing any emotion stronger than boredom from muslin ingenue in a picture hat. But her feminine appeal is enough to make
Mr. Baxter see the error of his ways as a successful slave crew cannot see Miss Allan, his wife, as anything but a menace to the continuation of their successful careers. So they must battle with noise and bloodshed and the Negroes are mercilessly flogged. But it all ends beautifully on a note after Mr. Baxter has been tried for illegal trafficking in slaves and Miss Allan’s pleas have melted the hard hearts of the judges.

“Another Dawn”—Warners. Can you forgive Kay Francis and Errol Flynn a poor picture for the joy of seeing them together? If so, then get all the satisfaction you can out of their association in one of the most hackedneyed stories you will see in a long time. Unfortunately, stars are only as good as their script. Unlike both Miss Francis and Mr. Flynn, I still was bored with them because their picture bored me. And I think they were bored, too, with a plot that could account for their lackluster performances. But Mr. Flynn wears uniforms with an air and Miss Francis displays her many dresses with ravishing chic. Both are handsome and incredibly slim. There’s hardly a hip between them. Perhaps they have nothing more. Anyway, they are part of a romantic triangle set in desert sands, an attack by savage hordes, a strocco and a determination on the part of every one to do his duty come what, preferably at a sacrifice of self. You see, Miss Francis is married to Colonel Ian Hunter when she meets Captain Errol Flynn and they fight—oh, how they fight—against a love that is almost as great as the love Miss Francis is added by the fact that Captain Flynn’s sister loves Colonel Hunter—has loved him for years and years—but he is tied up with service. So Miss Hunter sublimates her love by being extra sweet to Miss Francis. In fact, they’re so damned well bred and dutiful and intent on being noble that a more exasperating group of characters you would go far to find. Mind if I drop them right here?

“Ever Since Eve”—Warners. Marion Davies and Robert Montgomery—and especially Patsy Kelly and Allen Jenkins—provide summer entertainment in a picture of no importance. But it is inoffensive. The most remarkable fact about it is that five collaborators are responsible for the authorship. It’s nothing against them, but one just wonders why each gave so little of plot and characterization. Dialogue is bright, however, and I suspect that the picture is pleasing. Miss Davies plays a dual role, that is she disfigures herself with a black wig, glasses and plain clothes for one part and changes to blonde hair and youthful dresses for the other. The trouble is she plays both roles the same way with the same voice and expressions. But of course she isn’t supposed to be two separate entities—she’s just

"I Met Him in Paris."—Paramount. Only the movies could entertain us with such a frail story. Thanks, however, to shifting scenes, pungently amusing dialogue and the spell of beautiful photography, we are made to feel that we are participating in a play instead of looking at a cream puff. In short, this is more than usually diverting comedy. It is played with skill and sparkle by Claudette Colbert, Melvyn Douglas, Robert Young, and Mona Barrie, as well as lesser members of the cast. Beautiful outdoor scenes taken in Sun Valley, Idaho, easily pass for St. Moritz and at this season are welcome and stimulating. The story is hardly worth recounting. Miss Colbert, in Paris to represent a New York department store, becomes involved with two likable scalawags and they all run off to Switzerland for some fun. Then it is a polite battle for Miss Colbert's affections, with the right man winning her. But the other is far from being unworthy. Again let me call your attention to the dialogue.

"A Day at the Races."—MGM. The infrequency of their appearances make the Marx Brothers among the wisest and most welcome stars. Only Harold Lloyd is as retiring as they. Consequently their occasional pictures are celebrations, not everyday occurrences, and their peculiar humor and horseplay never grows stale even though some of it may be repeated. Ten to one you can't remember when you saw it, anyway. Their current picture is as goofy as any, as hilarious as any one has a right to expect, and is longer than comedy has a right to be. Just what happens in it is beyond my telling. After all, it isn't the story so much as the gags when the Marxes let themselves go. Here the gags are numerous, some of them ingenious and all of them heartily funny. See it and howl.

Danielle Darrieux, famous French actress, will make her American screen début soon in "The Rage of Paris."

What the Fans Think

The King of Filmland.

How on earth could any one possibly say that they're in love with Bing Crosby's voice or say that he has the most wonderful voice in the world. What has Nelson Eddy got if Crosby has the best voice?

Crosby sings nothing but jazz while Eddy sings real music that proves the power of his voice. Crosby has looks, and he makes a neat lover, but not a singer. Eddy, as some people say, can't act, but to me he is one of the best actors on the screen—he has a romantic voice, and oh, what a smile! His voice is the best I've ever heard, and he is the best lover on the screen, in my estimation.

I saw Eddy in person and nearly met him, and I want to tell you anti-Eddy fans that he can't be compared. The most captivating smile, a stalwart, tall, handsome man, and can he sing! There's something about Eddy that gives him the title of "The King of Filmland."

Now for my criticisms. Why on earth are such people as Barbara Pepper, Shirley Deane, Frances Langford, Dixie Dunbar, Dorothy McNulty, Shirley Ross, Bette Davis, Joan Blondell, James Cagney, and William Gargan, allowed on the screen? Why should Robert Taylor be so popular? He isn't as good-looking as Eddy, Robert Kent, Bob Cummings, Gene Raymond and others. Why should Bill Powell play the part of a lover, and the same to Luise Rainer?

Anita Louise and Olivia de Havilland spend a few days on Santa Catalina Island. They became good friends making "Call It a Day."
I want to disagree with Ted George who says that every star has his day. Look at Eddie Cantor—all the years he's acted and is his career ended? A star can always act some part after many years, and for their fans' sakes, why can't they stay?

I thoroughly agree with Robert Walsh about David Holt—one of the cutest kids on the screen, and they talk about a dear little girl with curls. David needs a chance. If all the little boys would get the chance the dumb little dames get, some pictures would be better. EVELYN-NORTH.

52 West Cedar Avenue, Merchantville, New Jersey.

Wayne Morris, who scored such a sensation in "Kid Galahad," says that swimming is the finest way to keep fit.

Here's to Nino Martini.

H ere's another Nino Martini fan! I agree most emphatically with the views expressed by Dorothy M. Lein- linger in the June issue. As a music lover I have followed Mr. Martini's career since he first came to the United States, and have never been disappointed in either his art or his attitude toward the public. I was delighted with his fine acting in "The Gay Desperado"—and one has to be good to keep up with such excellent actors as Leo Carrillo, Mischa Auer, and Harold Huber, all of whom helped to make the picture entertaining.

So—"Here's To Romance," and more fine pictures from "The Gay Desperado—Nino Martini!"

MARGARET FOSTER CHOTTY. 4431 North Rockwell Street, Chicago, Illinois.

No Nationality Boundaries.

W HEN I read Mrs. Basset's letter, I was dismayed. I can't see how any one could be so narrow-minded and say that we should send foreign actors back to their own countries. The theater has no boundaries pertaining to nationality and language.

As to what Mrs. Basset said about sending Garbo home, that would be depriving us of one of the greatest actresses of this age. Can any one see "Camille" and say "Go home, Miss Garbo"?

For Luise Rainer, she is one of the world's finest actresses and dear to the hearts of all Americans.

We have as many fine American actresses, Helen Hayes and Norma Shearer, as we have foreign actresses, for stage and screen are open to all who love them. MEHLE BLONDIN. 1353 Market Street, Santa Clara, California.

Foundations of Beauty

things you want to do to reconsition your skin and hair, and I'll have lots of news for you on this subject next month. But there's one thing you can do in the meantime to start this reconditioning process.

You can freshen your face remarkably by treating yourself to the new "beautillifil mask" recently introduced by one of our leading beauty specialists. Made of thin silk, it is in reality a mask, with holes for eyes and nose and mouth. Applied after being dipped in a special solution that comes with it, tied snugly beneath the chin and allowed to remain on for as long as possible, from twenty minutes to two hours, it will do wonders to lift the contours of your face, smoothing out tired lines and wrinkles, making the flesh firm and young. In fact, it's like a very expensive salon treatment and you can give it to yourself at home.

One last word about this soignée appearance and it has to do with hair, blond hair in particular.

Please be sure your head is well groomed, for a badly arranged coifure, stringy ends, streaked locks, can ruin the effect of even the most perfect make-up. Next month we'll talk a lot about hair, but for the time being, be sure to see that your head looks sleek and well brushed. And, if you're a blonde, keep the roots as light as the ends, for nothing is less attractive than hair that's supposed to be golden and gleaming, if it has become streaked and muddy-looking.

So, I'll have lots of hair and skin news for you next month. And don't forget to write me about any beauty problems you have on your mind.

That's what thousands of others have thought! Just like you, they longed to play some instrument—the piano, violin, guitar, saxophone or other favorites. But they denied themselves the pleasure—because they thought it took months and years of tedious study and practice to learn.
And then they made an amazing discovery! They learned about a wonderful way to learn music at home—without a private teacher—without tedious study—and in a surprisingly short time. They wrote to the U. S. School of Music for the facts about this remarkable short-cut method. And the facts opened their eyes!
To cap the climax, a free Demonstration lesson actually showed them how easy it was to learn.
The result? Over 700,000 men and women have studied music at home this simple,
A-B-C way. Now, all over the world, enthusiastic music-lovers are enjoying the thrilling satisfaction of creating their own music. They have found the key to good times, popularity and profit.
And that's what you can do, right now.
Simply mail the coupon below. Get the proof that you, too, can learn to play your favorite instrument—quickly, easily, in spare time at home. Never mind if you have no musical knowledge, training or talent. Just read the fascinating illustrated booklet that answers all your questions—and learn about the demonstration lesson.

Eddy’s Intellectual Vocalism.

WHat the Fans Think” in June Picture Play was interesting and gratifying in that it showed serious judgment on the part of the so-called average listener. There should be a difference of opinion as to the relative merits of Jeanette MacDonald, Grace Moore, and Lily Pons, or Nelson Eddy, Lawrence Tibbett, and John Charles Thomas. Obviously, different types of artists should appeal to various tastes.

Although I consider Miss MacDonald the most fascinating personality on the screen, I can only call her voice pleasing. Her loveliness as a woman and actress appeals to me far more powerfully than the glittering superficiality of Miss Moore. I agree heartily that Eddy is wasted on the screen. I do, however, challenge the statement that he is wooden or sings without expression. Call to mind his singing of “The Lord’s Prayer.” His interpretation of “Route Marchin’” brings me bolt upright on the edge of my chair. I grant his singing is highly intellectual and requires worthy music. Like Flagstad, he appeals to the brain, not just to the heart.

In this age of overinterpreted love songs and violent emotionalism, it is refreshing to listen to an artist like Eddy, whose cellalike voice and flawless technique can be enjoyed as we enjoy the perfection of a literary classic or a masterpiece of art. As to Eddy—Tibbett—Thomas, our three magnificent American baritones—it’s almost splitting hairs to say which is best. Heard in concert, all three are intensely enjoyable. Lawrence Tibbett is suave, sophisticated. With velvety voice he sings to his audience, with eyebrow raised superciliously. Thomas, a robust dramatic artist, takes his audience most casually. Eddy, the youngest, with utmost dignity, yet with frankly boyish eagerness to please, wins every individual listener with his forthright earnestness and intelligent vocalism. He is the most human.

Here’s for more of this discriminating analysis of our screen entertainment.

Singing That’s Inspiring.

EVERY one has a right to his opinion. How often we’ve heard that. I would like to repeat it for the benefit of Jean Holke who agrees with Freda Wakeling that Nelson Eddy’s voice is superior to James Melton’s. I agree with R. J. Kennedy that Mr. Eddy’s voice “is lacking in animation and warmth.”

Recently I heard Mr. Melton sing “Ah! Sweet Mystery of Life.” I’ve heard Mr. Eddy sing it many times. ‘Tis just another song when Mr. Eddy sings it. One felt as James Melton sang that truly he had at last found the mystery of life and truly he had at last found that mystery to be love. (Continued on page 9)
Once again he sings Pagan love songs as he woos and wins a lovely daughter of luxury.
BILLIE GUNTER.—Rosalind Russell was born in Waterbury, Connecticut, June 4, 1898. She has brown hair and black eyes. Travelled, studying literature and theology. Played in stock. Next film is with Robert Montgomery in "Live, Love and Learn." John Gielgud has been appearing on the London stage in "He Was Born Gay." Freda Bartholomew was to do "Thoroughbreds Don't Cry." Oscar Homolka is in Hollywood making "Edith, the Slade School of Art before starting his screen career. He is married.

Diane Belmore.—You may be able to reach Peter Willes, who played the role of Martin Hilton in "Call It a Day," at the Warner Studio. He is not one of their contract players, but I do not find that he has appeared in any other film since then.

Lucille Anne Bluestone.—That is Tyrone Power's right name. He was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, May 5, 1914; over six feet, has brown hair and eyes. Besides the story about him and his mother in this issue, there was an interview in May. This will tell you all you wish to know about Tyrone.

Nina Calman.—Fredric March's right name is Frederick Ernest McIntyre Bickel. Born in Racine, Wisconsin, August 31, 1908. I'm sure you'll find a lipstick on the market which doesn't rub off, such as they use in the movies. Old movie films are stored away in the studio vaults. Those that are worn out are destroyed.

Jean.—Jean Arthur was represented with an interview in the September issue. She was born in New York City, October 15, 1908; five feet three, weighs 105, dark-brown hair and blue eyes. Married to Frank Ross. Alfred Newman was the musical director of "History Is Made at Night." Either he or United Artists, 729 Seventh Avenue, New York, may be able to tell you the name of the tango in that picture.

Barbara Anderson.—Craig Reynolds was born in Santa Fe, New Mexico, July 12, 1909; a little over six feet, dark wavy hair, blue eyes. Played his first role in the Drama Art Workshop, a little theater in Los Angeles. After a successful stage career, an agent spotted him and he got his start in pictures with leading roles in three serials, including the remake of "The Perils of Pauline," with Evelyn Knapp. For Warners he has appeared in such films as "The Case of the Lucky Legs," "Ceiling Zero," "The Golden Arrow," "Sons o' Guns," "The Great O'Malley," "Stage Struck," "The Go-getter," "Shim," and "Back in Circulation."

What the Fans Think

Boris Karloff enjoys a hearty laugh as well as the next one. He’s waiting for his next scene in “Without Warning.”

Like another fan writing in the same issue of Picture Play, I think it might be a different story if Nelson Eddy were not playing with lovely Jeanette MacDonald.

I’ve studied piano about seven years, I make no claims of being a musical wizard. All I know is this: when James Melton sings the world suddenly becomes more beautiful, more peaceful. I feel as if I could take pen in hand and write a poem that would live forever. His song becomes a living, vibrant message, arresting and inspiring. Why they do not use him in pictures I’ll never understand. He’s certainly as easy to look at as Nelson Eddy.

Eddy Definitely Improved.

Being a constant Picture Play reader and a sincere Nelson Eddy admirer, I have eagerly awaited and enjoyed the pros and cons which Miss Wakeling’s letter started.

The many intelligent, and some not so intelligent, comments on Mr. Eddy’s talents were worth reading. Any fair-minded person has to admit that Mr. Eddy has one of the grandest voices of our time. One does not need an extensive knowledge of music to appreciate that, rather one needs only two ears. In my opinion, some of the comments were laughable. Why some, who know so little about light opera as to say Victor Herbert wrote “Rose-Marie,” think they are qualified to decry Mr. Eddy, who has been compared to Chaliapin, is beyond my comprehension.

However, when people make remarks about Mr. Eddy’s acting ability that is beside the point. I would like to give the challenge right here and now, Has Nelson Eddy ever claimed to be an actor? I doubt if any one can prove that he has. Mr. Eddy is and always will be a singer of exceptional repute. Who cares whether he can act or not when one can listen to that incomparable voice? At the same time who can see “Maytime” and not admit that Nelson Eddy has definitely improved?

Tribute to Jean Harlow.

This morning I see a rainbow in the sky and perchance a pot of gold at its end, while three thousand miles away one of the loveliest persons it has ever been my privilege to know is sleeping her last sleep. The beautiful and talented Jean Harlow has passed into that great land beyond the sky.

In life indifference was seldom her portion—people either liked or disliked her. But for the most part, those who knew Jean were extremely fond of her. It was part of her strangely complex charm that, while she personified romance, smoldering, sullen anger, even cruelty of a sort, she could also give lessons in wistfulness to those to whom wistfulness is their only stock in trade.

Miss Harlow had a unique power to attract and hold the interest of people. For one was completely captivated by her. She put her entire self into her acting. It was this and the fact that she never seemed hurried or abrupt which made her such a grand artist and trouper.

There were many who wrote unkind things about Jean. Naturally, since her death, it is impossible somehow not to resent unkindness shown toward the naive and lovely little girl who often looked out of Harlow’s eyes. Certainly Jean never on this earth was able to find that happiness she sought.

I shall never forget her graciousness when I met her. She was so beautiful she almost took my breath away. I shall always be grateful that I was able to see her face to face.

To-day I bow my head in humble gratitude for the many happy hours she gave me. To all the multitude of friends and dear ones she left behind I offer my deepest and sincerest sympathy.

Good-bye, Jean, may your soul rest in peace.

MGM’s Wonder Boy.

Before beginning any hot arguments I must congratulate Picture Play on being so generous and open-minded with opinions of fans.

For almost three years, I have been a rabid Nelson Eddy admirer. Naturally, I read like Leo the Lion at R. J.

George Brent is glad to get down to earth after making “Submarine D-1.”
Kennedy's letter, and several others. I don't see how Mr. Eddy could be overrated. I have attended two of his concerts, and if either his singing or speaking voice lacks quality, warmth, or animation, then I'm stone-deaf. I'll always cheer for this polished and thoroughly masculine American, with the proud set of his head, the friendliest of smiles, the deeply thrilling and tireless voice. I have him to thank for two of the most perfect evenings I have ever known.

I agree with Misses Wakefield, Wadde, and May that Nelson Eddy deserves bigger and better musical roles in the movies. "Maytime" confirmed his wide musical talent. MGM has a wonder boy under contract, and I'm afraid they'll let him slip through their fingers. After all, Mr. Eddy wants to interpret better music, and if the screen gave him the chance to do so before his biggest audience, the less trains he would have to chase in order to satisfy the rest.

With so many stuffed shirts singing in opera, concert, and movies to-day, it's a relief to find one artist with an American background, a name we can pronounce and a rare combination of splendid physique, captivating charm, and true musicianship. Up on the pedestal you go, Nelson, modestly and all.

What the Fans Think

Not Nino Martini's Fault.

I THINK that the greatest crime of producers is the way they handle the Metropolitan opera stars under contract to them.

There is no opera star who has made a truly great success of his or her career in the movies. Grace Moore comes closest to doing this, and Lily Pons comes next. But why is it that those two women have found greater success than the male opera singers? I think it is because they are getting better pictures and better supporting casts.

My favorite screen, radio, and opera star is Nino Martini, and it makes me sad to see the raw deal he is getting. That man has the most beautiful voice I have ever heard. He is handsome, and he has a pleasing personality, yet I know many people who could not be driven to see his last picture. That was not Martini's fault. It was the fault of the first picture he appeared in. He tried to make the best of the bad role he was cast in, but he was given a silly part and made to appear effeminate, which he is not.

Because I liked his voice I went to see "The Gay Desperado," but I had to go alone for none of my friends would go with me. That picture was much better than his first, so I went again and took four friends who agreed that Martini had something after all, and I am sure they will go to see his next picture.

But what about those who will not go to see him at all? I repeat, he has received a raw deal and he is being blamed for something that is not his fault. I think the only way to make him a success in the movies is to put him in a well-known operetta and give him a big build-up. Many would go to see it for its reputation alone, but they would return to Martini's pictures just to see him.

Until producers can give the opera stars better deals I would say to those stars, "Go back to the Metropolitan where you are appreciated and work to reach the top there. When the producers agree to give you a better deal go into pictures and gain the great success you deserve." THERESE LEE Opera Films Profitable.

WHY should the subject of opera in pictures continually be under discussion? There would always be a sufficient number of opera devotees to make pictures containing opera sequences profitable if they were not enjoyed by all types of people, but, that they are enjoyed by all types is evidenced by the tremendous success of "Naughty Marietta," voted the best picture of the year in which it was produced; "Rose Marie," listed among the ten best pictures of the following year, and "Maytime," which, from present indications, is likely to stand equally as high in this year's list of favorites. This being true, let's have an increasing number of such enjoyable pictures! MABEL E. CONWAY

Chivalrous Errol Flynn.

I CAN'T think of another actor on the screen who can portray gallantry and chivalry quite so convincingly as Errol Flynn.

His work in "The Charge of the Light Brigade" was so genuine that he made the slightly sentimental love story quite touching and realistic, as well as giving authenticity to the thread of sacrificial courage which dominated the story.

Realism is a quality always present in Flynn's performances—and it's a very important one.

I have read he is to make "Robin Hood" and that it will be in color. That is something to watch for, indeed, as not only should such a story suit Mr. Flynn's talents admirably, but color should fit especially well and add to the attraction of the picture.

AT this time of year the industrious housewife is in the act of cleaning and preserving those things which represent value, and discarding the rubbish that clutters her domain. What the Fans Think NORBERT LUSK voices the thoughts of millions of Americans when, in the May issue, he expresses surprise at the fact that Garbo has never been given the Academy award.

How one could see her in “Camille” and not name her as the winner for 1937, even though it was released the first day of that year and the awards made in the latter part of 1936, is beyond my comprehension. It will be many years before I can forget Marguerite. In fact, she made the part so live in my heart that I think of Garbo as Marguerite. Her exquisite tenderness and beautiful portrayal of that character surpassed all other actresses who have played the part, or of any who have played any part in any picture.

I have read many things which were not complimentary to Garbo, and I'll admit many have shaken temporarily my regard for her as a person—for instance the refusal to grant a small child an autograph and turning away leaving the child in tears—but I know quite well that such stories are often distorted, or if true, the motive behind the refusals we do not know, and not knowing I hesitate to condemn her for anything, and so continue to love and appreciate her as a great actress who I am thankful lives during my time.

MEM MITCHEM

Too Late for Award?

For many years my favorite department in this magazine has been “What the Fans Think.” I have read many scathing remarks about personalities whom I admire considerably, and have swallowed quite a lot especially against Garbo, Crawford, and Katharine Hepburn. But Joseph J. Hearn has gone just one step too far, and has overstepped all bounds.

As an ardent admirer of Freddie March he has written a very stirring letter in behalf of his favorite, who some people have evidently found to be somewhat less than perfect. On that score I find no fault. But it was not sufficient to let well enough alone. He remarks that it was Norma Shearer’s performance which ruined—yes, he said “ruined”—“The Barretts of Wimpole Street.” That statement in itself is preposterous. If my memory serves me right, some five hundred or so critics that year voted “The Barretts of Wimpole Street,” the best picture of the year, and it was given the vote over such splendid films as “It Happened One Night” and “The Thin Man.” That would not indicate that anybody in particular ruined the film at all.

I sincerely hope that Miss Shearer will hasten her return to the screen. In spite of all this ballyhoo about Louise Rainer’s performance in “The Great Ziegfeld,” if ever any one deserved an award for the year’s greatest acting, it was Norma Shearer for her inspired Juliet. And speaking of awards, what about offering Garbo a special one for “Camille,” since the Academy seems never to consider her when it comes to offering its prizes.

June Lang and Louise Hovick find Eddie Cantor the center of attraction in this scene from 20th-Century’s “Ali Baba Goes to Town.”
It is almost universally acclaimed that the British are the masters of the English language, and there is nothing more melodic to the ear than beautiful speech, the way a man who is ignorant of English would say such things as “thicken up on the accent” and such other statements as these, regarding speech, especially the speech of an Englishman.

An Actor Who Thinks.

THREE films have proved Henry Daniell unique and extraordinary, suggesting no other actor. He is praised by the discerning for rare intelligence and originality. His superb restraint refreshes after the soporific indolence of Fredric March and Leslie Howard, which is often mistaken for that elusive quality. Mr. Daniell is that phenomenon, an actor who thinks! His brilliantly pungent wit and savoir-faire are unequaled. With this he combines the added endowment of surpassing dramatic ability. These admirable gifts establish him as the most distinguished newcomer in many seasons.

Loretta Young’s penchant for adopting a maternal attitude toward the entire company, including the villain, of “The Unhazard Hour,” in no way diminished the luster and excitement of Mr. Daniell’s introduction.

In that gentle melodrama, “Under Cover of Night,” besides committing four murders he limned a persuasive portrait of the somewhat neurotic professor. Garbo’s “Camille” is a historic monument to undying beauty and will doubtless be revered as such by all, save possibly those cultured gentlemen who comprise that quaint group, the Academy of “Arts” and “Sciences.” Mr. Daniell’s Baron de Valaree was the only other performance in “Camille” worthy of such exalted association.

Despite unconventional technique, a quiet manner off screen and exceptional mentality, MGM assures us Henry Daniell will continue to add a fillip to our ingenious industry which, recently, he pictured to me as a “mad revel of softened brains.” — Jack Hitt.

What the Fans Think

No Comparison.

WITH all this talk of Academy awards and outstanding pictures, I wish to say that the two most interesting films I have seen this year are the revived “Enoch Arden” and “Monsieur Beaucaire.” One featured Lillian Gish and Wallace Reid, the other starred Rudolph Valentino.

To those of us belonging to the generation that has grown up since the advent of sound pictures, this was a distinctively extraordinary afternoon. There were no voices to accompany the shadows on the screen. An organ boomed appropriate melodies from the pit. Valentino sang, soundlessly; Enoch Arden raved—with gestures—on his desert isle.

The audience was small but appreciative. Occasionally somebody laughed at the wrong time—but it was a kindly sort of laughter. One lady remarked that she could remember when crowds stood for hours in the rain to see a Valentino film. Another complained of a head-ache from reading all the subtitles, but, I noticed she sat through for a second performance.

I left the theater with the feeling that pictures have come a long way in the last fifteen or twenty years. But have the actors? Barring the changing styles in clothing, in make-up, in acting technique, are our actors to-day any better performers than those of yesterday? It seems to me that some of our present glamorous-eyed, heavy-mouthed stars could learn much from the simple, wistful Lillian Gish. And if Rudy Valen tino and Wallace Reid were living, I wonder whether there would be any Clark Gables, Errol Flynn, or Robert Taylors? And if there were—would anybody give a whoop? — CLARENCE RING.

The Last Straw.

SEVERAL months ago, Freda Wakes
ing contributed a letter to this department saying that she feels that Nelson Eddy deserves better screen material than he has heretofore been getting. It was a perfectly sane, logical, and harmless opinion—but before long a great number of readers started sending in the most idiotic letters regarding this young man.

One very bright young man says that Nelson Eddy’s voice is flat and emotionless. That fellow is either a fool or he does not know a thing about singing and should keep his asinine opinions to himself.

Another says that Lawrence Tibbett and John Charles Thomas have better voices than Nelson Eddy. That is indeed a great mistake for Mr. Eddy’s voice is considered, with Tibbett’s and Thomas’s, one of the greatest of baritones.

But the last straw was sent in by a silly female who must be empty-headed to write such an utterly ridiculous letter. This maiden said that Nelson Eddy is an animated dummy and should never have left the concert stage.

All of us who have seen Nelson in “Maytime” know that he has reached the peak of acting ability and could get by on his looks and histrionic talents alone, even if he were not gifted with that splendid voice. But I agree with the aforementioned lady in one respect. Jeannette MacDonald and Nino Martini would indeed make a wonderful team—the toothy Miss MacDonald with her thin, shrill soprano, and the vague-looking Mr. Martini with his nasal, high-pitched tenor.

And now, your critic says that the sob-saurn Miss MacDonald has a better voice than either Grace Moore or Lily Pons. Well, I can only say that if Jeannette had the power of a Moore voice and the brilliance and range of a Pons voice, she could indeed be called a great singer. As it is, Miss MacDonald has a pleasing enough operetta voice, but that is as far as she can go. Why she is asked to sing such beautiful arias as “Noblesse Oblige” or “Elsa’s Dream” is beyond my comprehension, for she literally wrecks them. The person who should get more operatic arias to sing in his pictures is, without a doubt, Nelson Eddy. He would, at least, sing them as they should be sung.

—ELIZABETH D. MURPHY.

Montreal, Quebec, Canada.

All those ruffles seem to have bowled Judith Barrett over. Or perhaps she’s just resting after completing “Idol of the Crowds,” with John Wayne. Her black-and-white voile frock has a picture hat to match.
HE new film season promises more foreign players in leading roles than ever before. This will be bad news to those who, from time to time, sound that familiar battle cry, "Send the foreigners home and give our own boys and girls a chance." It will be good news to those who are susceptible to new faces and who recognize the artistry of Garbo, Charles Boyer, Luise Rainer, Simone Simon, Freddie Bartholomew, Sonja Henie and many others, some of whom have long since been accepted as our own. It is surprising, nevertheless, how many picture-goers hold against a star the fact that he or she is a foreigner. One of their favorite reasons for resentment is that foreign players "take away our good American dollars and give nothing in return." That is not so. For, aside from what they contribute in talent, in entertainment, the government sees to it that almost half their earnings are deflected into the national coffers. Taxes absorb about $15,000 of an income of $100,000—granting that every player of foreign birth earns that much yearly.

ANYWAY, fans will be asked to pass judgment in the next few months upon a large number of players they have never seen or heard of before. Hardly a studio in Hollywood is without its surprise with an accent. Some of them are bound to become favorites; others are almost sure to be found wanting. If studios never took a chance, never were optimistic about their discoveries, where would the screen be to-day? Producers are gamblers. They have to be. And every player is a speculation. There never yet has been a star who was born a star.

ANY discovery of Samuel Goldwyn, domestic or foreign, is interesting and important for the moment if not always enduring. Ronald Colman, Vilma Banky, Walter Byron, Lili Damita, Anna Sten, and Merle Oberon are some of his enthusiasts past and present. Now he offers his first star from Scandinavia, a Norwegian, Sigrid Gurie, who will be seen opposite Gary Cooper, no less, in "The Adventures of Marco Polo." Because of the association she will command world-wide attention, but not even Mr. Goldwyn can foretell her future.

ANOTHER stranger cast opposite an established star is Paramount's Franciska Gaal, a Hungarian, who will be seen as Fredric March's heroine in "The Buccaneer," the story of a pirate, Jean Lafitte. Cecil DeMille will be responsible for the glamour and drama of her début. Paramount has another discovery, if a man who is already "South America's Film Idol," really needs to be discovered. He is Georges Rigaud, an Argentinean with a French name assumed, no doubt, because France sponsored his film career. He must be good. Right away he is cast opposite Marlene Dietrich. Sandra Storm, said to be England's most famous model, soon will be seen as Miss Perfection in Paramount's "Artists and Models." Tall, willowy, blond, she is said to be a composite of Madeleine Carroll and Frances Farmer.

DANIELLE DARIEUX, celebrated in French films, is coming over for Universal while Germaine Aussey, also of France, goes back to her native land without any work in Hollywood to her credit. Twentieth Century-Fox centers its hopes of the moment upon another French actress already known to the American public, Captivating Annabella, who scored in "Wings of the Morning," comes to Hollywood on the crest of success, with William Powell already chosen to play opposite her. Grace Fields, hugely popular British comedienne, is another alien star who will be seen by us for the first time, thanks to 20th Century. Columbia has Luli Deste, charming Hungarian actress patiently waiting for a chance to act for us. I say "charming" with assurance, for I saw her in Edward G. Robinson's British film, "Thunder in the City." Geraldine Rudolph, somewhat vaguely described as "a Continental actress," is visiting Hollywood as part of her preparation for work in Alexander Korda's London Films. We shall be seeing her, of course. And Fernand Gravet will return to assume a permanent place in our films.

AND what has Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer in the way of European bombshells, skyrockets and assorted fireworks? Never caught short in the past, it isn't likely they've overlooked any possibility of a surprise this season. Are we to find it in Miliza Korjus, Rose Strader, Della Lind, or Tilly Losch? The latter already has appeared in “The Garden of Allah” and “The Good Earth” as dancer and pantomimist. Now she is being trained in speech to become a full-fledged actress in leading rôles. Speculating on Korus, Stradner, and Lind, we have only to remember that Luise Rainer was an unknown foreigner a short time ago. Her friend, Miss Stradner, also from Vienna, has been brought over to prepare for a film début. Her stage training has been similar to Miss Rainer’s and she has never appeared in pictures. Della Lind, Viennese light-opera singer, at last is to give us a taste of her voice and personality in “Rosalie” after obliging the magazines with chic fashion photos for all of a year. Madame Korus, a son, handsome blond, is an opera singer from Central Europe who is said to sing “the highest soprano note on record.” Her test came to the studio in the form of phonograph records which indicated an ability to sing the most difficult coloratura arias without apparent effort. Once seen she disclosed that miracle of miracles, a face and figure to match her voice. Somehow I’m banking on Korus. There you have Metro’s line-up of newcomers from Europe.

ALL told, these foreigners are too few in number to crowd out our own aspirants to any extent. The studios have under contract and are grooming a hundred times as many native newcomers than imported nobilities. They are too numerous to mention, really. Few, if any, of them possess the experience in acting that invariably justifies the signing of foreign artists whether they become sensations or not. After all, art in any form is not, and should not, be limited by nationality or language. Speaking for the majority of fans, Picture Play welcomes any one who can contribute to the American screen.

CRITICS give highest praise to “They Won’t Forget.” So do I give it high praise. But not highest. It is an extraordinary picture, however, one of the most realistic ever produced. The question is, should it have been produced? I do not ask this because of squeamishness in facing the uglier aspects of life graphically pictured in the film, but because I think the picture will do more harm than good. Its implications, its indictment of a community, are far more direct than in “Fury” and “The Black Legion,” the only recent pictures that can be compared with “They Won’t Forget.” But while these pictures had no determined locale, the scene of the new film is definitely and unmistakably the South where law, order, justice, tolerance, and the humanities of decent living are nonexistent, if we are to believe what we see and hear on the screen. I object to this, and I believe that thousands of other picture-goers will protest against a picture produced with callous disregard for the feelings of a large section of the country.

WHEN I commend the picture for being realistic, I mean in dialogue, acting, direction and settings. Every detail is real. I consider it grossly unreal, however, in concept and in representation of conditions and character. I do not believe that in a Southern city of any size, or a city anywhere, there exists not one upright person, not one citizen with sufficient principle and backbone to fight to save a fellow human from the fury of a mob, or to make the slightest effort to do so. I do not believe that a community exists anywhere without its decent minority, even in places of corruption. But “They Won’t Forget” would have us believe that every inhabitant of a city of considerable size is bent on seeing the hanging of a good-looking young man accused of murder, and that every one will resort to lying, perjury and worse to hasten the killing, not alone because the victim is supposedly guilty, but because he is a stranger in the community from the northern part of the United States.

I DO not believe that sectional feeling runs as high as that in any American city to-day, and I believe that in so picturing it on the screen prejudice will be stirred among those who have no knowledge of the South—prejudice akin to ridicule because of the exaggerated peculiarities of Southern speech cultivated by “Northern” actors for the most part as well as a British one in the dominant rôle.

CENSORSHIP imposes countless restrictions in the making of pictures, in evading the truth. Minor sins must be protected against knowledge of this, that and the other thing. Racial and religious taboos are inflexible. Foreign governments dictate what shall not be pictured on the screen. And Hollywood heeds their threat to ban any film that offends. The profitable foreign market must be safeguarded. But what about the film that offends a section of our own country? I do not believe that a Southern audience will accept “They Won’t Forget” without indignant protest, even though the first title, “Murder in the Deep South” obviously was changed to soften the stigma of the picture itself. It is a strong picture, engrossing, as the drama of doom tightens around and eventually strangles the victim, but I do not think it should have been filmed. It should have remained between the covers of the book. Undoubtedly the picture will arouse further censorship, the very menace that producers fear and resent most.

A WOMAN

Alone

BY HELEN LOUISE WALKER

GARBO CASTS A SPELL OF SILENCE OVER THOSE WHO KNOW HER WELL. THEY CANNOT TALK ABOUT HER EVEN WHEN THEY TRY. WHY IS THIS?

GRETA GARBO has probably been interpreted in print more often than any other woman living. She has been explained in all the languages, including the Scandinavian. Ninety-nine—or maybe it's eight hundred—times she has been described as "an anomaly."

Pardon me, ladies and gentlemen, if I seem to be heretical just here. I don't think that Garbo is an anomaly at all. I consider her a thoroughly consistent woman and actress. If the woman and the actress appear to diverge sometimes, it is because the woman is an actress. Somehow, people have always seemed to confuse the woman with the roles she plays, and the roles have been many and varied.

On the screen, Garbo has been exotic, winsome, earthy, tragic, mysterious, and much else. In private life she has been simple, frightened, lonely, homesick, eager for companionship and understanding.

When you confuse her with the roles she plays, it is as though you identified a painter with the characters on his canvases, a novelist with the people who move between the covers of his books. Garbo doesn't "live" her roles, as many actors will tell you they do. She creates them carefully, studiously, conscientiously, according to her own rigid standards. She works over them. When she isn't working she becomes herself again, and a rather stark and pathetic self it is.

Let me tell you a little about how Greta Garbo lives. She has never owned a house in California. In her early picture days she occupied a suite in an oceanfront hotel with wide windows which opened to the sea. Since then she has been a sort of nomad, occupying rented dwellings. All she has asked has been space and sunlight and a garden, hedged and fenced from public view.

She doesn't care what is inside the house. Apparently she doesn't even see what is there. She never moves a vase or changes the angle of a chair or the position of a picture.

The astonished owners return to find everything exactly as they left it, not one telltale detail to prove that one of the world's most glamorous women has been living there.

Garbo's reticence and aloofness to-day are not part of a publicity stunt. Early in her career visitors were welcome, interviews were frequent and she observed the rules of stardom. But she was betrayed and hurt by people she trusted.
Nothing is marred—Garbo never gives parties—nor china has been broken, everything is spotless. The gardens have been carefully tended. If there is any damage at all it may be some fading of rugs and curtains because all the windows have been open all day, every day.
Just now Greta is occupying the Neil Hamilton house in Brentwood. She rented this when the Hamiltons went to England. She has made no changes except to erect a fall tense about the estate which leads you to believe, as you approach it, that here is a very special sort of baseball park.
She employs a butler-houseman, a cook, and a gardener and she changes servants rather often. Once a pair of trusted servants betrayed her friendly confidence—and took money for it.
Amid such quiet surroundings she studies the scripts of her pictures, reads and reads and reads the books which will help her to understand the character she is to portray.
In the garden she rehearses her lines, pacing to and fro among the flower beds, murmuring to herself.
She is always letter perfect when she arrives on the set far work. This is partly because of her shyness. She is terrified at meeting new people and the preliminary rehearsals with a new cast reduce her to a pitiable state of nerves. She wants to recite her lines as quickly as possible and then flee. This terror of people is not a pose.
It is as real as toothache, and psycholigists have a name for it.
Years ago I dropped into the office of a scenario-writing friend on the MGM lot and found him just entering, looking rather sheepish. "I've been down watching that new girl work," he confessed. "Her name is Garbo. I don't know what it is that she has but I do know that every one on the lot who can get away for a few moments from whatever he is supposed to be doing goes to watch her. There is a stillness about her, a power, ar—oh, I dunno!"
Later I visited the set, myself, and was introduced to Miss Garbo. Her English was sketchy and we didn't get much further than "How-da-you-do?" and a couple of "How nice!" But she didn't seem any more shy than any other stranger, working in a strange land with scant knowledge of the language, might have seemed. She had an engaging and hearty giggle which bubbled forth unexpectedly when she became entangled with wards and courtesies. She still has that giggle but it doesn't bubble so frequently nowadays.
The reticence and shyness began to grow upon her after she had been asked incredible questions by interviewers, had read blunt and unkind remarks about herself in print, after she had been mobbed and nearly torn to pieces by impertunate fans. She simply did not understand these things. They terrified and bewildered her. She exaggerated their importance and began to distrust every one.
But the further she withdrew into her protective shell, the more determinedly did the public try to penetrate it.
People whom she liked and trusted and invited to dinner said their "impressions" of her to the newspapers. She became, literally, a fugitive from a sort of fame which seemed false and vulgar to her.
Those canvas screens which they erect about her when she is to make an important scene in a picture were not Garbo's idea. She never requested them. Directors simply found that she worked better, with much more ease, if she was protected from staring eyes. The directors order the screens.
If Garbo has seemed happier, more approachable in the past few months than she was before, perhaps it is because she is beginning to realize that the praise heaped upon her for recent performances has not been empty praise.
One of her closest and most trusted friends in Hollywood is Adrian, MGM designer to whom the studio gives much credit for having helped to discover Garbo's valuable qualities.
"At first they hung spangles and glass beads on her," Adrian told me. "They considered her a sort of decoorative prop. I saw that she was like a tree, with roots deep, deep in the earth. You must never, never put an artificial jewel or imitation lace on fur an Garbo. Not that it would

BENGAL LANCERS OF THE SEVEN SEAS

From an amazing sea story long buried in the files of the Philadelphia Public Ledger, Henry Hathaway, director of such Paramount masterpieces of pictorial adventure as “The Lives of a Bengal Lancer” and “The Trail of the Lonesome Pine,” has produced and directed this grandest of all sea romances. Gary Cooper strides through another of his glorious he-man roles as a seaman of the Fabulous Forties who becomes the leading figure in the cause célèbre of the time: the famous murder trial which followed the destruction by fire on the high seas of the Liverpool-Philadelphia packet, the William Brown. George Raft in a picaresque role as his companion in arms gains even greater stature among the male luminaries of Hollywood. Frances Dee and Henry Wilcoxon head an all-star supporting cast.
BRONZE lamé is the material used by Omar Kiam in designing this gown for Ida Vollmar to wear in "Vogues of 1938." The slashed shoulder treatment is striking and new. The headdress is nothing short of startling. It is of lacquered twine fastening grapes and scattered vine leaves.
HIGH up on the side of a Hollywood hill is an English cottage, with vines and rambler roses running up to the eaves and pigeons cooing among the gables. It is the only house of its kind in the neighborhood, and as you pass through the gate you sense that within this dwelling live people apart from their neighbors.

And you're right! They are different, quite different. Here reside three women who are of Hollywood, yet isolated from it. A mother with idealism in her soul, and two daughters who have absorbed this almost forgotten spirit.

The mother, English-born, bore these two daughters in Tokyo, Japan, about twenty years ago.

One, the elder, you've heard considerable about. Her name is Olivia de Havilland.

The other is not quite so well known. She was christened Jean de Havilland, but the screen is beginning to know her as Joan Fontaine, a name she took from her stepfather. It is of her that this story is written.

Were a stranger to be introduced to Joan, he immediately would be struck by the amazing resemblance between herself and Olivia. There is the same gentle expression; their eyes are alike, and the similarity extends even to the little wrinkling of the nose when they smile.

Joan and Olivia have a gentleman's agreement—neither will talk about the other. So, to bear out this agreement further, we'll cease mentioning Olivia and confine ourselves to Joan. All the more credit goes to her for wishing—insisting, even—that she win any acting laurels on her own, without the benefit of her sister's name to help her.

Joan is practically a newcomer in Hollywood, yet already a very vital component. Evincing unusual ability in her initial rôle, a small part in Katharine Hepburn's "Quality Street," the studio was so struck by her allure that it immediately cast her in the leading rôle opposite John Beal in "The Man Who Found Himself," and followed this with the heroine in "You Can't Beat Love." In both these pictures Joan more than justified the faith placed in her.

On the screen Joan recalls Jean Arthur. Indeed, in certain scenes, there is the same brittle quality that skyrocketed Jean to the position she now retains. Certainly Joan is entirely in command of every situation, and there is extraordinary confidence in her every move.

As a person, this young actress is more of a dreamer. She has lived greatly within herself during her nineteen years, and now that she is progressing so rapidly in her career she does not care particularly for companionship.

"When I was a little girl," she tells you, her hazel eyes twinkling, "I used to spend a good deal of time in a cemetery reading poetry." As you talk with her, you might readily fancy she had just returned from such a visit, for there is something rather unearthly—if that is the proper word—about her. She might be "Peter Pan" in modern clothes.

When she was two, her mother brought her to San Francisco from Japan. Ever fragile and continually Joan is "different" because her ambition is tempered with idealism. She plays opposite Nino Martini in "Music for Madame" and is to be Fred Astaire's heroine in "Damsel in Distress."

NO LONGER ARE THE STARS NAI"E IN THEIR CHOICE OF FOOD. THIS AMUSING ARTICLE DESCRIBES THEIR EPICUREAN TASTES.

WHY can't one get a proper Yorkshire Pudding in this country? I hired a cook who said she was an expert at it, but it turns out just like the others—soggy, pale, and depressing. "And curries. Why can't we get the condiments to make real curries? Can't they be imported from India?" "And what about po't? I like all the South Sea Island dishes, but the only place I've ever had them as they should be is at Frank Borzage's house-."

A very British voice interrupted. "Where," it inquired plaintively, "can I find authentic chicken à la Maryland?"

There followed a welter of talk about Bouillabaisse as one can only find it in Marseilles, Russian Borscht, Italian Antipasta, and goodness knows what.

I blinked, tried to sort my impressions, and realized with a start that I was in Hollywood; very much in Hollywood. A bunch of us were dallying over cocktails, and, though the hors d'oeuvres were delectable, the talk had turned toward food.

"Hollywood is going internationally food-conscious with a vengeance!" I thought. And so we seem to be.

For it was Dick Arlen, returned from England, who was wailing over the difficulty of obtaining Yorkshire Pudding, and other robust British offerings; and it was Basil Rathbone, British to the marrow, who was yearning for real chicken à la Maryland. Errol Flynn was longing for South Sea Island dishes, "done as they should be done."

David Niven was proclamationg that Merle Oberon was probably the only person on the West Coast who knew how curry should be made and served. Merle does know. She spent her early days in India, and she knows that some curries are hot, and that other curries are—well, not so hot.

Only Anglo-Indians and natives can enjoy the hottest curries; there are plenty of people who cannot take even the milder curries. But Merle gives you a heap of fresh grated coconut to cool your tongue, chutney to add a fillip, small varicolored chopped things of this and that, and a serving of dry, well-separated rice to act as a kind of blotter.

After dinner, you don't really burst into flame, as you tear, but you have a very good time.

You, who have admired the dainty figure of Songbird Jeanette MacDonald, may be a trifle astonished, as I was, to learn of her favorite dish. It is none other than the good, hearty, old-fashioned baked bean! Beans which have simmered for twenty-four hours in a sealed brick oven. Beans served with plenty of pork which is as soft as warm butter under your fork.

Every true baked-bean lover has a "special recipe," which has been handed down from some one or other, and Jeanette is no exception. I don't know what goes into those beans, but it is a combination of molasses, spices, and goodness knows what. With them, she serves (and eats heartily of black, damp, Boston brown bread, bulging with plump currants, and plenty of sweet butter. And she looks as though she might subsist on a diet of hot-house grapes! Well, one never knows.

Hollywood has always been addicted to salads, health salads, mostly; designed to make you feel as though you had eaten when you haven’t. These are the most depressing concoctions of row fodder you can imagine. But I suppose it is all in the interests of art. For there surely cannot be any pretense of enjoyment in them.

So I was cheered no end when I learned of the Salad Club organized by such honest trenchermen as Pat O’Brien, Chester Morris, and Bob Montgomery. The members are all males, and, to qualify for membership, one must mix with his own hands a salad and dressing which meets with the unanimous approval of the other members.

As a matter of fact, Chester, who was one of the founders of the club, was summarily relegated to the status of just an honorary member when he committed the felony of pouring a sickly, pinkish, Frenchish dressing over mixed fresh fruit. I didn’t taste it, but there were some strong (but not silent) men who did.

Well, the poor chap worked for weeks producing some of the most astonishing concoctions that ever entered the mind of man. Finally, the other members took pity on him, and reinstated him to full membership on the strength of (of all things) his barbecued steak, in which he really can take a pardonable pride.

Over a slow charcoal fire, he places a baking pan lined with rock salt, over which he puts a thick slab of steak and bakes twenty minutes. The source is a secret, apparently; all I know about it is that it’s a deep, purplish red, and that it certainly must contain some of those tiny, venomous Mexican peppers. Anyhow, it’s one of the best barbecue sauces I ever tasted. In honor of this chef d’oeuvre, the club is now called The Salad and Barbecued Steak Club.

Another chap who takes his “camp-fire” cooking seriously is Clark Gable, and Clark is pretty handy with a steak and a camp fire. But his pièce de résistance is his potatoes. He will shop for the most enormous potatoes available. These he buries in the red coals until they pop open, when he fishes them out, dunks them off, inserts butter, salt, pepper, and a wad of soft, nippy cheese in their mealy interiors. They are really something!

On the daintier side, naturally, is Luise Rainer. If you are lucky enough to be invited to her house for lunch—and very few people are—and, if she is in the mood, she may prepare for you her own very special egg dish.

I don’t know exactly how it is done, but the result is fluffy, and has a hint of tomato and something else I can’t quite describe. Every now and then you encounter a crisp, buttery crouton. With this, she serves Melba toast and a mound of mixed fresh fruit and perhaps a bit of mild cheese. And somehow you feel very pleased with life in general, and resolve to send Miss Rainer some flowers at once.

People who are fortunate enough to have been invited to lunch with Claudette Colbert in her dressing room look forward to the day when they may receive a second invitation. Every day, when she is working, her companion-secretary, Winifred, arrives at noon with a hamper about the size of a small wardrobe trunk. The size of the hamper is not due to the quantity of food, but to the necessity of keeping hot things really hot, and cold things as cold as they should be.

From the hamper emerges a cream of mushroom soup; squabs stuffed with wild rice, cooked under glass; romaine and tomato salad tossed in a bowl with a thin, colorless dressing. If Claudette is not to work too close to her fellow players in the afternoon, there may be a hint of garlic in the salad.

Afterward, there is fruit or a quivery, cold custard, and a wee cup of coffee. The soup is nearly always a cream soup, and there are always quantities of hot rolls and but-"Let me see; it was Mary Brian who brought us the recipe for a salad made of shredded carrots and cucumbers, with a sour cream dressing. Miriam Hopkins suggested the creamed chicken—or turkey—shortcake which has been so successful. By the way, did you know that Miriam can make a knock-out, old-fashioned corn pone baked on a shovel? Well, she can!"

I tried the chicken shortcake some time afterward. It's a very short, crisp corn bread, split in the middle, filled with creamed chicken, covered with the top piece of bread, and then smothered again with more creamed chicken. With it the Derby serves green peas and Jullienne potatoes. I am extremely grateful to Miss Hopkins.

I don't know whether George Raft has contributed a recipe to the Brown Derby, but he must have swiped one, because those hamburgers broiled very rare, smothered in onions and swimming in brown gravy, which one encounters at George's home served, sizzling in an iron skillet, surely originated at the Derby. And are they good! Wish you could try them some time.

I wasn't invited to Anna Sten's last Christmas party, but those who were tell me I missed something. A real Russian Christmas. There were individual bowls of the special caviar which Anna imports; there was Borscht, made with beets and served with whipped sour cream. There was Shashlik, and there was a whale baar roasted in the Russian style.

I am always cheered by the sight of Bill Robinson in the act of consuming a quart of ice cream for breakfast. Not that I could look a quart of ice cream in the face at any time, but his enjoyment is so apparent.

I am still trying to discover who can supply Mr. Rathbone with real chicken à la Maryland.

The best I can do for Dick Arlen is to tell him that the finest Yorkshire Pudding I have eaten in California was made by a Nebraskan.

Bill Robinson, the wonderful colored dancer, eats a quart of ice cream for breakfast which cools off his hot rhythm.

George Raft's specialty at home and in restaurants is hamburgers broiled very rare and served from an iron skillet.

Clark Gable takes his "camp-fire" cooking seriously. His baked potatoes are really something to rave about.

YOUNG MR. TAYLOR'S FAME PROVIDES HIM WITH NO BED OF ROSES THOUGH HE DOESN'T COMPLAIN OF HARDSHIPS—HE ONLY LETS YOU IN ON SOME OF HIS PRIVATE THOUGHTS.

Perhaps it is rushing things a bit to speak of Robert Taylor's reflections. But rushing things seems to be the great pastime so far as Hollywood is concerned. Witness Bob's meteoric career as an example.

It just so happened that I lunched with Bob every day for a week at the Brown Derby. The place is always jammed and, believe it or not, sometimes there isn't a table for the famous Mr. Taylor. So Bob came over and sat with me.

If I had planned the thing, it never would have happened. Writers sometimes wait months to have lunch with Bob. I had six right in a row, and it just happened that each time Bob was in a reflective mood and wanted to talk about the thing that was uppermost in his mind.

With his permission I am repeating some of his thoughts, because they weren't premeditated or the "right sort of thing" an actor always tries to hand out to his public. They reveal Bob Taylor as a human being, the boy who has had so much happen to him that his mind is in a turmoil trying to figure it out. Only in Hollywood, where the world gets to know you overnight, does it take so long to know yourself.

"I just got in from Salt Lake City this morning," began Robert Taylor says he envies Barbara Stanwyck more than any other person in the world. He wishes he were one tenth the person she is because of her tolerance, appreciation and gratitude for what life has already given her.
Bob's Problems Pile Up

Bob complains that people insist that he live up to what they have created in their own minds instead of taking him as he is. They seem to feel that he should change.

Success, and the money it means, stands in the way of old friendships nowadays. There's a misunderstanding that can't be dissolved. And this makes Bob unhappy.

Bob, "No one knew I was out of town because I left suddenly. Did you ever feel that things were closing in on you and you just had to get away and think? That's what happened to me. I wanted to think and think about—just things! I didn't even tell Barbara [Stanwyck] I was going. I didn't tell my manager. I just climbed in the plane and climbed out again at Salt Lake City.

"I hired a car and drove up into a canyon. I got out and walked until I came to a cabin set far back on a grassy knoll. I threw myself down and never stirred for hours. I just kept gazing at the sky and thinking of everything that had happened in the last year. A kindly old man who lived in the cabin came out and started talking to me. He offered to show me around the place. He had never seen or heard of me before. We talked for hours. He was so refreshing and honest in his point of view, it seemed to lift some great unexplained load off my chest. I flew back to Hollywood with an entirely new perspective. Wonder why a fellow allows himself to get so worked up sometimes over nothing in particular!

"The studio sent me a national box-office report to-day," said Bob the next time I lunched with him. "It lists me as one of the big money-makers of the year. What is a top box-office man supposed to feel like?

"I asked myself that question as I drove into Hollywood. I feel just the same inside. I've been trying to get some kind of new emotion. Wonder how Clark Gable feels. They listed his name, too. I can understand giving Clark credit. He's worked long and hard for the honor. He's gone through so much and earned his success. And that applies to Barbara, too.

"You know, I envy Barbara more than any other person in the world! I wish I were one tenth the person she is.

"Recently we drove down to the beach. We parked by the water's edge and turned on the radio. We just sat there in silence. Suddenly I realized that Barbara was crying. It's only the second time I've seen her allow her emotion to get out of control. She has so much feeling, but she doesn't believe in exhibiting it. She's been through so much and she's so grateful for everything that life has given her. But she hasn't much sympathy for anyone who gives in to obviously to emotion. She has great respect and understanding for the cause of the emotion. But she considers it a weakness to give way to every mood.

"If going through things gives one Barbara's tolerance and appreciation, I wish it could have happened to me. People sometimes think I'm indifferent and not impressed by what has happened to me. I'm very grateful, but I'm really awed at what has happened to Barbara. She was an orphan and practically brought herself up. She fought every inch of the way right up through life. From poverty she struggled to where she is to-day. She's really accomplished something.

"People are always asking me if I will marry and what my views on marriage are. I guess I'm almost too idealistic about marriage and it's pretty late to change now. I have a certain point of view and I'm pretty

HOLLYWOOD HIGH LIGHTS

BY EDWIN AND ELZA SCHALLER

SKIMMING THE CREST OF NEWS AND GOSSIP IN MOVIELAND.

WHAT does fate hold for Freddie Bartholomew? The most amazing child actor in pictures, he seems to be in a strangely nether and sinister phase of his young life. There must be golly-wogs on his trail, or something, because he goes from one cat-bailing of trouble right into another. Yet Freddie himself is all unaffected by what transpires. Still, if we observe aright, there is a subtle change in the bay—a reserve and a restraint that contrast with his unabashed attitude a year or so ago.

It would be a shame if this splendid young flower were crushed by the mêlée of legal fights, squabbles over his guardianship, salary wars and all the rest of the miserable mix-up of things, mostly symbolizing greed, which so often occupy the stage in Hollywood.

The differences about Freddie's salary rose to such a pitch recently, that Douglas Scott was put in his place in "Thoroughbreds Don't Cry."

That was no small blow to Freddie's aunt Myllicent. But then the studio and she are finding it impossible to agree on money matters.

Myllicent wants more because she says she has to pay so much out for attorney's fees and allowances for Freddie's immediate family, while the studio objects to much more than $1,100 as a fixed fee for the young man's services, the amount he was getting at the time of the wrangle.

An American Freddie.—One of the things we can't get over is the resemblance of young Master Tommy Kelly, who is playing "Tom Sawyer," to Freddie. He looks like an Americanized edition of the English boy. He lacks Freddie's ebullient temperament and, of course, the new Bartholomew sapphistication. Yet David O. Selznick, the producer, who discovered Freddie for "David Copperfield" and who is making "Tom Sawyer," must have liked the Kelly lad's similarity to his earlier find. Which is probably the reason he was chosen for the Mark Twain hero.

Feast for Queens.—Can you believe it? Angle worms are regarded as a dainty now in Hollywood, and who do you suppose favors them? Well, two very glamorous ladies, according to our secret information. One is Dolores del Río, the other Constance Bennett.

The angle worms are imported by a fancy-food store in Beverly Hills, and are esteemed by gourmets as the rival of snails and other such dainties. Anyway, nobody's yet eating rattlesnake meat—and it's done, you know—as a regular routine in Hollywood. Angle worms on crackers are really said to be quite palatable as hors d'oeuvre.

The Bob-Barbara Complex.—Fans are surely taking Hollywood by storm. There have never been such crowds for big premières, and previews almost rival them in lights, street throngs, and other attributes of the big-time film openings.

The crowd became so fierce in its interest in Robert Taylor and Barbara Stanwyck at the pre-showing of "Stella Dallas" that not only were the two mobbed, but completely separated from each other.

On top of that a police officer, not recognizing Barbara as a star, seized her arm and thrust her back in the milling mass of onlookers. Barbara's arm was injured by being twisted, and Taylor had the very deuce of a time rescuing her from the frantic mob. Taylor himself on his arrival at a recent charity baseball game broke up that contest. Even the police went after him for autographs.

Baxter Out in Front.—If you want to argue the question of who should be paid the most you can start in all over again. For recently the authentic salaries of Warner Baxter and Gary Cooper, among the highest among masculine stars, were published for 1936.

Baxter received $294,384 from 20th Century-Fox that year, while Cooper got $265,545 from Paramount. Baxter's salary was almost $80,000 higher than for the previous year, and he got nearly $25,000 more than the chief executive at the 20th Century plant, Darryl Zanuck.

Mary Astor's Hubby a Hit.—Mary Astor can now qualify as a talent discoverer. Her new husband, Manuel del Campo, proved himself to be a clever actor at Santa Barbara recently, where a summer theater, the first near Hollywood, was started.

Del Campo and Mary both appeared in playlets of the "To-night at 8:30" series by Noel Coward. Genevieve Tobin, Barbara O'Neil, who gives an excellent performance in "Stella Dallas," Nydia Westman, Helen Chandler, and Bramwell Fletcher were in the company.

Del Campo used the stage name Michael Field, and quite a few Hollywood producers were eager to sign him for various chores right after. But he wanted more stage experience.

A Real Academy Nominee.—Since we've mentioned "Stella Dallas" again, let's record this: What a laugh Barbara Stanwyck is having over the actresses who turned down "Stella Dallas" because they didn't think it suited to their talent or personalities.

These actresses, we understand, included Gloria Swanson, Ruth Chatterton, and Francine LaRimore. As a result of the picture Barbara is practically destined to be the Academy prize-winner among the women for 1937. Of course, Barbara is not the type ever to crow over anything, but she was a pretty wise gal, all right. This should be a lesson to stars who want to choose their own stories.

Brent Bachelor Again.—These are surely flirty days for George Brent, what with his quick marriage and separation, the lady in the case being the Australian actress, Constance Worth. The "shackles" donned in Mexico weren't so difficult to shake off from all accounts, because it was uncertain whether the couple was really legally and technically married as a result of the trip across the border. So, anyway, Brent is foot-loose and fancy-free, and we're betting on a new romance just around the corner.

Too Much "Tempest."—
There was a moment recently at the N. B. C. radio station in Hollywood which was historic. John and Elaine Barr, who were expected to pose in "Caliban" and "Ariel" costumes. The photographers were ready and waiting and John and Elaine George Brent's quick step leads him to two objectives: annulment of his May marriage and decision to become a citizen of the United States.

Repeatedly denying that she had ever heard of Frank Wallace, Mae West now admits her marriage to him twenty-six years ago. With him here is Trixie La Mae, his hoofing partner.
THE MYSTERY OF FALLING STARS IS NEVER COMPLETELY SOLVED, BUT HERE IS INTERESTING DISCUSSION OF SOME STRANGE ECLIPSES.

"WHAT is wrong? Why can't Gloria Swanson once more take her place among the leading actresses at the screen? Why do producers refuse to give the public the old favorites they want?" wails an irate contributor to "What the Fans Think."

But she is again a leading actress. As this is written, Miss Swanson is in Hollywood with a Columbia contract, riding the crest of a tidal wave of letters which shrieked "Yes!" to the question, 'Do You Want Swanson Back?' For once the rules are reversed and the public gets what it asks for.

But Miss Swanson is, as usual, the great exception. In general, the angry bewilderment of this demand for her return is typical of requests from fans which are blandly ignored by producers.

Audiences everywhere wonder why favorites to whom they have been faithful for years slowly fade out of the Hollywood scene and never reappear, despite demands for their return as vehement as the one just quoted.

The readers of this magazine in particular have wanted to know just why it is that they can't see the return of stars who have more to offer the screen than when they first attained eminence.

Of course the question is one that has always remained unsolved, but that does not satisfy fans who see no reason why it shouldn't be and are not appeased by the rubber stamps Hollywood offers as answers: fickle public, indifferent stars, wayward producers. Movie-goers rightly distrust such glib explanations which, however well they may look in print, seldom suffice to explain an actual case.

Think of the great stars who have disappeared in the last five years—Ramon Novarro, Gloria Swanson, Anna Sten, Nancy Carroll, Clara Bow, Ruth Chatterton, Constance Bennett, Helen Hayes, Nils Asther, Richard Barthelmess.

All these are famous 'names'—and once an actor becomes famous he is financially valuable no matter how much or far what reason his popularity declines. He was a hit once and he may be again, barring physical disfigurement or a jail sentence.

"What is wrong?" indeed! The failure of studios to give an adequate answer to this persistent demand of audiences would seem just one more evidence of movie-dom's fantastic fatuity.
But there is always method in Hollywood's madness—always some reason for what producers do which makes their behavior comprehensible if not sensible.
And when you ask seasoned observers of the film world the why of this apparent conspiracy to ignore the requests of paying customers, they will give you a straightforward answer—"That's Hollywood."
Like "c'est la guerre," this worn phrase is used to cover a multitude of mysteries. But its prevalence is only an indication that it's easier to dismiss the problem than tell the truth about it.
The real reasons why stars fall and stay fallen are so complex, so numerous, so bound up with the intimate life of the film colony that it is impossible to explain them in so many words. There is no simple answer.
If you want to understand why stars rise and fall, you must put yourself in their place.
Actors come to Hollywood from all over the world, from every conceivable class of society. But once they become a part of the picture parade, they are of Hollywood. Their ideas and standards are removed from ordinary life and adapted to the fantastic conditions of picture make-believe.
No wonder both their rise and fall seems incomprehensible to those of us who live in the world of definite reality.
It's only by close analysis that one touches the truth, and even then it is fair only to say that a star topples not because of this condition or that but because of subtle combinations of all of them.
Such factors as studio intrigue, poor judgment, the self-infatuation which is a part of the Thespian ego and encouraged by
Hollywood, all account for the demise of some of the stars.
Frequently the basic trouble does not become apparent because it is composed of several minor factors and is obscured by the glamour of stardom.
Think it over and see if you don't agree that many stars who should still be on the screen are no longer there for causes unimportant in themselves but devastating in the aggregate.

Ruth Chatterton is an outstanding example. At Warers she had final voice in the choosing of her stories, dictated by her belief that she alone was competent to decide what her fans would like.
She managed to choose a series of the worst films, both financially and artistically, that seasoned film-goers have ever borne with. Undaunted completely by this, she still demanded the right of story supervision when she left Warner and there were no takers.
When she finally signed with Columbia, they let her choose the story for her all-important comeback. After much publicized deliberation she finally fixed upon by all ods the worst picture she ever made. Miss Chatterton gets an occasional role these days, but no one offers her a contract, much less the right of story supervision.
This egomania on the part of stars is responsible for more declines than one would think, and comes in unexpected quarters. The modest Helen Hayes come from great success on the stage to far-flung fame in the movies.
She showed for a time a notable lack of overweening selfestem, and every one was grateful, particularly interviewers.
But after making a hit, Miss Hayes decided she knew a thing or two about pictures and insisted on making two phonies, both of which flopped miserably. Than Helen said she was going to leave the movies anyhow.
Perhaps some would put Constance Bennett and Nancy Carroll in this category of stars who knew too much for their own good. I think, though, that it wasn't so much the stories they chose for themselves as their attitude in demanding that pushed these two over the brink. And here we reach the class of stars whose downfall is to be attributed to studio intrigue.
I hate to say it, but it seems to me that studio intrigue is responsible for Gloria Swanson's long absence from the screen. What other explanation can be offered in the face of the burning fan interest shown in her? Not that Gloria was ever crudely high-hat or went out of her way to offend people.
Alas, I fear the answer is that Hollywood resents fineness.
Miss Swanson pays the price of being both a star and a great lady.
Of course the category of stars who finish themselves by their own misguided efforts is not large, for only very powerful stars ever can extract enough hate from the studios with which to hang themselves. The largest class of fallen players is that which includes the victims of studio mismanagement.

Fans are always wondering what has become of Evelyn Brent, Nils Asther, Alice White, Douglas Montgomery, Phillips Holmes, and scores of other players whose fans still champion them but who are passed up in favor of newcomers. All these stars held promise at one time or another, but were somehow not developed as they should have been.

And here again we see the confusion of mind which so often defeats both producers and stars, and which is the product of Hollywood's fear of the passé. The actors just mentioned never even attained full-fledged stardom; they were ballyhooed for a year or two with increasing success and resultant fan interest, only to be cast aside for a newer crop. Producers seem to feel that any new face is better than any familiar one, an attitude as incomprehensible to me as to you.

Some of them explain by saying that it is cheaper to sign a newcomer at a small salary than to take a chance on a doubtful star who wants the money he is accustomed to getting.

Does that make sense? Obviously the established player would be reasonable rather than continue to remain off the screen, and his salary is as nothing compared to the money lavished on newcomers to make them stand out from the job lots recruited by the studios every year. And when a newcomer finally reaches the stage where he is undeniable valuable, he straightway strikes for larger pay—and gets it. Is this business astuteness?

There are times when the whole thing seems rather a sordid story, and that neither stars nor studios know how to manage our fourth largest industry. It is refreshing at such times to contemplate the brief but illustrious list of stars whose absence from the screen is a matter of taste and judgment.

Until recently, one thought of Ramon Navarro as obvious head of this class. Far years Mr. Navarro endured poor stories and summary treatment at the hands of his studio as well as that final indignity, rôles unsuitable for a mature and sensible actor. No one has been more patient with Hollywood's absurdities than this star, but his farbear once was finally exhausted and he refused to renew his contract with a studio which had heaped humiliations upon him.

But now he has made a "sheik" picture for Republic. Coming from the star who refused the poet-guide's rôle in "The Garden of Allah" and flung down the gauntlet in Hollywood in general, the announcement makes one wonder just what Ramon does want, and if the lapse of judgment doesn't mean that he misses the spotlight after all. But maybe he has ideas about the move which he hasn't revealed. He has usually been right in the past.

The list includes a few others well known to you—Richard Barthelmess, Lillian Gish, Clara Bow—but my favorite of all the cases of players whose absence from the screen is a result of judgment better than Hollywood's is that of Anna Sten, the luscious Russian whom Samuel Goldwyn picked from the world for three years so that he might have ample time to search for stories which would straightway make him the screen's greatest star.

He finally brought her forth, you remember, in two bad pictures and one good one, and then decided that it was all a mistake and she would never do for American movies.

Miss Sten found no offers coming her way when her Goldwyn contract expired, but she said nothing and pursued plans for making a picture herself. Meanwhile, Mr. Goldwyn had an opportunity to count the foreign returns on her pictures for him and discovered that instead of being flops they had made him a great deal of money.

She will make "Gorgeous" for Grand National—a move which at first casts the same doubt on his judgment as on Mr. Navarro's. But Anna is shrewd. Her husband will direct the picture, and between them they will probably convince this new studio that they know best when it's a matter of putting Anna across with the public.

They can always paint to Mr. Goldwyn's mistakes as an MARTHA RAYE SETS A NEW HIGH IN POPULARITY, OUTSMARTING THE GLAMOUR GIRLS OF HOLLYWOOD.

Sally Eilers, below, is trying to see all Europe in six weeks. Returns for "She Married a Million."

YOU may have seen cheering crowds at World Series baseball games; you may have fought your way through throngs to greet a local hero on his return to your home town, but you never saw anything to equal the reception of Martha Raye in person at the Paramount Theater in New York.

Crowds stampeded the place, were restive and barely tolerant through an amusing picture and a swingy orchestral interlude. But when Martha came on they were far her one hundred per cent. And when her songs and shouting and nice little speech were over, the audience surged dawn to the footlights and talked things over with her—how it felt to score a triumph in the very theater where she sang almost unnoticed about six years ago; was Bing Crosby or Bob Burns her favorite actor? and was her marriage turning out happily?

Genuinely friendly, responsive to their enthusiasm, stimulated to partial paralysis of her vocal cords by their applause, never once did the Raye girl let her admirers down. (Other stars making personal appearances please copy.)
They Say in New York———

Mamma’s Field Day.—Later in the rehearsal room, where the publicity department was tossing a shin dig for her, Raye looked surprisingly gentle, and bewildered, and took direction meekly from mamma. Mamma never got further with her career than the smallest of small-voudeville, so, of course, she was just the one to advise her daughter on guest-of-honor diplomacy. She seemed to favor pallid and limp musicians.

However, in the brief moment allotted to me before mamma dragged her away, Martha Raye made a most pleasant impression. She has that rarest of traits—genuine humility. “I just didn’t know what to do when I got out there. I wanted to give ‘em something as big and wonderful as the reception they gave me. I’m glad I didn’t know it would be like this. I would have been so scared.”

She grabbed a fistful of sandwiches as she was led away. And I noticed that some one, her make-up expert husband no doubt, had given her the longest false eyelashes ever seen on a star. Marlene Dietrich and Katharine Hepburn will have to start using upholstery fringe if they want to stay in the competition.

Hailing and Farewelling.—Lately the motion-picture traffic at our little crossroads between Hollywood and London has been so congested that the town’s greeters, official and otherwise, are thinking of taking up residence in a trailer to be shuttled back and forth between the Grand Central Station and the French Line pier.

Marlene Dietrich and her husband, Jack Benny and Mary Livingstone, Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., Sally Eilers and her husband all went off on European vacation jaunts.

Binnie Barnes shoved off for London to make two pictures and congratulate her erstwhile protégée, Tamora Desni, on doing right well for herself in London films. Eddie Lowe, Nat Pendleton, and Charles Farrell came back from making films in London.

Lowe is leering at the Broadway stage—will probably join Gertrude Lawrence in a grand play called “Susan and God”—and Charles Farrell has gone off to a stock company in Ogunquit, Maine, saying he thinks he’d like to learn to act, it looks like a nice business.

William K. Howard, Hollywood’s renegade director, came back but briefly from London, and as always dropped pungent remarks to intent listeners.

Marlene Dietrich was escorted to Europe by her husband, Rudolph Sieber. Maria, their daughter, was not photographed because she is quite a young lady now, it seems.

The Truth About Hollywood.—Bill Howard explains his preference for making pictures in England by pointing out that there is no pretense of being one big, happy family there. In Hollywood he got fed up with the custom of sending flowers to the producer’s wife every now and then and of going to an endless round of cocktail parties where he saw nothing but picture people who talked of nothing but pictures.

He has just finished a little number called “Especially at Night,” with Eddie Lowe and Tamaro Desni, but it is his next picture that is his real love. He is going to Arabia to film a realistic biography of Lawrence, with Leslie Howard in the star rôle. It should be great, but it couldn’t possibly be as good as hearing this quiet but spellbinding young man tell about it. Note to exploitation department: Won’t you make a trailer showing Bill Howard explaining a little about the picture and what he hopes to accomplish in it? Audiences would adore him.

Vociferous Travelogue.—About the time this appears, Sally Eilers and her husband, Harry Joe Brown, will probably be showing the residents of Vienna, Budapest, Rome, Venice, Berne, Geneva, or Paris the sights of their own home town. As sight-seers, they work like G-men.

Sally, with some almost mystic form of penetration, finds out all about theaters, cafés, smart shops, monuments, and baby hospitals in a town almost as soon as she sets foot in it. Mr. Brown discovers all about sports events, means of transportation used by the multitude, how and where the great bulk of the population enjoy themselves.

Jack Whiting returns to films as Jessie Matthews’s leading man in “Sailing Along,” for Gaumont-British.
MRS. POWER TELLS THE STORY OF HER SON'S EARLY YOUTH AND HOW SHE HAS BEEN HIS SAFETY VALVE THROUGH THE TEMPESTUOUS YEARS.

How Tyrone Power came by his incomparable poise, along with other valued inheritances, can only be explained by the personality—and the mentality—of Patia Power, his mother.

No doubt of it, Tyrone Power is TNT, with fuse attatched.
You have the feeling that if all his nervous energy suddenly exploded, Tyrone would disappear in a thousand hat fragments.
At the same time, you know he won’t. In spite of being composed of all the assorted dangerous elements found in nature, such as terrific energy, dimples, gnawing restlessness, dramatic talent, beating eyebrows, and a fatal fascination for the other sex, he has something else that has kept him all of one piece.
That is his incomparable poise.
How he came by it, along with other valued inheritances, can only be explained by the personality of Patia Power, his mother. She has been his safety valve through twenty-three tempestuous years.

Patia Power is a product of the blue-grass country of Kentucky, the land we need scarcely add, of thoroughbreds and beautiful women. She possesses the lively brown eyes and patrician bearing of the Southern aristocrat, to whom has been granted the boon of growing more gracious with the years.
As Patia Réaume—that’s French, pronounced Ray-ame—she conducted the Réaume School of Dramatic Art in those gentler times before the World War. Her school was in Covington, Kentucky. It was there she met, fell in love with, and was married to Tyrone Power II. At suitable intervals thereafter Tyrone III and his sister Anne were born.
From the start, Tyrone was a bundle of vibrations, all of which promised trouble unless she did something about it. Fortunately, Mrs. Power’s training as an actress and as a teacher stood her in good stead.
And how well she succeeded with Tyrone is illustrated not only by his enviable standing in the picture world, but also in the story of how she advised him during the crucial stage of his career.

Shortly after the death of his father, Tyrone was in Hollywood facing the battle of breaking into the movies. Mrs. Power was teaching drama in Cincinnati.

"It always had been our habit of talking things out with each other," Mrs. Power told me. "When we were apart, long letters took the place of these discussions.

"Tyrone was at loose ends in Hollywood. He wrote me that he was ready to chuck it all, get a job on a boat, and leave Hollywood and its heartbreak behind.

"I gave his letter a great deal of thought before I replied. Even when my children were very young, I took their problems seriously, knowing that their small perplexities were as important to them as any problem might be to me.

"Tyrone, as I well knew, had his whole heart set on following in his father's footsteps as an actor. To give up meant more than temporary defeat. It was a calamity. I was confident, too, that only adverse circumstances stood in his way; given a chance he would make good.

"The memory of a line from 'Hamlet' came to me, a favorite with Mr. Power and me: 'This, above all: to thine own self be true!'

"All at once it was easy to reply to my son with the comradely advice he needed. I wrote: 'No matter where you travel, you will still be with yourself.'

"Logic always appealed to Tyrone. That was answer enough for him. He didn't chuck things and sail for the South Seas, because he could appreciate that truth. No matter where he lived, he would still have to live with himself.

"It was his habit to accept an answer he could trust. When I gave him one, at a crucial time, he accepted it.

"I formed a close association with my children when they were very young. I never talked baby talk to them. I never laughed at questions. Even when Tyrone seemed composed of a perpetual 'Why?' I answered everything truthfully, but I tempered my answers to his growing mind.

"When he and Anne learned to read, they would use words incomprehensible to them. I learned reading by learning words, as was the method in my generation. They learned reading by sounds, and so they could make an effort to pronounce even the most difficult words.

"We would sit together each evening for fifteen minutes, hands and bodies relaxed, while I would take a few words and teach them the proper enunciation. There was another advantage in these short sessions. I taught them that to have poise of mind, one must have poise of body. To jerk and joggle meant no control over your mind.

"Anne was a quiet child, naturally poised. With Tyrone, poise had to be a matter of self-discipline over a super-abundance of nervous energy. Quick to catch on, agile of brain and body, he had to be doing something every minute. Naturally there were many times when he did the wrong thing.

"During the production of one of my little theater plays he somehow obtained a stench bomb and set it off in the audience. He was not prepared for the uproar that followed, of course. He was dismayed and contrite, and would have accepted punishment for his guilt. But he did object to having his cousin, who was staying with us, come and tell on him.

"'Put to bed, Tyrone thought it over, and in his logical mind devised a fitting retaliation. When his cousin came to bed, Tyrone placed a similar bomb under his cot. Then he was satisfied.

"'I always let Tyrone and Anne make their own decisions."

In one short year, says Mrs. Power, Tyrone has grown from youth to manhood.

Mrs. Power has seen romances come and go in her son’s life, for Tyrone is most attractive to girls.

So far as Sonja Henie goes, his romance with her is already cooling by mutual inclination, and Mrs. Power is ready for the next.
BEFORE Marlene Dietrich left Hollywood for London she bought $750 worth of silk stockings to give to studio friends. But that can’t touch the gesture Marion Davies made at a home-coming dinner party. Marion had fifty feminine guests around the festal board and each one found a dozen pairs of five-dollar stockings tucked under a napkin. So Marion’s bill really soared.

NO airs for Edward Arnold even though he’s now making more than $100,000 a picture. Every day he isn’t acting he goes down to his studio office, just like a regular business man. To speak to him all you have to do is call and ask for him. He could afford a string of secretaries, but he democratically answers his own telephone.

FOR the first time in his movie life Clark Gable ran out on his promises to see interviewers. Suddenly advised that he could have six whole weeks of vacationing, he impetuously decided to start that very day. When he returns from the wilds of Wyoming he’ll be greeted by a host of wild-eyed writers. He’ll have a fresher viewpoint, anyway!

A LOT of people have thought that Gene Raymond assumed a terrific responsibility when he secretly built and furnished that house for Jeanette MacDonald. The bride is ecstatic. But maybe here’s the reason; Gene consulted Helen Ferguson, their press agent, on every single detail. For nine long months Helen was in a private frenzy, perpetually wondering if she was guessing precisely right about Jeanette’s tastes.

ADD to things that can never be again—those Mae West articles on how to get your man! Since her unwanted husband proved their ancient marriage was no joke, Hollywood wags are proposing that Mae wax witty on the reverse angle. How about it, Mae?

THE rumble seat in Preston Foster’s car is just a kitchenette on wheels. At first you’re amazed to spot the electric ice box. But then he asks if you’re hungry and cools you a snack on the electric stove!

ACCORDING to Cameron Rogers, author and adventurer, the Hollywood influence is penetrating the world’s darkest corners. On the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, Mexico, he met six barefooted native belles with hairdress and make-ups exactly like Joan Crawford’s. Every native hut, he discovered, contains a photo of Joan, a bit of mirror and a pot of rouge. Flattering to the star but disconcerting to explorers.

LATEST and probably best of all Hollywood income-tax stories has to do with the trouble of that mad one, Alice Brady. Going up, in her own words, in a pink balloon about her financial status, she did the simplest and most natural thing: telephoned the man she considered responsible. President Roosevelt, vastly amused, chatted with her at length and figuratively laid a cool hand on the troubled Brady brow.

It wasn't Robert Taylor's day at the big baseball game between leading men and comedians. Taylor, you see, was official captain of one team. But he didn't play. He did take lots of bows. Then departed early with a police escort. "Mother Taylor," the other leading men called him—far no special reason except that it sounded vaguely derogatory.

Basil Rathbone wins our nomination as Hollywood's best host. You've read about his swanky parties for important people. He was just as gracious, spent as much time and effort—and apparently had just as much fun—when he entertained one hundred and fifty tourists in connection with an exploitation scheme.

Dick Powell and Joan Blondell, after working continuously for months, planned one grand holiday, for which they chartered a yacht and laid in a month’s provisions. At the last moment Joan received a studio call. Result: the Powells had just one day of leisure. Sadly they boarded the boat and churned madly up and down the coast for twenty-four hours.

Music for Madame" is only half stating the case from the viewpoint of Joan Fontaine, leading lady for Nina Montini, in the film of that name. Joan is Olivia de Havilland’s baby sister, which gives you an idea. Nina’s conversation is ultra-sophisticated and slightly Rabelasion—and it grows more so in proportion to the blushes of his listener. "He is an education for any girl," gasped Joan one day. Nina’s obvious interest in her only increases her crimson embarrassment.

Very beautifully drunk were two male players at the Warner studio. They were trying to forget that they just had been assigned to play in a picture with Wayne Morris. With Wayne Morris. Just that. Two months ago both starred in their own right, and not more than six months ago Wayne Morris was unheard of.

A studio executive tells us of Josephine Hutchinson’s surprise when she heard that MGM was going to make her into a glamour girl. "How in the world can you do that?" she asked. "Easily," the executive told her. "Didn't we do all right with a couple of other redheads—Myrna Loy and Jeanette MacDonald?"
On and Off the Set

"But they are glamorous!" Janehine objected.
Which recalls, said the studio man, the day Myrna arrived on the MGM lot under contract. Told that she would be made over into a glamour girl, she expressed similar doubts.

An artist, seeking to interest John Barrymore in his sketches, brought some of them—nudes—to the star's set.
"Why did you hide their feet in grass?" Barrymore queried.
"I don't sketch feet well," the artist replied.
"That's odd," grinned John. "When I was a newspaper artist I couldn't draw feet, either."
John may never know, unless he reads this, that originally there were feet on the artist's nudes. The wily fellow, having heard of flawless Barrymore sketches, had eliminated the feet in his drawings to catch the actor's attention.

On "The Awful Truth" set a middle-aged woman visitor kept making such personal and audible remarks about Cary Grant and his "cute" clothes that the star became very uncomfortable.

Director McCarey saw what was going on. He went over to the visitor and explained politely but firmly that she was interfering with the star's work. She apologized.
"I was merely trying to make him blush," she explained. "I read somewhere that he did, and I wanted to see for myself."

A man who dislikes Janet Gaynor thought up a scandal item about her. Afraid to peddle it personally, he passed it on to another who is probably Hollywood's champion gossip-monger. He felt that the champ couldn't resist spreading such a lively story.

But the story did not spread. The gossip champ is one of a little company who knew Janet "when"—friends who are loyal to her because she has been steadfastly loyal to them.

So with what must have been a mighty soul-wrench, the gossip refrained from gossiping. Greater love hath no man!

Robert Taylor has concluded that it's the presence of Barbara Stanwyck at his side which causes so much excitement wherever he goes.
The other night, it seems, was one of those rare occasions when Bab went out alone. He visited a softball park. He wasn't mobbed; nobody asked for an autograph. The pretty young thing who sells cigarettes, candy, and chewing gum acted bored as she said, "Thank you, Mr. Taylor," when he tipped her. Feminine fans within hearing glanced at him, then turned their eyes toward the game. None of the gentlemen glowered at him.

Which, Bab swears, was a welcome change.

Recently Grace Moore consented to meet and chat with a tourist, as a favor to a minor actor at her acquaintance. Later the actor made a surprising confession to the star.
"I didn't know that fellow at all," he admitted. "I met him in a cocktail bar, and he offered me ten dollars if I would arrange the introduction. I needed the money so I agreed. Hope you're not angry."
To Grace's eternal credit she laughed and said, "That's all right—but why didn't you hold out for more?"

Dorothy Peterson, returning from a location trip, found that some one had taken advantage of her absence to give a party—evidently quite a large party—in her home. When she questioned the watchman about it he said, "Well, I saw a lot of stylish cars drive up and thought that you'd come home and were having guests. I sat in the garden and listened to the music."
On and Off the Set

They were considerate guests, Dorothy reports. They brought their own food and liquor and they washed all the dishes before they left. The only thing missing was a pair of new shoes which had been reposing in her dressing room.

The ingenuity which actors display in inventing ways to amuse themselves continues to amaze us. At this very moment Lionel Atwill is fishing off Catalina, with a bow and arrow! The arrow has a string attached to its tail so that he may pull in his fish. He says he caught one.

The back yard of Pat O'Brien's house at Del Mar overlooks the race track. So big-hearted Pat put up a small grand stand there with a large sign which said, "For kids only!"

"It's amazing," Pat observed, "how many kids there are at Del Mar who shave. Wonder if it's the climate."

Fay Wray, called suddenly to Dallas, Texas, to participate in a Rudy Vallee broadcast, was touched at the passionate insistence of her maid that she accompany her. Fay opined that it would be nonsense to take her for so short a stay. Arrived at the airport, however, she found the maid, luggage, and all, and the girl had brought her own ticket with the money she had been saving for her vacation.

Fay was still more touched at this evidence of devotion until the maid confided, "I thought I simply couldn't stand it, Miss Wray, if I missed a chance to see Rudy Vallee in person!"

And Irene Hervey wears toe mittens at night to keep her feet beautiful. Made of chamois and soaked in olive oil, they are guaranteed, Irene assures you, to keep your toesies young and alluring. A star's life is just one thing alter another.

A young thing was describing the delights of the concerted yachting parties at Catalina over a recent week-end. "Just everybody was there!" she burbled. "Charles Chaplin, Paulette Goddard, Claudelle Colbert, Errol Flynn, Joan Bennett, Tom Brown, Anne Shirley. Oh, it was too thrilling!"

"What did they do to amuse themselves?" some one asked. She wrinkled a pretty brow and then said, brightly, "Well, quite a lot of them fell in the ocean."

The Bert Wheelers recently moved into a new home in the Toluca Lake district. The other evening Bert glanced happily around the den and remarked to some friends, "If I had an income of $1,000 a month I'd never make another picture."

The joke lies in the fact that for five years he was under contract to RKO at $3,000 a week, and he hasn't made less than $750 a week in twenty years. But he has to go on working!

What are you going to do when you're washed up in pictures if you haven't saved enough money to live on?" some one asked George Raft recently.

"I'm not worrying," Raft laughed. "I'll buy a dozen beards and sell things to Bert Wheeler. There's nothing you can't sell him if you talk fast enough."

Richard Arlen likes to have his back scratched. His son Ricky likes to have stories told him. So Dick said to Ricky, "If you scratch my back I'll tell you a story."

In the middle of the story Ricky stopped scratching. "Go on scratching," he said to Ricky, "and I'll finish the story."

"No," said Ricky, "it's a rotten story anyhow."

"The Life of Emile Zola."—Warners. High sincerity and earnestness, plus the dramatic skill of a great studio, went into the perfect picture that every one applauds. It is a glowing page of cinematic literature as vigorous in its insistence on truth as was Emile Zola, himself. One picture as sturdily honest as this cancels a hundred evasions in ordinary film fiction. If only we didn't have to see the makeshift pictures and could concern ourselves only with such as this, the entertainment-seeker would never meet with disappointment and frustration. Lucky the film-goer who can pick and choose and is not, like the critic, a slave to duty! But we must admit that few lives are as dramatic as Zola's, few crusades as humane and sympathetic—and few actors of Paul Muni's simple eloquence combined with rare, breath-taking skill. There isn't another who could bring similar qualities to his marvelous portrait of the French novelist, humanitarian and patriot. His life on the screen begins in the 1860s when, as a starving writer, he shares a Paris garret with the artist Paul Cezanne and meets a girl of the streets whose story inspires him to write a novel that startles the world. He calls it "Nana." One of the loveliest things in the picture is the acting of Erin O'Brien-Moore as Nana. Rich, famous, complacent thirty years later, Zola is spurred by Madame Alfred Dreyfus to take up the cause of her soldier husband who has been sentenced to life imprisonment on Devil's Island because of his betrayal of military secrets. Zola's investigation of the case so inflames him that he writes his famous "I Accuse," in which he attacks the government of France and more particularly its military system. At an elaborate and hypocritical trial he is found guilty of treason. But the uproar he causes eventually unmasks corruption in high places. Captain Dreyfus is freed and restored to rank while Zola meets with accidental death. Once reviled by his countrymen and most of the world, he is buried in the Pantheon with Anatole France delivering the funeral oration. I consider this a far finer biographical film than Mr. Muni's "Life of Louis Pasteur" because Zola and his story are more passionate and the man himself is lovable.

"They Won't Forget."—Warners. Those who hate hopeful, happy endings and search for bitter truth on the screen need go no farther. They will find exactly what they are looking for in Mervyn LeRoy's scorching, searing picture. It is a magnificent example of cinema story-telling. Simple and artful at the same time, it builds up terrific suspense and ends in frustration and tragedy and cynical doubt. The only pictures that may be compared to it are "Fury" and "The Black Legion." This, it seems to me, is even more frightening and depressing. It is a study of bigotry and mob violence in the South, where lust for blood is stronger than reason, tolerance or humanity, and where hatred of the North burns as fiercely to-day as it did seventy-five years ago. I tell you what the picture insists that we believe. It shows a young Northerner, teacher in a business school, accused of murdering a lovely girl pupil. A newspaper reporter first scents a big story in fastening the crime on the young man against whom there is no evidence. The ambitious district attorney seizes upon the victim. Between them a case is developed, the townspeople are inflamed and eventually the whole country is aroused. But the efforts of a detective and a defense lawyer from New York count for nothing against the local mob intent on a killing. Convicted on flimsy evidence, the prisoner's sentence is commuted by the governor who knows that in serving justice he has ended his political career, and the prisoner is snatched by lynchers. "I wonder if Hale really did it," says the reporter after the Northerner's death. "I wonder, too," says the district attorney. Vividly acted by a cast of virtual strangers, Claude Rains dominates as the district attorney. He is Mephistopheles in a Palm Beach suit. His performance misses perfection, however, because his clipped English speech doesn't blend with the actor's idea of Southern talk.

"Wee Willie Winkle."—20th Century-Fox. Shirley Temple's biggest, costliest, most sweeping picture is, in my opinion, a weak vehicle for her personality and talent. She is overwhelmed by scenes and sequences in which there is no place for her. Army maneuvers, charging savage hordes, parades and suchlike. For all this takes place in the India of Queen Victoria's reign when Shirley and her mother, impoverished but beautifully dressed, come from America to live with Shirley's grandfather, gruff Colonel C. Aubrey Smith. Why he didn't send them an allowance and keep them where they belonged is a question. Ah, then there wouldn't have been a story. It is a slight story at that. Shirley softens her grandfather's gruffness, wins Sergeant Victor McLaglen for a friend and changes bloodthirsty Khoda Khan from a savage to a civilized gentleman only too willing to lay off the British. There is also a mild romance between Shirley's mother and a soldier. Unimportant though it is, it lessens the importance of Shirley's place as star of the picture. All this is no criticism of Shirley, her remarkable gift, nor of the picture itself. The latter is beautifully done, every detail expanded with skill. But I still think it far from satisfactory for the most popular actress in the world.

"High, Wide and Handsome."—Paramount. The title fits exactly this spacious, dashing picture that is even better and more unusual than its name. You never saw anything like it. Music, slapstick, melodrama, history and fiction are expertly scrambled in a brilliant medley that cannot be called less than splendid entertainment which breaks several rules. Whoever heard of music in the Pennsylvania oil fields? Or thought that a circus troupe could be convincingly used to aid farmers in laying pipe lines? This occurs in the magnificent climax of the show when the desperate rustics are all but done in by wily oil men. This takes place in 1859 when the petroleum industry was young. More than a romanticized account of that, however, is the love story of Randolph Scott, an earnest country man, and Irene Dunne, singer and dancer in a carnival show. Who, when she runs away from him after marriage because he cares more for oil than love, is "discovered" by the great Barnum—who probably thinks she is another Jenny Lind. On the verge of going to New York and fame, she rallies the entire circus to dash to the aid of her abandoned husband and his farmer friends. Irene Dunne is a dream as the heroine. Perfect, perfect! Every one in the cast is grandly right, and the picture, for all its popular appeal, is as unconventional as they make them.

"Saratoga."—M.G.M. Jean Harlow's last picture should not be judged by ordinary standards; it should not be judged at all. One will see it because it marks
"New Faces of 1937."

Her final appearance on the screen, or one will avoid it to escape reminder of the deceased actress. Those who are drawn to it will not find Miss Harlow at her best. Obviously lacking her characteristic vitality, she does not rise to brilliance save in one scene. Then she really is at her best as a comédienne. It occurs when Clark Gable conceals himself under a couch as Miss Harlow’s fiancé, Walter Pidgeon, enters the room and she smokes Mr. Gable’s unfinished cigar. Otherwise the picture is interesting as a curiosity, an example of the redoubled energy of a loyal cast to cover up the absence of their star and the skill employed by writers, director, cutters and sound engineers to disguise her abrupt withdrawal from the proceedings. Miss Harlow’s stand-in, Mary Dees, is recognizable in several long shots, a scene of reconciliation with Clark Gable being photographed with her back to the camera. As the title indicates, it is a race track story and it isn’t always clear. But that is due to the unusual circumstances attending its production.

"The Toast of New York."—RKO. Why this ambitious picture fails to come through is not easy to explain. The cast is important, interesting. So, too, is the story. The period is lusty, gaudy, the production lavish. But the result is not a big picture, only a tolerable one. I believe it is because the characters are not interesting. With a few exceptions they are stock figures that might fit into any story, any period. The principal one is Jim Fisk who rose from a peddler after the Civil War to a position of fabulous power in New York. Gambler, stock manipulator, trickster, megalomaniac, he is rather tiresome because he is never real. He is simply Edward Arnold overdoing things. Now, Mr. Arnold is a fine actor whose gifts are like no others, but this is not one of his better roles for their convincing display. Here he is a blistering buccaneer who falls for an earnest young actress. From then on every dollar he amasses is laid at her feet in reverent tribute. Jim Fisk was a vulgarian, a libertine, and his favorite mistress was the notorious Josie Mansfield. There is no reminder of her in the vestal portrayed by Frances Farmer whose purity is almost ascetic. Blame it on censorship. They wouldn’t have dared picture the real people. But why the costly, wasteful attempt.

"Stella Dallas."—United Artists. The public will decide whether it was worth Samuel Goldwyn’s while to remake this great success of twelve years ago. For my part the story is too familiar, probably because I believed it wholly the first time. More than that, it is dated. As dated as “Madame X,” which also is to reappear. But always a new public is growing up, new picture-goers are being recruited. To them this story of sacrificial mother love may be a revelation of truth, fine drama and vital acting. They may weep, as I did with many others in 1925, but my eyes are dry to-day. I cannot believe Stella Dallas any more. She is too stupid for 1937. She did not learn to dress, to make up, to imitate a lady in thirteen years, with the incentive of a well-bred husband and daughter. She remained a gaudy freak in spite of film stars, fashion magazines and beauty columns, unaware that she was not like other women, even when among the nicest. But she loves her daughter. There is no doubt of her fierce love. But she has to overhear gossip about her vulgarity to realize that she stands in the girl’s way. So she stages a scene of disillusionment that the child may abandon her in heartbreak and live with her father and his lovely, new wife, marry a boy of good family. Last scene finds Stella, shabby and old, a vagrant standing in the rain to peer at the radiant bride, Barbara Stanwyck’s Stella has created a furor in Hollywood. Already the Academy award is mentioned. Her performance is competent, whole-hearted. The part is sure-fire. The situations sweep it along if the actress does not hold out. Miss Stanwyck keeps back nothing. However, my enthusiasm is for the wonder and beauty of Anne Shirley as her daughter. She holds me for all that makes the picture worth while.

"The Emperor’s Candlesticks."—MGM. A charming, mocking spy melodrama played to Viennese waltz time, you will go far to find a picture to equal this. It is unique of its kind. Which is to say that it is light, as artificial as an opera ballet. But it reveals polished

THE Bing Crosby Enterprises Corporation has been dissolved. In its place we have the Everett Crosby Company, Ltd., housed in a swank Crosby building on Sunset Boulevard. All the Crosbys have their names on the doors and offices. All except Bing. He only makes the money that keeps the outfit going.

BARBARA STANWYCK, rushing from one picture to another at breakneck speed, is undermining her health. She was three months on "Stella Dallas" and lost twenty pounds. Her doctor has put her on a weight-gaining diet and ordered her to gain at least fifteen pounds. She is working on a closed set in order to spare herself the strain of unnecessary conversation with visitors.

DESPITE the fact he has been a big hit on the Jack Benny radio program, Andy Devine gets little or no money for his broadcasts. When friends urged him to strike for more, he said, "No. I was in a slump when Jack gave me a break on the air.

Things have picked up for me now in pictures and I feel I owe him anything I can do. He can have me for his broadcast any time he wants me at the same salary he first paid me."

THE Barrymores—John and Elaine—were rehearsing a scene from "The Tempest" for a radio broadcast. It was a tender love scene; the orchestra was playing softly and cameramen were making pictures for publicity when suddenly a flashlight globe exploded with a loud bang. Elaine screamed; every one ran around excitedly except John, who stood quietly where he was.

"You're pretty calm," a photographer remarked.

"Explosions don't bother me," John replied blithely. "I've been married four times."

ROsalind Russell was backing her car out of the garage when a neighbor's puppy ran under the machine and was hurt.

Not even the pup felt as badly as Rosalind, who rushed the animal to the hospital and did everything she could to make amends.

Despite the protests of the dog's owner that it was not at all Rosalind's fault, she insisted on paying all the hospital bills and returned the pup to its owner as good as new.

Al Jolson was swimming in his pool with his two-year-old baby in his arms. He inadvertently ducked the baby, who let out a loud yell for his mother.

"Mamma! Mamma! What do you mean, 'mamma'?" Al asked the baby indignantly. "Who pays the bills around here, anyway?"

Mary Pickford spent her last days at Pickfair dressed in a pair of slacks, a sweater and beret, riding around and around the big grounds on a scooter bike. One day she ventured down the road where a new house was being erected and stopped to look at it. Just then an automobile load of tourists stopped and asked the workmen if they ever saw Miss Pickford around. The carpenters said no, the tourists drove on and Mary laughed.

The most effective scene in a foreign picture comes when the heroine plays a love scene with her back to the camera. Novel, effective, dramatic—these are some of the comments of reviewers on the unusual stunt. A friend of the director confides that it was necessity, not art, that gave rise to the idea. "The front of the face expressed blankness. The back—well, one could use one's imagination at least."

Thursday night is cook's day off in Hollywood, and you see all the cinema charmers dining at restaurants all over Beverly Hills. But not the Dick Pawells. Joan Blondell, Dick tells us, is one of the world's best cooks, and on Thursday they stay home and have steaks t-h-i-s thick, with all Dick's favorite vegetables.

Billie Burke, appearing in "The Bride Wore Red," is shown here in a beaten silver lamé house coat, with scalloped edging on the coat and fabric buttons.

at all in finding a pleasant place to park for she camps right on her own property and at the same time supervises the new home she is building there.

The furniture is all maple, the fixtures copper and if you think Grace can't bake a mean biscuit in her little electric stove you are crazy.

Shirley Temple's friends save up all their jokes to tell her because she always sees the point immediately.

Isn't Harriet Hilliard's hair arrangement attractive? The bangs are brushed back in a pompadour effect. Her next is "The Life of the Party."
ill, the family decided the rigors of the Cherry Blossom Kingdom were not for her, so the Bay City of California was selected for its healthful climate. Later Joan and her mother and sister moved south a few miles to the little hamlet of Saratoga, where Joan was reared to young ladyhood.

"It's so small a place that even now they don't own a single theater," she smiles. "For that reason, when I attended a convent near there, every other Saturday was a day of joy, for on that day, if we had been particularly good, the Sisters would show us a motion picture. From those few films was born my ambition same day to act in them."

But art and drawing and sketching were to occupy her attention first, and she returned to San Francisco to study.

When the long hard road that an art student must tread began to break down Joan's health again—at fifteen, she returned to Japan for a year, and had come back to America quite sound, for the first time, in body—she was forced to give it up temporarily. Hers, however, was a temperament which demanded creative work and when Homer Curran, a theatrical friend of the family, invited her to appear in a play called "Kind Lady," she accepted. It was but a step, then, to Hollywood, for Henry Duffy, another producer-friend, offered her a rôle in his local production of "Call It a Day," and Jesse L. Lasky, in the first-night audience, immediately signed her to a contract.

Joan's eagerness to make good as an actress fills every waking moment. She constantly is studying others, and whenever she can, watches the acting of the best actors of the screen. Much of her time, therefore, is spent at the movies.

Although she doesn't care particularly to do comedy, still she attended "My Man Godfrey" an three occasions. Twice to watch the picture and enjoy it—and the third time for the purpose of studying Carole Lombard's characterization and attempting to analyze it to her own satisfaction.

"People are forever saying I seem much older than I really am," she declares. "They express surprise that I can do any dramatic acting, when they learn my age.

"I don't see why age should enter into it. I don't see why a younger actress can't feel the character as well as an older one, and project herself into it. I've read so much, and dramatized characters so thoroughly in my own mind, that I believe I'm prepared to undertake almost any rôle that might be assigned me."

That the studio believes she is ready for more important work is evidenced by its placing her opposite Nino Martini in the important "Music for Madame"—her fourth picture—and its decision to cast her in "Damsel in Distress," opposite Fred Astaire.

Intensely serious about her career, Joan is as intent upon whatever she attempts. She studied many hours for her radio broadcast in "The Plainsman," in which she portrayed Mrs. William Cody—Mrs. Buffalo Bill, to me—and with the same relish attacks the finer points of philosophy. Plato honestly is a favorite of hers, as are a number of other ancient Greek and Roman philosophers. She spends hours reading all types of plays, both old and modern.

To romance she gives not even a passing thought. "Perhaps later that will come, but right now—I'm most interested in my career," is the way she touches upon this subject.

Interesting particularly is her program when she is working in a picture.

"I come home from the studio and go directly to my room," she says, "without seeing a soul. I take a warm bath, then have dinner in bed. No one speaks to me, and I'm completely alone.

"I read over my part for the next day, read and reread it and study it until I have grasped its every meaning. Then, I may listen to the radio for a while, or glance over a book. By nine o'clock I'm asleep. In this way, I keep the character I'm doing clearly in my mind."

Joan is sincere when she makes this explanation, a statement that from other lips might sound rather affected. But Joan is different from other actresses in Hollywood; she cannot be compared with the average run-of-the-mill player. One thing is certain, though. Joan Fontaine very definitely is on her way to the top.

be noticed on the screen. But it would do something to Garbo and her performance."

He means it and the studio believes him so thoroughly that it spends many, many dollars providing Garbo with the real where the false might answer for another actress. I have seen dozens of women at work in the wardrobe department, making intricate bead work, fine hand embroidery, for Garbo's costumes. Some of these costumes—notably some of those she wore in "Mata Hari"—have become museum pieces.

Her interest in clothes, however, is academic and purely professional. She will spend hours over conferences for costumes for a picture, to make sure that they will express the character she is to play. She will stand patiently and endlessly for fittings. But her personal taste in clothes is for garments which are tailored, simple, comfortable.

Hollywood's best-known tailor, Watson, has a shabby top coat of Garbo's hanging in his shop. Every now and then she telephones him and asks him to make another, "exactly like that one." When he notifies her that it is finished, she goes to his shop, ascends in the squeaky elevator—it amuses her to operate it herself—tries on the new coat and usually wears it home.

She wears slacks, sweaters, brogans, and berets. She is devoted to an old corduroy jacket with deep pockets in which she can sink her hands. She probably does not own more than one evening dress at a time and this will be white or black and completely unadorned.

She will lie for hours in the sun without moving. She seems to soak up sunshine and store it away like a lizard. In slickers and sou'wester, she will walk for hours in the rain alone. She especially likes to do this at night. She is a strong swimmer and occasionally, when she is in a gay mood, she likes to show off her prowess. But her chief love is tennis. Dolores del Rio and Cedric Gibbons play with her often. She is appalled at any suggestion of table games or parlor games.

She likes to talk for hours with cronies like Zœ Akins and Sally Viertel. On these occasions she sometimes sits on the floor, but usually she sprawls on a divan or in a big chair and drinks strong unsugared tea and eats pickles. Dozens and dozens of pickles.

She loves to shop in delicatessens and about three times a week she arrives home laden with large brown paper parcels, filled with odorous smoked fish, cheese, olives, peppers. She is usually proud of her purchases and is childishly pleased if some one sells her a new kind of sausage. Later these purchases accompany her to the studio for her lunch and she frequently sends to the commissary for rye bread and sweet butter to go with them.

The hamper also frequently contains a mystery story, not just the ordinary "whodunit" yarn but something really grisly, well besprinkled with corpses and lots of horror. For some reason these things make her chuckle.

She never misses an important concert, even though she might arrive late, wear dark glasses, sit in an undesirable, because inconspicuous, seat and run like everything down a dark alley afterward to avoid unwelcome attention. She listens to the radio when she thinks of it but she is more likely to listen to her Victrola. She owns an enviable collection of fine records.

When they tore down the building which housed her dressing room at the studio, she was appalled. Afterward she became interested in decorating the new one. It is an astonishing hodgepodge of mulberry draperies, wine-colored upholstery, brown rugs, and tiny gold bands running all about everything. You never saw anything quite like it before. But it is effective and interesting. It doesn't look as if it had been planned. It looks as if it had just happened.

"It is the first room I ever planned," she says, placidly, but with just the merest touch of pride.

Just about then another change came into her life. The famous eight-year-old car really breathed its last. Garbo grieved briefly, sighed, and then bought what she called "a new second-hand car." A car which looked as much like the ponderous old limousine as possible. She is growing used to it, she says.

Somehow the people who really know her well, who are really close to her, simply cannot talk about her. She exerts some amazing personal power over them so that they are completely, almost slavishly devoted to her. But they can't describe her. This applies to hairdressers, taxi drivers who have served her consistently, prop men, as well as to personal friends.

Sensitive and intelligent people who meet her briefly fall under this spell, too. A prominent writer who had occasion to talk to her frequently during the making of a picture was offered a sizable amount of money to write something about her. He consented. The studio approved. The writer bought some new typewriter ribbons and called for his favorite stenographer. Then he just sat (he reports) and looked blank. "I simply can't do it," he notified his editor at last. "There is too much to say about her, and I can't say it well enough, no matter how much you pay me!"

A witty woman writer met her, talked with her and came away to say, in a surprised voice, "I am stimulated. I am inspired. But all that I can tell you is that her long eyelashes are her own."

George Cukor, who directed "Camille," said of her, "She can walk across a set and give every other actress in the world a lesson in grace and poise."

Some one else said, "She can do more to you with one short, quiet line than can many another actress with paragraphs and hysterical dialogue."

Norbert Lusk said, "Remember in Romance," when she said, "Thank you for having loved me?"

I insist that she is a consistent woman. I think the critics agree that she is a consistent actress. But, you know, I like to remember that giggle and to hope that she is using it more and more often.

WHENEVER a door is opened to you, instantly you feel the feminine personality that has created the home.

Joan Crawford has given her heart and her mind to the domicile over which she reigns. Two factors govern her efficient management: love and system. “Love” means the husband’s comfort; whatever he wants whenever he wants it. “System” includes a detailed, orderly supervision of a household. Joan oversees each item, sews, paints, garden furniture, makes rugs.

At the studio a tremolo of drama surrounds her, a driving force which urges expression of her talents.

Joan at home is gentle, mellow, somehow more contented. There she is Mrs. Franchot Tone, hostess and housewife.

To one with a strong hearth instinct, home is the foundation. I see reflected in the movie players’ personalities what home means to each.

Some give to it a sanctified service and are rewarded by health and happiness. Others seem to be just star boarders in elaborate and badly run ménages.

Because her marriage to Franchot has brought her such peace, Joan has erected barriers, a definite picket-fence of attitude keeping out interviewers, press agents, and photographers. Breaking her rule, she takes readers of Picture Play into her home.

A circuitous route leads one to Brentwood Heights, between Beverly Hills and the Pacific Ocean. Beyond a hedged driveway is the two-storied white house of eleven rooms. Joan’s firm handclasp offers welcome.
fireplace flanked on either side by wall book shelves. Walls throughout are of tan, and the chairs are upholstered in beige with tomato-red velvety binding.

At home Joan is most lovely, because there she is frankly herself. Upon her face and arms Old Sol has pecked freckles which, as Mrs. Tone, she disdains to hide by cosmetics. In her black silk frock, besprinkled with perky yellow flowerlets, she leads the way, a serene wife.

William Haines decorated the house in accordance with Joan’s preferences. Blue and white, her favorite colors, predominate. The general aspect immediately informs one that it is the home of a happily married couple. Beauty and restfulness are subtly mingled. One senses that, cupped in that home, are shared hours of understanding, of joy.

In the Tone home guests never are embarrassed by any fretful undercurrent. Mrs. Tone never has to apologize, because she regulates her domicile systematically.

The domestic staff comprises Mary and Axel, cook and butler, Joan’s maid—these three live in the house—a chauffeur and a watchman.

“Calm, competent Mary rules the kitchen,” Joan told me. “She never gets nervous. If I phone at six o’clock and say that I am bringing guests for dinner, it doesn’t upset her. She never complains.”

Franchot pays all home expenses. Joan defrays expenditures of her career: salaries of driver and maid, photos, personal wardrobe.

It costs Franchot forty dollars a week to run the house for utilities and food. If Joan didn’t budget so carefully it probably would be much more.

“Remember, five people eat three meals a day: Franchot, myself, Mary and Axel, and my maid. The chauffeurgardener and the watchman are not domiciled on the premises. We entertain almost every Saturday evening, sometimes ten, again twenty, guests."

Mary phones the grocery orders. Joan checks the daily bills. Laundry? The linens are sent out, Franchot's shirts and Joan's wash dresses and lingerie being done at home. She checks the lists.

Incidentally, Mrs. Tone does not select Mr. Tone's shirts or ties. "I wouldn't dare!" she admitted.

Sunday is inspection day. The mistress is all over the house, and if there were a speck of dust it would not escape her vigilance. But on Sunday she and Mary make an outline of needs, menus, and duties for the following week. Once a month they list requirements to replenish the breakage and deterioration customary in every home, and Joan shops downtown for linens, china, cooking utensils.

"On my last trip to New York," she told me, "I bought a lot of things at Macy's—jelly bowls for individual servings—such things."

"Pardon? Make inventories? Why, Myrtle!" Those large blue eyes blazed, then subsided into a gentle rebuke. "That would be an indirect insult to our employees. However," she added, "if anything were missing, it wouldn't remain a secret from me. I know everything we have. Mary understands that I check bills only because tradesmen often try to charge stars double prices, and I won't stand for that."

Only once did Joan refuse to answer a question.

"The wages we pay our servants?" Voice and eyes poised a reprimand. "I would rather not mention the salaries that we pay our employees. We respect domestic service. It is on honorable way of earning one's living. We wouldn't humiliate our employees in any way."

Mary and Axel have Thursdays free, and alternate Sundays. When they were on vacation the substitute maid became ill with influenza. Mrs. Tone cooked the meals—and nursed the sneezing maid.

Joan writes "This Is To Remind You" notes. Even to Franchot.

"He forgets to thank people for things—gifts, books, nice reviews. He is appreciative, but he hates to write letters. Though he loves his mother dearly, he can't express his

HAIR AND SKIN NEED SPECIAL CARE AFTER THE SUMMER VACA-TION AND DURING THE WINTER.

A wise man once wrote that "genius is only on in-finiten capacity for taking pains." An even wiser woman would have substituted the word "beauty" for "genius" — and she would still have been right.

For truly, beauty is never accidental, but is the result of painstaking care and never-ceasing vigilance. Granted that some girls are born with more regular features — with larger eyes and straighter noses — than others, it's the care they give their hair and skin and teeth that tells the real story of their adult loveliness.

We hear so much about the beauty of the maidens of the South Seas, but what do we ever hear of the women? Nothing, for the satiny skin and lustrous hair of the fifteen-year-old girl are soon lost and at twenty-five, a native woman is old and partially toothless, with dried-out wrinkled skin and hair faded almost to gray.

Why? Because she does not know how to take care of herself! And if care is necessary for the preservation of beauty in the mild and balmy climate of the tropics, where steam heat and smoke and soot are nonexistent, think of how much more essential is care here in our modern towns and cities.

And it's really fine that this is so, for it places the privilege of beauty in our own hands. Once we realize that delusiveness is not an accident, but is the result of simple thought and care, we can't blame any one but ourselves if we don't look well at all times. It's so easy to give ourselves the proper care, anyway. It doesn't require elaborate equipment or more time than the average busy woman can spare, it's only a matter of spending a few moments each day, faithfully, in working on hair and skin to keep them clean and healthy and glowing with fresh young blood, our teeth white and gleaming.

The hair alone is worth every moment you can spend on it. Have you ever stopped to think about what feature, above all others, is noticed first? The hair — and it can make or mar a girl's appearance more forcibly than anything else.

No matter how smooth the complexion, how attractive the make-up, how tasteful the costume, if the hair is stringy and lifeless, a girl looks dull and dowdy. But if hair is vital and alive and shining with sweetly scented freshness, even an otherwise plain girl takes on a glow and is lovely.

Now, as you know, care of the hair really begins with the scalp, which should be white and free from dandruff.
It should also be flexible, or loose, and movable on the skull, so that the blood can circulate freely and feed new strength to the growing hair.

Therefore, the most important single item you must have to keep your scalp in this condition — and also to keep your hair nice and clean between shampoos — is a good brush.

Proper brushing of the hair is really an art, but it's well worth learning. To begin with, the scalp as well as the hair must be swept by the bristles of the brush. To do this, first part the hair and place the brush dawn with its under side along the part. Then, sweep the face of the brush across the part touching the scalp, and continue down the length of the hair. Make another part about an inch from the first one and repeat the entire operation until the whole head has been brushed. And doesn't your scalp tingle and feel fine?

For proper brushing you need a good firm brush that will penetrate through the hair to the scalp and the best one I've ever found is made with serrated, wave-like bristles that pick up each strand of hair and polish it individually.
It's a medium-sized brush and comes with either black or white bristles, in a variety of bobs. Both the white and black bristle brushes are moderate in price, the black costing a bit less than the white ones—and the black bristles are stronger, too.

Beside regular nightly brushing, hair should be given a shampoo every week or ten days. There are three basic types of hair—normal, oily, and dry—and each should have a different kind of shampoo.

To take up dry hair first—for that's what most of us have—the shampoo and treatment created by the famous firm of seven Scotch sisters is one of the finest and is relied upon by smart women all over the world.

This treatment begins with a brisk brushing, of course, then a reconditioning oil is warmed and applied to the scalp with a small piece of cotton. This is thoroughly rubbed in with the hands, then hot towels are wrapped around the head so that the steam will open the pores and allow them to absorb this reconditioning oil.

Next, a warm olive-castile shampoo is poured on the head and is rubbed in with firm fingers. Rinsing is quite important as any soap left on the scalp or hair makes a dull film when dry and this not only looks unattractive, but is harsh and drying to the hair.

After dry hair has been thoroughly rinsed, a special remedy for falling hair and dandruff is applied to the scalp with cotton and this tonic, too, is rubbed firmly into the pores.

For best results with dry hair, the originators of this treatment recommend that the special remedy for falling hair and dandruff be applied every night for a month, then every other night for about two weeks more, and by this time the effects will be in such a healthy condition that a weekly application of the remedy will be sufficient.

These same remarkable hair experts have a tonic for oily hair, too, which should be applied every night for a month. This tonic is compounded of special herbs that regulate the flow of oil until it becomes normal.

I think that oily hair should be shampooed regularly every week, never allowed to go for the ten days that are all right for normal or dry hair. And the best soap for oily hair is a pure olive-castile.

Another trick that is especially good for oily hair is to cover the bristles of the brush used nightly with a thin piece of silk. This fabric will absorb the oil quickly, leaving the hair glossy and soft to touch and to see.

Normal hair does not present the problem that these other types of hair do, yet it's necessary to use care to preserve this normal condition.

The regular brushing, plus frequent massages of the scalp, and regular shampoos of course, will usually do the trick. But it's in selecting her shampoo that the proud possessor of normal hair must be cautious.

For this type of hair, there's a fine foamy oil shampoo which cleanses thoroughly, yet is unlike soap in that it contains no alkali and thus can have no drying effect on the hair. It should be applied directly to the scalp by parting the hair in squares about an inch apart, then when the entire head has been covered, rub this foamy oil in thoroughly and down into the hair.

Only then do you put water on your head and you'll find yourself in a perfect bellow of fluffy bubbles. Yet because this preparation contains no alkali, when you rinse your hair there will be no film on it and it will be soft and shining without need of a lemon or vinegar rinse.

Once your hair is clean and healthy, your next concern is your wave. Of course you have a permanent, unless your hair is naturally curly, and it must be set after every shampoo, into the waves most becoming to your face. And whether you've ever realized it before or not, the lotion with which your wave is set is very important, for a lotion that is too thick or is greasy or takes too long to dry, or leaves a flaky deposit on the hair, can really injure the health of your hair.

Therefore, you want a lotion that is thin, nongreasy, yet effective, and one of the finest is made by a firm whose permanent waves are enjoyed all over the world. This lotion dries quickly, keeps your hair in place for an amazing time, and never, never leaves those horrid white flakes on your hair, to toll on your shoulders and embarrass you.

There is one more item necessary to the well-groomed head. That's a curler for those ends which lose the curl that was set in them usually because they stay from under your shower caps when we are bathing.

To take care of these annoying ends, which can droop and ruin even the loveliest coiffure, there's a small curler that does the trick. Perforated its entire length so that air can circulate freely for easy drying, these curlers with the tiny red ball in the end are no trouble at all to use and turn out grand ringlet curls. Simply moisten your hair, roll it around the curler, clamp it in place and forget it for an hour while you give your face a good "going over." By the time that is done, your hair will be all curled and well-groomed—and you'll be ready to step out with every stray lock in place.

Speaking of this "going over" the face is no joke. Certainly the skin suffers from the heat of the summer, whether it has been actually exposed to the sun on the beach or not. So, with the days and nights getting colder, the skin needs to have its oils replenished to fortify it for the rigors of the winter ahead.

Of course, all skin care begins with cleansing, and I'm a believer in the double-cleanser method—that is, a good cleansing cream plus the regular use of soap and water.

For oily or normal skins, a thorough cleansing with cream at night, followed by soap and water, is usually sufficient. Of course, if you have time to change your make-up during the day, you'll first cleanse your face with cream.

stubborn about it. I feel that a man should make the money and a woman should do her share by helping and guiding him. Actors are tough to live with because they are usually self-centered and egocentric. When fame and success came along, the chances are even less for a fellow to find the right girl. If he doesn't want to marry an actress, he wonders if any other girl would really love him for himself, or just because he is a celebrity. Success makes a fellow suspicious."

And still another day Bob confided, "This may sound conceited but I don't mean it that way.

"Last night I went to a party and the room was filled with women. They sure put a fellow on the spot. You never know whether they are trying to be encouraging, aggressive, flattering or laughing at you because of resentment. It's difficult to know whether to behave like a gentleman and be thought stupid or be aggressive and run the chance of offending.

"They make remarks about my looks. If I make a reasonably good appearance, it just happened that way. I didn't bring it about, so it's nothing that I can take credit for. What they don't know is that it's given me quite an inferiority complex. I never knew if I am being liked just for myself. By trying to hide this complex I often give the impression of being conceited. One of the many reasons why I appreciate Barbara so much is—I know she likes me for myself!"

At another lunch the subject of friendship came up. "Success is a strange thing," Bob mused, "especially when it happens as fast as it did in my case. You look forward to the day when you can associate with the big shots. But once you get in that enviable spot, it doesn't mean so much. They are either interested in you for your career or for other business reasons. They advise you to do all the formula things and make all the formula gestures. You have to choose between what you know to be right and what is said to be good for you. When you actually feel the need of a true friend, invariably you will turn to those you made before you got your chance. And in my case I suffered a disappointment."

"Friends of the old days seemed to think I had changed or were watching for signs of it. I know they have changed and it hurts me deeply. Two of my best friends used to pal around with me. We used to take trips together and each pay his own way. Now if I ask them to go as my guests, because I make so much more and it would be a thrill to take them, they won't come along. When I offered to go dutch, they still held back."

"Finally, they admitted that they were afraid I'd think they only liked me because I make more money. I tried to explain that they are the two people whose friendship means more to me than ever before. But they deprive me of the very thing I want and need most. We can't see each other's point of view."

On the last day I lunched with Bob. He came in quite disturbed. He settled himself, ordered corned beef hash and began to talk.

"Why do people insist that a person live up to what they themselves have created in their minds? Why do they ask if I have discovered some amazing new philosophy or expect me to project some startling new point of view? They're disappointed when I tell them that I still feel and think the same way about most things."

"I had an interview this morning and the woman asked me if I wasn't amused and shocked when I think back on the views and outlook I had on life a year ago. They haven't changed and I told her so. Her face mirrored resentment. I suppose I should have put on an act for her just because she had made up her mind that I would react a certain way. And she wanted to know what I thought of Garbo. When I said I didn't want to talk about Miss Garbo, the woman immediately insisted that I hated Garbo. When I said that I did not she insisted that I must be in love with Garbo. The interview finally ended with the woman telling me whom I liked and disliked. And what I thought and didn't think. Well, at least it was nice of her to let me in on it."

Now, all this might sound as if Bob is taking himself a bit seriously. But mind you, these are all thoughts of the moment—the same thoughts that you or I might have and no one would be a bit interested. Belonging to Robert Taylor they have great interest and are significant of the rapid growth that is inspired by Hollywood success.

Robert Taylor has many other thoughts that are representative of the Bob the world knows and admires. He is pretty much thrilled about his whole career, the comfort and luxury it has allowed him to give his mother, and the absorbing, stimulating nature of his work.

But even a big star is entitled to do a little plain and fancy private thinking. Now you know what Hollywood's number one bachelor thinks about when he's alone—if he ever is.
LABORATORY TESTS on rats were conducted for over three years...

1. We fed rats a diet completely lacking in "skin-vitamin." Their skin grew harsh, dry, scaly—old looking. Under the microscope, the oil glands were dried up, the tissues of the skin were shrunken.

2. Then we applied Pond's new "Skin-vitamin" Creams daily for three weeks. The rats were still on a diet completely lacking in "skin-vitamin" —yet, with just this application of the cream their skin improved. It became smooth again, clear, healthy.

Now—this new Cream brings to Women the active "Skin-Vitamin"
Finally we gave Pond's new "skin-vitamin" Creams to women to try. For four weeks they used the new creams faithfully—women who had been using other creams before. Three out of every four of them asked for more. And these are the things they said: "My skin is so much smoother," "My pores are finer!" "My skin has a livelier look now."

"Lines are disappearing." . .

Exposure is constantly drying the necessary "skin-vitamin" out of the skin. Now, Pond's new "Skin-vitamin" Cream helps to bring it back! If your skin shows signs of deficiency in "skin-vitamin," try Pond's new "skin-vitamin" Cream—today.

Four years ago, scientists first learned that a certain known vitamin heals wounds, burns, infections—quicker and better. They found that certain harsh, dry conditions of the skin are due to insufficient supply of this vitamin in diet. This was not the "sunshine vitamin." Not the orange-juice vitamin. Not "irradiated." But the "skin-vitamin."

This vitamin helps your body to rebuild skin tissue. Aids in keeping skin beautiful.

Of great importance to women

Pond's requested biologists of high standing to study what would be the effects of this "skin-vitamin" when put in Pond's Creams.

For over three years they worked. Their story is told you above. Also the story of the women who used the new Pond's "skin-vitamin" Creams.

Today—we offer you the new Pond's "skin-vitamin" Creams!

In the same Pond's Creams

The new Pond's "skin-vitamin" Creams are the same creams you have always known—with the active "skin-vitamin" added. They are in the same jars, with the same labels—at the same price. You use them the same way you did the old. Now this new ingredient gives added value to the millions of jars of Pond's Creams used by women every year.

Just Among Friends.—Life eddies and swirls around smiling, freckle-faced, red-haired, nimble-footed Jack Whiting like one continuous old-home week.

He hasn’t made pictures in the last four years largely because old friends were always putting on musical comedies in London or New York that looked like fun. And they were.

But now he is off to London to appear opposite Jessie Matthews in “Sailing Along” because Sonia Hale, her husband who produces her pictures, seems like such a clever and likable fellow with practical ideas.

Whiting asked me to meet him at the Gaumont-British office in New York, explaining that his apartment was, at the moment, all giddy and hilarious confusion. Mrs. Whiting, who was the first Mrs. Douglas Fairbanks, was welcoming Doug, Jr., from California and seeing him off to London; her mother and niece who had been visiting them were packing to leave for California; Vera Zarino, who played opposite him in musical comedy in London last winter, was dropping in at odd moments before leaving for Hollywood and a Sam Goldwyn contract.

“She’s a lovely girl, sensitive, beautiful, and magnetic, but not in the least practical. We had to urge her to go into pictures, where she can make big money. She would have gone back to the Ballet Russe, content to be part of a tradition at very little per week.”

He looks forward to working with Jessie Matthews whom he admires tremendously. He’d like to get around to working with some old friends in Hollywood.

Wherever he and Mrs. Whiting settle down, if ever, you can be sure they will be surrounded with friends. Champion negotiators, they give out warmth and encouragement and wise counsel to all camers. And Whiting is just the most refreshing, exuberantly alive entertainer you ever watched. If any one could via with the popularity of Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers, my bets would be on Jessie Matthews and Jack Whiting.

Marlene Launches Fashion.—Leav- ing the train at a suburb and going to the boat heavily guarded, Marlene Dietrich nevertheless was seen by enough fans to dot the streets with copies of her dress within a few days. A safely tailored gray-tan suit with four huge patch pockets, a tiny boot-shaped hat with the brim rolled up all around showing full profile from either side, and a chignon cravat of piercing sage green made her stand out in any crowd.

Miss Dietrich is a fascinating study in contradictions. She pleads with ship-news reporters to consider her just a working girl going away for a hard-earned rest. She goes to the most ingenuous milliner in town and begs him to create additivities for her that will demand attention. This trip her sartorial innovations included a heavy ring that extended up to her wrist and joined a bracelet.

Is "Obey" in Her Contract?—Si- mane Simon had been in Paris only a few days of her promised vacation when a cablegram from 20th Century-Fox summoned her back to Hollywood to appear in the next Walter Winchell-Ben Bernie picture.

She was scheduled to sail on the "Normandie" with Mr. and Mrs. Wil- liam Goetz and seemed docile enough about it. But after the ship steamed out of Havre a note was delivered saying that she was not on board, didn't find it convenient to leave for a while. Incidentally, did you hear the im- personation of Simone done by Beatrice Howell on the Vallée radio hour? Would you want to come back while memory of that still sends people into gales of laughter?

Ballet Ballyhoo.—Sam Goldwyn is so enthusiastic about the dance maneu- vers created by George Balanchine for the "Goldwyn Follies" that he told his guests to shoot the works and bring out the whole troupe from New York that he trained for the Metropolitan Opera.

Included is William Dollar, whose leaps are sensational. You'll think they are tricked when you see them on the screen, but take my word for it, he springs high into the air spontaneously. Don't worry for fear that you are in for a siege of dying swans; Balanchine uses the ballet for satire.

Cross Currents.—Jean Muir is win- ning fame and friends, but no fortune, in a stock company at Suffern, N. Y. . . With all Broadway talking about her great progress in Paramount's "Ex- clusive" and RKO'S "The Toast of New York," Frances Farmer quietly sped through town and up to Mount Kisco to study for her stage début there. . . . After chilling audiences with his ruthless, vicious ambition in "They Won't Forget," Claude Rains lingered in New York long enough to convince people that he personally was a droll and gentle fellow, then retired to his farm at Cheyney, Pennsylvania, to play his favorite vacation rôle, the country squire. . . . Elissa Landi will play an on the New York stage in "Jean," which has been purchased as the first American film vehicle of the charming French Annabelle whom you saw in "Wings of the Morning." . . . Lily Pons had a Connecticut wayside inn rebuilt into a French village for a party. One of the guests was Geraldine Farrar who was eager as any lan to hear Lily tell how singing pictures are made. . . . Mitzi Green made her agent promise to introduce her to James Stewart when she signed her RKO contract.

Nelson Eddy blows the candles on the birthday cake which a group of stars surprised him with recently at the studio.

devotion in written words. His idea of correspondence is a telegram every few weeks."

Joan rises at six thirty if she or Franchot is working; at eight if they share vacation time. While she breakfasts she notes the dinner menu, a reminder the previous evening having made known what she wants in the lunch hamper.

Joan Rules Her Home

Ivory, hand-painted panels. A pine hallway leads to the blue powder-room with its French-red draperies, and to the bar, where cupboards contain mugs and glasses. The refrigerator there is stocked with beer and White Rock. Little drawers pull out, filled with sugar and various ingredients, at hand for Ye Host.

"Franchot spends so much time showing off his bar," Joan laughed, "that he forgets to mix the drinks."

You can't see the library for the books! Shelves of them fill all four walls. A divan and chairs, upholstered in a rust-colored fabric, invite you to sprawl and rest. On a desk are stacks of letters, wires, memos. Even here there are the delicately fluted white vases and ash trays and bowls that Joan loves. And flowers everywhere.

"Like Joan, I have a kitchen complex—may I rave?—shining sinks, dish-washing compartments. An eight-unit, four-oven gas stove. The cooler, with its six tiers of revolving wire baskets for fruit and vegetables.

In one cupboard hong cooking utensils. Plush-lined drawers contain silver. Others are full of fine linens, many monogrammed in blue.

Joan has two full sets of china, one flowery, the other white with blue trim. For formal dinners there are a dozen gold-decorated service plates. The breakfast dishes are cheerful blue and white, as are her precious two dozen Copeland salad plates, gifts from Franchot and from her sister-in-law. There are tea sets from Lynn Riggs and Jean Dixon.

That copacetic soup tureen, surrounded by chubby, smaller bowls, presented the compliments of John Fredericks. Among her sparkling glassware are two dozen crystal sherbets.

The pantry shelves are stocked with preserved fruit and jams. Twice a year Joan orders them from the Preserving Kitchen at San Bernadino. Scooping potato chips from the big corner bin, we move on. Glass jars are neatly labeled: prunes, dried figs, raisins, so on.

"No, I don't buy canned goods by the case," she answered a query. "Six, or sometimes a dozen, to have spores on hand."

The back yard comprises the swimming-pool, the badminton court—and the prosaic clothesline—the Little Theater, where Joan and Franchot run off home movies and rehearse, the bird houses, and the kennels for Jumbo and his two pals, the three great Dones that they found starving and adopted. The pavilion—white, green, and yellow—has two commodious dressing rooms, with showers, and a game room stocked with rackets and other paraphernalia for fun.

Upstairs there are four rooms. Franchot's is done in brown and white, with maple furniture. The guest room is draped in perky blue-and-white gingham pleats—even the canopy over the spool walnut four-poster bed. Joan's small niece has occupied it recently; toys scattered about.

Joan's sitting room has a crisp cheerfulness, with its delicately flowered wall paper, white and blue couch and chairs, and white organdie curtains. A Japanese screen adds subtle color notes.

Franchot's most devoted fan is Joan, as his many photographs indicate. Even on her dressing table are three gold-framed miniatures of Mrs. Tone's favorite actor.

In corners and niches, everywhere, are shelves of books.

Joan's bed, of dark mahogany, canopied with royal blue, stands in one end of a long addition reached through an archway. A huge chest, its drawers full of photographs, occupies the other end.

Baby and Puchchen and the new blessed event—venerable docthuloids—have two beds, one in the dining room, for their daytime siestas, and their night one near Joan's bed. Both baskets have protecting curtains of blue.

Joan's clothes closets! One for suits

Dick Foran spends a day at home with his new bride, the former socialite Ruth Hollingsworth, and seems mighty happy.

"I don't diet any more," she said.

"Really, I eat like a horse. For breakfast fruit or juice, bacon, toast, coffee. Lunch, a thermos of soup, chicken or vegetable salad. Our dinners include consommé, a good cut of meat, vegetables, salad, a sweet."

Joan favors buffet suppers at her parties, so that informality makes people feel more at home. She orders two meats—turkey and ham, for instance. One hot dish, baked beans or macaroni and cheese, provides starches. Salads: vegetable and shrimp. There is a similar choice of dessert. Her meals are well balanced and sensible.

In her home, Mrs. Tone walks in beauty—the loveliness that she has created, and to which she gives grace, surrounds her.

The nucleus of the seven downstairs rooms is the drawing-room, its big windows draped in cream corded-velvet with blue tie-backs. On stands are lovely objets d'art: vases, statuettes. Dresden figurines from Phyllis and Fred Astaire, a tiny sterling tea set from Bob Montgomery. Many are gifts; others exquisite pieces Joan has bought.

A large painting of her hangs on one wall. Photos of friends are framed either in silver or in white.

The dining room walls are chaste and daytime dresses, another for evening tracts. One cedar-lined wardrobe contains her wraps. Five fur coats. A tanned, freckled hand caressed them lovingly.

"I worked too hard to earn my first one to regard a fur without a feeling of awe," Joan said.

On three wide shelves are laid out about fifty bags and purses. Tiers of racks hold sixty pairs of slippers. I gasped.

"My contract stipulates that I furnish my shoes and hosiery."

Joan often washes her own lingerie. Always she mends and presses her clothes. I inquired about the masculine socks.

"I wonder," she mused. "Far over a year and a half I have waited to perform the widely share of darning his socks. He must have been well 'heeled' when we married. Or, as I suspect, he throws them away when a hole appears. Can it be that he chooses to spare the Little Woman's lily-white fingers?" Joan chuckled, glanced at her firm, tanned hands.

One wall of her dressing room is a ceiling-high mirror. In twin alcoves are dressing tables, shelves alongside holding bottles of perfumes. Her comb, brush, and mirror are gold-backed; gloss jars for powder have gold taps. Besides the white bath, there is a glass-inclined shower.

"Must be same job for Mary and Axel, keeping all this white tile clean," I remarked.

"Oh, I pitch in and help. This morning I mopped my dressing room and bathroom," Mrs. Tone admitted gayly.

showed up, but not in the costumes. It seems there are limits even to that merry-merry. But one thing has happened in the costume line, and that is Elaine is making John wear ties nowadays. Comes the revolution!

Mae's Career Over? Hah!—Just one question that seemed to us utterly preposterous was raised when Mae West finally admitted her marriage to Frank Wallace. And wasn't she a long time doing that?

The question? Well, it was asked whether breaking the news would have any effect on her career. We have to laugh at that. Is Mae by any chance the modern little girl with the curl, such as used to exist in the days of Miss Innocence of Movi? We rather doubt it.

As a matter of fact, it wasn't be very long till Mae is seen in another picture. And maybe the Wallace business will even prove good ballyhoo.

Incidentally, this husband of hers is reported interested in a fifty-five share in her $3,000,000 earnings. Well, Mae isn't wanting far money. That is, unless Wallace "wants" very successfully in his legal fight.

"Chans's" Troubled Life.—Rift in the Warner Oland household is about the strangest thing to imagine. Yet there seems little doubt of the differences between this couple who have been married many, many years. Mrs. Oland was in the East for a long time, and on her return stopped at the Beverly Hills Hotel, while Warner remained mostly at his beach home in Carpinteria.

Mrs. Oland was well known at one time for adapting Scandinavian plays to the American theater.

Despite the reported friction, the couple entered many denials concerning a divorce.

The Doctors' Paradise.—Sometimes one feels like asking the question: Are movie people the victims of more ill health than any others? They seem constantly to fall heir to all kinds of ailments, major and minor accidents, and other disasters.

Kay Francis and Joan Blondell were both recently in the hospital for operations. Joan suffered a great deal from neuritis. Just a few weeks before Dick Powell was a victim of intestinal influenza. Glenda Farrell is having gall bladder trouble. Joan Bennett's eyelids were pierced by a small nail scissors, which happened when her eyebrows were being plucked and trimmed. William Powell collapsed on the set of "Double Wedding"—an aftermath of his disturbed condition following Jean Harlow's death. Virginia Bruce was ill for about a week during the filming of—oddly enough—"Wife, Doctor, Nurse." All these things happened within a couple of weeks. Some sort of elixir, toxic, or restorative is sorely needed by film-land.

Nautical Weddings N. G.—That romantic idea of getting married at sea appears to be knocked in the head once and for all.

Tom Brown and Natalie Draper tried this scheme on board a yacht between Wilmington and Catalina Island, but found there was doubt about the legality of the ceremony. Consequently, just to play safe, they had a second wedding.

California, it seems, doesn't give its imprimatur to oceanic nuptials. And now what about Charlie Chaplin and Paulette Goddard, if it's true that they were married while cruising? In a newsreel recently Paulette, by the way, was called Mrs. Chaplin.

Harlow Film Lures Mobs.—Nothing in ages in the show world of Hollywood and Los Angeles has been quite such a sensation as the Jean Harlow picture, "Saratoga." One wonders at the peculiar interest of the public in this production, which seemed some-thing more than mere morbid curiosity. It looked as if real sentiment were displayed for Jean by the picture-seers, who enjayed themselves at the showing and who were also curious to determine what scenes Mary Dees had played in doubling for Jean.

These scenes toward the close of the film are not difficult to detect, though there is never a real close-up of Miss Dees's face.

We wonder, incidentally, how long that seven-year contract she has with MGM will last.

Architectural Headache.—Ramon Novarro, who'll soon be seen on the screen again in "The Sheikh Steps Out," is the owner of a tappy-turvy house. It's the puzzle of the world to his friends.

Located on a sharply slanting hill, it was used to be entered a year or so ago from the base thereof. Now you make your way into the identical domicile from the top instead of the bottom. Each entrance is on an entirely different street, and a number of people were so loaded that they thought Ramon had two mansions in the district.

With a high-strung lad like Tyrone, that sounds risky. But I believed that an adult should be clever enough to lead a child into making the proper decisions so that in time, taking the proper course would become second nature. I've never regretted that method of giving advice and letting the child decide for himself. I merely showed both sides of the picture and let Tyrone take his choice. Of course I tried to be adroit enough so that the wrong thing did not offer as attractive a picture as the right thing, and as his ability to reason grew so did his logic until he could be depended upon to make the right decision from an impartial discussion of facts. "Every mother must go through that Age of Intolerance, when the child knows everything and you know very little. This lasted about six months with Tyrone, and I was hard put to grapple with the problem. I met it by deferring to his wishes and judgment, and let him air his views freely. "When, at seventeen, he determined to start out on his own, other mothers asked if I were not afraid to let him go. "'No,' I said, 'because I am so well acquainted with my son. He has never failed me, and so I have confidence in him. If I've guided him properly, I have nothing to fear; if not, I should find guidance elsewhere.'" Mrs. Power's confidence in her son was well placed. An astonishing success has not gone to his head. mains unusually poised and bold. The training and advice she has given him counted well when he had to shoulder the weight of his rôle in "Little London" on his young shoulders. He turned with astonishing ease and drama to farce in "Love Is News." "Café Metropole" there was an improvement in technique, and in nature with Sonja Henie, "Thin Ice" marked maturity. "In one short year," remarked Mrs. Power, "he has grown from youth to manhood. Looking over his past the other day that fact was a home to me. Those first skills showed boy; now they reveal a man. It is greatest pleasure to see how completely he has found himself." There remains but one more note of importance in our discussion mother's advice to her son. What should Mrs. Power tell Tyrone about romance? When I asked her how she made artistry from beginning to end, with an elegance and precision not often encountered. It takes place in Vienna, London, Paris, and St. Petersburg when the century was young and settings and costumes were graceful, curving, and intriguing was polite rather than passionate. William Powell and Luise Rainer are rival spies. He is intrusted with the delicate task of delivering a pair of magnificent can­delabra to a Russian princess, but before he can start on his mission Prince Johann changes his mind and asks Miss Rainer to deliver the candlesticks. Mr. Powell already has placed a message in the secret compartment of one candelabrum and Miss Rainer has utilized the other for the same purpose. Then the ornaments are stolen, each concealing what the rival spies value most. The search brings clashes, deception, defeat, victory and love to the two in a brilliant exhibition of acting.

“New Faces of 1937”—RKO. The title is a misnomer since Joe Penner, Parkyakarkus, Jerome Cowan, and Milton Berle have the leading roles. Only Mr. Berle is new to the screen. It is all right with me if he remains a stranger from now on, but I doubt if this will be possible due to his tremendous energy. He and his associate comedians romp through a top-heavy musical which lacks the freshness expected of the title. There are plenty of newcomers but they are mostly in specialty acts glimpsed only briefly. Ann Miller, a tap dancer, is excellent; an unnamed young man who nomenclatizes an act called “A Lady Undressing for a Bath” is unusual and funny. The plot is all about the harrowing difficulties of putting on a Broadway show, and it doesn’t seem to matter. However, the picture has an effective climax, a big number called “Peckin'”, in which principals and chorus sing and dance through changing scenes while their heads imitate the motions of pecking chickens. It is silly but infectious. Harriet Hilliard is a charming heroine.

“Easy Living”—Paramount. Rol­licking comedy is just that the dish that Edward Arnold, Jean Arthur, and Ray Milland devour with zest. You would think none of them had ever played a serious role, that all their professional lives had been monkeyshines. Their picture is gay, goofy, continuously laughable. Mr. Arnold plunges head­long down the marble stairway of his mansion. “You’re down early for breakfast, sir,” stilly remarks the butler. He quarrels with his wife and tosses a fur coat out of the window. It lands on the head of a poor girl in a bus. This unlikely accident starts her madly on a series of adventures based on the premise that she is the mistress of Mr. Arnold whose name she doesn’t even know. Because of this fancied relationship she is forced to move out of her seven-dollar-a­week room to a magnificent hotel suite. Meanwhile she has met a care­free young man acting as busboy in an automat restaurant and he becomes mixed up in her affairs. Of course he is Mr. Arnold’s flippant son and Miss Arthur marries into the family of the millionaire after all. The picture gains from luxurious settings, careful direction that extracts the last drop of humor from everything, and the splen­did acting of the stars. It is all dizzy and delightful.

“The Hoosier Schoolboy”—Mon­ogram. A simple, human story stars Mickey Rooney, one of the screen’s finest and youngest actors. Evidences of hasty production rob the picture and Master Mickey of utmost effec­tiveness, but it is vigorous, direct enter­tainment with plenty of family appeal, if you know what that is and aren’t scared away by wholesomeness. It seems that Mickey is the town’s outcast, an incorrigible who forever carries a chip on his shoulder and is ready to fight to a draw on the least provocation. His provocation is great because of his father, a shell-shocked veteran of the World War who finds consolation in drink. A sympathetic school­teacher takes an interest in "Exclusive."—Paramount. Another newspaper story is just that, although this one has the advantage—and adorn-ment—of Frances Farmer, Fred MacMurray, Lloyd Nolan, and Charlie Ruggles, a quartet of no mean accomplishments and strength. Miss Farmer has a far more realistic and attractive rôle than in "The Toast of New York." She makes the most of it. But the story, although written by an honest-to-goodness newspaperman, is strangely similar to others, perhaps because the author formerly was a film critic. His picture is lively, the dialogue excellent and the acting first class. The doings, however, are entirely too luridly melodramatic. A racketeer acquitted by a jury takes over a newspaper for the purpose of ruining his enemies. He does so by means of yellow journalism, scandal-mongering, and traffic with the underworld. The spectator is asked to be especially concerned when Miss Farmer, a reporter, goes to work for the bad newspaper over the protests of her father, an old newspaperman, and her fiancé, Mr. MacMurray, of the conserva-tive paper.

"King of Gamblers."—Paramount. Here is an excellent underworld melodrama. It has every quality required for a good show—speed, bold characterizations, snappy dialogue and legitimate drama. Nothing in it will bowl you over on the strength of novelty, but everything in the dish is pungent and is thoroughly mixed and blended. An unpretentious picture, it is one of the most entertaining of the month. The cast is top-notch, too. The Russian Akim Tamiroff grows more commanding—and more fascinating as he grows in skill. He is a bad racketeer here, Claire Trevor is the singing star of his night club who repulses him—up to a certain point—and Lloyd Nolan is a newspaper reporter who accidentally happens upon a clue that leads to Mr. Tamiroff's undoing. Miss Trevor gives a splendid performance, Mr. Nolan likewise, and we are given a glimpse of another fine artist who has long been absent from the screen—Evelyn Brent. She is eloquent and moving in her brief portrait of a woman broken by the underworld.

"Two Who Dared."—Grand Na-tional. Anna Sten disappoints in the picture directed by her husband, Eugen Frenke, in London. It is handsome but empty. The same is true of Miss Sten's performance. Her magnificent talent as an actress is strangely muted into mere prettiness. It is beyond me to tell why. But her lapse reminds me of Hollywood's preoccupation with looks while the spirit of a rôle is allowed to languish. In this picture the star has an expert cameraman and that is all. The simplicity, earthiness and poignance that are inherent qualities in the actress are only sensed now and then. Of course the turgid story could hardly be expected to bring out the fineness of any star. Miss Sten does justice to the situa-tions but they are only "situations" drained of everything except theatricality. She is a frolicksome Russian adventuress who flirts with Captain Henry Wilcoxon, about to enter into a love-

Hollywood frequently sees James Stewart and Virginia Bruce together at night spots, but a picture of them lunching in the studio café is rare.

Foundations of Beauty

But for dry skin, it's well to supplement this nightly routine with a brief cream-cleansing every morning.

For this purpose, there's a fine new oil-purpose cream that cleanses, refines, and softens the skin at the same time. It is as light and fluffy as the chiffon for which it is named. Not as heavy as a cold cream, nor as light as a liquefying one, this cream is easily absorbed, it penetrates the pores and routes out dirt and leaves no greasy residue after it has been removed. It is especially recommended for dry, sensitive skins.

On the other hand, the oily skin often fares best if a liquefying cleansing cream is used, and one of the finest of this type is almost unbelievably modest in price.

When it comes to choosing a soap for your face, you can't be too careful. As you want one that is a penetrating cleanser, yet is gentle enough not to burn the delicate tissues of the skin. Such a fine, gentle soap is the one made from pure palm and olive oils, blended into a mild, bland soap that gently cleanses every type of skin without possibility of harming it.

For regular nightly use, this soap should be applied with a soft cloth, then with the fingers work the lather gently into the skin. A thorough—and I mean thorough—rinsing with warm water, then with cold, will leave your face alive and tingling, and pink with health.

Once your face is cleansed with cream and soap, it should be "toned" before make-up is applied. By "toned" I mean given something that will close the pores and thus keep out dirt and grime. For this purpose, one of the finest products I've ever seen is the combined toning liquid, foundation and powder combined. It comes in a variety of shades and the application of this pleasantly scented liquid will close your pores, give you a fine foundation and a smooth, velvety-like dusting of powder.

A last word—but an important one—don't forget your teeth when you're planning your beauty care.

For a long time, the makers of one of the finest toothpastes recommended that we massage our gums with our fingers when we brushed our teeth, but at last they have come forward with an even easier method. They have designed a toothbrush with a handle that almost does the gum massage by itself. Honestly!

If you'll use this brush faithfully with the special toothpaste that fathered it, and which contains special brightening ingredients, and if you'll take a few moments when you're through brushing to rub a bit of the toothpaste into your gums with your finger, you'll have teeth that a movie star would envy.

Why Stars Fade Out

example of what happens when some one opposes his opinion to theirs. Anyhow, it's safe to say that the title of "Gorgeous" will be its only concession to conventional Hollywood technique.

As I come to the end of a story which saddens me more than it does you, it occurs to me that I may not have answered the question which probably interests you most. I have told you what I think are the reasons for the downfall of many stars. But can they come back? Will we ever see again the magnetic Auster, the gayety and spirit of Clara Bow, the high splendor that is Swanson?

The answer is only a question mark. Perhaps those of our old favorites who still struggle to come back always have a chance; the movies are one. But for the rest—well, silence.

For "beautiful, bright, busy Hollywood" and its gay and restless demimondaines are cruel in their way. A star who has been away from Hollywood for even one year might just as well be dead.

"The rôle of Lt. Pinkerton in 'Madame Butterfly' is the only part in opera where the tenor smokes a cigarette on the stage. As I sing the aria, 'Amore O Grillo', I smoke—and it's always a Lucky. You see, I discovered long ago that Luckies are a light smoke—gentle on my throat—and my throat is naturally my first concern. I have smoked about a pack of Luckies a day ever since 1920."

No one ever noticed Bill, until....

YOU'VE GOT TO INVITE BILL SMITH TO YOUR PARTY...JIM BROUGHT HIM OVER LAST NIGHT AND HE PLAYS THE PIANO MARVELOUSLY

BILL SMITH? I NEVER KNEW HE PLAYED...HE'S ALWAYS SO QUIET I'VE HARDLY NOTICED HIM...I WONDER HOW HE LEARNED

LET MUSIC MAKE YOU POPULAR
it's easy to learn this "short cut" way

ONLY a few short months ago, Bill was no one at all. Now everyone notices him. He is always in demand—always invited to parties—the center of attraction wherever he goes.

How it Happened
The big chance in Bill's life began at Don Webster's party and quite by accident, too. At the last minute Jim Barnes called up and asked Bill to come along, as they needed an extra man.

As the party got under way, Bill took his usual place in the corner. But this time he had a strange grip on his feet—a smile half smirked, half determined. "What's Bill nicknaming about?" someone whispered. "There's nothing funny about a party without our piano player.

But's face flushed. "I'm sorry, folks, but Dave Gordon, our pianist, couldn't come. Isn't there someone here who can play?"

For a moment no one an swered. Then suddenly Bill rose, strode to the piano. "Do you mind if I play," he said.

Everyone burst out laughing. "What's Bill doing? Trying to make a fool of himself?" some one asked. But Bill pretended not to hear.

As he struck the first few chords, everyone leaned forward spellbound. For Bill was playing as Dave Gordon had never played. Playing with the fire and soul of an inspired musician, everyone sat in awe and silence until the last dreamy chord had died away. In a moment Bill was the center of an adoring throng. In answer to their eager questions he told them how he had always wanted to play, but never had the time, or the money, to realize his ambition. And then one day he read about the wonderful U. S. School of Music course, and how almost any one could learn, at home, without a teacher, and at a fraction of the cost of ordinary old-fashioned methods. "That day," said Bill, "was a lucky day for me. I went for the course, and when it arrived, I was amazed. I never dreamed that learning music could be so easy. The course was as much fun as a game, and in a few short months I had mastered some of the most popular pieces. That's the whole secret. There's no mystery about it. Learning to play is actually as easy as A-B-C, this 'short cut' way."

This story is typical of thousands who have found this easy way to popularity and good times. If you have always wanted to play, but have the notion that learning music requires years of practice, and expensive teachers, here is your opportunity. You can learn to play your favorite instrument, this easy as A-B-C, this 'short cut' way.

No Special Talent Needed
You don't need any special musical ability to play. If you can learn a tune, you can learn to play your favorite instrument, this easy as A-B-C way. The secret lies in the amazing print and picture method perfected by the U. S. School of Music. With this simplified, "short-cut" system you are first told how a thing is done, then an illustration shows you how, and then you play it and hear it. Studying is fun and in a surprisingly short time, you are playing real pieces—classical music—popular songs—and dance music, by actual note.

Popularity Insured
Think how surprised your friends will be when you sit down at the piano, and sweep easily from a lazy waltz to a syncopated foxtrot. How they'll crowd around you wondering how you did it. No more dull moments for you. You'll be the center of attraction at every party.

FREE BOOKLET AND DEMONSTRATION LESSON
In order that you may see how really simple and easy this course is, the U. S. School of Music will send you a free demonstration lesson and explanatory booklet. No matter what instrument you want to play, the booklet will show you the easiest and simplest principles on which the course is based, and it will enable you to become a popular musician in a short time—and at a cost of only a few cents a day.

If you have always envied people who played, if you have always wished that you might entertain your friends with their favorite melody—fill in and mail the coupon below. Don't delay. Act at once. You'll not be obligated in any way. Instruments supplied when needed, cash on credit. U. S. School of Music, 5311 Brunswick Bldg., New York City, N. Y.

Since when have Mr. Flynn’s "limited talents" been put across by a "catch phrase"? He put himself across when he gave us "Captain Blood!" Such a remarkable performance from an unknown drew plenty of attention. Here was a man that was different. He’d been places, he’d seen and done things that made the rest of Hollywood look like cream puffs! Catch phrase, indeed!

The writer also goes on to explain that in view of everything, Mr. Flynn does not even overshadow two lesser players, one of whom I never knew existed. What a comparison he made there!

Another writer accuses Mr. Flynn of continually threatening to "abandon civilization to its fate and return to jungle life." Such a statement can easily be misunderstood. Unless one’s life has been lived at a pace such as Mr. Flynn’s, it would not be possible to understand this. However, Mr. Flynn found out early that the glamour of picture-making soon wears away.

I also wish to express my displeasure concerning Mr. Flynn’s pictures. I lay my blame not wholly on his studio, but on Mr. Flynn as well. Through "The Charge of the Light Brigade" there was a trace of conceit, through "Green Light" it became much too noticeable, and through "The Prince and the Pauper" he dashed about as though it were a Twentieth Century masquerade. Evidently his success struck at one place—his head. But still I can pass this fact by—after all, we’re all human. But any one in his position and ten to one the same thing will happen. But I will say that he improved considerably in "Another Dawn." If Kay Francis had been less ridiculous in her emoting, the picture would have been worth seeing.

I know that to wait for another picture with the thrills, splendid acting, and meaty part that "Captain Blood" offered, is to wait in vain. But still there is the rarest possibility of Warners becoming aware of the fact that there are still more Sabatini stories, a "Robin Hood" running around loose, and best of all, Mr. Flynn’s own life story, that have not yet been filmed.

But until then, and ever after, Errol Flynn will continue to be my favorite star because he’s still "Captain Blood" to me.

There’s a Reason.

Ellen Hendrickson, there is nothing wrong with the make-up men of Hollywood. It’s just that you don’t seem to realize the difficulty some of the make-up artists meet in trying to make an unattractive actress appealing to the public.

You must remember no make-up artist will plaster any movie actress with make-up for no reason whatsoever. Why is it that Jean Parker, Maureen O’Sullivan, and many others aren’t paint-boxed like Marlene Dietrich, Mae West, Carole Lombard, et cetera? Because they are the ones who have natural beauty and don’t need improvement.

You talk as though you are some sort of beautician. Well, if you are, why don’t you go to Hollywood to beautify

A Misunderstood Man.

After reading various letters and articles in Picture Play, I have decided to rebel against a few of the ungracious remarks tossed at Errol Flynn.

I have been a Flynn fan from the very beginning. I have watched his career skyrocket to stardom from his very first picture, "Captain Blood." Yet, one very intelligent writer has remarked as quoted: "The studio has coined ‘cinema’s man of the hour’ as a catch phrase to put across the limited talents of Errol Flynn."
What the Fans Think

Strong Superlatives.

For the benefit of Norma Reichstadt and Elizabeth Kultala, I want to quote what "Musical America," one of the leading music periodicals said of Jeanette MacDonald when reviewing "Rose-Marie": "One wonders why she is not actually in opera. Many far less well endowed are doing great things in the lyric theater."

Both Miss Reichstadt and Miss Kultala seem to labor under the common delusion that every opera singer must have an enormous voice. For some roles, yes, but not for all. Many of the most popular operas, such as "La Bohème," "Manon," "Romeo and Juliet," "Pagliacci," and others, have leading soprano roles written for the light soprano voice of the type possessed by Miss MacDonald, Grace Moore, Mary Lewis, Natalie Bodanya, and other well-known lyric sopranos. A large, dramatic soprano voice such as that of Kirsten Flagstad, or Rosa Ponselle, is required for heavier roles. Certainly any one with any knowledge of music must admit that Jeanette MacDonald's voice is the equal of any of those mentioned above.

The movies should, however, be more careful of the music given the stars to sing. Some years ago, in "Oh! For a Man!" Jeanette was represented as singing the rôle of Isolde, which she could never do in real life. Similarly, Grace Moore, in "Jenny Lind," appeared as Norma, a rôle which would be utterly beyond her.

I am thankful that Picture Play's writers do not fall into the popular error of labeling the various singers in pictures as "greatest of their generation," et cetera. Recently a writer in another magazine declared that music critics have hailed Grace Moore's voice as the greatest dramatic soprano of her generation. Miss Moore is a lyric soprano, and I have yet to hear of a critic who called her great. When she made her London début, the critics were practically unanimous in dismissing her as a singer of trivial gifts. "No vocal style to compare with her illustrious predecessors"—"untidy phrasing"—such was the verdict on Miss Moore. Those same London critics, when Lily Pons first sang at Covent Garden, mentioned at least two other modern coloraturas as her superiors. Certainly Miss Pons is not to be compared with such great singers as Melba, Tetrazzini, Galli-Curci in her prime.

The truth is, of course, that so far the screen has presented, in full-length films, only two first-class voices—those of Lawrence Tibbett and Nelson Eddy. Nino Martini of the small voice which has been improved by movie technicians: Gladys Swarthout, who sung only secondary roles at the Metropolitan until after her film success—they are not great. What will the critics who regard Moore and Swarthout as great say, when, in "The Big Broadcast of 1938," they hear Kirsten Flagstad, possessor of one of the two greatest soprano voices of our time?

Less Drama.

I NOTICE in the July issue that some fan writes in to advise the lady who described Fredric March as a "colorless personality" to attend some good dramatic school "for diversion."

Having had a little experience with such a school, I privately believe that an overdose of dramatics is exactly why Mr. March is colorless. Also, why the press-agented "great" Garbo, Gables, Howard, and Hepburns continually find themselves eclipsed in popular favor by the supremely well-disciplined singing artists, the Taylors, Temples, and Ginger Rogers.

Naturally, a certain amount of dramatic coaching is necessary, but that sort of thing belongs on the stage, if it belongs anywhere. It becomes more ridiculous than otherwise when attempted in films, since the action appears as near to you as your own living room. To teach a screen player to "act" is to make an imitator and a puppet of him and rob him of spontaneity. Practically every living person has either experienced actual drama or seen it take place and the average movie fan is quick to perceive the sham—or isn't it ham?—attitude-striking and self-conscious speech of the above-named dramatic specialists. They are incapable of exhibiting any natural mood or reaction common to humanity because they have been trained to "act" them all down. Their curriculum consists of three parts, Pose, Posing, and Posed. Watch them in one performance and you have seen them in all. Dramatics, indeed!

I have never wanted to see stage stars brought to the screen or screen stars re-formed into stage actors. I deeply appreciated Norbert Lusk's editorial of some time ago where he said that both stage and screen acting is legitimate, but each in its own niche. I and my family are frequent movie-goers and we get to New York once a year. To us, Helen Hayes was just about as great a flop on the screen as was Hepburn on the stage.

We consider Nelson Eddy and Jeanette MacDonald, Eddy in particular, two of the most convincing and intelligent actors in pictures. They use no artifices, but identify themselves with the roles they play so thoroughly as to make them unforgettable. Robert Taylor was all that saved "Camille" from oblivion. Hepburn and March, unfortunately, had no saviors for "Mary of Scotland." Gable usually has such good support that his pictures click. Leslie Howard nearly ruined "Romeo and Juliet," but Fredric March simply buried "Anthony Adverse" beyond hope of resurrection. Less drama and more intelligent presentation, please!

What the Fans Think

Argument is always interesting and stimulating if it can be managed without amusment. Personally, I dislike the letters which attack the players. I really don't wonder that many fans spring to the defense of their favorites in such cases, and yet why be so hitter toward the stranger who has written the letter? So much bitterness creeps into letters that it's not only amazing, it's horrible. In a country where we can say anything we please I suppose if we choose to battle about movie players and with strangers on the subject, we may if we wish. But when it's uncalled for, why do so? Why write in and say "I hate and despise and loathe a certain star?"

A Star in the Heavens.

I AM disappointed that hardly any fan has written about my favorite actor, Errol Flynn. Or perhaps letters have been written and not published for some reason or other. I am inclined to believe the latter, for who doesn't like this superb actor?

Errol Flynn is a grand, refreshing personality that makes all his pictures "tops." To me and his fans, he is a shining star in the heavens that represents everything that is to be enjoyed in life. Dauntless, adventurous, handsome, brave, and a character built from experience. A world rover, experienced in everything that a real man does.

Who can forget the amiable Mr. Flynn of all his successes, especially "Charge of the Light Brigade," the performance of this Irish lad will remain forever as splendid.

Here's a hint for producers. Why not star Errol Flynn in a dashing Technicolor role? That would be a grand movie. I should like to see him cast with Maureen O'Sullivan. What a grand team that would be.

A FLYNN FAN.

Boston, Massachusetts.

Not Better Than Nelson Eddy.

I AM not in the habit of writing fan letters, but I could not help giving my opinion when I read something written by "One Loyal Fan" under the title of "A FLYNN FAN."

About the most untrue thing I have ever read is this: "All of Jeanette MacDonald's leading men become merely part of the background. She's never played with a male equal."

Miss MacDonald's most frequent leading man is Nelson Eddy and if you do not think he is equal to, let alone surpassing, Jeanette, then the whole world must be wrong—and you are right! If you ever heard Miss MacDonald sing over the radio you would know that she is no great singer, ignoring the fact that she is ready for Metropolitan, so many insist. True, she may not have a voice for radio and radio sound harsh and unnatural, but is that any reason why she should sing off-key, miss the high notes, and waver when she should not?

I do not especially dislike Jeanette. On the contrary, I think she is a fine actress, and nice-looking, but I have never heard one person rate her higher than Nelson Eddy.

I enjoy her teamed with Mr. Eddy, and as long as the studio can fix her voice, by having her sing the song many times and choosing the best parts from each, I will continue to enjoy her. Never, however, will I recognize her as being better in any way than Nelson Eddy. She is merely a background.

Immortal Garbo.

MY sympathy to "One Loyal Fan" who made that nasty crack about Dietrich and the screen's great actress Garbo being dead. After eleven years experience you still can't sense great acting! No doubt you saw the soul-stirring and tragic beauty of "Camille" and are still laboring under the haunting death scene. Oh, no, she isn't dead, but very much alive and will be long after the breath has left her body.

It would be a splendid idea if you self-appointed executioners would lay your hatchets aside and with us who have come to love this great star as she is, faults and all, thank God for the privilege of being able to sit in the audience and marvel and thrill with one who is destined for immortality.

I would also like to remind E. T. C. who was so concerned about Robert Taylor's health as Armand, that love is still the greatest force in life and no germ is deadly enough to prevent two people who are really in love from kissing each other.

As for Garbo being fit for a sanitarium, please remember that there are many who would consider themselves favored to be under the same roof with her. But why worry over trifles? There
What the Fans Think

Eldorado, you had better keep your suggestions to yourself. We who have seen Nelson play opposite Jeanette MacDonald in "Naughty Marietta," "Rose-Marie," and "Maytime" have been more than pleased with his grand performances.

All Nelson's fans are anticipating "The Girl of the Golden West," again opposite Miss MacDonald. No hoot owl by the name of Martini can deprecate Nelson Eddy of his great achievements or any of his fans.

Blame the Secretary.

JULIETTE LAINE deserves a medal for her article in August Picture Play entitled "The Secretary Menace."

I love the old show business because I have been spouting words behind footlights for fifteen years and certainly harbor no illusions about actors, but I make it a point to gather opinions of people of all ages. Many would love to write to their favorite star, but for some reason they are ashamed for their friends will think them saps. Naturally, I who want to write to a "two-bit" secretary who won't even read your letter, much less answer it!

Having had the bad taste to write only three fan letters in my life, I do want to give credit to one charming person who answered a letter of congratulation. I wrote him and he answered the same week. Then I have a friend who received a reply a short time ago to a letter she had written him a year ago. The star is Francis Lederer. Needless to say, we feel a deep respect for one who is so thoughtful. My other two letters were to Rosalind Russell and Nelson Eddy. Neither replied but probably

The Danger of Being "Typed."

The exquisite artistry of Luise Rainer is distinctly above all others, even Garbo's. Her interpretation of the depressed O-lan in "The Good Earth" reached a plane of exceptional merit. I hope the producers will let her escape the danger of being "typed" as she is a versatile actress and will always be successful in roles requiring the utmost skill, delicacy, and tenderness. In "The Great Gatsby" and "Essence" she was gay and exuberant as spring itself. She is a born actress with rare potentialities.

Robert Montgomery gave a performance of masterly subtlety in "Night Must Fall," yet for all his fine acting I would not want to see him cast too often in roles like that. Mr. Montgomery is a versatile actor and will always be interesting to audiences as long as he plays versatile characters.

Mynor Loy is exquisite both in acting and appearance. Yet I happen to hear audiences remarking how tiresome she is becoming. Why? Because MGM has her typed as a modern sophisticate which is just as dangerous as were her exotic Orientals. "Parnell" will be a welcome relief to Loy fans.

Clark Gable is one actor who is always interesting because he is so versatile. He would be magnificent as Rhett Butler in "Gone With the Wind." He is a man who combines those rare traits of true artistry and hard common sense.

William Powell is another actor who is artistic in his finger tips but never arty. I believe the secret of his interpretations lies in the fact that he has the power to sway us with his compelling magnetism. It is marvelous to watch the curtain of his immobility lift in a lightning flash when emotion surges into his face.

Hoot Owl Martinis.

In my opinion, Nelson Eddy doesn't need anyone to defend him because his wonderful voice and his good acting do it for him. In the June issue Mildred Post called Nelson Eddy an "animated dummy." Mr. Eddy is a truly great artist, but the main trouble is some people are too ignorant to appreciate a good singer and actor when they see and hear one. If you don't have any better suggestion than having Nina Martini co-star with the lovely Jeanette MacDon-
What the Fans Think

Through no fault of theirs except their choice of secretaries.

Thanks for Picture Play's candid articles and the extensive space given to fan letters. There's more intelligent criticism there than I ever hoped to see in print. Marie Dupree. San Angelo, Texas.

Simone's Accent Soothing.

I am writing this in reply to the unbelievably stupid letters of Mrs. W. G. Bassett and Martha Posey. The seemingly uneducated people that denounce Simone Simon's accent just show that they have never studied French. It is always wise to broaden one's vocabulary by a few foreign words and it must be only the middle classes who can't appreciate the beautiful rolling of her "r's." It is a voice like that of Eleanor Whitney's that is unbearable. I advise Miss Posey and Mrs. Bassett to take a course in French.

As for Miss Simon's acting, is there any American actress who could have done her work in "Girls' Dormitory"? She has a rare freshness and beauty that are seldom seen and her accent is soothing. America would certainly look ridiculous if it prohibited great foreign actresses because of a few badly conditioned fans. Audrey Nabiss. Baltimore, Maryland.

Victims of Make-up.

The sentiments expressed by Ellen Hendrickson with regard to make-up men are unfortunately very true. These experts have disfigured some very beautiful women, notably Madeleine Carroll, who appear to be the victims of some conspiracy to make them look alike. As a result, we get such appalling jobs as that inflicted upon Miss Carroll in "On the Avenue" and "Lloyd's of London," wherein her naturally blond hair was lightened to the point of harsh, platinum artificiality, her lips greatly over-painted and, to cap it all, she was photographed under excessively strong lights, which obscured the lines of her face.

I worked for Gaumont-British in 1935 while Miss Carroll was making "The Thirty-nine Steps." She wore a minimum of make-up at that time and looked refreshingly natural, British and lovely. The blame for her metamorphosis clearly lies with the Hollywood people and their mistaken notions about glamour.

I hope Ellen Hendrickson's letter has been brought to the attention of some responsible person on the Coast and that these mistakes will not be repeated. G. Thorekelsen. New York, N. Y.

Not Fair to Nelson Eddy.

Whole-heartedly do I join in protesting MGM's neglect of Nelson Eddy, both in singing and acting. "Rose-Marie" was disappointing to those of us who wanted to see and hear the great star of "Naughty Marietta," but we were patient and hoped for and expected satisfaction in "Maytime." This was even worse; not only was his voice completely ignored, but no effort was made to photograph him properly or give him his fair share of close-ups. John Barrymore occupied more film footage than Eddy, the costar! Whatever motive his studio has for this lack of consideration of his fans, I know it cannot be failing interest on the part of the public. It is no press agent's tale that thousands return to see his films time after time; that he maintains a huge volume of fan mail; that he ranks tops in radio entertainment; that he packs to the utmost hitherto uncrowded concert halls; that he inspires unusual loyalty and devotion among the members of his numerous fan clubs who work with constant zeal just to show extra admiration for the golden singer. I know, for I belong to two clubs! The songs he sings become instantly popular. The very first day "Maytime" was shown here every copy of the sweet-heart song was sold out by all the local music dealers. Last year I visited the Texas Centennial and wandered into a hall where a great electric organ was being played in hourly concerts, the numbers being requested by the passing crowds. The organist said about one out of every three listeners either called for "Sweet Mystery of Life" or "The Indian Love Call."

That Nelson Eddy has raised the standard of music appreciation in this country is unquestioned. His voice has the requirements of the best books—it makes us laugh, cry, or think. Perhaps we cannot yet think of being hungry for grand opera, but we are able to think back with a shuddler that we once endured the Crosbys, the Valentins, the Langfords, Fayes, and Hilliards without a murmur.

Nelson does not rely upon his Prince Charming looks and manners, nor the natural quality of his voice to put him across, either. One of the things most frequently commented upon is the evidence of masculine efficiency and application that is revealed in perfect diction, mastery of dialects and foreign languages and everything that goes to make his life a story of accomplishment. A star well worth starring, and that's what I'm praying for! Mrs. Grace Stoval. Gardendale, Texas.

Frances Gifford showed great promise in "New Faces of 1937" and was immediately cast in RKO's "Stage Door."

Novarro's Back!

Three cheers and a huzzah! In August Picture Play, Norbert Lusk informs us that Ramon Novarro is coming back to the screen. I can hardly wait to see him. The title of his picture, "The Sheikh Steps Out" doesn't sound promising, but it will be so nice to see him again that the picture won't matter very much, really.

Mr. Novarro is one of the best actors the screen has known and beside him the Taylors and Montgomerys and Taylors just don't show. He is so appealing and has such a lovely voice. I never could understand how it took Hollywood so long to realize that they needed Novarro back. I only hope that he will remain with us for a long time now. Good luck and the best of everything to you, Ramon Novarro. Your fans haven't forgotten you and never will.

Tim Holt, son of the veteran Hollywood star, Jack Holt, is making a name for himself on his own. Having made a good impression in "Stella Dallas," he gets his biggest opportunity to date in "I Met My Love Again."
ALL the world knows that Robert Taylor is in England making the film "A Yank at Oxford." Mobbed in New York when his vessel sailed, he was greeted by an equally disorderly crowd on his arrival in London. The time has long since passed when the British public kept its distance. Film stars have changed all that. But that isn't what is on my mind as I think of young Taylor's first trip abroad. I am hoping he will learn how to dress while in England. I am hoping he will learn by observation and the use of that imitative faculty which all actors possess.

In fear that his admirers may annihilate me, let me explain what I mean. (Incidentally, I am one of Mr. Taylor's admirers, too.) That is why I go so far as to wish for improvement in him, especially in the matter of clothes. He dresses too well, if you know what I mean, and if my reader is a man I am sure he does. Bob Taylor's suits are expensive and they fit perfectly—too perfectly. Every button, every seam, looks as if it were calculated to the sixty-fourth of an inch. In short, Bob always looks spick and span—glossy. Now, there is a great difference between being well dressed—and that means appropriately turned out—and clothed so as to be noticeably flawless. The well-dressed man, according to metropolitan standards, does not proclaim the services of a valet; he wears his clothes easily and unobtrusively. And that is exactly what I am hoping Bob Taylor will learn to do.

He has the example of Englishmen all around him. They are the best-dressed men in the world, not because they try to be, not because clothes are a fetish, but because they wear their garments casually. I doubt if our Bob will find a single Oxonian with a fraction of the clothes he possesses, and I know he will find none as snugly well dressed as himself, yet every last one of them will make a better appearance from the standpoint of wearing his clothes carelessly, unself-consciously—and rising superior to them. Seldom is an Englishman clothes-conscious so that one can notice it. And that is exactly how I should like Bob Taylor to be.

No longer a campus hero, he is known the world over and should express the best masculine taste. He can find no better example to follow than the Englishmen he sees all around him to-day, and without aping them, either. Just rub a little of the gloss off, Bob, and learn to accept a wrinkle in your coat sleeve with equanimity; it's not a blemish on your character, you know. And, as I become more and more personal, let me say just this: Don't continue to fold your breast-pocket handkerchief in those four precise points any longer. You will notice it isn't done in England and not even in your own country is it tolerated except by a class to which you obviously do not belong. Be nonchalant! Poke your handkerchief hurriedly, carelessly, into your pocket. It doesn't matter if it fails to stick out. Every one will know it's there. Do this and I'll know foreign travel has broadened you!

Gary Cooper's acting ability is taken for granted to-day. "Mr. Deeds" put him over as a topnotcher with the majority. But in all the acclaim given that picture, and his part in it, I read nothing to explain why he suddenly became a fine actor in the eyes of those who long accepted him as just a personality. I even read in a New York newspaper that he had changed from "one of the worst actors in Hollywood to one of the best." But the critic did not tell me what his best consisted of. He merely pointed to his acting in "Mr. Deeds" as proof.

So I turned to back issues of Picture Play in the hope of finding some sort of analysis of Mr. Cooper. I thought that I might translate a fan's opinion of his work in an early picture into what the leading critics think of him to-day, even though they do not tell beyond a phrase or two, in which the adjective "restrained" is more than likely to appear. In my search I came across the issue of May, 1930, and discovered a review of "Seven Days' Leave" that I am proud to have written. Every admirer of Mr. Cooper will understand why. It follows:
Soft and Sharp Focus

There are at least two reasons for his preeminence on the screen. Here is a man who in perhaps a dozen pictures has never departed from the standard he set for himself in his very first, 'The Winning of Barbara Worth.' He has underacted, and underemphasized every part he has played. Accidental? No! He has been directed by six or eight men of different viewpoints, experience, temperament. Yet he has never been influenced by any one of them, nor has he ever given a 'bad' performance in the sense of permitting a false gesture or intonation to creep in. He is absorbed of the charge of always being himself by the fact that no other player has ever succeeded in being himself to the same extent. All have shown results of poor direction, of faulty judgment, of blurred characterization at one time or another. Or have permitted themselves to overemphasize mannerisms, or certain marks of individuality, when they chose to do so. But not Gary Cooper. He can never blame a director for anything, nor is he one to try, for he is curiously superior to direction in its broadest meaning.

'Of technique as it is known in Hollywood he is unaware, or indifferent. He has never made an effort to obtrude himself, to steal a scene, or even to make a point except by suggestion. Always he has kept to the proportions of his part both as a whole as well as in individual scenes.

'Actually Mr. Cooper stands as the lone exemplar of a new style of acting, as far removed from the Biograph school as 'The Rhapsody in Blue' is unlike 'The Blue Danube.' And that opens the way for reminding oneself of the second of one's reasons for Mr. Cooper's preeminence. It lies in the sound of him—his speaking voice.

'It is absolutely a natural voice. His use of it is natural. Untrained in even rudimentary elocution, his speech belongs altogether to the screen and the intimacy of it. On the stage it would be lost, not because of lack of volume, but because of inexperience in public speaking. In this, however, is discovered the strongest appeal of Mr. Cooper's voice. There is not a single sign of self-consciousness. Not even the excusable self-consciousness of one who has a point to make and proceeds to do so. Or even a desire to be heard distinctly.'

'Mr. Cooper's speech is spontaneous, but never glib; agreeable in tone, but never musical; distinct enough, but never precise. It is perfectly suited to the short dialogue that comes his way. And last, but not least, he, as an amateur, has a gift that often is never acquired in years of experience on the stage: that of causing his words to seem like thoughts overheard, not lines committed to memory.'

Thus ends my annual tribute to the man I most admire in Hollywood.

What differently the course of careers run in Hollywood! I have in mind an actress you all know who has been constantly active four years. She is young, personable, intelligent, wears clothes well and plays leading roles most of the time. She has never given an inadequate performance, frequently has given expert ones in first-class pictures and is always interesting. But she isn't talked about. I have never seen her name in a newspaper gossip column nor heard it in radio chit-chat. As for photographs and interviews, they are virtually nonexistent. At the same time there is no doubt that she is shy, aloof or unsocial. Give another actress the same opportunities and her name would be publicized the length and breadth of the land. Why, then, is Claire Trevor's not? Can it be that she is absorbed in the pictures she makes one after another in rapid succession, and is content to let her acting speak for itself? This is not the time for me to advise her to mend her ways if she expects to gain fullest reward for her work. Now is the time, however, for me to call the attention of every one to what a fine actress she is in a current picture, "Dead End."

We must thank Samuel Goldwyn and his casting director, Robert McIntyre, for discovering in Miss Trevor exactly the right actress to play Francey and giving her the chance to attempt a part unlike any past one. She is a consummate prostitute, the former sweetheart of Humphrey Bogart in a younger, more innocent day. There is no illusion of prettiness or a charming girl gone wrong. Miss Trevor is too realistic and too honest an actress to beglamar a sordid character. And yet, because she does it courageously, unsparingly, Francey stirs the spectator's compassion more than any other person in the film. All praise to Miss Trevor for being a standout in one brief scene of an important picture and making it burn into one's remembrance of the best that the screen offers this month.

Ramón Novarro continues to evoke extreme fan worship. There have never been such tributes paid any other star. For example, this, from a British admirer: "Do you know what a winter in England is like? Then you will be able to judge the extent of my happiness when I tell you that, for me, there will be no winter this year because Ramon Novarro is making films again. Having wallowed in the slough of despond for months, can you imagine what it must feel like to be promised a sight of the sun once more; for Ramon, with his sunny nature, is just that."

You supply your own comment. It doesn't require experience with a winter in England to exclaim!

Two kings share one crown

By Sonia Lee

Clark Gable and Robert Taylor set a precedent by being the first two kings to reign simultaneously in Hollywood. Two heroes—vastly unlike.

Both have an electric intensity, a spontaneous charm; both intrigue the imagination. But their appeal is to different phases of character.

Clark holds his throne by his reality, and Bob shares it by the romance he awakens. Women follow both.

Robert Taylor, a youth in his twenties, briefly out of an American university, has overnight become the living symbol of romance.

Not long ago Clark Gable was the man of the hour. His name was on the lips of every woman. He was the pattern to whom every woman cut her love ideal.

But the ascendency of Robert Taylor has in no whit dimmed Gable’s star. It is amazing, unprecedented—for never before have two kings reigned simultaneously in Hollywood.

Let us examine the men and their special talent and appeal to find the reason for this.

Fashions in heroes change, not alone because the public is fickle, but because the world moves on. What fits the pattern of life to-day is outmoded to-morrow. Check over the list of the public’s adored for the past fifteen years, and you will find that each idol fitted the times and the circumstances of that particular period.

A long line of screen heroes preceded Robert Taylor. Men who had been worshiped; who had been idolized; who had been kept on a pedestal, not only by impetuous heart-hungry women, but by those who sought free flights of fancy from the realities of their everyday routine.

But not since Rudolph Valentino, however, has there been such a display of adulation given any star as has been given Robert Taylor.

Chronologically, it was time for a Robert Taylor. The scene was set for him—in the emotional sense—as it had. been for Valentino. The decade between the two had been marked by too much hardship, by too much reality to give impetus to romance.

But shortly before Taylor's skyrocket achievement of fame, men and women began to seek newer and gayer patterns of living. They sought romance, emotion, new beauties and new dreams. The screen was the open door to much of this. Here they could find quick and concise romance, concentrated for quick journeying from emotion to emotion.

And on the screen, in a lad called Taylor, they found the essence of romance.

The most successful wearer of the mantle of greatness before Taylor was Clark Gable. He was the "depression lover," as Taylor to-day is the harbinger of better times.

Both defined to exactitude current mental states and moods. It is an extraordinary testimony, not only to Gable as a personality, but to his veracity as an actor, that even in the light of the new Taylor craze he has in no wise suffered defections from his followers.

Both these stars are standard setters and standard bearers. Taylor defined the newly romantic and easier era; Gable, a more rugged and exacting period.

There is a deep and vital reason why the popularity of the one does not erase the consciousness of the other from the public mind. That reason is the difference inherent in their personalities and in their natures.

Gable's and Taylor's audiences do not entirely overlap. Clark appeals more strongly to the masculine population; Bob has a larger coterie among women. They differ, too, in that their appeal is to different phases of human character.

Both have an electric intensity, a spontaneous charm; both intrigue the imagination. But Gable's appeal is to the modern woman who faces fact as it is—who knows problems exist and recognizes them.

We have called Gable the "depression lover." He is that—for he is the practical lover; he is the man who appeals to the woman who works for her daily bread. He has force and he commands respect.

After a fashion he personifies the Victorian ideal that man primarily is put on earth to protect women. Gable is rude—but he is tender. He has a swashbuckling glamour, but it is glamour which can be translated into reality.

Mentally, physically and spiritually he is not far removed from the men a woman meets every day. He has an authentic down-to-earth quality which makes him, to an extent, a personification of every woman's husband.

Robert Taylor, on the other hand, is the impetuous lover of whom every woman dreams, the man clothed in the insubstantial garments of feminine fancy.

Primarily Taylor is a symbol: he is the unreal, the intangible lover. He walks through a woman's imaginings as the perfect complement to her moods, to her longings which she can neither define nor voice.

With Taylor, every woman feels at ease, not at all impelled to make rhyme or reason—but free to follow her will-o'-the-wisp dreamings and desires.

There is no fear mixed with a woman's reactions to Taylor, as there must be with Gable.

Taylor might be well imagined as the hero of every romance since Eve. He can be conceived as Leander, as Abelard, as one of the Knights of the Holy Grail. In brief tunic or in shining armor—in ruffles or wigs—all the romantic trappings suit him admirably.

In every century and in every period where romance flourished; when impetuous love-making rang the bell of hope in women's minds, some prototype of a Robert Taylor undoubtedly existed.

A RIVAL for Dick Powell

By William H. McKegg

YOU'VE heard the old yarn about hard work getting you where you want to be. You've never believed it much, have you? But you do when you meet Kenny Baker. You've heard that the simple life is best. You've never believed much in that, either. But you do when you meet Kenny Baker. You've heard that young fellows in movies are unassuming. And you've never believed it. Neither have I. But you bow to fate when you meet Kenny Baker. Kenny epitomizes the tried and true; the platitude and the proverb.

When prosperity turns the corner of a Hollywood career, what does the average young actor want? Recognition, of course, and adulation. In short, he desires what the average young man desires. That's what I expected to hear from Kenny Baker. But Kenny is not an average young man. He has sprung into Hollywood's limelight as a newcomer with interesting possibilities. Warners, who have him under contract, featured him in "Mr. Dadd Takes the Air." Sam Goldwyn borrowed him for the Goldwyn "Follies."

New to interviews, Kenny decided to be simple about everything. A well-built chap, without dazzling handsomeness, he possesses passable looks, and what we call personality.

With this combination who shall say him nay? Having made himself popular in the Jack Benny broadcasts, Kenny is already assured of a following. The latest movie bulletin states that signs are favorable toward his screen popularity.

"I didn't think of acting when I begun looking for a career. I wanted first of all to sing. In fact," he amended, "at the very beginning I didn't know what I wanted to do."

It just goes to show you the less certain you are of your future, the more definite it becomes. But Kenny did plenty of hustling and bustling all the same.

Born at Monrovia, California, twenty-five years ago, he spent his high-school days in Los Angeles and Long Beach. At junior high, Kenny felt the urge of self-expression in music. Violin lessons were begun, and Stevenson Junior High, in Los Angeles, soon acquired a dynamic concert master.

Kenny Baker, well known on the air, is making such headway in pictures that there's no telling where he may get in a year. His story is as simple and unassuming as himself.
THE POWER OF THE CANDID

In Hollywood the camera is king. Bettering that, the cameraman is a veritable Napoleon, and can even be a "Little Caesar." One step up on the whole shebang is the candid cameraman. With one flick of a shutter or a flashlight he can make or unmake a star's career—almost. "Shoot the bad side of her face when she walks into the theater," "Catch that dame when she's scratching her ear," "Loy off that Jenny; she's a pill." "Get him when his mug freezes." "Grab that stuffed shirt while his dress tie's crooked."

The foregoing are some of the secret passwords that are occasionally cued between professional snapshotters when they have a star on the block list. And woe betide such sparklers if the lensmen really run them down! They're likely to see pictures of themselves in publications clear across the country that look like one of great-grandmother's prize poses of seventy-five years ago, or a tintype on an off day at Coney Island.

In the pursuit of stars the photographers' chances are nearly always the best. They can catch them slipping furiously out of Hollywood by airplane, train or ship if nowhere else, and they have an uncanny way of ferreting out the exact point of departure even when it's remote from the movieland.

They've even "nailed" Greta Garbo on her excursions to Sweden, and she's regarded as one of the most difficult personalities to capture in the candid camera manner. There are pictures of Garbo, too, that are ridiculous, as for instance the one where she was supposed to have scuttled into the opera one night, her cloak over her head, trying to "evade publicity." She looked like some sort of strange awkward wraith from the planet Mars.

Film celebrities are completely at the mercy of the candid camera view. The record thus secured often goes completely round the globe, being printed in a million and one different papers and magazines, where it is avidly viewed by legions of interested, and often critical fans, who see the impression of a favorite just for what it is. That may be good, and it may also be indifferent or bad.

Consequently, "be nice to the cameraman" has come to be the pretty slogan adapted by most stars. They pose carefully and judiciously whenever possible, and nearly always ask for the chance to strike just the right, and certainly the most attractive attitude.

It's an amazing thing that most of the world distribution of candid camera glimpses of picture celebrities is in the hands of about four newspaper syndicates. Year in and year out about fifteen men take the informal photographs of Hollywood's finest. Of course, the studios themselves also make photographs. However, even the studios distribute theirs to a large extent through the organized press services, which supply not only the newspapers but also certain of the finest magazines. In addition, there are a handful of fan-magazine photographers, and a few accredited free-lancers.

But there are eighteen or nineteen men, members of an organization called the Hollywood Press Photogaphers, who practically rule the candid camera destiny of the stars. They are in a position to turn thumbs up or thumbs down on a movie idol. The latter sometimes with very devastating effect.

The association is supposed to lay down rules for candid camera activities. Also to iron out troubles. Syndicate men and fan-magazine representatives principally belong. If a star gets rambunctious, as happens now and then, the system is generally to pass him or her up for a time.

The photographers declined to do any shooting this past summer at the Bing Crosby race track at Del Mar, because it was felt that the boys had been given the runaround at the opening of the establishment. I hear also that they came mighty near boycotting a premiere or two because improper provisions were made to accommodate them in their work, and no seats set aside.

Some of the stars who are not popular are Katharine Hepburn, Margaret Sullavan, Sylvia Sidney, and Grace Moore. The difficulty is mostly about getting them to pose. Miss Sidney is said to have squared herself recently by doing that little duty under the supervision of a publicity man, who urged it very emphatically.

There are some stars who are very happily regarded by the cameramen. Ginger Rogers until lately, at least was a super-favorite. Her first real setback was the big skating party given by herself and Alfred G. Vanderbilt, from which snapshots were excluded. However, this was mostly blamed on Vanderbilt.

Glenda Farrell is another "peach of a girl." On the chilly night of Grace Bradley’s barn dance, when it came time to return home, Glenda invited quite a galaxy of the top-notchers to her residence, and they played cards till dawn. Glenda was such a delightful hostess that the boys volunteered they were going to present her with a set of poker chips, because she didn’t happen to have any, and they’d had to use matches.

Norma Shearer had trouble with the cameramen after living a certain picture of hers, and request, and the picture, which the director felt was below par. The director finally gave the director a plate but it wasn’t the Norma Shearer one. He held onto that, and it would probably have been printed in every newspaper in the land had it not later been decided by the syndicate head to respect Miss Shearer’s wishes.

Biggest wisecrack ever made by a photographer was at a preview one night, attended by Margaret Sullavan and William Wyler, her ex-husband. At that time they’d just been separated, and the news had been in the papers. So their appearance together was very much worth a picture.

Wyler, though, raised strenuous objections, and one of the photographers, remembering he had seen Miss Sullavan with another escort a few evenings previously, held his peace while Margaret and Billy went into the theater together—but when they came out, exclaimed quite audibly:

Garbo sacrificed glamour and poise when she chose to make this strange spectacle of herself entering a Los Angeles theater. And all for what?
'Oh, there's Margaret Sullivan. No—don't shoot her; she's with the wrong man!' Over which Wyler was considerably irritated.

Some of the men who do the photographing like George Watson, Donald Brinn, Hymie Fink, and Frank Filo have been on the job for a number of years. Watson, who is president of the photographers' association, is about a twenty-year veteran. He devised one of the earliest candid cameras—a little affair that he used to hide in his hat. He's the only photographer to have gained access to the church at the Rudolph Valentino funeral. He slipped by twenty policemen who had strict orders to keep all cameramen out.

Watson hurried up the steps, with his tripod in one hand, and his cap in the other. He had a large camera on the tripod, and he said to the police: 'Somebody just asked me to come inside the church for a minute. I'll leave my camera right out here.'

After a moment's debate the police gave the O. K. Whereupon Watson slipped up into the choir loft, and photographed the whole proceedings by the time-exposure method, which was very difficult to do. But he got his picture, and it was published.

Candid cameramen sometimes are thoughtfully rewarded for their work by the stars. Jeannette MacDonald and Gene Raymond, for example, presented them with cigarette lighters following their wedding. It had been very difficult to entertain the men at the time, and they had worked under severe handicaps in securing pictures of the bridal party, because the room in which they were required to shoot was small. Evidently the bride and groom took token of all this.

Nevertheless one photographer complained bitterly because he and his confrères were not given champagne.

The Basil Rathbones were hosts of a huge costume party last winter at which the candid cameramen were permitted to do their work normally and efficiently, and the whole world received an impression of this glittering affaire. One syndicate alone secured eighty usable negatives of the event (a record), distributed ten of these to fifty important newspapers, sent the total output to their Eastern offices, whence pictures were dispatched to approximately fifteen hundred publications in America, and one thousand abroad.

Actually if given a break these newsmen are uncritical, and carry their duties quickly with a minimum of carbonage. In the past I have set a bad record by attempting to single out guests. At one party a few years ago I can remember a group of photographers gathering around a piano at a fashionable affair and trying to join with

BECAUSE the town reeks with many celebrities from the worlds of society and finance, politics and sports, radio and opera, it is occasionally assumed that a film star can enjoy a certain obscurity in New York, safe from the antics of frenzied folk who are starved for sight of a celebrity. Robert Taylor knows better!

On his arrival at Grand Central Station, a mere two hundred women—but thousands strong in determination—vanquished the special police sent there lor the occasion, broke through restraining ropes, and swirled around him like a whirlpool. Two days later the "Berengaria" delayed her sailing half an hour because two sixteen-year-old stowaways were found under the bed in his stateroom, and it was deemed wise to search the whole ship. Like ants in a sugar barrel, his admirers had taken possession of the vessel. They vaulted railings, hid under lifeboats, climbed up ropes.

To his eternal credit let it be said that Robert Taylor took this fantastic demonstration like a genuinely modest hero. He was appreciative, but worried for the safety of his supporters. Later, when led into the lethal chamber where a picked group of reporters asked him barbed questions, he still maintained his composure.

He confided that he does not consider himself an actor. Spencer Tracy is the finest actor, in his opinion. He looks for-word to playing "A Yank at Oxford" in England because he is going to have a chance to play a louse, which will be a pleasant change from soppy heroes. If you want to endear yourself to him, tell him he is a nice guy but a lousy actor. That is his favorite adjective.

Others Have Their Moments.—While all this was going on, a waitress in a hotel frequented by Broadway’s most glamorous, fainted at sight of Henry Fondo, and women in great numbers announced that it was the overwhelming milestone of their lives because they had just seen Ramon Navarro in person.

I wish that each and every one of you who are rejoicing that Ramon has come back to the screen might have a chance to talk to him. That really is worthy of being a milestone, for in the years since his voluntary retirement from the screen Ramon has found a sustaining philosophy which makes him the most pleasant imaginable companion.

Humility, gratitude, and the conviction that every moment in life should be approached as if it were the first and the last opportunity one would have to prove himself, are the lodestones of his faith.

Above all, he believes, and is living proof, that one should enjoy every moment without regard to other people’s standards of success, that it is not possessions that count, but the opportunities every one has, every day, of finding that he can be guided by a divine Providence.

Just a Few Friends.—Ramon made "The Sheik Steps Out" for Republic, a small and enterprising company that he found infinitely more enjoyable than MGM, the somewhat overpowering and impersonal factory where he spent twelve years of great financial profit.

He will make more for Republic when they find just the right stories. Meanwhile, some thousands of old friends have asked him if he won’t please sing some old Mexican folk songs in his next picture. If you will add your plea to theirs, addressing the Republic Studio in Hollywood, perhaps scenario scouts will bestir themselves to find just the story into which they will fit. While you wait you might enjoy seeing Gory Cooper’s "Souls at Sea" and Paul Muni’s "The Life of Emile Zola." Ramon simply glows with enthusiasm when he speaks of those pictures.

They Had Their Fling.—The acid test of acting ability is appearing in the stock companies that flourish through the East in the summer and fall, and not a few film players have come through with flying colors.

In an explosive rôle made to order for Lupe Velez, Frances Farmer acquitted herself with great distinction at Mt. Kisco.

There is rejoicing over Ramon Navarro’s return to films for there never has been a star whose absence was more keenly felt.

Schiaparelli, designer of international fame, has devised "shocking" costumes for Mae West and a perfume she calls "Shocking."
A STAR you never READ about

BY CAROLINE BELL

In the movies' infancy, when they cruelly reflected life in the raw, the cowboy stars came out of the East and rode the vaudeville ranges into the sunset clinic.

Now that the screen has become sophisticated and artistic and artificial, we have a real cowboy. Welcome, stranger!

Gene Autry has made the cowboy current because he puts into music and into plausible action that spirit which is in the heart of the West and the Southwest, a field of dream adventure to the armchair Easterner which will live as long as we have movies.

Oddly, he draws best not in tiny places, but in towns of ten thousand to one hundred and fifty thousand. In Milwaukee, during a recent personal-appearance tour, he broke all records. Michigan practically adopted him.

On his tour he and his five "hands" sang, and Champion, his "horse with a high-school education" did tricks for the folks. Champion—just a plains pony—was taught patiently by Gene, without ever a whip or a harsh word.

Gene sends out thirty-five hundred photos a month, answering all such requests, and all of the five thousand letters that "sound sensible." I had imagined that most of his fan mail came from boys.

"No, ma'am," he corrected me. "The majority are girls between eighteen and twenty-five, though we do get a lot from kids. It must be the music, ma'am. We try to put in action for the kids, music for the young ladies, and comedy to entertain the elderly folks."

With such Westerns as "Round-up Time in Texas," "Oh, Susanna," "The Old Corral," and others, the crooning cowboy, himself a product of small towns, plays fair with all his fans and appeals to many.

"'Ceptin' sophisticated New York," he qualified. "They can't see us there. But," he added, "we don't mind. Plenty of other territory."

I like a number of things about Gene Autry. First, his clear, steady blue eyes, and the clean, healthy look about him.

The fact that he doesn't smear on his Southern accent an inch thick pleases me. Another thing: Gene speaks of his company as "we," meaning that the outfit has worked as a unit.

Entering Gene's Hollywood office, I faced the sturdy, blue-eyed young man behind his desk covered with letters and file baskets. He was neatly attired in a brown seersucker suit. At one side a pretty secretary smiled over her typewriter. A businesslike room, simple.

One by one, tall and lean, or small and stocky, figures ambled in, sprawled in straight chairs tilted back against the walls. Eyes typical of cowhands, eyes with that far-seeing, shrewd gaze, and etched around with sun-wrinkles, regarded us with a bland twinkle. All wore dusty-looking, real cowboy clothes, and ten-gallons. I didn't get the full significance of their quiet presence at first.

Each Gene Autry Western—he makes eight a year—costs around fifty thousand dollars. His contract with Republic is a salary and cut proposition. Ordinarily, he spends from ten to twelve days on each, though some, he informed me proudly, take fifteen days. I thought of the mammoth movies, requiring many weeks of production.

At my start of surprise, his injured tone gently rebuked me:

"Why, ma'am, most of the Westerns are made in five or six days. We," he grinned, "are practically colossal—in our class. We have art, too; it's a natural art of music and action, that springs right from the atmosphere, from the spirit. We make 'em mostly on location, at Lone Pine, Kernville, so on. We're gain' to Flagstaff for the next one. Sometimes we stay at little hotels, again we camp out. (Continued on page 92)
Gene Autry
I DON'T know how they do it, I really don't.

It must require a lot of ingenuity for actors to think up the things that they think up to buy and do when they are between pictures—or even when they are between scenes in a picture.

You might imagine that they would just relax and watch the corn grow on those San Fernando Valley estates they've all been acquiring—or gather eggs or watch the baby alligators Uncle Ned sent them for the fish pond.

You might even imagine that they would sit down and read or knit—or just sit. But they can't.

They can't even relax for a few moments between shots when they are working on the set. They have to think up practical jokes to play on some one or a new game for next week's party. Or they send to the corner drug store for a gag or a gadget.

How they all love gadgets!

Maybe I had better try to explain, in my slightly bewildered fashion, what a gadget is.

If I understand it rightly, it is something which seems to be useful but isn't. It must be expensive. It must be something the like of which you never saw before—so that when the proud owner displays it you will look astonished and say, "Oooh! How cute!" Or maybe you just say, "Well! Well!" Any exclamation of that sort will make the owner happy.

Only yesterday Robert Taylor was displaying a pair of cuff links, each of which contained a weensy-weensy watch. Now, no one could possibly tell time by these infinitesimal watches, even if he wanted to tell time by both cuffs. And who does? But they were pretty little things, if you looked at them through a magnifying glass—and they undoubtedly cast a great deal of money. So you just said, "My! My!" as amiably as possible and Bob was happy and proud.

Once an actor acquires a new gadget, especially one that has some sort of wheels attached to it, there is simply no getting along with him until he has demonstrated it or at least told everyone all about it.

Robert Montgomery demonstrated the new, rubber-bladed electric fans in his dressing room so energetically that he broke all three of them within two days.

Chester Morris hasn't actually demonstrated his electric toothbrush—to women friends, anyhow—but he has talked enough about it, goodness knows. I don't know yet how it works, although it has been explained to me again and again. All I have been able to gather is that Chester presses a button, something goes "Bzzz-up!" and his teeth are—presto—as white and gleaming as new-fallen snow.

Just here you are supposed to say, "Well! Well!" It would please Chester so! You could send him a post card.

But the people who have young children are the prize gadgeteers. They have dinges to teach the tots to swim, to teach 'em not to swim, they have merry-go-rounds, projection machines which make the Mother Goose figures on the nursery walls come to life and say their pieces. There are jacks-in-the-boxes which pop out and say "Good boy!" when a movie child condescends to eat his oatmeal and there are wiggly wooden figures which will bring him his sweater and make him giggle on a chilly day.

Maybe Pat O'Brien is the most sentimental parent of all. He has installed dictaphones—you heard me, dictaphones I said—in the nursery, the sand pile, all about the garden, just so that not one gurgle or lip emitted by his two youngsters shall escape preservation for posterity. Personally, I should hate to hear what those children will say to their fond father twenty years from now when he trots out those records and demonstrates to their friends how cute they were as tots.

Then there is Harriet Hilliard who arranged for Hubby...
Ozzie Nelson to telephone her from New York and hold the baby at the phone so that she might listen to her infant gurgles. What's more, she had recordings made of those gurgles. I doubt whether her daughter will be properly grateful, either, when she reaches the sensitive age of eighteen. I've known children who never, never forgave their mothers for having them photographed in washbowls.

Dolores del Rio, of course, ran no such risks when she telephoned, at goodness knows how many dollars per minute from London just to speak to her bulldog and to hear him grr-umph a reply. Dolores didn't have recordings made of the event, and it probably wouldn't have embarrassed the dog, anyhow.

I said "Goodness!" in my best and most astonished manner when I viewed Hugh Herbert's oblong pool in his dining room, with the vertical sprays which cool the air on hot days. He was a trifle evasive when I asked him how many people had fallen into the pool—and after all the nice things I had said about his guinea hens, too!

But his reading-in-bed light is his best gadget. Seems Hugh likes to read in bed—as who doesn't? Seems, too, that he is inclined to read too long for his own good—as who isn't? So he has a time clock arrangement which dims the light slowly, so he won't be too annoyed; so that he will just take the hint.

These actors can't risk having their feelings hurt even by their own electric lights. It might show in their work.

Guy Kibbee has a feeling-saver, too. It's a little motion-picture camera, weighing less than a pound, which he attaches to the front of his hat when he goes fishing. It furnishes an irrefutable record of that perfect cast and of the shimmering catch. Since he uses color film, it also proves that he caught the kind of fish that he has been trying to tell you he caught. Of course, if the cast isn't perfect and if the fish turns out to be a turtle or a minnow, he can always destroy the film.

And speaking of turtles, gallant Hollywood swains can buy tiny, live ones at one of the night clubs now, with their names and those of current girl friends artfully painted and entwined upon the shells. It's a lot of fun, what with girlish giggles and depreciating masculine guffies. Fun, that is, for every one except the turtles. They don't seem to care for it much.

The same night club presents portraits in flowers of prominent stars whom it hopes to lure to its tables as "guests of honor." Up to now these floral portraits have all been of women. I have yet to see Robert Taylor or Clark Gable's features worked out in gardenias and lilies-of-the-valley.

What I really want to see is W. C. Fields tastefully done in scarlet geraniums with forget-me-nots eyes.

It was probably awfully cute of Betty Furness to buy that sharkskin bathing suit which is so delicate that she doesn't wear it in the water. I guess it's cute. It's awfully hot in Hollywood and grows more and more difficult, as the silly season advances, to tell whether a gadget is worth an "Ooohops!" or not.

To tell you the truth, I was a little bit depressed over the skating girls on the recent Sonja Henie picture who contributed their hard-earned dollars to buy Sonja a bracelet with a diamond bangle which spelled, "S. Q." They explained that this stood for "Skating Queen." I kept thinking, in my crass, material way, of how much money Sonja earns for skating and how much these youngsters get for doing the same thing not quite so well. But they like to buy gadgets as well as any one else.

But then, Sonja presented Sidney Lanfield, director of "Thin Ice," with a plaque, no less, in appreciation of his help to her on the picture. Now, what do you suppose Sidney will do with a plaque?

Henry Wilcoxon has spent weeks and weeks perfecting an electric motor to attach to miniature kayaks—whatever they are—to go scooting about swimming pools. He has patented the contraptions, too, and plans to manufacture them in quantities.

Robert Taylor's cuff links are weensy-weensy watches too small to tell the time except with a magnifying glass.

I'll betcha he can sell them—in Hollywood.

Luise Rainer is as proud as possible of her key case which boasts an electric flashlight—just in case Luise should ever arrive at her house to find that no one has remembered to turn on a porch light for her. Imagine!

Glenda Farrell will insist upon showing you what she calls a "make-up bar." It's a thingumabob which looks like an oversized make-up kit. But when Glenda presses buttons and says magic words to it, it undoes itself, somehow, and becomes a table with racks for bottles and jars and powder puffs and with legs and wheels so that she can trundle it all about. It has made, she will assure you, a difference in her life.

Jeanette MacDonald owns a towel which is almost as versatile as Glenda's bar. This towel, by an ingenious arrangement of drawstrings and hooks and things is (1) a nice blanket to sit upon on the sand (2) a roomy, waterproof bag in which to carry wet bathing suits, sandals, combs, dog biscuits and whatever else ladies take to and from beaches, (3) a becoming and enveloping wrap to wear home, just in case she has remembered to put all the other things into another case.

Maureen O'Sullivan has a new sports pin made in imitation of a zebra—and—and—

Oh, for goodness' sake!
Is this another moment to equal Garbo's grand farewell in "Queen Christina"? Here she sees "Napoleon" on the shores of Elba for the last time. With her are Claude Gillingwater and the boy, Scotty Beckett.

W HETHER you like Robert Taylor or whether you don't, you must respect him. Success hasn't changed him. At a table in a restaurant the other day he turned suddenly to Spencer Tracy. "Spence," he asked earnestly, "would you teach me to act?"

W HEN RKO heads approached Lily Pons on the subject of costarring another singer with her, Miss Pons replied, very sweetly, "It is not singers I need in my pictures, but actors."

B ENNY STOLOFF was directing a cabaret scene in "Fight For Your Lady." The company worked one night and the extras were all properly enthusiastic over the floor show. But by noon the next day their enthusiasm had waned. "For Pete's sake," screamed Stoloff, "will you extras please wear the same expressions you were using last night!"

A RATHER touching story comes to light about John Gilbert's bed which was sold same time ago in the auction of his effects. A hotel in Pennsylvania bought it for $350. They had it shipped East and installed in their bridal suite. Newly married couples may now occupy the bed of the screen's greatest lover at a cost of ten dollars a night.

Y OUNG Ricky Arlen was pestering Dick to find a certain pistol. Dick ransacked the nursery in vain. Finally, in desperation, he seized a big carton of toys standing in one corner and turned it upside down. Ricky watched speculatively while Dick plowed frantically through the toys.

"Who's going to put all these things back?" he asked finally. "You are," yelled Dick. "Not me," Ricky stated positively, losing all interest in the pistol and turning on his heel and walking out.

S PEAKING of the Arlen's, it is Dick who always enters every tournament and, although he is an excellent golfer, he has never won a match. But Jaby, his wife, recently capped first prize in the women's tournament at the Lakeside Golf Club.

B ICYCLING has reached such proportions in the studios that stop signals have been installed to protect the old-fashioned pedestrians. A glamour girl will run you down if you don't watch out! Ginger Rogers is the fastest of them all, but Joan Crawford can be credited or blamed for the new craze. Joan tired of stopping her limousine to run a mile on her way to work and bought a bike to ride from her dressing room to the sets. Maureen O'Sullivan gaped as Joan, in a formal evening gown and calf-furred to kill, whizzed by. Then she rushed to the nearest bicycle store. Gable started the men riding. Now Metro's prop department has had to buy bicycles for all the prop boys!

S INCE he has been in Hollywood Michael Whalen has seen only three pictures besides the ones he stars in himself. And they were made by his own studio at that. Same one might tell him what he's missing.

A MONG the missing on contract lists is Jean Muir. Her sin? Too much outspokenness. It's disastrous in Hollywood. But if Warners, her ex-boos-feters, fancy she's a hosbeen they're going to be sad one of these days. Jean lost no time returning to the stage and she'll never give up until she's zoomed again. Meanwhile she's studying tact.

FOR the past two months Jean Arthur has been vacationing incognito in Carmel. Instead of stopping at a fashionable hotel she rented a simple shingled cottage. She says she would like to have met some of the interesting artists and authors who make that town a mecca, but she didn't know how to go about it. She consolés herself with a flack of good books. Evidently she overlooked Dale Carnegie's.

JACK HALEY had to pull himself up by his own initiative so he is resolved not to raise a spoiled son. Junior is only three, but daddy fears the future. So a baby brother has been adopted to share the Beverly trimmings.

GEOERGE BRENT may have refused to play the real-life gallant in his latest marital mistake, but you can't say he hasn't the courage of his conviction. Nor classify him as one of those ultra-modern Hollywood husbands who remain the ex-wife's best friend. He's still even cool to Ruth Chatterton, which proves he has a principle and is consistent.

GLADYS GEORGE has just become the only woman member of an unnamed club, which includes on its roster James Cagney, Pat O'Brien, Warren William, and other male stars. Its purpose is to help deserving "bit" players who have had bad luck. Gladys suggested a stage actress friend for a rôle in "Madame X." She withdrew the suggestion, however, in favor of a player William named in behalf of the club. The blond star's friend didn't need the job. The club's candidate did—badly.

Thanks to Gladys, the needy actress got the part.

ERROL FLYNN wanted an extra copy of his book, "Beam Ends," so he phoned a Hollywood bookstore. The salesgirl, a chatty and officious soul, suggested another travel book instead. That actor's, said she, was fair in spots, bad in others.

"But of course we'll send it if you insist," she continued.

"What's the name and address?"

Errol was either too embarrassed or too considerate to drop the bombshell.

"Let's skip it," he said. "Probably I wouldn't like the book now, either."

EVIDENCE that Garbo still commands the awed respect of fellow actors was noted during the filming of "In Old Chicago."

Tyrone Power, Alice Faye, and Dan Ameche were chatting beside the camera. Suddenly they stopped talking to stare at a tall feminine figure standing in the near-by shadows. Under its familiar béret was the unmistakable face of Garbo. Hesitatingly, even timidly, they all went forward to welcome the great visitor. Then Alice Brady's jolly laugh sounded from behind the Garbo mask, which she had borrowed from an artist friend.

"Don't look so darned impressed," cried Alice, "it's only Brady!"

CHARLES BOYER is still embarrassed as the result of his experience in a small Hollywood theater.

It seems Boyer never attends regular showings of his own pictures, and rarely public previews. So he hadn't heard the lovelorn sighs and ecstatic comments his cinema image evokes from feminine fans, until his mischievous wife, Pat Paterson dragged him into that neighborhood showhouse.
She claims he was blushing all the way home, and that she will have something to tease him about from now on.

GLORIA SWANSON shed some tears at the preview of Bette Davis's "That Certain Woman," which is a new version of Gloria's early talkie success, "The Trespasser." The friend who sat beside her was sympathetic. "Poor Gloria," she said. "It reminds you of your day of triumph, doesn't it?"

"Day of triumph, fiddlesticks!" snapped the spirited Swanson. "I wasn't thinking about myself. If I've spoiled my mascara, it's simply my tribute to a fine performance by a great actress!"

MYRNA LOY calls it "The Great Sweat-shirt Mystery."

It seems an MGM executive found in his outer office a frayed and faded sweat shirt, on which had been inked various designs, autographs, and wisecracks in the highschool manner.

Thinking the disreputable shirt might be dear to the heart of some office boy, he didn't throw it into the wastebasket. Instead, he had the studio police department try to find its owner.

No wonder this task took the sleuths some time. How were they to know that the sweat shirt was a favorite garment of fashionable Miss Loy?

GENE RAYMOND fell into his birthday cake! It was really Jeanette MacDonald's fault for she ordered the cake. It was a truly monumental affair and, what was more, when Gene came to cut it, he found himself standing on one of those dinky rugs on a slippery floor. Gene stood on tiptoes, the rug slipped and there was he covered with frosting. And you should have heard the razzing he took after he had changed from dinner clothes to flannels! The guests even pinned a bib on him.

WE told you that Douglass Montgomery was asking for trouble when he acquired those two Irish wolf hounds, built the two-story dog house (complete with balcony) and sacrificed his tennis court to supply them with a front yard. Well! Now he shops for stale bread to soak in the special raw milk which is delivered at his door twice a day. And when he dropped a glass of orange juice, both dogs lapped it up vigorously, glass and all—and this necessitated a hurry call for a vet with a stomach pump. Anyhow, Doug has never a dull moment.

CLARA BOW came to town this week, looking slimmer and prettier than she has looked in years. She has taken a house at the beach, "so that I shan't lose my ranch tan."

She "lo-oves" ranch life but is not, apparently, completely used to it even yet. "I still look under the bed for tarantulas," she confessed. "And I couldn't bear to have the spring lambs slaughtered for meat. And there they are, growing into big old sheep! And it was distressing to realize that we were so far from a doctor when I found the baby clutching a jar of ant paste. Fortunately he hadn't opened it."

She says that she never wants to make another picture. "But I'd like to do something about pictures, maybe produce, or something. I don't want to act. It's too strenuous."

WHEN a cap flagged Wendy Barrie for a minor traffic infraction, she burst into tears. This disconcerted the cop. "Why, what's the matter?" he asked, solicitously.

"I—I was just so homesick for my family in England—I couldn't see what I was doing!" sobbed Wendy. "Well, now—you just pull over to the curb and have a good cry," he advised. "It'll make you feel better."

Wendy cried and cried and then the cop saw her safely home. Nothing was said about a ticket.
MARY BRIAN has been the house guest of Glenda Farrell while Mary’s mother is away. Both girls are popular and, we must say, a bit careless about writing things on the pad by the telephone. The tap came when Glenda, dressed in her best, kept a dinner date which she had written on her engagement pad. Her escort turned out to be Alexander D’Arcy, a gentleman whom Mary had met abroad and who had followed her Brian to Hollywood to pay ardent court. Mary, all unaware of this error, had gone elsewhere. However, Glenda and Alec had a good time together and there were no recriminations on any one’s part.

GALE SONDERGAARD was pretty cross when a diamond ring slipped from her finger and rolled between the floor boards of her summerhouse. “We’ll have to get a carpenter and rip up all those boards!” she scolded. But when the carpenter came to light with not only the ring but the bracelet which she “mislaid” last summer, she felt much better about it all.

THE startet were her best and finest for her first date with the studio’s new athletic rave. For cocktails, he took her to one of the less exclusive bars. “I get drinks free here,” Later they attended a fifty-cent-a-meal eating house on Hollywood Boulevard. For amusement they saw a movie made by the star’s home studio on free passes. When he started to drive out a lonely road in the moonlight, she burst out tearfully, “I’ve been playing straight for you all evening! Take me home!”

WARRREN WILLIAM gets lots of mail from writers who insist that a truck driver in Los Angeles is an exact double of the star. All this furor makes Warren smile. His new portable dressing room looks just like a furniture von, and he drives it back and forth to work himself—while motorists stare at the “truck driver” in make-up.

LUCKY Lela Rogers, with a movie daughter who writes devoted and amusing letters. Ginger wears old dungarees and faded cotton shirts on her fishing trips, but the fish still suspect a glamour girl. “We rose at dawn,” she wrote Lela, “for a five-oclock date with the fish, but they’d evidently had an earlier call with another company.”

TWO-FISTED Richard Arlen took matters into his own hands when another yachtman rudely jostled into the dock landing ahead of Arlen’s own craft. Jumping aboard the other man’s boat, Dick threw two members of the crew overboard and beat up the owner. “Why don’t you help?” the owner demanded of onlookers. “You’ve had this coming ever since you bought that boat!” they answered—and gave Arlen a vote of thanks.

CAROLE LOMBARD’s representatives are pretty cautious about mentioning her friendship with Clark Gable, which isn’t supposed to be publicized, or something. They tell you Carole’s activities, admit that she went horseback riding, and add, sotto voce, “with Mr. G.”

WATCH celebrities being entertained at charity or political affairs, and their lives seem pretty salt. We saw the other side of the picture at a semipublic dinner in Los Angeles. After Mae Clarke, Fred Kahler, and others took their bows, they were seated at a table, served a round or two of drinks, and promptly forgotten. The politicians went about their own business, ignoring the “guest of honor,” who sat around a while, talked shop, and finally drifted out.

JAMES STEWART loves to squeeze little tunes out of his accordion and was delighted when he was asked to play it on a radio program. But during rehearsal Jimmy couldn’t seem to hit it off with the orchestra. After several...
IT PAID TO GO RITZY

By Frederick James Smith

LAST YEAR THE RITZ BROTHERS MADE $8,000 ON THE STAGE. NOW THEY GET $8,000 A WEEK. AND CRAZIER OFF THE SCREEN THAN ON.

The funniest thing that has happened in Hollywood since the four Marx Brothers is the three Ritz Brothers. Hollywood loves its laughs and the Ritz boys are funny on and off the screen.

During all of 1936, the boys, filling stray café and vaudeville engagements, earned $8,000 in all. This year they are making $8,000 a week. That's the magic of a laugh in Hollywood.

The Ritz boys have the noisy informality of a vaudeville theater backstage. When I phoned them for our first meeting, Jimmy Ritz came to the wire.

"What's the name?" he demanded. "Sure, we'll give you a story, pal. Come on over."

Another brother apparently tore the receiver from his hand. "Sure, Fred, we got a yarn for you," he said. "Hop a taxi. We'll show you our new dance routine."

The boys are informal and direct. They are almost as mad off os on the screen. Full of nervous energy, restless, they pace their hotel rooms. When they tell a story, they rush into pantomime. While Al Ritz is showing you a new dance step, Harry is doing his life story with graphic acting. It's a three-Ritz circus.

I insisted upon knowing something about their private lives.

"Comics have no private lives," protests Jimmy. "It's a gag, and we're goldfish," sighs Al.

"We're in a show window, but we're lucky, at that," Harry will tell you.

The three Ritz boys are Al, who is thirty-three, Jimmy who is thirty-one, and Harry, twenty-nine. Their real name is Joachim. Their father, Max Joachim, was a small manufacturer of hats in Newark, New Jersey, where the Joachims lived when the boys were born.

When the oncoming Ritzes were infants, Papa and Mammo Joachim migrated to Brooklyn. The brothers went to Public School Number 147, were graduated from P. S. Number 50, then called it a day as far as conventional education was concerned. Al went to work in a shoe store while Jimmy got a job with a Manhattan mail-order house.

"We were natural dancers," explains Jimmy.
It Paid To Go Ritzy

"Sure," says Al, "never took a lesson in our lives."

"Just danced, that's all," comments Harry.

"We'd always clown around," Jimmy goes on. "Can't remember when we didn't clown. One day I got a little card in my pay envelope. It said, 'Your services are no longer required.' You see, I'd been dancing around too much for the salesmen. Kidding too much. That card put me in the theatrical business."

Al could contain himself no longer. "By that time I was on the stage. Want to know how we got the name of Ritz?"

"Sure," brake in Harry. "We were looking for a flashy name. You know—short, with punch. We got out a hotel directory. Ambassador was too long. Waldorf-Astoria wouldn't do. Biltmore was fair, Astor wasn't so bad. But Ritz hit us right between the eyes!"

"Pay no attention to him," cut in Jimmy. "It didn't hop- pen that way at all. When Al was still working for the shoe people, he would go out to the Vitagraph studio at the end of Brooklyn. Finally he got a day's work but the man who hired the extras stumbled over the name of Joachim. 'Pick out a short name, pal,' he told Al.

"Al looked out the window. The Ritz laundry was across the street. So he said Al Ritz. The name sounded classy to us. So we all went Ritzy.

"My first job," went on Jimmy, "was with an amateur show. I clicked. A vaudeville agent saw me and put me in on act with two girls. It was called Sally Sisters and Jimmy Ritz. I did that two years.

"By that time Harry was out of school and had joined a vaudeville act. Al had succeeded George Burns, now of Burns and Allen, in another act. It was Lorraine and Ritz.

Then we got an idea for a vaudeville turn out of a newspaper comic strip. Harold Teen, you know, the collegiate idea, wide pants, big bow ties, all that. We got together, the three of us."

"After three weeks in vaudeville Earl Carroll saw us and signed us for a show, 'The Florida Girl.' Then he put us in 'The Vanities of 1927.' That was our real start at dancing."

"Then we did an almost straight dance turn, with just a little comedy. We didn't know we were comics until later."

"After that came vaudeville, a lot of it. Then we had our own show touring the Public movie theaters for several years. After that bad breaks—and a lot of 'em."

I wanted to know more about the bad breaks. It seems that one of the Ritz brothers, a nonprofessional, became desperately ill. All the brothers' savings went into medical efforts to save the boy. But they failed.

"Lay off that in the story," said Jimmy huskily.

"Cut it there," interpolated Al.

"No sob stuff," pleaded Harry.

"Well," went on Jimmy, "it looked kinda hard for us. We'd play one or two weeks, lay off for four or five. Some of the doctors' bills were still storing us in the face. Vaudeville was gone. Night clubs couldn't pay our salary.

George Brent's suit for annulment of his marriage to Constance Worth goes merrily on. She denies that "pressure" was used to persuade him to marry her. He says that if she wants "muddling" he can give her "all the dirt she wants."

Latest "Gone With the Wind" rumor is that Dorothy Jordan will return to the screen to play "Melanie" in the famous story of the South.

HOLLYWOOD HIGH LIGHTS

BY EDWIN AND ELZA SCHALLERT

On her return from honeymooning in Hawaii, Jeanette MacDonald with some of the effects of a bombshell announced that she had become "Mrs. Cranky Housekeeper." Which is a new rôle utterly for the singing star, whose whole life has been dedicated to melody, with interludes of dancing.

Gene Raymond maneuvered a pleasant surprise for Jeanette when he provided her with a home in Bel Air, completely furnished, as their post-honeymoon abode. The two had a delightful time in Hawaii, where we talked to them on the long-distance telephone, and discovered that they were sequestered in a modernistic residence quite apart from the madding throng of Honolulu.

Only one blot on the horizon when the couple returned was the last infection which caused Jeanette to be laid up for a time.

It really looks as if this marriage were to turn out more than happily, and that Jeanette will demonstrate the same efficiency in the management of her household as in all other lines. That, incidentally, is why she describes herself as "Cranky Housekeeper."

Heavy Phone Tolls.—Estimates are that the bill for telephone service for transatlantic calls between Barbara Stanwyck and Robert Taylor will mount to many thousands of dollars during Bab's sojourn in Europe for "A Yank at Oxford." Communication between the two started immediately after Bab's departure from Los Angeles, and continued straight across the seas.

Bob called one day and Barbara the next. Which means they alternate in the payment of the tolls. This romance is A-1 puzzle in moviedom. It is the most intense in many ways, and yet we wonder whether it will ever culminate in marriage. There were rumors prior to Taylor's departure that the couple had eloped to Yuma. But there's nothing to that.

Lily Pons Acclaimed.—Lily Pons may well be called the new glamour girl of Hollywood. Never has there been such an audience to watch the personal appearance of a star as greeted her concert at the Hollywood Bowl. She was welcomed by no fewer than 29,000 persons when she sang her concert there prior to her new picture.

The fame she has won in the films was largely responsible. Which just shows what pictures can do even for a famous diva.

Simultaneously Lily and Andre Kostelanetz, her fiancé, are ever evasive on the subject of marriage.
Quits Bounding Waves.—The close of a chapter in the John Barrymore personal life history was written when his yacht, the "Infanta," was ordered sold as part of foreclosure proceedings to satisfy the demands of certain creditors. The craft was valued by John himself at $100,000, and it was this boat in which he spent many leisure hours during his marriage to Dolores Costello, and aboard which at one time he took flight from Elaine [Ariel] Barrymore.

Since John (first) married Elaine he has ceased to have any particular interest in cruising the high seas. For many years that was his favorite diversion.

A Mysterious Mr. X.—The Bel Air burglar is becoming quite a famous character since he robbed the Gary Cooper's home. That was the second time for Gary, and a few weeks before he had invaded the residence of Sol Wurtzel, the movie producer.

The loss in the Cooper mansion was no small matter, as insurance experts estimated it at $20,000.

Bel Air, which is the new Beverly Hills, is a suburb of ample spaces between houses, and an atmosphere of seclusion, and even, it might be said, of loneliness that did not exist in the old-time movie residential settlement.

But then burglars aren't particular. For the Malibu district was also prey to a marauder, who looted a cabin of Richard Barthelmess, while Ketti Gallian in Laurel Canyon was in a great stew because, so she said, she had $25,000 worth of perfumes and furs taken from her one evening, which were returned a few days later.

Del Rio Sentiment.—Dolores del Rio has a pretty sentimental idea, which she fulfill as a yearly custom, and that is going to the Santa Barbara Mission to renew her marriage vows with Cedric Gibbons. Each year for seven now she has made the pilgrimage to the famous old church surrounded by so much of the early Spanish California tradition.

Dolores gets credit for prompt action in rescuing the two-year-old daughter of her stand-in Carmen La Roux from drowning. The little girl, named Dolores after Miss Del Rio, fell in the pool at Dolores's home while her mother was visiting there. Dolores dived in immediately and pulled the youngster out.

Joan Sponsors Joan.—And here's Joan Crawford setting forth to sponsor a career. Her protégée is Niece Joan Le Sueur, who is three years of age, and who spent the summer months with her famous aunt.

Joan arranged for the youngster to do a little part in her picture, "The Bride Wore Red," and she thinks that maybe Joan, Jr., may be a shining star about twenty years hence. Little Joan is the daughter of Hal Le Sueur, as you may know, and the privilege of spending time with her actress-aunt is granted when she has been a very good little girl.

The Clannish Bennetts.—The Bennetts, most temperament of acting groups, are together again. That is, Papa Richard Bennett recently joined daughter Constance. Joan was in the East at the time for a summer stock engagement, but the family reunion has been held before this.

The elder Bennett, who was a big stage star not many years ago, had reverses and recently went through a bankruptcy. He and daughters Constance and Joan were severed for a few years following the break-up in his own home. Despite the fact that there is always fireworks when Continued on page 88

Another foreign importation is MGM's Lona Manders who found the name waiting for her on arriving from Vienna. Until then she was Illona Hajmassy of the stage.

Luise Rainer and Fredric March are interested table companions at a Hollywood dinner dance not long ago.
Buxom Sophie Tucker has a great heart and great understanding. She is to star in “Molly, Bless Her,” inspired by Marie Dressler’s life.

Willie Howard, who advised Miss Tucker to try the stage when she was a waitress, catches up with her in “Broadway Melody of 1938.”

BY HELEN LUDLAM

UNIQUE ON THE STAGE FOR THIRTY YEARS, SOPHIE TUCKER IS DISCOVERED FOR PICTURES IN A BIG WAY. THE STORY OF A REMARKABLE PERSONALITY.

Sophie waited on table. She was fat and blooming, with two thick flaxen braids hanging to her waist. She had a voice like an organ plus a loud speaker, and when she laughed there was no mistake about it. While she wasn’t a beauty, she had such health and magnetism and happiness in her make-up that she last little by not being one. She was always singing at her work and the customers loved to tease her because she always came right back at them with a side-splitting remark.

She had no defense against the Howard Brothers, however, whose kidding was completely out of her experience, and when they told her that she ought to be on the stage with that voice she took them seriously.

“Honest, with a voice like that—you’re another Sarah Bernhardt! Why don’t you stop slingin’ hash and head for New York? You’d be a riot,”

The latest laughing dynamo to come to the screen is Sophie Tucker who makes every one step around in “Broadway Melody of 1938.” Behind her excellent performance are years of hard, grinding work. While that is said of most players I think it comes nearer to being the stark truth in Sophie’s case.

Thirty years ago Sophie Tucker was a bright and buxom youngster in her father’s restaurant in Hartford, Connecticut.

It was a tiny restaurant and strictly a family affair with papa, mamma, and Sophie the only producing force. But it was clean and neat and served Kosher food, the only place in town that did.

Trouping at best is hard on the digestion and when the Howard Brothers, Willie and Eugene—vaudeville headliners then—played Hartford they were delighted to see the words “Kosher Restaurant” printed on the window. “That means it’s pure anyhow,” they said.
went on Willie, both young men enjoying the maiden's confusion and the lovely color that flamed in her cheeks. And while they did it as a joke, they were speaking the truth though they were the last to think so.

She swallowed all they said in dead earnest, but months afterward when they heard she had taken their advice there were two miserable brothers and their name was Howard.

She never looked them up in New York or asked their advice when things looked black, and in all these years she never played with one of them until now. Willie Howard is also in "Broadway Melody" and plays a scene with Sophie. "Well, here's my little joke!" he said, greeting her with enormous pride.

Sophie was born at sea. Her parents fled a pogrom in Odessa and adopted the name of an Italian deserter they had befriended and which got them across the border. Mrs. Abuza had made up her mind to have her child born in America, but I guess the flight from Odessa had something to do with the fact that Sophie came into the world on hour after the ship sailed for New York.

Years later she landed in New York again, this time from Hartford, with fifteen dollars, her youth and belief in herself her only assets. After she had been around a little she decided there wasn't anything in the world hard work wouldn't lick. So she rolled up a mental pair of sleeves and pitched in, and she's still at it.

Her first real job was coon-shouting in blackface at Tony Pastor's in Fourteenth Street, and to make up for her inexperience she had to use every ounce of energy to get her songs across. But she had plenty of that and still has. She's a perfect ox for strength.

Miss Tucker is as popular in London as she is here for her originality and gusto. She served matjes herring, a Kosher delicacy, to a member of the British nobility for tea and her guest loved it. There is no pose and no pretense about Sophie.

There was a time when she played in a nickelodeon on One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street owned and operated by Marcus Laew and Nicholas Schenck. Their show consisted of a two-reeler picture and a song and dance by Sophie Tucker. Alternating with the two-reeler she did her act every twenty minutes—twenty shows a day. How do you like that, Hollywood? That's trouping, that is.

In those days she played blackface almost continually because a manager told her she ought to cover up that homely mug of hers. Again it was an accident that released her from it.

During a vaudeville tour her trunks were lost and she arrived in Springfield, Massachusetts, sans everything but a suitcase and the clothes she had on her back. No make-up, nothing. Came time for the rise of the curtain is not hers, but rather the picture itself. Visually beautiful and tuneful too, it is dull and a bit boring at times. When it ends after two hours and twenty minutes, even an ardent admirer of Miss MacDonald is relieved—and somewhat exhausted. Not from a surfeit of her lovely art, but because what he has seen on the screen has not clicked except in occasional moments, has not seemed right. There is none of the poignant sweetness of "Maytime," no reminder of the exhilarating freedom and spontaneity of "Rose-Marie," none of the veneer of "Naughty Marietta." Instead, the new picture is artificial operetta from beginning to end. Nor does a lot of war stuff, introduced for a loud finale, add a jot of realism. Allan Jones is in a tough spot as the successor of Nelson Eddy in Miss MacDonald's screen affections. He has everything to qualify for that place except he isn't interesting and doesn't "belong." In other musicals, yes, but he as out of key with Miss MacDonald. She is a Spanish queen saving her king from the clutches of the French. After much intrigue and innumerable interruptions she succeeds so largely that the embattled French, English and Spanish cease their cannonading.

"The Firefly."—MGM. Jeanette MacDonald's first starring picture is a disappointment, a comedown from "Maytime," "Rose-Marie," and "Naughty Marietta." The fault... critical among them will wish it were more polished, but as few of his films have ever been considered worthy of him by exacting admirers, it is safe to say that the majority will overlook defects in the joy of once more beholding their star. I predict satisfaction for them and success for the film. It is light comedy in a desert setting, Mr. Novarro supposedly an Arab, Lola Lane a shrewish American tamed by him in a serio-comic adventure. She returns to her family troubled by the dark stranger and is about to marry a British cad when Mr. Novarro interrupts the ceremony in full sheik regalia. It develops that he is a Spaniard whose foster-father reared him in the desert. The story doesn’t tell us where they will spend their honey-moon, but I would say Holly-wood. All this is set forth speedily.

Action never lets up. That is a major virtue for any film. Another good point is that the picture doesn’t run beyond footage suitable for the subject. I wish that I might say Mr. Novarro had found his ideal heroine in Miss Lane, but a more unpleasant choice cannot be imagined. Her harsh voice and personality persist when she is supposed to be tender, and she shouldn’t wear polo pants.

"It’s All Yours."—Columbia. Francis Lederer is oddly cast in a lighter than light comedy with Madeleine Carroll. Oddly because he is supposed to be an American irked by the foreign Mischa Auer. Mr. Auer fosters the illusion by caricature but Mr. Lederer for all his stalwart Americanism is still a Central European. While picking flaws in the casting I recall that Miss Carroll passes as an American secretary. She passes so gracefully that one is thankful for her beauty and doesn’t question her nationality. However, I don’t think anybody will mind all this. It happens too often in pictures. There is some blurred explanation of Mr. Lederer’s accent anyway. He is a charming profligate, she his rich uncle’s mouselike employee regarded by Mr. Lederer as impersonally as a filing case. When he hoards his employer’s money and Mr. Lederer is cut off with nothing, she becomes a wise Cinderella determined to teach Mr. Lederer a lesson or something. For she secretly loves him. Now you guess whether she remains a spinster or not. Some of the picture is gay, some of it too long drawn out, but the whole is diverting. Miss Carroll is rogueish, delightful, and recent criticism of her make-up was heeded. Her loveliness is more natural now.

"Topper."—MGM. This picture is a witty, whimsical oddity, most unusual of any recent film. It is clever as clever can be and shouldn’t be overlooked by the film-goer in search of a departure from the usual. Cary Grant and Constance Bennett are husband and wife, rich, casual pleasure-seekers in constant pursuit of fun. Speeding madly, their automobile is wrecked and they are killed. But wait! This is no tragedy, it is comedy. For the shades of the young couple rise from their corporeal selves. They speak cheerfully to one another but they cannot be seen. Then they start upon their gayest, maddest adventure. It is a resolution to do a good deed. They seize upon Mr. Topper, a banker friend whose life is hedged in staid conventionality. Their object is to lead him astray, shock his wife and friends and give him a taste of the joy of living fully. Visible and invisible by turns, they lead him on, put ideas in his head and start him off on a spree of wild indiscretions. Their success is a tremendous scandal. Fascinating trick photography adds to the picture’s interest. The players are top-notch. Mr. Grant plays with engaging lightness, Miss Bennett is a capital comedienne, and Roland Young—Mr. Topper—excels even himself in wry comedy.

"That Certain Woman."—Warners. Any picture in which Bette Davis appears is important nowadays. She grows in artistry, in depth and delicacy. Always there is a blunt honesty in her acting that never robs her of charm but adds force to what she says; and does. I won’t say that her new picture is unworthy of her. It gives her ample opportunity anyway. But it is such hokum. It sweeps into one story a dozen situations that we have seen a hundred times or more. However, the dialogue is strong, terse, the direction sparkles and the acting of all concerned is remarkably free and spontaneous. But it boils down to much ado about nothing. Written and directed by Edmund Goulding, the story also served Gloria Swanson under the title of "The Trespasser" in the silent days. There seems no urgent need for its reappearance except to occupy the screen with something. The story asks us to believe that Miss Davis can’t keep out of trouble with men. Deceived by a gangster when a mere gel—she married at sixteen—her second marriage is a failure, too. Her father-in-law has it annulled because he thinks Bette not quite nice enough for his playboy son, although we find her more honorable than any one in the cast. The third man is her rich employer who cannot offer marriage on account of his wife. The censored screen would have us believe that Bette offers him spiritual comfort in exchange for a luxurious life. Oh well, her ex-husband's wife, beautiful Anita Louise in a wheel chair, conveniently dies and he is free to remarry Bette. I do not accept this as a play: it is just a vehicle.

"Vogues of 1938."—United Artists. To say this is the best fashion film ever made is too faint praise. It is so far ahead of every similar attempt that it cannot be compared with any of them. It excels on several counts. First, it is the most beautiful Technicolor that the screen has so far captured. Color becomes dramatic, uplifting, soothing, as it is employed in these creations of designer's art. Another superiority is the clever way the innumerable dresses, wraps, hats and furs are presented. No tiresome parade of mincing, swaying mannequins; the models are introduced casually. So smart, interest and beautiful are they that one doesn't see any of them long enough. Then, too, the story that carries along the fashions is utterly right. It is light but clever, the characterizations are unusually definite and it is amusing and sophisticated. Warner Baxter is head of a great house of fashion. His wife, Helen Vinson, is dissatisfied because she isn't on the stage. Joan Bennett is an upper class society girl who refuses to marry Alan Mowbray and persuade Mr. Baxter to employ her as a model. Mr. Mowbray backs Mischa Auer as a rival designer to ruin Mr. Baxter. He all but succeeds when Mr. Baxter's bankruptcy makes everybody with the greatest fashion show that ever was. The color is so true that even the offstage loveliness of Miss Vinson and Miss Bennett is reproduced to the life.

"Souls at Sea."—Paramount. If you are ready for another marine melodrama here it is, say I with a yawn. (A little tired of slave ships, that's all.) This one begins with Gary Cooper on trial for his life in Philadelphia about a hundred years ago. He is charged with causing the death of seven persons by hurling them from a life-boat during the burning of his ship. His wife, an ingénue who owes her life to his not pitching her overboard, too. This introduction ends with a fade-out which takes us back to the beginning of things. We find Mr. Cooper is an honest seaman, not a trafficker in slaves, and that he is secretly retained by the British government to unmask the guilty heads of the syndicate who wax rich on the sale of blacks. Just why he is cleared of the charge against him when it is brought out that he was serving Queen Victoria is not clear to me, but the photography is crystalline and the fire at sea is thrilling as marine conflagrations always are. But for all the elaboration of detail the picture is deadly close to routine in spite of its length. Mr. Cooper is excellent in a straightforward part. Whatever success the picture will come from him. George Raft is admirable, too, and Olympe—pronounced O-lamp—Bradna is the surprise of the film. Frances Dee fares poorly in a silly rôle, her charming face marred by a monstrous wig that suggests a black spaniel.

"Dead End."—United Artists. The slums are no proper place to live in and they are the worst place to bring up boys. They (the boys) are sure to be hoodlums and grow up to be gangsters, especially with the example of Humphrey Bogart before them. But if by the grace of God they have the makings of a leading man in them, with a leading man's looks and pure speech, they are sure to get up virtuously like Joel McCrea, receive any rich employer and get out of the slums. Samuel Goldwyn paid $165,000 for the right to spend several times that amount in telling us this on the screen. In other words, the successful stage play is not a dramatic sock in the cinema. Its chief novelty is the setting and it becomes monotonous after an hour or so. A fashionable apartment building towers over surrounding tenements in the dead-end street facing New York's East River, offering us the ironic contrast of rich and poor. A sissy boy is set upon, beaten and robbed by the hoodlums; a rich man's mistress casting about for virility almost finds romance with an idealistic member of the people; a successful gangster returns to the slums where he was born and is spurned by his mother and the sweetheart of his youth now a tubercular prostitute. Gunplay, police, knife-fighting, create suspense, death for the gangster, reformatory for the ringleader of the juvenile gang and hope for Mr. McCrea's and Sylvia Sidney's escape to a quieter neighborhood. Of course, all this is expertly done. The picture is anything but ordinary. On the other hand, there seems no particular reason for it except its

Finally the Clover Club, in Los Angeles, heard of us. They wired. Someone who owned part of the club was at the Waldorf in New York. Our agent talked things over with him. He called Los Angeles, "O.K." said the club, 'Send 'em out.'

"We figured it was a new spot. We'd either get over or be kicked back to New York. On the opening night Gloria Swanson, Herbert Marshall, Marlene Dietrich, and Carole Lombard were there. Something happened to us, we were sure of ourselves. We clicked. Marshall, Swanson, and Lombard sent notes back to us. 'You're great,' they said, 'keep it up.'

"After our cave-man number we came out for bows. Each of us grabbed a girl from a ringside table, danced around with her, pulled her into a side room. The young woman I seized was shy and a little scared. 'What will my husband say?' she exclaimed. 'Girlie,' I asked, 'who's your husband?' 'I'm Mrs. Darryl Zanuck,' she answers. 'Lady,' I says, 'my mistake! My mistake!' Maybe I didn't hurry her back to her table!"

Jimmy took up the story again. "Next day some of the studios got busy," he relates. "We want the boys,' they told their aids. But not a word came from Zanuck. And no wonder, we thought.

"But somehow we held off signing. Right after that we entertained at the Mayfair Actors' Fund ball. Zanuck was there. We went out on the floor, clowning around impromptu and waved 'em. Zanuck asked, 'Go get those mugs, I want 'em.'

"'Next day Twentieth Century sent us a contract. It had everything we had hoped for. 'Lau,' we said to our agent, 'that's the studio for us.' And we signed. And, say, we've never regretted it.'

"The studio has its problems with the boys. They kid the actors, break up scenes, poke fun at the directors, practically wreck the commissary. Nothing is sacred. After their hit in "Sing, Baby, Sing," the boys had a vacation in Manhattan. The studio summoned them back, planned a big welcome in Los Angeles. A whole chorus was assembled in costume to do the honors. But the boys thought it would be funny to get off at Pasadena and leave the reception committee flat.

"Here's the way the Ritz boys explain it. "We think people like us on the lot," they say. "After we landed there, they'd say, 'What's happened to the place?' We tried to put life in the joint. I guess we nearly drove everybody screwy. Now everybody knows what to expect. Everything is lovely. Hollywood is a pleasure.'"

"There is another brother, George. He's in the ready-to-wear business in lower Manhattan and he has three children. Of the movie Ritzes only Jimmy is unmarried. Harry and Al married nonprofessionals and have no children.

"'What are your plans for the future?' I asked the boys.

"Al looked at Jimmy. Jimmy looked at Harry.

"'The future?' they answered. "Say, that's why libraries are full of books. Trying to answer that one. We just hope to get another gag.'

"'Yeah,' said Jimmy, 'a laugh will get you in anywhere.'

"'And out,' concluded Harry.
Two Kings Share One Crown

Son of a mid-Western physician, he early had every advantage that a boy could have; the right toys, the right food, the right exercise, the right companionship, the right education, the right training—all these were his without question.

As he grew older, nothing was lacking in his life. He met no sharp struggles to bewilder him or to confuse the even tenor of his days. After high school, there was college. All in all, a leisurely, normal, right life for a boy of his years.

He has no corroding memories of physical lacks. He has never gone hungry; he has never been cold; he has never been without suitable clothing. He made the jump from college directly into a studio. Whatever struggles he may have had in his rise to fame, they were not devastating. Normal disappointments, impatience, discouragement—yes. But none strong enough to scar him.

He has no deep-seated memories of hurts as Gable has.

When he appeared in "Magnificent Obsession" that untouched quality about Taylor was evident. Here was a boy with illusions intact. And that breathless sense of romance, which in the final analysis is the thing which has made Taylor the favorite he is to-day.

As Taylor grows older, as he is matured in his talents and in his personal life, a quality of phantasy which lingers around him will probably be dispelled and then he will be a greater idol. For he will give to women the two things they want—reality plus romance.

In Gable that romance only flashes out. In Taylor it is a constant factor.

In effect, Gable and Taylor to-day are sharing the affections and romantic notions of the world as a whole. They have both set standards—and women follow both.

That is as it should be, for women are complex and their needs are multiple and changing.

So Gable holds his throne by his reality, and Taylor shares it by the romance he awakens.

Two heroes—Gable and Taylor—vastly unlike. Both great.

Love and the urge to sing came together. It was at High school that Kenny met Geraldine Churchill. Love cannot be put into cold words, so the ex-violinist sang.

His mother encouraged him; Geraldine encouraged him; every one encouraged him. Instead of idling the summer away, basking in Geraldine's romantic aura, he worked in Los Angeles, spending his wages on singing lessons.

Kenny is farsighted. That is, he knows you've got to set about to work right now for things. The future brings nothing of itself. He wanted a career; he wanted to marry Geraldine. He couldn't get a career unless he studied for one; he couldn't ask his sweetheart to become his wife unless he had a home for her.

At twenty, Kenny did his first public singing—at churches, at clubs and social functions. But these first steps were not his Ultimo Thule. With the coming of another summer, he was at Las Vegas, Nevada, working hard to earn money for singing tuition. Later, he lobered on a farm in New Mexico. It was at this time that a turn occurred. He found work in a Roman Novarro film, singing with a group of others. He was able to study with Edword Novis, brother of Donald. There was a radio contest, in which Kenny came out second. This result did not down him. He studied harder than ever. Eventually radio work was his.

With things coming his way, Kenny asked Geraldine to become Mrs. Baker. Then things started to move faster and faster. He won Eddy Duchin's Texaco radio contest, and was also permitted to sing for a week at the Coconut Grove.

It was there Mervyn LeRoy saw him, and gave him a contract. Votes gave Kenny his engagement with the Jack Benny Jell-O broadcast. This year's radio poll nominates him third among male singers.

Modesty, or reticence, marks Kenny as on original newcomer. The average chap desires to impress you—by implication or inference—that his initial work staggered all who beheld it. But Kenny does not even consider himself an actor yet.

"I realize," he said, "how much singing has aided me to step from the air to the screen. I'm not an actor. At least, not yet. But I'll probably develop into a possible one. I don't see myself ever rivaling Paul Muni, though. Broadcasting rid me of stage fright, if ever I had any. In a way, I'm keeping up in the same work. In 'The King and the Chorus Girl,' I sang a song. It was a mere bit. Yet it was better than to find myself in a lead I wasn't ready for."

In a way, he is similar to Dick Powell. Both are Warner players, and both do the same stuff. It will be interesting to keep an eye on each one during the next year.

But even with the imminent knock of popularity on his door, Kenny remains cool, calm, and collected. He is businesslike in his career. It is not art for art's sake," Mr. Baker holds to sensibility.

"If I thought my life was to become full of pretense and posing, I'd do something about it," he declared, in seeming earnestness. "I like to be noticed, as any professional does. I like fan mail, if that means anything. So far, I've only had radio mail. It's first sent to New York, so the sponsors can check the number of letters."

Living in San Fernando Valley, the happy hunting-ground of many movie players these days, Kenny has settled down as a proud resident.

"Before I got a break, while edging my way into radio work, I lived in an apartment," he recalled for my benefit, "so I could see how he enjoys the domestic bliss of the Valley. 'I'd get up at five or six in the morning to practice. It must have been annoying to the neighbors."

"But apartments ore annoying at any time. You know, people ore all around you—like the canons of the Light Brigade. You can hear them in their bedrooms, their kitchens, their bathrooms. In the country you can relax, with nary a discouraging sound."

As I said in the beginning, the average movie newcomer pretends. A normal existence is not for him. He must dwell in luxury and fling himself into the swim of fashion.

But, as I also remarked at the beginning, Kenny Baker is not an average young man. Crowds do not attract him.

"I have few friends," he said, "not a lot. I'm not one who must have a large audience in private as well as on the stage."

Professionally, he is gathering about him an ever-increasing audience. In private, he may not have a large crowd.

But with Geraldine by him, his charming wife these four years, Kenny has no desire for a mass meeting of acquaintances in their happy San Fernando Valley home.

Margaret Lindsay demonstrates the new "rocking-chair" rowboat. She is currently appearing on the screen in Warners' "Back in Circulation."
Now—this new Cream brings to Women the Active “Skin-Vitamin”

Applied right on the Skin—this special Vitamin helps the Skin more directly

"IT'S WONDERFUL," says Mrs. C. Henry Mellon, Jr.

one of the first women to use Pond's new "skin-vitamin" Cold Cream. "It's wonderful," she says. "My skin is so much brighter—and finer textured. The new cream is even better than before. Congratulations to Pond's—and to all women."

THIS NEW CREAM does more for the skin than ever before! It contains a certain vitamin found in many foods—the "skin-vitamin."

When you eat foods containing this vitamin, one of its special functions is to help keep skin tissue healthy. But when this vitamin is applied right to skin, it aids the skin more directly.

Here is great news for women:

First doctors found this out. Then Pond's found a way to put "skin-vitamin" into Pond's Cold Cream. Now everyone can have Pond's new "skin-vitamin" Cold Cream!

Famous beauty cream now has "Something More"

Pond's Cold Cream has always been more than a cleanser. Patted into the skin, it invigorates it, keeps it clear, soft, free from skin faults.

But now this famous cream is better than ever for the skin. Women say its use makes their pores less noticeable, softens lines; best of all, seems to give a livelier, more glowing look to their skin.

Same jars, same labels, same price

Already this new Pond's "skin-vitamin" Cold Cream is on sale everywhere.

The cream itself has the same pure white color, the same delightful light texture.

But remember, as you use it, that Pond's Cold Cream now contains the precious "skin-vitamin." Not the "sunshine" vitamin. Not the orange-juice vitamin. Not "irradiated." But the vitamin which especially helps to maintain healthy skin—skin that is soft and smooth, fine as a baby's!

SEND IT IN 9 TREATMENTS

THE NEW CREAM! Pond's, Dept. 14-C, Clifton, N. J. Rush special tube of Pond's new "skin-vitamin" Cold Cream, enough for 9 treatments, with samples of 2 other Pond's "skin-vitamin" Creams and 3 different shades of Pond's Face Powder. I enclose 10¢ to cover postage and packing.

SHE LIVES IN Beauty

BY MYRTLE GEBHART

Dolores del Rio's living room has putty-colored walls that rise from a black lacquer floor and woodwork of Chinese red. The two huge divans are covered with a putty-toned fabric; their backs are built-in bookcases. Note the oil painting of Dolores above the black and chromium fireplace.

EACH woman creates her own home, daily renewing its spirit. It reflects her personality and is her own source of strength.

Every star is a different type of housewife, because each is a definite individualization of womanhood.

Born to wealth, Dolores del Rio hasn't the faintest idea how much the food costs, or the laundry. All household bills are sent to Cedric Gibbons, her husband. He signs the checks. Firmly, though politely, he refused to disclose details of household expenditures.

The housewife Dolores is the result of her training. Her father, J. L. Asunsolo, was active in banking institutions. An only child, she was delicately reared. At the convent of St. Joseph, in Mexico City, she learned languages and the womanly graces.

To understand her at home, you must know her background. At fifteen, by parental arrangement—that being the custom—she was married to Jaime del Rio, ten years older, who had met her at a charity bazaar. She was presented at the Spanish court of Alphonsa XIII and became Mexico's social queen. Hollywood success came later, and the death of her husband.

Wealthy in her own right, Dolores never has had to count pennies. Married—her first mature womanly love—to the outstanding cinema art director, it is natural that she continue in the tradition to which she was born; that woman's main duty is to manage the home expertly and to endow it with peace and charm.

"My husband shares the viewpoint on which I was reared," she explained. "The man earns; the wife sees that he is comfortable and happy. My mother is my
She Lives in Beauty

Cedric Gibbons had planned a modernistic bachelor home. At a dinner he was presented to Dolores. Beneath her delicate dignity he saw the subtle vibrance that had been smothered by tradition.

Two months later they were married. Plans for the home were altered, adapted to frame a background for his bride. Formality and freedom were blended adroitly. A palace for a princess in the modern mode! "To-day's personification of illustrious lineage," he described her beauty to a friend.

Having sensed rippling streams of a self restricted by a heavily draped life, he made her free, setting her placid poise and her skin like a ripening peach against clear crystal and glistening chromium. A few dulled colors for moods of wistful thought—rare, now, for "the sod one of the river," which her name means, has slipped away.

Set in one of the high, white walls is a large fluted gate of chromium. The grounds are cool with pines and a grove of cypress—and riotous with loveliness when either the wild cherries are in bloom, or the gardenia bushes spill their fragrance.

Artificial rain cools the house in summer, a mechanical device dripping chilled water onto the roof.

The front door is a massive chromium panel, satin-finished to reduce the glitter. Putty-colored walls rise on two sides of the lounge from a black lacquer floor. A third wall is mirrored, while a huge window and a staircase occupy the fourth side. Corduroy-covered divans make the momentary wait restful.

Before the fireplace hangs a chromium mesh curtain.
On a crystal-topped coffee table—fully five feet across—there is a modernistic statue in bronze, done by Cedric while Dolores was in Hawaii on "The Bird of Paradise."

To the left of the lounge is the master's suite. From the other side, one enters the dining room.

A prismatic room of clear, translucent beauty! The oblong table, its azed crystal top two inches thick, seats twelve. Walls of the prevalent putty tones raise a severe background. The chairs are upholstered in white horsehair. Ceiling-high windows, overlooking the terraces and gardens, are draped in folds of gold duvetyn. Paneled mirrors, steps of glass dawn one side of the ceiling, reflect the table's appointments.

For formal dinners, silver service plates are used, white en famille. The china is all of a delicate eggshell in pure white. Her silver and linens are marked with a "D" or a "G" in her own individual formation of letters. For the table she prefers linen damask, using her banquet cloth of lace only occasionally.

The staff consists of six servants. Their quarters are over the garage. Dolores supervises every detail, though her orders reach the other servants via Rose. Housekeeper and personal maid, Rose has been with the star ten years.

The chauffeur, Tom, is Rose's husband. Joseph, the butler, Mary the cook, Elsie the laundress, and George the gardener, cheerfully perform their tasks. Elsie does the household mending, but Rose permits no hands other than her own to repair her lady's clothes.

Rose, the first one up, prepares and serves Mrs. Gibbons fruit and café au lait. Mr. Gibbons drinks orange juice and plays tennis with a friend. Only the servants eat real breakfasts.

Dolores goes over the day's routine with Rose, and makes out the dinner menu. Mary is present at this morning conference only if a party is scheduled.

For a guest luncheon the menu is likely to consist of tamata soup, sweetbreads sauté served with brailed mushrooms, peas, string beans, strawberry Bavaroise, Sauterne, demi-tasse.

In famille, they prefer simple food such as clear soup, roast and potatoes, vegetables, a salad or light dessert.

Cocktails are passed on silver trays. The folding Raman tables used for large buffet suppers are exquisite, handmade from a design by Cedric. At one of their recent parties guests were served roast veal, browned potatoes with sour-cream dressing, salmon mousse, Raman noodles, vegetable salad, and Boston cream pie with hot chocolate sauce.

On free days Dolores reads, sun-bakes, writes letters and visits her mother who lives next door. Last spring she and her gardener planted rows of vegetables in Mrs. Asunsola's orchard. In the garden the star wears blue-jean overalls.

Indoors, she is invariably dressed, preferring a skirt and light sweater or blouse in the forenoon. During the cocktail hour she wears shimmering hostess gowns, remarking that her mother always

On the opposite page is the back patio looking onto the garden. Below it the entrance lounge, its other half reflected in the wall mirror. Next is the magazine corner of the living room. A novelty is that Del Rio is not reading Picture Play but another good magazine.

The beautiful dining room, above, features a table with an addit. crystal top and chairs upholstered in white horsehair. The black lacquered floor of the entrance lounge reflects Del Rio standing beside the famous Kolbe statue.
With Paramount's Olympe Bradna as model, and hats by Sally Victor, who created most of the headgear for "Vogues of 1938," here are the most becoming of the new season's headlines. Turbans of fur sweep upward, their heavy outlines softened by veils. Brimmed hats square off at the front, sounding belligerent but accenting a seductive eyebrow. Turbans of multi-colored suède promise to be the success of the year. Favorite of the younger set is the sharply upturned brim banked with pompons gay as confetti.
For informal dining a sly little Victorian bonnet with chenille fringe and trailing veils gives the wearer a demure look. Even the tiny hat that sets out to be conservative, thinks better of it and juts upward in saucy peaks. Hats will be flaunted, not just worn.
DELLA LIND'S coat is of summer ermine. The mutton-leg sleeve and small stand-up collar are new fall notes that give individuality.

Her sports coat has a fitted waistline of particular interest. Note the angled pockets.

Silver-gray lace fashions her evening gown, the dropped sleeve and décolleté back a charming accent on youth.
MISS LIND'S formal evening gown is of dusty pink chiffon and high-waisted, with tiny pleats forming the bodice. The youthfulness of the small draped sleeves and bows lend charm.

Ermine and sable dramatize her coat. The loose sleeves, capelike collar and fitted hipline are new notes in sumptuous fall fashions.

Y LAURA BENHAM

NOT long ago I conducted a very informal poll among the men of my acquaintance to learn the first thing they noticed about a woman. Some of them said her eyes, others her hair or skin or both—but over half of them agreed on one subject and said “Her hands!”

So, armed with this information, I began to watch the hands of every woman I saw—my friends, casual acquaintances, women I passed on the street or sat beside in the subway or in restaurants. Some of them were actresses and business women, many were wives and home-makers, others were college girls and social leaders. And I must confess I was appalled at the result.

For the widespread application of liquid polish seemed to only attention the majority of women were giving their hands and nails and thus the really lovely hand was the exception rather than the rule it should be. For of all our features, the hands respond most readily to care and are the most easily made beautiful.

So, I decided to remind you this month that there’s more to a lovely hand than polished nails. To be truly attractive a hand should be soft and smooth and white (except when the entire body is sun-tanned), the nails should be shaped to conform to the contour of the fingers and the shade of polish should be chosen not only to harmonize with the size and shape of the hand, but with the personality of the wearer, as well.

Therefore, if you would have hands of which you can be truly proud, you must begin with the skin.

Now, we all know that the hands are exposed to water longer than any other part of the body. Thus, they need more lubrication to prevent dryness and chapping, especially during the winter. This means three things—first, care in the selection of soaps that touch the hands, second a carefully chosen hand lotion used faithfully, and third a rich cream for nightly nourishment.

Beginning with soap, let me explain that it isn’t the soap you use for washing your hands that usually causes the damage to delicate skin, for you are likely to use for your hands the same mild, bland soaps you use on your face and body. But it’s the soaps used for other things that women are so often careless about.

For instance: Nearly all of us do a certain amount of “cleaning” around home, whether we live with a large family and help with the dinner dishes, or are business women who “live alone and like it” and consider the polishing of a few tea cups or a favorite vase our greatest household chores.

And this is where we’re apt to be a bit careless, using harsh soaps and cleansers, when it would cost little if anything more to wash our dishes with the same brand of soap we use for our baths, or with the gentle soap flakes to which we intrust our pet wool sweaters and hose and lingerie.

So, the first thing to remember in acquiring beautiful hands is to protect them from all harsh soaps. And then, be sure that even the mildest soap suds are thoroughly rinsed away and the hands carefully dried.

Well, once you’ve resolved to allow only bland soaps to touch your hands and to rinse even these soaps away thoroughly, the next step is to keep a good, rich hand lotion within easy reaching distance at all times. Keep a bottle in your bathroom, another in the kitchen or in your desk drawer if you work in an office, and never, never forget to apply it after your hands have been in water.

One of the best hand lotions I know of is made by the firm famous for its bouquet-scented soap. It’s a smooth, milky emulsion scented to match the soap and it dries quickly, leaving the skin soft and smooth and deliciously fragrant. It’s not the least bit sticky and leaves no greasy residue—in fact you can put on gloves right after using this lotion, and that’s the best test I know.

And even the bottle in which this lotion comes is attractive—it’s rather flat, and hob-nailed glass with a nice white cap on it.

The third step in keeping hands lovely consists of the nightly use of a good hand cream. This is especially important during the winter, you may be sure.

For this, one of the best night hand creams I’ve found is that made by a famous manicure salon. It’s of the massage type, is iridescent-looking and after a few moments’ brisk rubbing, vanishes, leaving the hands feeling perfectly natural, only a little softer than usual. There’s no grease

Foundations of Beauty

Short, stubby nails were never meant for the darker polishes, but large hands with proportionately large nails will be perfect with the richest, deepest reds.

Of course most smart women find several shades of polish they like and that are becoming to them and they vary their shades with their moods and the colors they are wearing.

Which brings me to the suggestion that the new Club Kit just introduced by the world’s largest manufacturer of manicure products, contains everything you’ll need for a perfect manicure, even including a finger-rest on which you place each finger while applying polish. This is indeed a boon as it keeps the finger steady and gives it a firm base, so the polish flows on smoothly with little effort.

Another fine series of polishes are those made by the firm which first came out with the now-famous Crime polishes. Among their newest shades are two called Sunrise and Sunset, both of them rich and dark and calculated to make hands look fair and white and ever so interesting. And these polishes are famous for their lasting power, too. They have a high luster and will not chip or peel or fade and the mysterious white deposit in the bottom of each bottle serves as a medium for keeping these polishes smooth and creamy and always in solution.

There’s a new glycerated polish-remover in this line, too, that is fine for the nails and that you are sure to like.

Of course by now you’ve decided to give your toes the same type of manicure you give your hands, for even though it’s too cold for bare feet on the beach, winter evening sandals will keep our toes exposed far enough time to come. And the toe that twinkle between the bright silver or gold sandal straps must have a well-groomed polish all its own.

The only thing to remember in manicuring your toenails is to file them straight across rather than into the same oval shape you give your fingernails, as you’ll find this smarter as well as more practical.

And now that we’re on the subject of feet, let me tell you about a set of three items that will erase wrinkles from your brow by taking the tiredness from your feet.

Made by a firm that has for years specialized in products for the feet, this trio consists of a granulated foot soap that is applied with a brush and which stirs up circulation, penetrates deeply into the pores and sooths tired tissues into new life and vitality.
and the baggage was still missing, and Sophie was as flustered as the occasion demanded.

"I've been wondering why a handsome woman like you covered up her face with all that black stuff anyway," the theater manager remarked thoughtfully. "Go on as you are and do your act."

Sophie Carries On

She is here. During an engagement at The Kit Kat Club she saw a gentleman standing with his back to the dressing-room stairs chatting with friends on the stage.

"Who is that distinguished-looking man?" she asked a fellow player.

"Why, don't you know?" the girl said curiously. "That's the Prince of Wales."

"Bless me," said Sophie, and in her excitement caught her heel in a plank which pitched her headlong down the stairs and smack into the arms of the royal guest. Which, I suppose, is as good a way of meeting a gentleman as any other. At least he won't forget it.

Sophie Tucker is about as genuine a person as one could meet. There is no pose and no pretense about her. Few people would meet a writer for the first time when they were suffering with an attack of grippe.

And no one but Sophie would serve maties herring to a member of the British nobility for tea. Sophie said she wanted to give her guest something she had never had before and she seemed to like it for she ate every snip.

And then there was the time of New York's Palace Theater fire a few years ago. It was Sophie's first engagement after a London appearance and she came down for her act to find the scenery backstage blazing away.

"You can't go on, Miss Tucker!" shouted a frenzied manager. "We'll have to ring down the curtain."

Sophie laughed. "Nonsense," she said. "Just put the fire out, that's all you have to do."

She did the rest. While engines from a four-alarm fire clanged outside the theater the audience sat in their seats, held there from inevitable panic by the courage and the laughter of Sophie Tucker.

She was thoroughly reconditioned for pictures and the hairdressers, the madistes and make-up staff took such pains with her that Sophie thought a celebration was in order when it was all over. She invited the whole troupe to lunch with her in the studio commis- sary and sat in their midst like a rose in full bloom. Into the picture stradd a tall, lithe man who bent over her hand saying, "Sophie Tucker! How many years I've admired and wanted to meet you." It was Clark Gable. So he sat down, too, and they all had a grand time. Her work in "Broadway Melody" said MGM executives hook, line, and sinker an Sophie as a box-office draw.

They bought Frances Marion's novel, "Molly, Bless Her," depicting the life of Marie Dressler for her starring picture.

Well, na ane will take the place of Marie Dressler but there are other actresses with her great heart and her great understanding, and I think Sophie is one of these.

Just before she returned to America from London, Sophie was asked to organize an all-American benefit for a pet charity of the late King George V. Sophie went to work and the date set for the performance was December 10th.

Edward's abdication speech was given at ten o'clock London time that night. Sophie's first appearance was slated for ten minutes past the hour.

Gertrude Michael affects this Cleopatra coiffure for "Sophie Lang Goes West," with Larry Crabbe opposite.

It took Sophie a full minute to digest this. No one had told her she was handgame before. "Well," she shrugged, "I guess it's all in the paint at view." There was no falling off in the reception she got that night. "In fact," she said, "they seemed to like it even better than blackface." So she never wore blackface again.

Ziegfeld happened to be in the audience and before she left the theater her name was an automatic to appear in the "Fallies." The engagement lasted one night. Once that blase audience got a load of Sophie it didn't want to see any one else on the bill—just wanted more of Sophie. That didn't set so well with the others in the show.

The backstage shenanigans were too much both for Sophie and for Mr. Ziegfeld. It was either the gate for her or the rest of the cast, so she and Mr. Ziegfeld parted by mutual agreement.

In London Sophie is as popular as John King, of "The Road Back" fame, plays bridge between scenes of his current "Merry-Go-Round of 1938."

She walked out on the stage and faced the audience, for the first time in her life, she said, not knowing what to do on a stage. She just stood there speechless, motionless before the people she loved and whom she knew loved her. When the silence became more than painful a little voice from the gallery piped, "Carry on, Soph, carry on!"

"I snapped into action then," she told me, "but it was the child that did it."
showing versatility and a lusty warmth never suggested by her screen rôles.

Offstage, she was friendly and affable and meek, cooperated wholeheartedly in getting publicity for the little company, and in general belied the rumors from Hollywood that she had gone grande dame.

Jean Muir was a poignant heroine in several plays at Suffern, New York, provoking such demonstrations as even Helen Hayes never got there. Gertrude Michael endeared herself to Cape Cod audiences in a play of Colonial days. And Henry Fonda romped through the musty archives of "The Virginian," a stalwart hero of the old school. Anno Moy Wong put up a losing, if decoratice, battle against veteran stage players with magnificent voices. All together, Hollywood gained new respect from stage devotees.

Bad News For Mr. Selznick.—Perhaps the most auspicious début in prospect, and the most dismal in performance, was that of Margaret Tollichet, often mentioned as the dark horse who might play "Scarlett O'Hara" in "Gone With the Wind."

Miss Tollichet, you may remember, was the aggressive reporter on a small-town paper who interviewed a Hollywood talent scout and confided her determination to break into pictures. His encouragement was mild, but she went to Hollywood, and eventually after a session working as typist for Paramount, got Corole Lombard to recommend her to Selznick.

After playing bits in "A Star Is Born" and "Prisoner of Zendo," she persuaded Mr. Selznick to gamble on her to the extent of paying for a course at a New York dramatic school. Her graduation present was playing opposite Henry Fonda in "The Virginian." If she has any promise as an actress, it was not evident there. It was just one of those ghostly occasions when an audience felt embarrassed for a performer.

Mae West in Second Place.—The high point of the new Mae West picture seems to be that Schiaparelli, that modcap Porision designer who from time to time has dressed Marlene Dietrich and Miriam Hopkins, has made the costumes for it.

Figuring that the period of the Merry Widow hats, about 1908, was shocking only in a naïve sort of way, Schiaparelli has adopted "Shocking" as her byword of this season, and launched a fruity pink and plum color, a large hot with sweeping upturned brim, and perky bows at the neck of dresses as forerunners of Mae West fashions. A papier-mâché dressmaker dummy of Mae West's figure sent to Paris for fittings, so inspired Schiaparelli that she had a bottle repro mode and filled it with perfume that she calls "Shocking."

Joan Bennett Sets a Pace.—The open-air plaza of Radio City was the setting of a party given for Joan Bennett, when the Professional Models' Association commended her for giving new dignity to the profession by her rôle in "Vogues of 1938."

I'd like to award Miss Bennett a handsome plaque myself for being the most casual and breezily friendly of film belles.

So near-sighted that she cannot detect her closest friend at close range, she has adopted the pleasant habit of welcoming everyone with a pleasant smile. You're a friend until proved otherwise. She confesses to being terrified at the prospect of competing with the most dazzling of dress models in this picture, but when she found that they didn't know how to figure their best angles in motion, she decided it was an even break.

The lengthy tests of fabrics and colors made for this picture never bored her. She has always been interested in clothes and here was a chance to find out which photographed best. Miss Bennett was wearing a simple black frock with printed flowers decorating it sparsely, a three-strand pearl choker, and one of those tiny, uptilted hots that seems poised for flight.

Sent On Approval.—Joan steered conversation away from herself when she found that I knew Louise Platt, newest member of Walter Wanger's company which is otherwise made up of such solidly intrenched stars as Madeleine Carroll, Charles Boyer, Miss Bennett herself, Sylvia Sidney, and Henry Fonda.
"Louise has great possibilities" Joan told me. "She was awfully nervous at first, but every one liked her so much, she got over it right away. She is an unusual girl, has such depth that she is a constant surprise. I liked working with her in 'I Met My Love Again.' My only complaint is that she ought to talk more, her voice is so musical."

Triumphant Return.—Although Louise Platt has signed a contract to make more pictures for Walter Wanger, she insisted on coming back to New York to work on the stage for a few months. And in spite of her Hollywood money, she is returning to the same more than modest quarters she occupied when struggling to get a hearing on the New York stage.

That is a break for me because we will be neighbors again, and Louise is one of the few individuals I can lace at breakfast without flinching. She is more given to ominous silences than to speech, and I am agog to see if some canny interviewer sets out to reveal all about her after a few minutes’ conversation.

I don't know anything about her except that from the first time I saw her I have felt that here is a girl marked for future greatness. There is thunder and lightning in her personality. And I can hear her razzing me about that statement now, "Will you have a little thunder or lightning with your coffee?"

Mamma Is An Asset.—Aside from Louise Platt, I find Olympe Bradna the most engaging and promising of newcomers to the screen.

Little Olympe of the confiding eyes and tremulous chin had the good judgment to be born into a family that for five generations had been eminent in the circus world. Hollywood's glories are just tinsel to a mother who has played command performances at many royal palaces, so there is little chance that Olympe will ever grow self-important.

Mamma has the professional viewpoint, lets her doll-like daughter do her work without any hampering advice. Mamma speaks up only to pay tribute to George Raft's kindness in demanding that Paramount give Olympe the rôle opposite him in "Souls at Sea."

She had long been under contract to the studio, but they had used her only for a flash of acrobatic dancing in musicals. In New York, Olympe passed up theaters in order to go to the movies. And as soon as she is old enough to have dates with boys, she is coming to New York to go on a shopping spree, buying innumerable woody green and wine-red dresses and romantic hats with swirling veils.

Matinée Idol for Men.—In a burst of inspiration, Republic grabbed off Joe di Maggio, current idol of the baseball diamond, to play a few scenes in "Manhattan Merry-Go-Round."

No one bothered to make a test of him, because no matter how terrible he was, he would draw a large part of the male population of the country to the box office. Imagine their stunned surprise when Joe proved to be a comedian, and a natural adept at playing to the camera.
Hughes-Hopburn Duet.—As many guesses are being made about the outcome of the romance between Howard Hughes and Katharine Hepburn as that of Charles Chaplin and Paulette Goddard. Are they married, will they be married, have they been married? Charlie and Paulette who keep their own counsel have never admitted anything, and Hughes and Katharine are just about as successful in emulating the Sphinx. But they seem to be intensely interested in each other, meeting in New York, Chicago, Hollywood and various ways points on occasion. Hughes paid a lengthy visit to the home of Katharine’s parents during the summer.

Hollywood High Lights

New Elopement Center.— Hollywood has a new Gretna Green. It’s the seaside town of Santa Barbara. There Paula Stone and Anne Shirley were recently married in elopements. Anne, of course, married John Haward Payne, the actor, and Miss Stone was wed to George Walker Mason, a café mon. Paula also witnessed Anne’s civil ceremony. Flights to Yuma, Arizona, and Los Vegas, Nevada, are therefore becoming past history, and you’ll probably hear of everybody in the future going to the millionaire colony on the Coast to have nuptial knots tied speedily. Incidentally, the Warner Oland’s had theirs broken in the same place, but that’s mainly because Warner has his residence near there in Carpentaria.

Lupe Fêtes Aristocracy.— Lupe Velez has taken to entertaining lords and ladies. It’s the result of her trips to England. She gave a party in honor of Sir Louis and Lady Greig at her home in Beverly Hills shortly after her return from abroad. And a huge cornucopia of guests showed up for the event. Lupe didn’t sign the invitations Velez but Weissmuller, which probably indicates that momentarily all is peaceful along the Potomac. Or are Lupe and Johnny really reconciled again at this instant?

Nuptials at Sea!—“I wanted to be married on the high seas because my father, grandfather and great grandfather were married there.” So said Gypsy Rose Lee, and she and her bridegroom had the ceremony performed in a water taxi twenty miles off the coast. But after a honeymoon in Agua Caliente Gypsy Rose had some qualms about the validity of the maritime wedding, and so she had a second at Santa Ana. Bridegroom of Louise Havick—for that’s Gypsy’s screen name—is Robert Mizzy, son of a New York manufacturer.

Time the Jester.—The ups and downs of movie celebrities are duly revealed in the divorce suit filed by Alice White against Sidney S. (Cly) Borlett, in which Alice asked for $1,000 a month alimony, and “I need $200 for singing and dancing lessons.” she said.

Only a few years ago during the flapper stage Alice’s career was literally sailing along, with herself a rival for Claro Bow. To-day she is seldom seen in pictures, while Borlett, who was previously having a difficult time landing anything of solidity and permanence, is now one of the more successful scenario writers.

Alimony Problems.—Another twist of late is that affecting Buster Keaton, former top-notch comedian who recently found himself unable to pay more than $100 monthly alimony. Buster is working again after a long hiatus, producing short films for MGM, where he formerly starred. He was away behind in alimony payments at the time he got the job.

Bottle-scared Veterans.—Movie stars just aren’t safe anywhere, especially at the fights and wrestling matches. Sometimes a wrestler is almost hurled into the lap of some bright sparkler who holds a ringside seat, but when it comes to bottle-throwing that is away out of order. Yet recently, Al Jolsan and Ruby Keeler, as well as Chica Miliza Korjus, opera star from Europe, has been placed under contract by MGM. Credited with singing the highest soprano note on record, Madame Korjus was a Continental musical sensation before her discovery.

A Negro was accused of hurling the bottle, which hit a post and shattered. One piece of the glass hit Ruby and frightened her to death. She literally scaped out of the place. Chico Marx was also hit with the glass. The Negro might not have liked momma songs, but anyway he wasn't aiming at Jolson but at the king.

Rats Deflate Income.—Funny argu ment developed between Wallace

Beery and the income tax experts re tently. It all come about because Wolly attempted to import two boats made from walrus skins which he se cured in Alosko, and expected to rent to the movies. While they were en route to Hollywood rats gnawed the craft so that they were unusable upon arrival. As Wolly figured to make the revenue from the boats part of his income, he wanted to charge off the damage inflicted by the rats, but the government said it was no go. Wolly also wanted something taken off for his plane expense.

Actors Battle Revenues.—Open warfare on the income-tax collectors is likely to be the next step among the actors in Hollywood. They’ve had their fight with the studios about labor difficulties, and now Uncle Sam had better look out.

Adolph Menjou wants some consideration taken of the fact that his clothes cost him a lot of money.

“They’re responsible for the jobs I get,” he said. “Consequently they should exempt me from part of the tax levy on my income.”

Charles Laughton, against whom a deficiency of more than $100,000 was charged, Wallace Beery and Verree

Teasdale (Mrs. Menjou) are among the protesters. And there’ll be many more.

From “Operation” to Operation.—

Pete Smith, that commentator you so often hear telling about sports events, acrobatics, boot races, and what-not, had a most extraordinary experience lately. He was preparing a film called “My Operation,” dealing with some novel medical stunts, and what should happen to him? Right in the midst of making it he had to go to the hospital to have his appendix removed!

HOLLYWOOD MEDLEY

Give me a Hollywood homestead

With a view that accounts for the rent,

Where the Cobots speak only to Garbo

And Garbo speaks only to Brent.

Where the birds are shamed into silence

As MacDonald and Eddy duet,

And Temple pouts sweetly to win me completely;

And Johnny keeps Lupe for a pet.

With a pool in my yard I’d be happy

To have Crawford and Dietrich therein;

For although my choss is somewhat declasse,

I take pleasure in scanning a shin.

Then I’d like a man who’s a mixture Of Gable and Colman and Scott.

Although this is catching, these dreams I am hatching,

I’ll cling to the Eden I’ve got.

used to preside in teagowns over the afternoon ceremony.

The second floor holds the heart of that home. There are the lovely guest suite, Dolores's suite, and the living room.

Though very small, Dolores's bedroom is a perfect setting for her fluescent glow. With its chaise white walls, its simple furnishings, it would have an austere severity were it not for the crystal night tables on either side of the large, low bed, the silvery satin spread and the vicuna fur coverlet.

A pale flame in Dolores's bedroom subtly claims your attention; it beckons to a crystal statue of the Blessed Virgin, a cherished heirloom which belonged to the star's great-great-grandmother. Above it hangs a silver crucifix which has always hung in every room Dolores has ever occupied.

Surrounding a center cylindrical pedestal—the source of the indirect lighting—are graduated crystal shelves. The big chromium chair is upholstered in ivory mutton-skin. Crystal and silver ornaments reflect their delicate dazzle in a huge round mirror.

Silver-leaded, the adjoining dressing room ends in walls of mirrors, before which steps of crystal hold her perfume bottles.

Divisions of the enormous wardrobe cantine clothes for all occasions. One cedar-lined, satin-padded closet holds her furs. There are shelves for accessories; on racks, two hundred pairs of slippers.

The black bathroom is walled with mirrors. No faucets mar the exotic luster; disks in the floor, pressed by the foot, send water into the tub or the large basin.

Leading the way into the enormous living room, like a creamy vapor floating before me, Dolores paused, a tanned hand describing a graceful arc, and said, "My favorite room. It gives me a renewed glow when I am tired; peace and delight always."

It is warmer than the other rooms of a chiseled elegance, and suggests, in subdued notes, those muted undercurrents of Dolores.

Putty-colored walls stand from a black lacquer floor, their expanse based by woodwork of Chinese red. Before the black and chromium fireplace are two huge divans covered with a putty-toned fabric; their backs are built-in bookcases.
unsuccessful attempts to get in tune with the musicians the director stopped and said, "That's all right. Just play the mistakes. Then people will know it's really you playing and not a double."

WHEN a man-sized chimpanzee arrived at the 20th Century-Fox Studio to work in a Jane Withers picture, Shirley Temple rushed over to the cage to take a look. The animal had been unimpressed by the group of grown-ups about the cage, but when Shirley approached, began to scream with rage and struggle with the bars of the cage in an effort to get out. The chimp also made a peculiar clicking noise with his mouth, which amused Shirley.

"He's giving somebody the raspberry," she said, "and I guess it's me."

P.S. It was decided that if the chimp didn't like children it would be better not to use him in the picture. A harmless little monkey was substituted and the second day he worked he bit Jane on the finger.

It was a hot Sunday afternoon and drinks were being passed around. Paul Muni refused. Urged by his hostess to have a cool one, he broke into a hula dance and, cawing around the room, sang: "I've got acid! I've got acid!"

HATTIE McDANIELS, the colored woman in "Saratoga," wore a hat in the picture that she thought did a lot for her and she was delighted when it was presented to her at the end of the picture. She wears it every week when she goes to sing in the radio production of "Showboat" and thinks it's a sin she has to take it off and wear a costume on the stage.

Hattie has a new home, paid for by her work in radio and pictures, but she is proud of her electric ranges—two of them. She had to have two stoves so she could fry a lot of chickens at one time and says she can cook fifteen fryers in no time.

ALICE BRADY moved recently to a house where there is a swimming pool. Now, Alice doesn't swim, but explained that the pool was "for my dogs and my guests."

Alice has her serious side, as she wishes Hollywood producers would remember when they begin to cast the picture depicting the life of Sarah Bernhardt. Alice will be broken-hearted if she isn't given the title role and to remind the folks that she is a tragedienne as well as a comedienne, she did the most morbid scenes from her stage hit, "Mourning Becomes Electra," recently over the radio.

GIVEN her choice of three dressing rooms at the MGM Studio, Virginia Bruce chose the smallest and, to all appearances, the least desirable. But to Virginia it was the best because, she said, "I can look out the window and see Garbo go in and out of her dressing room."

Black velvet and white silk braid combine to fashion the lounging pajamas Gladys George picks for her wardrobe.
The Power of the Candid Camera

The stars in "Sweet Adeline." Also participating in the midnight supper as if they were honoraries at the function.

The custom of permitting photographers at private parties has somewhat abated. At one time one fan lenser had this field practically to himself and did his work very skillfully and craftily. He'd slip into a party even where he wasn't invited, because he happened to know some guest. He wouldn't disclose his camera immediately but wait for the right degree of mellowness to obtain, and then with the aid of the star of his acquaintance who was usually "soft," would prevail upon the host or hostess to permit a few pictures to be taken.

He's still a king-pin in Hollywood, and keeps his place by submitting copies of most photographs he takes to his subject. Myrna Talmadge was the hostess at one party he appeared at in the early days, and exclaimed with more than ordinary gusto: "Who let him in anyway?" Also somebody once jokingly looked under a rug on the floor and said: "I just wanted to see if Mr. So-and-so, the photographer, was hiding there." So omnipresent was he.

In all, the cameramen are a human bunch of chaps—and enterprising! Too, according to an experienced studio publicity man "They're very temperamental.

"I can always handle reporters and writers," he averred, "but I'm never quite sure whether I'm getting anywhere with a photographer. He'll blow up on the slightest provocation. That's probably because he's an artist."

The cameramen themselves, though, aim to straighten out many of the netting problems through their own organization. They're talking of appointing a sort of mediating secretary, like a Will Hays, to handle their policies and public relationships with the studios. He'll also probably try to smooth out the feuds which invariably develop between syndicate men and fan magazine photographers. They fight like the deuce at times.

If the candid cameramen do have a Will Hays, say, the studio press departments, it will be a great proposition—"We won't have to talk to fifteen of these temperamental guys every time we have a premiere, but just one." Well, maybe! But then cameramen are different!

DIETRICH

Calm and unsmilng as the Sphinx, is she a paragon or a minx? Does this lackluster dull expression conceal pent-up fires of repression? Behind this vacant, staring mask do culture and refinement bask? Is genius fostered by fine limbs, or fed by temperamental whims? Marlene, break your synthetic shell and the curious world's doubts dispel.

A Star You Never Read About

"We only use about ten interiors for each. They're for the love stuff." A haw-haw from near by startled me, and his easy manner froze momentarily into a stiff explanation: "Ma'am, I don't claim to be any special kind of an actor. Standin' around and kissin' a girl for the camera is downright awkward. But we do our clinches for the box office first, get 'em over with, so's we can enjoy ourselves makin' the picture."

"Married, yourself?" I asked.

"Shhh!" A sibilant stage whisper from a corner warned: "Now we're comin' to the ra-mon-tic part." Lounging shapes among the listening semicircle nudged each other, I got it—and charted.

His blue eyes bored them, one by one, with a kindly but definitely reproving look. He reddened. Turning in his chair, he faced me squarely, his eyes level on mine, and said, "Yes, ma'am! An' I'm mighty proud of her. We've been married for five years. Her name was Ina May Spivey. She's from Oklahoma, but we met through friends when she was gain' to school in Springfield, Missouri."

Putting a query on my face, I gusted a series of stairs steps.

"No, ma'am, no youngsters yet."

Compassionately regarding his discomfiture—knowing full well how men of his type hedge when forced to discuss anything really personal—I flicked a glance around the audience and murmured, "Well, I'll let you off telling me how and where you proposed."

"Aw, shucks!" As the regret round about became audible, Gene smiled his thanks.

Down in Tioga, Texas, a little town of one thousand folks, Gene was born. Rather, out in the country, six miles from the town. There he grew up on the ranch, early learned to tend cows and twirl a rope. His people had been settlers.

His grandpa was the Baptist minister. So, came Sundays, Gene raised his piping voice, his main idea then being to draw down out the chair and the wheezing organ.

"For back as I can recollect, I sang," he admitted, "I liked the singing classes at school, 'specially at Rovia, Oklahoma, where I went visitin' once for a spell."

He rade in his first rodeo, at Achilles, Oklahoma, when he was twelve.

Before he reached his teens, the blond kid went travelin' with a medicine show. His job was to sell corn solver. When he couldn't talk folks into buyin' it, he sang his solos. There must have been some natural magic in his untrained voice, for they crowded round him and flipped him their two-bits.

Always he must sing. He never thought why or how. Roping steers, he burst into a natural rhythm of the range—rustling morch tunes—and soft, persuasive tunes of tenderness. Hardin' restless cattle in those ornery moods that lead to stampedes, he crooned the cows into docile moods.

Opining it was time for him to see the world, he got a railroad job at Sapulpa, Oklahoma. His boss, as he unloaded steers and buckled box cars, was Jimmy Long, who had an ear for music. Together they composed "Silver-haired Daddy," which was destined to become famous, and many other ballads.

He bought a saxophone, from a mail-order house, and learned to toll it right smart. But a person can't "sock" and sing at the same time. So he traded it in on a steel guitar.

But a feller like Gene, with the blood of pioneers in his veins, gets sorta rest- less, just sittin'. So he learned teleralogy. When he was eighteen, he got himself a job as train dispatcher and operator at a measly little town, a tank town. Trains chugged in, now and then. Folks round-about only sent wires when somebody got sick and Aunt Het had to be sent for. As the drawing, somnolent hours passed, Gene twanged his guitar, his musical mind spelling out tunes.

Having saved his money, in 1928 he braved New York. But the big town just laughed at the kid from Texas. Tulsa was kinder. Over Station KVOO he became "Oklahoma's Yodeling Cowboy." In October, 1930, he was asked to make phonograph records, particularly "Silver-haired Daddy," which he had sung to popularity over the air.

"Was I troubled! Sure, I always loved that tune. But, ma'am, I never had put 'Daddy' on paper," I gasped. "'Y' see, it's easy to think up melodies, but I hadn't learned to write out the notes of a musical score. It was plumb hard work."

The 'Daddy' sales broke records. After an organizing period of instruction, he managed to score the song. He aired his voice over Station WLS, Chicago. Then he took his "Born Dance" radio act on a vaudeville tour. A Republic producer saw it and lassoed it. That's how, about three years ago, Gene Autry song and Galluped into the movies.

In San Fernando Valley he has a big ranch, with a sprawling house and barns, a carroll, a well and a windmill, cattle, horses, sheep. The "pool" is an old-fashioned swimmin' hole. It and his ping-pong tables belong to all the Valley kids. They came barefoot, riding panies and mules, in school busses, to enjoy his hospitality.

"Well, isn't that what such things are for?" he replied to my comment on his generosity. "Kids ought to have fun."

When I rose to leave, one grizzled veteran of the range doffed his ten-gallon, made me an awkward bow, and invited: "Drop in any time, ma'am, pal'cy if you're aimin' to int'view Gene again. This here session has been pow'ful eddicalional."

"'Cause why, papa?" I asked.

"Wa-ll, ma'am, when he got to gain' good he eased the word down home an' bunched of us loped up to ride with him, hankerin' to see Calharrny. We all knew he could sit a hoss, an' he had a right fine voice. Now that he's gettin' int'viewed, we reckon he's an actor, too."

I have an idea that it will take Gene some time to live down our interview—in his own outfit.

Foundations of Beauty

The second item is a foot balm, an antiseptic skin emollient to be used as a massage cream. Rubbed into the skin, it takes away all aches and pains and keeps the feet in a healthy, comfortable condition.

Third is the foot powder which should be dusted on when you step from your bath. It keeps the feet cool and fresh and makes your shoes feel delightfully soft.

There's a nice little foot brush, too, along with these three items to be used for applying the granulated soap. And if you want your feet to feel at least two sizes smaller and about ten years younger, just try treating them regularly with these products.

However, the best care and tenderest treatment in the world won't keep your feet feeling fine if your shoes fail to give you the proper support in the three places that bear the greatest strain—the heel, the arch, and the metatarsal arch.

That's why more and more smart women are turning to the gay young shoes that have amazed the fashion world by being so light and good-looking while at the same time having built in them an especial support for these three local points of the foot.

These shoes are really something new in footwear, for they are soft and flexible as a dainty dancing sandal, yet because of this firm and scientific construction, they make one feel as if walking on wings. In fact, the dancing movie star, Eleanor Whitney, wears them all the time—and certainly she knows what the foot needs in the way of support and comfort as well as smartness.

From hands to feet was a long jump, wasn't it? But somehow the two seem to go together and once I started telling you about care of the hands, I couldn't resist giving you some news about feet, too. But next month I'm not going to be practical at all, I'm going in for glamour. And I'm going to help you get started on your Christmas list by giving you all the latest news about the newest perfumes.

Norbert Lusk's Reviews

"Broadway Melody of 1938."—MGM. Lavish of talent and everything else that goes into a major picture, Metro-Goldwyn's annual "Melody" is up to standard, but is neither striking nor exceptional. It is uniformly pleasant, however, and virtually goes on forever. To the point of exhaustion, in fact. Every moment is characterized by good taste and intelligent appeal to eye and ear. The picture would be better if there were less of it. And we must not take for granted the fact that every one in it is charming. Such a large company of ingratiating people is seldom seen all at once. As for the story, it is too fragmentary, too much a thing of shreds and tatters to stand telling, and it doesn't matter anyway. But Eleanor Powell's dancing with George Murphy in the rain is something to rave about, as is her solo tapping in boy's clothes. She has developed a singing voice that is sweet and low, too, and altogether is a finer artist than ever before. Robert Taylor hasn't much to do but he does it with discreet good taste and altogether gives an excellent account of himself. The brief presence of Willie Howard, veteran stage comedian, is richly gratifying, for he is one of the great comics of our day. And Judy Garland's singing and acting of "Dear Mr. Gable" is lovely. In short, all this is well worth seeing if you are looking for amiable diversion rather than a musical sock in the eye.

TOO
Harald Lloyd is too wholesome, Jean Parker too cay; Barthalamew too much af A 'teacher's pet' bay.

JEANNE.—A full-page rotogravure still of Louis Hayward with Jane Wyatt from "The Girl in the West," appeared in January, 1937. In March there was a gallery portrait of him, and "The Woman I Love," in which he appeared, was previewed in May.

Lit.—Errol Flynn has played in "The Case of the Curious Bride," "Don't Bet on Blondes," "Captain Blood," "The Charge of the Light Brigade," "Green Light," "Another Yankee in King Arthur's Court," "Prince and the Pauper," "The Perfect Specimen." Born in Antrim, near Belfast, Ireland, June 20, 1909; six feet two, weighs 180, brown hair and eyes. Olivia de Havilland in Tokyo, Japan, July 1, 1916; five feet four, weighs 107, chestnut hair, brown eyes. She uses her right name. Joan Fontaine, her sister, uses their stepfather's name. There are no other children in the family.

V. R. C.—Buck Jones was born in Vincennes, Indiana, December 4, 1889; six feet, weighs 174; brown hair, gray eyes. Educated in public schools and for a while worked as a mechanic. Later he went to Montana and took up the life of a cowboy. Next he joined the U. S. Cavalry for service in the Philippines, following which he was engaged by a Wild West show as an expert rider. During the World War, he went to France with the First Air Squadron and after the War remained in Europe performing his feats of horsemanship. James Stewart was born in Indiana, Pennsylvania, May 20, about 1912. Cora Sue Collins is playing in "The Adventures of Tom Sawyer."

P. T. O. All Lane was John Campbells Burke; Bill Norton; Edward Aeullie Jamie Bradfbrd, and Delma By- ron Mary Bradford, in "Laughing at Trouble." As Joseph Sawyer is freelancing, I am unable to give you a permanent studio address for him.

F. A.—"The Pagan" was previewed in May, 1929; "Matie Hari," February, 1932; and "The Barbarian" was used as the frontispiece in May, 1933. However, if there is an available copy now of the 1929 issue, it will cost you fifty cents, since there is an additional charge for old copies.

State of New York, County of New York (ss.)

Before me, a Notary Public, in and for the State and county aforesaid, personally appeared H. W. Kelston, who, having been duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is the Vice President and Secretary of Street Publications, Inc., publishers of Street & Smith Publications, Inc., publishers of Picture Play, and that the following is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a true statement of the ownership, management, and circulation of said publication as required by the Act of March 3, 1933, embodied in section 355, Postal Laws and Regulations, to wit:

2. That the owners are: Street & Smith Publications, Inc., 79-80 Seventh Avenue, New York, N. Y.; a corporation owned through stock holdings by the Estate of Edward Street; and the Estate of George C. Smith, 89 Seventh Avenue, New York, N. Y.; the Estate of George C. Smith, 89 Seventh Avenue, New York, N. Y.; Ormond V. Gould, 89 Seventh Avenue, New York, N. Y.

3. That the known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 per cent or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages, or other securities are: None.

4. That the two paragraphs next above giving the names of the owners, stockholders, and the like, contain only the list of stockholders and security holders as they appear upon the books of the company, but also, in cases where the stockholder or security holder appears upon the books of the company as trustee in or for any other fiduciary relation, the name of the person or corporation for whom such trustee is acting, is given also. The following two paragraphs contain statements embracing Kelston's full knowledge and belief as to the circumstances and conditions under which stockholders and security holders who do not appear upon the books of the company as trustees, hold stock and securities in a capacity other than that of a bona fide owner, and this affidavit has no reason to believe that any other person, association, or corporation has any interest direct or indirect in the said stock, bonds, or other securities than as so stated by him.

H. W. KELSTON, Vice President, of Street & Smith Publications, Inc., publishers.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 50th day of December, 1936. T. W. M. Van Valkenburgh, Notary Public No. 16, New York, N. Y. (My commission expires March 30, 1938.)

You don't have to know anything about a piano keyboard to play the piano. You can... you don't have to know anything about a piano keyboard. You can whistle, hum, or sing a tune, and then play it in a few easy steps. Easy, quiet and natural. So easy it might almost be called a parlor trick. No mechanical devices, robot, letters, books or technical terms. No beating scales or lengthy finger exercises. Only a few minutes a day is necessary and after five lessons you will play any tune you care to remember. Be in time on the top of the invitation list.

NOW YOU, TOO, CAN LEARN TO PLAY MUSIC THIS QUICK, EASY WAY!

New simplified home-study method ends gambling and guess-work—over 700,000 students

Fraction of the cost of old way methods
IT'S SURPRISING to discover how many folks have learned to play music this new, quick, easy way. People who you imagined had practiced for years. Who you figured must have spent huge sums on personal teachers' fees. Yet up to a short time ago they were in the same position as you are today.

You, too, can learn to play real music—classical numbers or jazz. And you won't need a private teacher, either. You'll learn all by yourself—right in your own home. And best of all the cost is only a small fraction of what it used to cost by old-fashioned methods.

Why are we so sure? Simply because more than 700,000 other men and women, boys and girls—no more clever—no more gifted than you—have studied music by this modern way.

No Special Talent Required
Learning to play this U. S. School of Music way is easy as A-B-C. No special talent is required—no previous musical training. You needn't even know one note from another, for thousands have learned to play by this simple method—quickly than you ever dreamed possible. There's nothing tricky about it—no complicated theories—nothing to memorize. You learn to play from real notes—the same as those used by accomplished musicians.

There's no doubt about it that popularity comes quickly to those who can pick up a staff—who can get a crowd started and keep them going. The easiest way to do this, of course, is with music. Anyone who can play will be more and more in demand—invited everywhere.

And with this short-cut system you don't have to spend hours practicing unnecessary scales or monotonous finger exercises. Instead, you have the fun of learning real tunes—right from the very beginning. And in a surprisingly short time you are learning some of your favorite popular and classic pieces.

Clear as Crystal
The best part of it all is that it is so simple—so crystal clear—so easy to understand. It's all right before you in print and pictures. First you are told how to do a thing. Then a picture shows you how to do it. Then you actually do it yourself and hear it. It's fascinating fun, too—practicing becomes a really interesting pastime instead of a wearisome task.

Free Demonstration Lesson
So that you may see for yourself how easy, how pleasant it is to learn by this modern, simplified method the U. S. School of Music has prepared an illustrated booklet and typical Demonstration Lesson which are yours for the asking. They explain fully the principles of this remarkable method and how it enables you to become a popular musician in a surprisingly short time, at a cost of only a few cents a day.

If you are really serious about wanting to learn music—if you honestly want to become popular—to have the pleasure of entertaining your friends—take this first step today. Send for this Free booklet and Free Demonstration Lesson. Don't put it off. Mail the coupon below and they will be sent to you promptly. No obligation. Instruments supplied when needed, cash or credit. U. S. School of Music, 5312 Brunswick Building, New York City.

48 PAGES OF ROTOGRAVURE
JOAN, QUEEN OF THE CRAWFORDS, goes formal in ice-blue slipper satin, the skillful draping of the bodice caught with sapphire-and-diamond clips, severe simplicity marking the whole. She is to star in "Mannequin," with Spencer Tracy, in the part played by Dolores Costello in 1926.
No Ordinary Actress.

Very few actresses radiate the warmth and sincerity that characterize Kay Francis's screen performances. Hollywood sophisticates, glamorous though they are, fail to approach the spirit of friendliness and deep feeling of Miss Francis's portrayals, because they cannot bring their interpretations of emotions above the surface artificiality that typifies the extreme modernism of our day.

With possibly one or two exceptions, the 1937 screen siren blatantly makes a play for the approval of her audience and, in so doing, fails to penetrate the gap that stands between herself and those who watch her on the screen.

On the other hand, the glamour girls who do not openly court public favor by posing in unnatural positions or forcing themselves to grin continuously in the Cheshire-cat manner—and there are few who don't—are often lacking in even the primary requisites of good acting.

They simply fail to register any feelings whatsoever.

Nor only must a star's characterization have the force that marks a truly great performance, but sincerity, a deep-rooted bond which will bring the actress and her audience in sympathy, an interpretation that will give the audience an understanding of the character's innermost feelings. Not one star in a thousand can do it, but Kay Francis is not to be classed among ordinary actresses for just such an achievement is hers.

With a word she can bring to mind the tranquility of blue twilight; with a smile, the exhilaration of living; and her laughter denotes gayety such as that of Brahms's madly beautiful Hungarian rhapsodies. One senses even from the screen that she lives for each breathless moment, yet has a knowledge of human emotions which only sympathy for others can bring.

Says Dorothy Brooks Holcombe of Kay Francis: "With a word she can bring to mind the tranquility of blue twilight; with a smile, the exhilaration of living; and her laughter denotes gayety such as that of Brahms's madly beautiful Hungarian rhapsodies."
Not since the days of Chaplin and Harold Lloyd has so much money, talent, and creative effort been devoted to pure comedy—zestfully spiced with music, youthful allure and romance.

JOHN HAMILTON—Boris Karloff is a native of London, England, born there November 23, 1887. Six feet, weighs 175, with dark-brown hair and eyes. Educated at Uppingham Kings College. A story about him in the April, 1937, issue will give you intimate details about your favorite actor. This issue may be had by sending your order with remittance of fifteen cents to our Subscription Department.

Julie Hayes.—Eleanor Powell is to play opposite Nelson Eddy in "Rosalie." There are always reasons why a studio postpones or shelves a picture. Jeanette MacDonald's marriage and honeymoon interfered with plans to produce "The Girl of the Golden West" ahead of "Rosalie."

F. T. Henry—"Charlie Chan at the Opera" was released January 8, 1937. Some one else did the singing for Boris Karloff in the opera sequences of that film.

J. S.—Clark Gable was represented in the magazine in 1931 as follows: September, gallery portrait and story. In December began a three-part story about him. In April and July, 1932, there were two more stories. In March, 1933, a gallery portrait, and in August of that year a story. Any issues mentioned may be had by remitting fifteen cents each to our Subscription Department.

Kathleen Atwell.—Robert Taylor is six feet and one-half inch tall. His English-made film is "A Yank at Oxford," with Maureen O'Sullivan. One might say that Harpo Marx's silence on the screen is the secret of his success. Certainly it is a novel idea that the boys have adopted. There is no Cliff listed in the cast of "Let Them Live."

When writing to The Oracle, please include your full name and address. If requesting costs, a list of fan clubs, the names of all of a star's films, or information about how to obtain stills, a stamped envelope should be inclosed. We regret that we cannot undertake to answer any contest questions.

Jean Allen.—Their birthdays are: Hoot Gibson, May 18, 1892; Robert Allen, March 28, 1900; Ginger Rogers, July 16, 1911; Charles Starrett, March 28, 1901. Please consult page 98 for addresses of the stars.

Dorlis Lane.—In "Little Women," Katharine Hepburn played the role of Jo, Joan Bennett Amy, Frances Dee Meg, Jean Parker Beth, Douglass Montgomery Laurie.

Peggy Palmer.—Wayne Morris was born Bert DeWayne Morris, in Los Angeles, California, February 17, 1914. Six feet two, weighs 190; blond hair, blue eyes. Educated in San Francisco grammar schools, at Los Angeles High School, Los Angeles Junior College, and the Pasadena Playhouse School of the Theatre. His theatrical career began during his attendance at the Pasadena Playhouse School. Latest is "Submarine D-I."

An Audrey Adams.—Nelson Eddy was born in Providence, Rhode Island, June 29, 1901; six feet, weighs 175; has blond hair, blue eyes. He has never been married. Mr. Eddy resumed his Sunday night radio broadcasting, beginning August 8th which emanates from Hollywood. I doubt if he was vacationing anywhere during the month of August.

An Ellison Fan.—James Ellison was born in Valier, Montana, May 4, 1911. Married Gertrude Durkin April 25, 1937. His latest is "The Barrier," with Jean Parker. I do not find any picture called "Love on a Budget." Helen Burgess died of pneumonia April 7, 1937.

A Young Fan.—Barbara Read was born December 29, 1917; five feet five, Nan Grey, July 25, 1918; five feet four, Deanna Durbin, December 4, 1922; five feet two, Jane Rhodes, April 24, 1921; five feet four, Jackie Cooper, September 15, 1943; about five feet six.

Alice.—Franchot Tone pronounces his first name Fran-show.

M. W.—Janet Gaynor has not married again since her divorce from Lydell Puck. She was born Laura Gainer, October 6, 1907.

Mary Louise II.—Fred MacMurray was born August 30, 1900; John Beal, August 13, 1900; Fred Astaire, November 26, 1889; Katharine Hepburn, November 8, 1907; Preston Foster, October 22, 1909; Bette Davis, April 5, 1908; Miranda Hopkins, October 18, 1902; Ronald Russell, June 14, 1906; Melvyn Douglas, April 3, 1901. The late Ross Alexander had a daughter by his first wife but I haven't her birthdate.

Mary Jane Smith.—Dick Purell is appearing in Warners' "Evidence."

R. H. D.—An interview with Bing Crosby appeared in December, 1933. One of Nancy Carroll appeared in January, 1934, and one in October, 1933. The 1934 issue will now cost you fifty cents, and the others fifteen cents each.

A Friend.—Carlyle Moore, Jr., played the role of Bob Terrill in "Midnight Court." He is a native New Yorker; five feet ten, weighs 160, dark hair, brown eyes.

Helen Smith.—John Ford, the director, and Francis Ford, actor and director, are brothers. Both were born in Portland, Maine, and attended the University of Maine.

What the Fans Think

I HAVE in front of me a copy of September Picture Play, which contains some very distressing letters. So distressing, in fact, that I find I must come to the rescue of the vivacious lady about whom unpleasant words have been written. It’s about time some of her many thousands of admirers put up a protest and came to her defense.

First of all, even before Norbert Lusk wrote it, I have always known Jeanette MacDonald ranked first as the cinema’s loveliest and most talented singing lady, and that any singer who tries to take that position from her will have a tough battle ahead.

Of course, Jeanette hasn’t sung in opera yet, but it is well known that she has been offered opportunity more than once. She couldn’t accept these offers as she was busy making pictures. It proves, though, that the musical world knows and appreciates her fine voice, and I am certain that once she appears at the “Met” and really proves her unquestioned ability, all these doubting Thomases will be left in gaping silence while we faithful MacDonald fans will be shouting “I told you so!”

On the other hand, being an ardent Nelson Eddy fan also, I cannot help but agree that he has not occupied the spotlight as a great star should. Perhaps at first MGM, knowing how experienced he was, cast the bulk of “Naughty Marietta” and “Rose Marie” on the experienced shoulders of Jeanette. But “Maytime,” should have cast all doubts from their minds as to his capability as an actor, and I sincerely hope to see him appear in the first red of “The Girl of the Golden West” with Miss MacDonald. He and Jeanette are an incomparable team, and I for one hope never to see the day when they will separate.

There have been rumors of their quarrels (which I think is cheap talk), but I believe they have little reason for this, for both are well equipped with fine looks, charming personalities, and thrilling voices. What cause is there for petty jealousies when one possesses as much as the other?

Another thing, would the conservative publicity-hater, Mr. Eddy, attend Jeanette’s parties, give interviews in praise of his costar, or sing at her wedding, if they weren’t friendly? I think not, for he is different from the usual Hollywood actor. If he doesn’t want to do a thing, he won’t, and publicity be hanged.

So, you disturbers of my peace of mind, Cecil and Anne O’Brien, I hope you get a chance to read what a real MacDonald and Eddy fan has to say in reply to your biting and cruel letters.

New Haven, Connecticut.

We Need Foreigners.

I THINK the most interesting feature of Picture Play is the department of fan letters. It has never been more interesting than it is right now. It is very amusing, people arguing about foreign stars as compared to our own American stars. May I say my bit?

I want to give my congratulations to Eleanor Crump whose letter appeared in the September issue. I agree with her in every respect. Pictures would certainly not be what they are without the presence of such personalities as Garbo, Rainer, Heine, O’berson, and Dietrich.

As for American stars who stand on the same basis with these foreigners, my votes go to Davis, Colbert, MacDonald, Loy, and Russell.

I disagree entirely with Anne O’Brien about Jeanette MacDonald. I think she rates far above Moore or Pons. If Miss Disguised as a Malay in "The Adventures of Marco Polo," Gary Cooper rescues the lovely "Princess Kukachin," played by the Norse Sigrid Gurie.

O'Brien polished up on her reading once in a while, she’d find out that Miss Mac-Donald was offered a Metropolitan audti-on but could not take it due to studio difficulties.

I also resent a crack about Eleanor Powell. All I say is, give the gal a break and let her be herself. She has done very well so far.

And how about some producer giving Virginia Bruce a chance? She’s got what it takes.

No Comparison.

NDRBERT LUSK asked in a recent issue if the stage is more legitimate than the screen. I consider it to be far more so. The stage is greater than the screen in every respect. It gives us something which the movies can never convey. On the stage the characters are human, their presence is real.
On the screen they seem so distant, unreal, and the movies, after seeing several stage plays, seem like so many snapshots.

Mr. Lusk also asks if the acting of Helen Hayes, Katharine Cornell, John Gielgud, and Maurice Evans is more legitimate than the outstanding stars of the screen. I have yet to see a screen star reach the acting of these brilliant stars.

What star in Hollywood can compete with Miss Cornell, or Maurice Evans?
Certainly not Robert Taylor or Carole Lombard. These two hams seem to be tops in the cinema, and many worse than they are considered great stars in filmland.

I also have been to the leading theaters in New York where only stage plays are shown and I have yet to meet the conditions described by Mr. Lusk.

Stuffy air, gloomy lounges, uncomfortable seats, that is ridiculous. The New York theaters are in as good a not better condition than any theater where pictures are shown.

Of course, there are a few good actors and actresses on the screen to-day, and these were on the stage years before going into pictures. These on the screen who have never had any stage experience such as Robert Taylor, Carole Lombard, Joan Crawford, et cetera, are terrible. To get back to the subject, the only real actors and actresses in films are Charles Laughton, Beulah Bondi, Elsa Lanchester, Freddie Bartholomew, Bonita Granville, Herbert Marshall, Brian Aherne, Bette Davis, Lionel Barrymore, Nova Pilbeam, and Flora Robson.

Legitimate stage is not inaccurate, and I am sure that it is going to remain legitimate as long as the stage exists, which will be as long as there are people left in this world who appreciate real acting by real actors.

Don't Be Silly.

In reply to Sidney Ann Gold: It is no longer smart, sophisticated, or particularly intelligent to sneer at the movies, as has been the custom in the past.
It has become old-fashioned and silly.
You say that there is no one in Hollywood who can equal the performances of Helen Hayes, Katharine Cornell, John Gielgud, and Maurice Evans. Have you seen Garbo, Luise Rainer, Bette Davis, Sylvia Sidney? Have you seen recent films of some of the stars of the stage, seen how the camera has caught and magified and kept for future generations the superb acting of Basil Rathbone, Burgess Meredith, Claude Rains, John Barrymore, Freddie March, and others?

I strongly doubt whether Evans or Gielgud, splendid actors that they are,
have ever turned in a performance surpassing that of Paul Muni in "The Life of Emile Zola."

The noisy little boys who charge up and down the aisles of theaters where movies are being shown may annoy you, but they cannot be more annoying than the little darling who sat next me at a performance of "The Barretts of Wimpole Street" and amused herself by kicking me and talking audibly to her mother when I was trying to listen to the first lady of the stage, Katharine Cornell. Do you really think that Robert Taylor and Tyrone Power are the victims of many more amorous sighs than Burgess Meredith and his contemporaries on the stage?

Movita plays the lovely "Arai" in "The Hurricane." Her rôle is as inspiring as the one she had in the memorable "Mutiny on the Bounty."
What the Fans Think

Within the last twelve months, the screen has produced such masterpieces as "Camille," "The Good Earth," "Romeo and Juliet," "Captains Courageous," "They Won't Forget," "Maytime," "Lost Horizon," "Night Must Fall," and "The Life of Emilie Zola." It is a record that Hollywood may point to with pride. It proves that after many years and much wasted time, the screen has indeed come into its own.

Two Rôles to Avoid.

PEOPLE everywhere are still reading and talking about "Gone With the Wind." There is one thing I cannot understand, and that is why people want Clark Gable in the rôle of Rhett Butler. Why any one should look forward to seeing him as such a conceited, sarcastic, egotistical, dishonorable, and intolerable person is more than I can see. How any one could feel flattered to portray such a degrading character is something I can't imagine. Regardless of who wins the rôle of Rhett Butler, I think many will sympathize with him. I'm sure that out of the million copies sold every one doesn't thrill or sigh when Rhett Butler's or Scarlett O'Hara's name is mentioned.

And as for a heroine, Scarlett is the worst that I've ever had the misfortune to run across. Why did I read the book? Certainly not to bring about it but to follow the experiences of Melanie. I'm still wondering how even she could put up with it. In my opinion, Scarlett is the most contemptible, vain, self-centered, unfaithful, self-indulgent "I'll think about that to-morrow." individual who ever sprang from a book. Any actress who was tested for this rôle and then rejected should breathe a sigh of relief to think that she had escaped living in such an undesirable characterization. For, as many will not believe, people will never forget them in those parts, and they will always be associated with the names of Scarlett O'Hara and Rhett Butler, and that isn't handing bouquets to any one.

Should Have Been Shelved.

I HAVE just seen "Saratoga," and, in my opinion, it definitely should have been shelved for at least two or three years. It is a fine picture, and the comedy was put in the hands of experts. Then why should it have been shelved? Simply because of the presence of Jean Harlow. Most of the audience came, I believe, to see just how sick she looked during filming, her double for some takes, etcetera. I went for enjoyment, but I didn't find it as the audience talked continually about her. When you have a large audience, and three fourths of them are whispering, you can't hear much of the talking in the film, and I couldn't. If "Saratoga" had been shelved two or three years, during which time many would have forgotten her, then taken off the shelf, re-filmed with the same cast as before, excepting, of PICTURE PLAY makes a big change in the next issue. Forty-eight pages in rotogravure instead of thirty-two, new type throughout and more pictures than ever before. It is a dramatic, satisfying change which begins with the most unusual cover the magazine has ever had, a brilliant likeness of Joan Crawford that will strike her admirers right in the eye. More than physical change in the magazine, though, will be the appeal of its contents. Every story will be a choice story, every star to have a story must deserve it. There will be no fillers, no interviews solely to express the sweetness and charm of the subject. In short, there will be nothing trite and nothing blah. Every article will be short, forceful and informative. This is a realistic age, these are hurried times; the long-drawn-out article is a thing of the past; pictures speak louder than words.

At the same time, Picture Play is not casting overboard its solid foundation, its intelligent viewpoint, in favor of flashiness and superficial inspection of films and personalities. It will continue to be penetrating and authoritative, but in the modern manner.

We are sure our loyal readers will like it, for it is they who really ordered the improvement, and we are pretty certain that new readers will be attracted by the force of the magazine's personal magnetism! Anyway, we're having a good time putting into practice our own theories of "how to win friends and influence people."

WHO started the letters about Nelson Eddy that are coming to all the fan magazines, including Picture Play? They tell us that Mr. Eddy is MGM's stepchild, of all things, and Jeanette MacDonald is the golden princess to whom he is "sacrificed"! Fans from all over the land voice this opinion, with England and Australia even more indignant over the wrong done their hero.

Though they may rend me for saying it, I don't think Mr. Eddy has been badly treated by his studio any more than Miss MacDonald has been exploited beyond her just deserts. Try as I may, I can't see that she has been "forced" and Mr. Eddy "neglected." To me, they are ideally paired and they complement one another. Miss MacDonald's delicious archness in proper contrast to Mr. Eddy's masculine reticence and dignity; while their voices not only blend in an undivided stream of melody but each maintains its beautiful identity. Yet intelligent fans protest that Mr. Eddy's talent is superior to Miss MacDonald's and that "in every possible way—dialogue, action, music and footage, 'Maytime' was conceived to slight Nelson Eddy."

One of Mr. Eddy's champions tells us that in "Maytime," which runs one hundred and thirty-six minutes, Mr. Eddy appears for only about thirty minutes, including long shots. Another one times his first appearance in each film, with surprising results. This fan informs us that "Naughty Marietta" ran twenty-five minutes before Mr. Eddy gladdened the eye and ear, and the aching void was as long in "Rose-Marie." Worse than either of these pictures, from the standpoint of cheating the public of Mr. Eddy, was "Maytime." Thirty-five minutes of the film unreeled before he was seen.

NOW, all this is interesting. If nothing else, it tells us how avidly the true fan follows films and what amazing discoveries are made by those who carry split-second timepieces to clock minutes of delight or chagrin. But I would inform them of something they overlook. It is the story.

For example, in "Naughty Marietta" it was necessary—for later understanding of the romance—to know what manner of girl was Miss MacDonald, how she happened to be in old New Orleans and why he responded so quickly to the honest virtues of Mr. Eddy after the sham and artificiality of the French court. It wasn't necessary for us to know how Mr. Eddy happened to be in Louisiana. Obviously he had lived there always.

"Rose-Marie" described a spoiled prima donna's reactions to the rough customs of the Canadian Northwest and her gradual awakening to the beauty of nature—and Mr. Eddy. In order to make this clear it was necessary to show what her life had been before the meeting, while no story was suggested in how Mr. Eddy happened to be wearing the uniform of a Mounty.

So, too, in "Maytime." The prologue was a dramatic essential to the whole. Without it, the romance that followed would have had little point and the epilogue would have lost its poignant significance. Mr. Eddy had no place in the prologue because he was dead and only lived in the memory of the heroine. In the epilogue he only appeared when she died. In short, Mr. Eddy had no place in the scenes dealing with the period of the prologue and epilogue, the present. He was of the past. I can't see anything wrong in keeping him in that part of the picture.

I'm afraid that Mr. Eddy's partisans have lost their balance in natural enthusiasm and are losing sight of his pictures as a whole, as well as his screen heroine. They remind me of the lengths Ramon Novarro's fans used to go in denouncing whoever happened to play opposite him. MGM was rounded taken to task for pushing Norma Shearer ahead of him in "The Student Prince" and Dorothy Jordan was despised on the principle that she shouldn't be playing with him at all. I concluded that this contingent of the Novarro fans would only be happy when their idol put on a one-man show, that is, when he acted all the roles himself. Perhaps Mr. Eddy's fans will find compensation in seeing him in "Rosalie," without Miss MacDonald, just as it is possible that some of her votaries may enjoy her most fully in "The Firefly," minus Mr. Eddy. But all wait for their reunion in "The Girl of the Golden West."

THREE of the best pictures of the month have no love story. They are "100 Men and a Girl," "Stage Door," and "First Lady." The last two star such love-ridden ladies as Katharine Hepburn, Ginger Rogers, and Kay Francis.

Of course, Deanna Durbin is automatically excused from love in "100 Men and a Girl" because she's only fourteen, but had her picture been conventionally planned she might have arranged one of those forced and unnecessary romances between her elders. Instead, we are given only the love of great music as the picture's motivation, and it is perfect.

The absence of romance from the other pictures is more significant, though I don't know exactly why except that we look for a love story from these stars. Neither picture suffers from this innovation. "Stage Door" is one of the most entertaining films we are likely to see this month, and "First Lady" is surely the wittiest example of "catty" comedy we are apt to see in any month. If we must find a reason for their significance, I think that praising the courage of Miss Hepburn, Miss Rogers, and Miss Francis is as good as any. They tell us that stars are just as anxious to do something different as we are to see them do it.

FULL-LENGTH opera is coming to the screen for the joy of those who have begged for it, and for the surprise of some who think they will shy away from it. Bona fide opera, not excerpts strung together, nor "modernized" versions, but "Rigoletto," "La Traviata," "Aida," and "Tosca" as Verdi and Puccini composed them. They are to be produced in Italy by Hal Roach in partnership with Vittorio Mussolini, son of Il Duce, who is now in Hollywood acquainting himself with American methods of picture-making. This important combination is the result of Italy's intention to take her place in affairs cinematic and to sublimate pictures that will appeal to the world instead of a limited native public.

That is where Mr. Roach comes in. He will see to it that the operatic films are not funny in the wrong places and that the tenor and soprano are not physical parodies of what a hero and heroine should be to please an American audience. It wouldn't surprise me to find some of our Hollywood singers getting their chance to sing opera at last, especially Nelson Eddy. Under contract to MGM, with whom Mr. Roach is affiliated, I think the possibility is far from remote, especially as MGM will distribute the pictures. Mr. Roach says, "We want young faces and fresh voices for this new venture, not a lot of fat men and women long past the camera age." If that isn't a call for Mr. Eddy I don't know what is.
DIVINE LADY: GARBO AS MARIE WALEWSKA IN "CONQUEST"
Bette Davis decides to accept Hollywood as it is, instead of rebelling against it, and to go about playing the movie game. She knows she must follow its own peculiar rules.

BETTE DAVIS paused, listening to the conversation at the next table.

She wasn't eavesdropping. The speaker was an extra, once an idol of the films, and he didn't lower his voice as he said:

"I'm an extra to-day because I was stubborn and witless. I had no hard luck. The fickle public? Fickle my eye! It wasn't the public that turned away from me. I turned away from the public.

"I thought I was up there for good, secure and permanent. The industry was changing, but I didn't change with it. I considered it a vehicle which would carry me along wherever it went, with no further effort on my part.

"Instead, I found I was riding a surf board on the crest of a wave that had elevated me—by sheer luck—and was now racing away without me. I slipped down into the trough behind that wave, and fell off my surf board. Successive waves rolled over me. On their crests triumphant riders sped by. But I couldn't catch another. I'd lost the only chance I had."

Bette shivered. "Whew! That's a realistic picture, isn't it?" she said in a low voice. "Oddly enough, I used almost the same figure of speech not many months ago in a huddle with myself about my own problems."

"And the result?" I prompted.

"Chiefly a lot of resolutions to which I'll stick hereafter. I'm good at sticking to resolutions. One of them was to stop all wish-thinking about Hollywood. To accept it as it is, and go about playing the movie game by its own rules.

"In other words, I made quite a few changes in myself, and so far the effects have been beneficial, not only in private life but, I think, in my work.

"You see, I felt I'd wasted a lot of time and energy in the past. To revert to a watery figure of speech, I'd been swimming against the current, not with it. And as any lifeguard can tell you, that's silly. A current doesn't admire or acknowledge your courage.

"The current of movie popularity is just as unheeding as any in the ocean—and twice as shifting. Try to float on it and it rushes away from you. Struggle against it and it engulfs you. But swim with it, as alertly and intelligently as you can, and you can keep up a long time."

"Spoken like a true ex-lifeguard," I said.

"Which I never was," smiled Bette the frank.

"That was only a publicity story some one invented."

"About this change in you—has it attracted much attention?"

Bette laughed. "I don't believe so. After all, it isn't an outward change, like going in for mannish clothes or a freakish make-up. People notice those things right away."

"When did it start?"

"Oh, probably before I was fully aware of it, or ready to accept it. But it really became a clear-cut resolution one day on the boat, returning from England and my licking in the British courts. I was looking at the water, which accounts for the wetish figure of speech I told you about."

It occurred to me then that people had noticed the change in Bette—not in her personality or conduct, but on the screen. Many to whom I talked had remarked that in pictures made after her return, "Marked Woman," "Kid Golahad," "That Certain Woman," and o film we had only that day viewed in the projection room, "It's Love I'm After," she showed a new power and assurance. Behind it was this change in Bette herself, and her attitude toward Hollywood.

"Tell me some of your resolutions, Bette, and more about the change in you," I suggested.

She frowned thoughtfully. "Well, first of all, I unpacked my trunks. You may not understand, if you don't remember that in my early days in Hollywood I once had my trunks packed and was about to leave for New York. Universal had dropped me at option time, and I mistrusted my future.

"Although a test for George Arliss's 'The Man Who Played God' halted my departure, and won the rôle against the competition of better-known actresses, I kept my trunks packed. Actually, And dressed out all them. It was silly, but it wasn't superstition—just a defense mechanism.

"Afterward, although I seemed to be getting along in films, and had unpacked my trunks physically, I kept the same defensive attitude. Even when I'd worked in pictures such as 'Cabin in the Cotton,' 'Fog Over Frisco,' and 'Of Human Bandage,' I remember telling people I wouldn't buy a house or anything I couldn't pack in a trunk.

"But now I feel that my life is definitely tied up with pictures. I'm going to stick, with bridges burned behind me, trunks unpacked."

Even the New England home in the Berkshires which Bette used to mention as an ultimate refuge for herself and husband Harman O. Nelson, has now been put into the dim future. Bette's new conception of career lacks provisions for retreat. There will be no retreat.

The change in her plan of campaign naturally affects "Ham" Nelson. And he helped to bring it about by achievements of his own. As an orchestra leader he was sometimes in Los Angeles, sometimes in San Francisco and finally in New York, while picture work kept Bette in Hollywood. Now he has a thriving Hollywood agency business. He too can unpack his trunks, for his interests, like Bette's, are centered in the film city.

"Any woman whose husband has been forced by business to live apart from her for long intervals can understand how having Ham here, and being in a way settled at last, has helped me," Bette remarked.

This change came, incidentally, soon after Bette returned from England with all her new resolutions. Nelson launched his Hollywood business and Bette plunged into the film campaign which even at this date has resulted in new critical honors and popularity.

Bette and her husband figure together, too, in her resolu-

THE GREAT GARRICK
BRIAN AHERNE, English stage idol of the 18th century, incurs the animosity of the Comédie Française, and only by his own wits does he save himself from their little plot. Outer left, Mr. Aherne, in “Hamlet” costume, poses for Henry O’Neill. With him and his valet, Edward Everett Horton, are Albert Van Dekker and Milton Owen. Top, with Olivia de Havilland, a countess who wins the love of the great actor. Above, with Trevor Bardette, Center, Melville Cooper with a group of French players on the stage.
GLADYS GEORGE has the title rôle in this dramatic story of mother love. Because her husband suspects her of infidelity, she is forced to leave him and their child. Trying to support herself, she first becomes a governess and then a café hostess. When Henry Daniell, center, a gambler, tries to blackmail her, she shoots him. Her son, John Beal, now a lawyer, is put on the case to defend her. Below, with Phillip Reed.
ROMANCE and the events which led up to the Chicago fire of '71 are depicted in this dramatic story. Alice Brady plays the rôle of "Mrs. O'Leary." Two of her sons are Tyrone Power and Don Ameche. The former falls in love with Alice Faye. Brian Donlevy runs a music hall. Left, the fire engines returning from the scene of the big stockyards stampede.
THE PERFECT SPECIMEN
ERROL FLYNN has been reared by his grandmother, May Robson, to be letter-perfect in almost all the many arts and sciences. Despite his riches, he proves his fitness in any fight and as an automobile mechanic. He meets Joan Blondell, whose brother, Dick Faran, left, bottom, with Beverly Roberts, works on the estate. Outer left, with Edward Everett Horton.
THE most exciting section of American history is the background of this story. Joel McCrea, employed by a stage and express company, takes over the job of lengthening the line from New York State to St. Louis. For there he will again see Frances Dee, whom he loves. Bob Burns is always with him. The couple marry but are separated when the Civil War breaks out. Below, "Ramsay MacKay" with Henry O'Neill. John Mack Brown, right, renews his suit.
THERE GOES THE GROOM

THIS romantic comedy recites the experiences of a young author, Burgess Meredith, who simulates amnesia to avoid marrying Ann Sothern, to whom he is engaged. Her unselfish devotion during his apparent loss of memory causes him to fall in love with her, and leaves him in a quandary how to explain his deceit. Below, with Louise Henry.

Picking to-morrow’s WINNERS

BY FREDERICK JAMES SMITH

Do you know who will be the stars of to-morrow? Who will the audiences go to see in 1939 and 1940? I put this question to representative theater men throughout America and here are the findings:

The newer, younger players line up in this order:

1. Tyrone Power
2. Shirley Temple
3. Bobby Breen
4. Robert Taylor
5. Sonja Henie
6. Jane Withers
7. Alice Fay
8. Ray Milland
9. Deanna Durbin

I imagine that this scoring will surprise you. Yet the exhibitors put them in exactly that order—and they certainly ought to know their audiences. It indicates that Tyrone Power is growing faster than any one suspected. His vote was more than twice that of Robert Taylor.

Now let us take the established stars of to-day. Who will survive two years from now? Here’s how the exhibitors rate them for January 1, 1940:

1. Claudette Colbert
2. William Powell
3. Clark Gable
4. Bette Davis
5. Fred Astaire
6. Carole Lombard
7. Irene Dunne
8. Janet Gaynor
9. Kay Francis
10. Luise Rainer
11. Spencer Tracy
12. Fernand Gravet

Bob Burns pulled a remarkable vote, second only to Tyrone Power. I have not included him in either list, since he is a figure quite apart. But he will be a big force on the screen, another Will Rogers, or our exhibitors are wrong.

A second list of potential stars, based on the exhibitor vote, would run like this:

Virginia Bruce, Joel McCrea, Buddy Ebsen, Wayne Morris, Eleanor Whitney, Frances Farmer, Annabella, James Stewart, Judy Garland, Rosalind Russell, Dan Ameche, and Freddie Bartholomew.

My test questions went to most of the States of the Union. Exhibitors in twenty-eight States answered in detail, so the summary can be considered the showmen’s verdict of all these United States.

Here it should be noted that, in sending out questionnaires, I tried to reach the average exhibitor not allied with any particular chain of theaters. The vote, in the main, expresses the town and small city verdict. Yet villages and cities are included, too, to balance the judgment.

I believe that exhibitors in smaller localities are nearer their patrons and know more than any one else about Mr. and Mrs. Average America and what they want to see on the screen.
Now I'll tell you what some of the showmen think of coming trends in pictures:

Raleigh W. Sharrock, of the Centenary Theater, Shreveport, Louisiana, looks toward color photography and third dimension pictures, as do many other showmen.

A large proportion of the nation's exhibitors believe that pictures move in cycles. Listen to George Bannan, of the Prudential Long Island Theaters, East Hampton, New York. He says:

"The screen will follow through the same cycles which have been prevalent in the last three years, such as from horror to romance, romance to historical, historical to adventure, adventure to musical, et cetera, until the cycle is completed by following the Hollywood time-worn formula."

In the West, action pictures are in strong demand. J. H. Noah, of the New Liberty Theater, Fort Worth, Texas, expresses the demand for the outdoor film in this fashion:

"We have found that pictures with a great deal of action and attractive titles mean about as much at the box office of our theater as those with big names. Gene Autry is our best drawing card, due, no doubt, to the colorful titles of his films, as well as his singing. Such titles as 'Red River Valley,' 'Hills of Old Wyoming,' 'The Old Corral,' 'The Last of the Mohicans,' and 'Rootin', Tootin' Rhythm' appeal to our patronage. Since the success of 'The Plainsman' in key cities, as well as in small towns, we believe there is a trend toward pictures emphasizing wholesome action with outdoor backgrounds."

This Gene Autry, by the way, is a strong draw everywhere, according to exhibitors.Tex Ritter is running him a strong second in his field.

H. R. Griswold, of the Sewanee Union Theater, Sewanee, Tennessee, looks to the spectacle and sheer comedy as the pictures of to-morrow. He says:

"Trying to guess the trend in pictures is not an easy task. My crowd does not like topical pictures. Such films as 'Black Legion,' 'Marked Woman,' et cetera, were flops for me. On the other hand 'Romeo and Juliet' gave me the second highest gross for the season, the best going to 'Maytime' by a very few dollars. Yet I understand 'Romeo and Juliet' generally has been a flop in general release."

Mr. Harrington, of Clatskanie, Oregon, sees the story steadily becoming more important, regardless of its source or background.

H. M. Gerber, of the Roxy Theater, Hazelton, North Dakota, echoes this, adding that the direction is almost as important.

Rudolf Duba, of the Royal Theater, Kimball, South Dakota, sees the trend toward comedy melodrama with some romance. Audiences want action and comedy. "Keep away from society stuff," he says, "and avoid the divorce triangle."

Gladye E. McArdle, of the Owl Theater, Lebanon, Kansas, says the coming demand will be far simple, homely stories. "It seems to me," she says, "the future trend of pictures will be along the line of it-might-have-happened-in-our-town. I think the public is tired of the magnificent, the spectacular and the weird. It wants more of the made-in-America type of story of our own country and our own people." And she adds, "This is just the opinion of a small-town exhibitor from the Kansas dust bowl."

B. Hallenbeck, of the Rose Theater, Sumas, Washington, predicts a reaction against the big musical film. "It is my opinion," he says, "that the public is getting tired of the endless procession of musical and dancing pictures. And that they are on their way out. A few snappy songs or some dancing incidental to the main theme is acceptable, but the picture that devotes itself to an interminable procession of meaningless songs and chorus routines is becoming boresome to the average fan."
Picking To-morrow's Winners

But the exhibitors, like the producers, don't agree. L. C. Bolduc, of the Majestic Theater, Conway, New Hampshire, contradicts exhibitors who believe their audiences dislike costume dramas. He says the historical film is coming back again. Predicts, too, a trend toward more romance and adventure stories.

C. M. Pincus, of the Capital Theater, Salt Lake City, Utah, thinks, and probably rightly, that the next trend depends entirely on the development of world affairs. A war abroad easily could change the film trend, for instance. "Sea stories and rugged outdoor dramas will continue to be strong attractions, nevertheless," he adds.

Jna. S. Erickson, of the Rex Theater, Iron Mountain, Michigan, believes that television will change the whole method of exhibiting films in the next two or three years. The pictures, he believes, will come direct over wires from the various exchanges located in key cities.

A wide variety of opinions might be added, along with a whole series of exhibitor complaints. But, in summarizing ideas, we find that most exhibitors believe that their audiences want clean, wholesome entertainment now and two years from now, that comedy will continue dominant, that outdoor pictures are growing in popularity, that there will be a general reaction, now apparent in spots, against the musical spectacle as it is done in Hollywood to-day. Ninety per cent of the exhibitors say one thing: The story is more important than most of the stars, and stars are wholly dependent upon their vehicles.

Now let's return to the personalities of the screen—and detail what the exhibitors think of the nine newcomers they select as the stars of to-morrow.

Every exhibitor agrees that Tyrone Power is a potential star of great possibilities. Their verdict on Shirley Temple—and this covers Jane Withers, too—is interesting. They believe that Miss Temple will go on in continued popularity for at least two more years. Growing-up gawkiness may come then to both these young ladies—but fame is safe until 1940.

Bobby Breen's popularity with exhibitors may surprise you. They believe in him strongly. They like his voice, his lack of typical film cuteness.

Deanna Durbin has a tremendous exhibitor following. They feel sure she is going places.

Alice Faye has been developing steadily—and is building a definite following. Marie of Sanja Henie in a moment. I will let the exhibitors comment on her themselves. And Ray Milland! There's a surprise.

This Paramount leading man is in high favor with the country's showmen. Ralph Cokain, who, until recently, when he joined 20th Century-Fox, was manager of the Indiana Theater, at Marion, Indiana, says of Milland: "All at once he has come to display a brand of charm that captivates every one. He is day and right grooming with the stars."

Now let the exhibitors give these stars and starlets.

A. E. Hancock, of the Colony, Indiana, names Judy Garland, high-power newcomers. His voice of range and power, mumbles in "Wings of the Sphinx." Audiences.

M. E. Harrington, of the Capitol, Oregon, is strong for Wayne Morris and Deanna Durbin. Both have refreshing new personalities, he says. Morris, he believes, will "go places." Miss Durbin has "a voice that thrills."

Mr. Harrington believes Janet Gaynor will achieve big things in the next two years. "Her successful comeback in 'A Star Is Born,'" he says, "definitely placed her as one who will rise high to a new stardom. She possesses a talent which could make her the screen's finest tragedienne." That is, if she gets the breaks.

Says Mr. Harrington of Spencer Tracy: "At last he is coming into his own. He will continue to do so, if care-fully cast. His amazing versatility shown in recent pictures, proves him capable of fine performances in the future."

Sanja Henie has a strong following. "Her skating gave us something new," Miss McArdle of Lebanon, Kansas, says and Miss McArdle, with dozens of other exhibitors, believes that Miss Henie will grow in popular favor with future pictures.

Mr. Cokain, then, of Marion, Indiana, is strong for Miss Henie, too. "She cannot go through stardom merely skating," he says, "but the fact that she won hosts of admirers in her first picture certainly justifies her holding these admirers and winning more, with successive hits. Shrewd casting will help her, miscasting will harm."

Mr. Cokain is strong for Tyrone Power, too. "It is my firm belief," he says, "that Power will eventually become more popular than Robert Taylor. Taylor is extremely handsome, of course, while Power is not only handsome but the clean-cut type of youth all classes of audiences admire. He is the young fellow next door."

Mr. Cokain casts a vote for Frances Farmer, also. "Miss Farmer has done exceptionally well in the short time she has been in Hollywood," he remarks. "She will reach stardom by 1939, perhaps before that."

Says Howard Rals-ton, of the Ritz Theater, San Bernardino, California: "Power is another Robert Taylor. Ray Milland can't be stopped, the women love him. And I think Henry Fonda should prove another Gary Cooper."

Hollywood and the Goldwyn "Follies" are winning Zorina away from the Ballet Russe, but very gradually. The ballet is like a religion to her.

WHEREVER two or more Hollywoodians meet in New York, you have on your hands a meeting of the Deliriously-Stage-struck-and-Let's-Get-Away-From-It-All Association. It may be at "21," it may be in a fitting room at Hattie Carnegie's, and at lunch time it is pretty sure to be the Algonquin or Sardi's; but wherever it is, the air is filled with protestations that one really must get back into the theater.

They Say in New York——

Fonda distinguishes himself in "Blow Ye Winds" by speaking risqué lines without a single apologetic smirk.

Elissa Landi—with Vincent Price, New York's pet matinée idol—feels confident after out-of-town try-outs that she has a Broadway hit this time, and Burgess Meredith, back from the wars of Hollywood, is doing a play with Lillian Gish.

Gloria Dickson, of "Lest We Forget" fame, is all set for her Broadway début; Jean Muir, who drew rapturous raves in her summer stock engagements, is looking for a play, and looming on the horizon are Fredric March and Florence Eldridge in a play called "The Christian Hero," dealing with the essayists Addison and Steele.

Those Spellbinding Marches.—So infectious is the enthusiasm of the Marches, they have lured John Cromwell from Hollywood to direct them in their play. Mr. Cromwell, having directed "The Prisoner of Zenda," which threatens to become every one's favorite picture, could while away his time in Hollywood directing nothing but super-super productions at super-de luxe pay, but once the Marches got to work on him, he was fairly frantic to get back to the theater.

The Marches, I might as well warn you, are born organizers, cause leaders, drum-thumpers. Every now and then—or let's be accurate and just say now—they discover a book by some unappre-

Luise Rainer's immigrant girl's wardrobe in "Big City" left fans disappointed. They want a good show for their money on and off the screen.

Don AMECHE'S BOYHOOD TRICKS

BY EMIL J. BLACKY

THE DIGNIFIED STAR OF TO-DAY IS REMEMBERED IN HIS HOME TOWN AS AN IMPETUOUS ITALIAN BOY WITH A WAY OF ALWAYS GETTING OUT OF TROUBLE.

It is Sunday afternoon in Kenosha, Wisconsin. The industrial plants in this thriving city, jutting between Chicago and Milwaukee, have earned their week's respite and smoke curls lazily from their stacks.

In the Italian quarter of the town dark-haired youngsters frolic about, while the grown folks are clustered on porches and chat volubly in their native tongue or wander leisurely to visit relatives and neighbors a few blocks down the street.

You stop before a group on a corner waiting for a parade of automobiles to pass.

"We would like to know where to find the relatives of Don Ameche?" we ask.

The face of the elderly man in the group beams.

"Ah, my friend," he replies in slightly broken but understandable English. "You are verra close. You meana da Amici family. Don's a seester she leaves five blocks up da street. She's a married to Ventura, the coal and ice man. It's a beega house.

"But Mrs. Ventura she's a verra seek inna da hospital," he adds sadly. "Mrs. Amici she's a come home to take care of her daughter. But she's a nice woman. She's a be glad to see you."

We thank our informer who stands watching us as we turn and proceed to the "beega house." Our first guess is right.

Handsome and friendly George Ventura answers the buzzer, and without hesitation he invites us in. He accepts our apologies for interrupting him during the illness of his wife, but his genuine expression of hospitality bids us remain.

"I will call Mrs. Ameche," he says, as we make ourselves comfortable.

The moment she emerges from the kitchen doorway, you have a feeling that you are going to have a pleasant visit.
And when you tell her that your editor wants to know all about Don and his boyhood days she sighs and her eyes twinkle with a kindly light, as if she were about to live over again a beautiful dream that has been made all the more sweet because it came true.

"Oh, my," she sighs. "I just don't know where to begin. Don was such a wonderful boy."

And then, with a chuckle, she adds, "But a bad one at times, too.

"There was the time when his father arranged to send him to his first boarding school. He was eight years old then. The evening before he left, I had all his clothes ready and neatly arranged for the trip and had brought them down into the kitchen to pack. As a farewell, I decided to make our favorite dish—spaghetti with tomato sauce—for supper. Don liked it, too. I had peeled a lot of tomatoes and left the skins in a dish.

"Remembering that I had neglected to bring some of Don's things down from his room, I hurried upstairs to get them. When I returned to the kitchen, what a sight greeted my eyes! The tomato skins were spotted all over the walls. The clothes I had worked so hard to clean and press were stained with ugly spots. And standing innocently in front of the sink was Don, his hands still dripping from the moist tomato skins.

"Just as I was about to give him the scolding of his life, his father entered. Much to my—and I imagine Don's—surprise, he did not say a word, and all of us ate our dinner in silence. But when we had finished, he marched Don directly into the kitchen.

"It was twelve thirty that night before a much-humbled boy had removed all the tomato skins from the walls and cleaned the kitchen well enough to pass his father's inspection. The next day, tired but completely disciplined,

The smaller picture shows the tavern that Don's dad owned before his talented son built a home for the family in California.

The other photograph is of the typical place where Don Ameche was born.

The small picture on the opposite page shows Don Ameche in his Sunday best at the age of twelve in Kenosha, Wisconsin. It is interesting to note the resemblance of the boy to the man we admire to-day.

At twenty-nine Don has not lost the mischievous twinkle in his eye that put him up to many pranks that inked his family—and especially his father—when he was a mere boy.
THE PRICE SHE

BY JERRY ASHER

During the latter years of her marriage to Frank Fay, Barbara allowed her career to slip close to oblivion. In place of the spirited young actress whose provocative beauty and husky voice had once thrilled New York audiences in "Burlesque," there remained a bitter, inarticulate person. Came her divorce. After it followed long months of readjustment. She tried to recapture the sparkle that had once been the keynote to an exciting personality.

Slowly but surely her efforts were rewarded. Her bitterness began to slip away. Work was her salvation. She prayed that she might be given another chance to prove that it was not too late. She threw herself into her career with a fervor she had never known before.

Deep in her heart was the ambition to give a performance that would make up for all she had been through. To friends she confided that she was working and waiting patiently. But the day must come when she would really act for the first time.

Since her advent in pictures, Barbara Stanwyck has always nursed a secret ambition to work for Samuel Goldwyn. She had learned, however, that Mr. Goldwyn did not admire her ability. As a matter of fact she had been told that not only did Goldwyn have scant regard for her as an actress, he didn't think she was pretty, he didn't like her figure. And he thought her voice was bad. In short, Goldwyn didn't like Stanwyck!

So the story goes, once after he had sat through a Stanwyck picture, Sam Goldwyn turned to his associates and asked if any one could tell him just why Barbara Stanwyck was on the screen. It seems that no one cared to volunteer the information. Or couldn't. So Goldwyn went right on thinking Barbara was a bad actress. And Barbara went right on hoping to work for him.

Having made several pictures together, there is a friendship between Barbara Stanwyck and Joel McCrea that is one of the most genuine in Hollywood. Joel knew of the struggle Barbara had been through to reestablish herself. One day while working together in "Banjo On My Knee," Barbara and Joel sat talking between scenes.
"I wish you could work for Sam Goldwyn," said Joel. "He's the best boss and the best producer in the world. And he's especially good for women stars. If he has faith in you he'll never let you down. Just recently I had a preview. I felt I was so bad that Goldwyn would surely fire me. Sure enough, next day he called me into his office. Before I could say a word, he cut in: 'You were so good in that picture, you should have a raise—but don't ask for it because you won't get it,' he finished with typical wry humor."

"I'd rather work for Goldwyn than any producer," answered Barbara. "I'd work for him for less money just to be in his pictures. He does everything on such a large scale. His pictures show such good taste and he doesn't spare a thing. One picture with him is worth a dozen with others. I hear he's to remake 'Stella Dallas.' I'd give my soul for a chance at that. But I heard when I first came to Hollywood that he has always SEND over the body!" is the quaintest example of Hollywood slang. It's what actresses say when they telephone the wardrobe departments for the form-fitting garments of elastic and padding which are worn under gowns to insure that all the curves are in their proper places.

I'M Warren William," pleaded the star when forest rangers objected to his parking the William trailer three feet over a "No Trespassing" boundary in Rainier National Park. "So what?" said the rangers. So Mr. and Mrs. William unhappily packed up their belongings, folded their tents, and moved on.

IT could only happen in Hollywood. While waiting for her hair to grow long for the sulphurous rôle of a Southern belle in "Jezebel," Bette Davis is passing the time planting an old-fashioned, formal New England garden in her back yard. Bette's the only star in town with a back yard, not a "patio."

THE practice of asking celebrities to lend their names to restaurants and businesses, in the hope of attracting tourists, reached a new high with Clara Bow's "It Café." Save for opening night, the guests haven't seen much of Clara. Now the tourists are growing hard-boiled, and they order, "One ham sandwich, one beer, and show me Clara Bow!"

ALTHOUGH press agents may get little notes into the gossip columns linking Nelson Eddy's name with different girls, the truth is that Nelson is seldom seen out without blond Ann Franklin beside him. She accompanies him to rehearsals, to broadcasts and to parties and it is beginning to look serious. She was once married to Sidney Franklin, director.

KAY FRANCIS won't be bothered by visitors while filming a picture, but during production of "This Woman Is Dangerous" she made one exception. A guide whispered that an important visiting critic wanted to meet her.

"I don't care how important he is!" Kay interrupted. "I wouldn't see the King of Siam!"

Said Kay's press agent, "The guide's wrong. This man is just an obscure movie scribe, here for a few days as a reward for twenty-five years of faithful service on a small Eastern paper."

Kind-hearted Kay sent for the visitor immediately—and never was one treated more royally.

GOT the time, buddy?" W. C. Fields asked an electrician on his set.

Paying no attention to a flamboyant wrist watch he wore, the man hauled out a dollar ticker.

"That's a funny one!" Fields remarked. "Has your wrist watch stopped?"

"It ain't been running for a month, but I wear it because Mae West gave it to me," was the reply. "I can't afford to get it repaired. That would cost seven bucks."

"Hm-m-m!" murmured Fields. He made a note of the incident in his small red memo book, which means he'll use it as a gag on the screen some day.

WHEN Tyrone Power and Simone Simon took a test for a picture they may do together, the reputedly temperamental actress asked Tyrone for advice about certain phases of movie work.

He complied at length. He was qualified to do so, and his manner of handing out advice was charming.

But in our opinion not one cinema queen in ten would have listened to the end without argument or sarcastic comment. When he had finished Simone did an even more unusual thing.

She thanked him.

WHAT did you do to the young man who watches you so dolefully? Virginia Bruce was asked at a recent shindig.

Virginia couldn't recall even meeting him. Still, the idea preyed on her mind, so she approached him and asked, "Having a good time?"

"Miserable!" came the startling reply. "You see, I fell in love with you. Yep—the moment I met you this evening." Noting Virginia's dumbfounded expression, he added, "Don't worry—I'll recover. Last week it was Ginger Rogers!"

Sorrowfully, he arose and headed for the bar.

A PRIM old lady was touring her first movie lot. She was lucky enough to see interesting scenes in the making, and stars such as Shirley Temple, Claire Trevor, and Don Ameche.

But she didn't seem satisfied until, on the set of "Life Begins at College," she witnessed the maniacal cavortings of the Ritz Brothers.

"There!" she exclaimed triumphantly. "This is the way I expected movie people to act. The others were too dignified. Probably on good behavior, simply because they knew I was a visitor."

shoes were oozing water at every step he took. "Gosh," murmured Mr. Benchley, "I must hurry home and get out of these wet clothes and into a dry Martini!"

THE Warner publicity department is indefatigable in its efforts to publicize Wayne Morris as the great lover of the year. An item appeared in one of the papers to the effect that he had had Lea Roy in a fight at the Coconut Grove. When a friend kidded him about it Wayne grinned sheepishly. "I'd like to meet the girl sometime," he said quietly.

DOWN at his ranch, Bing Crosby took his four-year-old son, Gary, into the chicken run to see some newly hatched chickens. Gary spied one off by itself inside the hen house. He made for it and the angry hen made for Gary. In a panic he made a leap and grabbed hold of the roost overhead. The roost broke and Gary fell. He picked himself up and angrily surveyed the clucking hen. "Dommit," he said, "I'm glad I broke your old trapeze!"

USUALLY in fight scenes the punches are pulled. That is, the participants are careful not to hurt each other. But during the fight sequence in "The Four Marys," Bob Evans accidentally blocked Hank Hinkinson's eye. Mr. Hinkinson, a year or so ago a leading contender for the heavyweight title, got sore and tore into Mr. Evans. Result, a cut lip and a badly bruised face. Richard Thorpe, the director, blandly let the fight go on. So this is one picture where you'll see the real thing—in the way of fights.

VINTON HAWORTH, under contract to RKO for a long time, has worn a mustache for eleven years. When they failed to pick up his option he shaved the mustache off to see if it would change his luck. They hired him back next day.

MORE fun at Ginger Rogers's house with her new soda fountain! It has all the gadgets—things which go squidge when you press a button and the things which go blurbp with nice thick sirups emerging from somewhere. The only rule is that you must eat whatever you concoct. What's more, there is a prize at the end of each week for the guest who has concocted the most original and appetizing goop. So far, Burgess Meredith has won every prize, a fancy bottle of his favorite sirup. Now that he's in New York appearing in a stage play, perhaps some one else will have a chance to win.
When Jeanette MacDonald's two sisters visited her, she thought it would be fun to take them on one of the sight-seeing busses which volunteer to show you "the homes of the stars." Jeanette donned a rather elaborate disguise for the occasion and the trio were enjoying family giggles until the guide shouted, "On your right, ladies and gentlemen, you see the home of the singing star, Jeanette MacDonald!"

"Oh no, it isn't!" Jeanette corrected him. "I don't live there any more." Whereupon the other passengers evinced such excitement that Jeanette and her guests had to disembark at the next stop and taxi home.

Apropos of a recent magazine article which dealt with Hollywood writers and was entitled "Angleworms," Dorothy Peterson produced this recipe from her grandmother's "remedy book."

"Place half a pint of angleworms in a glass jar, add one ounce oil of sassafras, stir with turpentine and two tablespoons salt. Let stand in the hat sun for two or three days—until angleworms have dissolved. Apply with red flannel for the relief of rheumatism, pains in the back—or in the neck!" Why, Dorothy!

Hollywoodians practically stand in line to acquire some of those colossally superior eggs from Alison Skipworth's now-famous hens. The other day, just after she had given away her last egg, Skippy heard that a friend was ill. In near-despair she rushed to her hen house and spoke firmly to her assembled brood. Anyhow, she secured one egg, climbed into her car and rushed seven miles to the invalid's side. "They say that new-laid eggs are good for you," she proclaimed. "And I had to wait five minutes for this one. I got here as soon as I could!" The invalid, we might add, is recovering nicely.

It's Anita Louise who has the devoted butler who is always trying to persuade her to eat things which will "build her up." One of his fetishes is yeast and Anita insists that she can't take yeast. But he's sly, this one. He mixes an engaging concoction of milk, sherry and egg and brings it to her with an innocent expression. After she has swallowed it with obvious enjoyment, he dissolves in delighted chuckles. "Had your yeast and never knew it!" he crows. "Now, you'll thrive!" Anita pretends horror and dismay and the next day they do it all again.

When the newsreel men arrived at Clara Bow's new Hollywood café to make pictures of her some one thought of asking half a dozen of the youngsters who hung about outside to help with a scene. Ten minutes later the place was practically inundated with

LOOKING BACK ON JACK BENNY'S BOYHOOD AND YOUTH IN A SMALL TOWN, WE FIND THE BEGINNINGS OF THE GREAT ENTERTAINER AND COMEDIAN HE HAS NOW BECOME.

On the second floor of this building in Waukegan, Illinois, Benny Kubelsky—now Jack Benny—practiced on the violin that eventually led to fame.

PACK your books and leave. You're suspended.”

Like the Sphinx moving its stony lips the principal of the Central School in Waukegan, Illinois, delivered this ultimatum to the youth standing before him.

The mischievous grin on the round boyish face suddenly turned to consternation.

"But why?" he asked innocently.

"You don't deny that the librarian had to put you out of the room this morning because you made uncomplimentary remarks about me," challenged the principal in the same icy tone.

The boy was silent.

"B-b-but, please," he suddenly blurted. "School will be out in two days. Can't you postpone court till the finish?"

His pleading words fell like drizzle on a rock.

"My orders are final," snapped the principal. "I'm tired of your wisecracks. Get your books and leave at once."

And so Benny Kubelsky, now Jack Benny, and famous the world over for the same wisecracks which caused his first downfall, turned his back on higher education.

Had the principal been more lenient, Benny might have graduated and become one of the leading clothing merchants or perhaps a lawyer or doctor, but the screen and radio would have lost one of its best comedians.

"Jack was just a real honest-to-goodness boy, intelligent and quick at repartee," divulges Julius Sinykin, lifelong friend of the star, as he sits in lounging pajamas in his apartment in the Waukegon Hotel. Grinning at you from all walls of the room are various photos signed: "To my pal, Julius, from Jack."

It was Mr. Sinykin who discussed Jack's boyhood problems and who encouraged him to adopt acting as a career.

In vaudeville at last, our hero, then billed as Ben K. Benny, tested his flair for comedy by interpolating wisecracks as he fiddled. He was a hit from the start.

Mr. Benny as he is today with Julius Sinykin, his lifelong friend whose early reminiscences color this unusual story.

Mayer Kubelsky, Jack's father, had a men's clothing store at 223 South Genesee Street in Waukegan, and Mr. Sinykin owned another furnishing store in the same block. Although the Kubelsky establishment no longer exists, Jack's old home, which was directly across the street, still stands. It was here that Jack, before he was eight years old, used to practice on the violin.

His early musical career had a sudden interruption. The natural ability which he possessed won him a place in a children's orchestra under the tutelage of Bill Farmer, who also doubled as postmaster of the town.

One day, during a lull in the rehearsal, Jack whispered a remark about the dignified tutor to the girl beside him. The Farmer ears, trained to detect false notes, overheard it, and before Jack knew it he was being marched out the door. Even the pleading of Jack's father failed to reinstate him in the little orchestra.

Mr. Sinykin chuckles as he relates another of Jack's boyhood incidents. "He had been practicing on his violin until a late hour the evening previous and was tired. After school he went

Young in Years........Old in Talent

Bonita Granville

After the showing of "These Three"—wherein the morbid imagining of an adolescent girl caused tragedy for all concerned—people came away astonished, almost silenced, by what they had seen. A thirteen-year-old actress had given so realistic a performance that every one asked who she was. The screen had not placed her name in the cast, Miriam Hopkins, Joel McCrea, and Marle Oberon being stars of "The Children's Hour."

Bonita Granville meant nothing to any one at that time. She was just another child player to the studios. She had played the little girl in "Cavalcade."

As in "Cavalcade," time marches on. Suddenly Bonita rang the casting bell anew, and it is still ringing. With her magnificent performance in "These Three" she lit an artistic candle which, by the studios' grace, will never be put out.

Paramount engaged her for "Maid of Salem," a witch-burning story. Like other film companies, Paramount believed Bonita was only a one-part actress. Then Warners cast her in "Call It a Day."

With such artists as Frieda Inescort, Olivia de Havilland, Roland Young, and Ian Hunter in the picture, Bonita commanded full attention. As the whimsical, refreshing child of the family affected by spring fever, she showed us how versatile she could be. In fact, her work in this comedy leaves the interviewer without a word to describe her brilliance.

Mickey Rooney told me she was excellent. I might quote old sayings—versatile, infinite variety, genius. They've been said before. In fact, wasted on many undeserving players.

Meeting Bonita, you think immediately of radiance. You note her lovely hair. It has a natural luster so sadly missing in her fellow artists, whose rinsings of henna and peroxide achieve for them the tint of canned pineapple. Bonita's naturalness is refreshing.

Crossing over from my place to her apartment, I thought of her sudden rise to notice. Young players are astounding us to-day. Mickey Rooney, Freddie Bartholomew, Shirley Temple, Jane Withers, and the Mauch twins make us wonder whether acting is the result of years of technique, or the offspring of eternal memory.

Bonita's ability must be the result of memory, I informed myself. No child could appear so vicious and cruel as she was in "These Three," unless her imagination was highly developed.

In my pavings in the cinema city, I have passed a school of dancing where photos of pupils, including Cara Sue Collins, adorn the windows. A pretty one of my subject bore this inscription: "To my dear dancing teacher, Edith Jane. With lots of love. Bonita Granville. 1935."

Mickey Rooney

With a somewhat motherly attitude, a waitress at the Metro-Goldwyn commissary approached our table and, proffering a menu to Mickey Rooney, requested his autograph.

Without posing, Mickey wrote his name in bold style. Amid the lines and flourishes of his M and R, the two completed names were all but concealed. They resembled tightly wound springs in the center of a labyrinth.

Here we get an insight into Mickey Rooney. He has big ideas. So big, that occasionally he is all but lost in his own gigantic projects. He tends off the world with his ideas—thus the world often loses sight of the real Mickey in being staggered by his plans.

But there is nothing of the impractical dreamer about him. His ideas are solid and workable. He doesn't hint, or suggest, or consider a thing merely possible. What he wants to do is right up his street and quite likely. A businesslike idealist, a sensible dreamer—such men as Mr. Rooney mold world events.

"At twenty-one, I want to be a director," he said, with such dynamic conviction that I all but saw him wielding the megaphone. "In a few years from now, I'd like to travel in Europe—you know, see all those places and pick up more knowledge."

"I've had all the experience I need for directing. I've been on the stage all my life. I've been a good many years in pictures. I know as much as there is to know about making and acting in them. So when the time comes, I'll be ready."

You are astounded at his assurance, but easily convinced by his common sense.

There is a difference, Mickey says, between conceit and knowing what's what.

"If you pose about knowing something you don't know, that's conceit," he pointed out. "But to talk of something you know you know, is being sure of yourself."

And Mickey Rooney is sure of himself.

The profession is an old game to him. He has been on the stage with his parents since babyhood. Neil Brown, a dancer, and Joe Yule, a comedian, received a delightful surprise on September 23, 1921. A son was born to them in Brooklyn, New York, and named Joe, Jr.

When eleven days old, Joe, Jr., took his first professional train ride. His parents were going to Albany with a vaudeville troupe. Eleven seems Mickey's number for action. He was eleven months old when he first trod the boards.

So close to the theater was his world, that he never seemed to know when he was on the stage or off. Once he strolled out front when his parents' act was going full blast. Thereupon, Joe, Sr., decided Joe, Jr., should inherit Bonita Granville, at fourteen, is recognized as one of the most skilled actresses in Hollywood and more versatile than many. An interesting girl, too, as you learn from her story opposite.

Repeatedly, critics affirm that Mickey Rooney is the finest actor in pictures. His ambition is to play a leading rôle opposite Spencer Tracy, "his" choice among the Hollywood great.

BY WILLIAM H. McKEGG
There's nothing in the world so glamorous as a Hollywood premiere. See Carthay Circle Theater, above.

Deanna Durbin is growing up quickly, with success and fame. At fourteen she has her orchids. That's her mother with her at premiere of "100 Men and a Girl."

The great battle of the moment is to keep Deanna Durbin from being overworked. Studio and radio sponsors both demand her time, and Universal is naturally anxious to follow up the victories already won by her two pictures, "Three Smart Girls" and "100 Men and a Girl."

There are literally a dozen stories lined up for the little lady, though it's a question how many of these Deanna will be able to do within the next year. Her health has to be safeguarded to the utmost at this particular time, and the desire is to preserve her lovely voice for the future. In addition to all else she must pursue her school studies, and also face the terrific idolatry of a public that is enchanted with her.

How keen this idolatry is was evidenced time and again at the Hollywood Bowl, when she attended concerts, and was besieged by adoring fans and autograph seekers. Deanna and her family live very simply, for they are good substantial people, and this enables her to keep her feet on the ground.

Yet, even so, their experiences are hectic enough. The Durbin telephone is consequently kept almost as deep a secret as that of Joan Crawford, which is supposed to be one of the most unfothomable, and even then is changed about twice a month.

A Marriage Holiday.—Miriam Hopkins did everything possible to keep her elopement with Anatole Litvak a secret, but she was stalked practically all the way to Yuma by reporters. The only trick she played successfully was having the plane on which she traveled flown from one field to another about ten miles distant so she could take her departure quietly. Reporters were momentarily caught off guard by this, and couldn't procure another plane at the psychological moment to trail the wedding party. However, the newsmen were on hand to greet them on their arrival at the Arizona Gretna Green.
Isa Miranda is Italy’s most celebrated cinema star. She really is. Now she’s in Hollywood polishing up her English for Paramount stardom.

Like Alice Faye, Miriam had chosen a week-end as an appropriate one for a “quiet elopement,” though in the end it missed little of fanfare.

Alice and Tony Martin seem to have reached a much greater stage of contentment following their marriage than before it. Their courtship was tempestuous, with Alice frequently sending her engagement ring back to Tony. It’s never easy to tell how any marriage will come out at the present time. Stories relating the new-found happiness of Martha Raye, because of her wedding to Buddy Westmore, were just appearing in the magazines about the time she was seeking a divorce. That was about the shortest-lived adventure in matrimony ever heard of these days.

Standing by George.—Funniest story in a long time that we’ve heard, if it were not so sad, is the one about George Raft attending the funeral of his mother with Mack Gray the “Killer,” and another companion. It seems that neither Mack nor the other chap had ever been in a church where kneeling was the custom.

When they accompanied Raft they earnestly sought to support the actor in his grief, one being on either side of him as he entered the church. On arriving at their seats they told George sort of slip to the floor from their sustaining arm-clasp. Said the Killer: “Don’t give way, George. Be brave.”

SO YOUR TEST

EVERY year the big film companies seek out and make screen tests of thousands of promising aspirants for Hollywood careers. It is not surprising that few survive the merciless gantlet of camera and microphone and official eye. It is not surprising that many candidates with successful records in other fields of entertainment flop dismally.

And yet many of these flaps have a way of babbling up later as film successes, and occasionally as very great successes—which makes the business of testing players unpredictable and exciting and littered with odd anecdotes.

For instance, several years ago Fox talent scouts spotted an inexperienced but promising youngster named Pauline Moore and gave her a screen test. As in the case of many other charming and talented aspirants, her hopes were dashed. A year later Fox tested her again, and again she drew a blank. They made a third and fourth test, at long intervals, and these also were turned down. Meanwhile other companies had tested her with the same results.

Miss Moore knew enough of the uncertainties of show business to keep plugging right along, getting more experience, waiting for a break. She landed an important part in an Earl Carroll review. Fox tested her once again—and within twenty-four hours rushed her to Hollywood for a part in "Love Is News."

Michael Bartlett can look back on some strange experiences with screen tests. He took his first in the early days of talkies, passed it triumphantly, and signed a contract, at $1,000 a week, to appear opposite Janet Gaynor in a musical. But musicals suddenly fell off in popularity, plans for the picture were canceled, and the young opera singer was bought off.

Several years went by, while Bartlett kept knocking at Hollywood's gates. Eight times, at least, he was tested by various companies before Columbia signed him and gave the public a chance to hear his fine voice.

The phenomenal popular Robert Taylor has probably appeared in more screen tests than any other star. To be sure, he was signed to a contract as the result of his first test, but because he lacked experience he was relegated to the lucky position of a "test horse."

That is, when the talent scouts wanted to find out how a new girl could put over a love scene, they trouted out the obscure Mr. Taylor, who was then known as S. Arlington Brugh, for her to work on.

Girls came and went, but the patient test horse continued to fill in and collect his thirty-five dollars a week, until one day he was drafted for a part in an MGM short through motives of economy. When the public got its first look at Taylor, his days as a test horse were over.

The roll call of Hollywood stars who have been tried and found wanting in screen tests is really imposing. There's the illustrious Mae West, for instance.

Before talkies, Mae knocked vainly at Hollywood's portals. To be sure, she had a Broadway reputation, but pro-
Was a Flop!

Producers feared that the sort of roles with which she was identified were too earthy for the screen, and she was too mature and buxom to fit the current style in stars. In 1932, however, Mae made a test in which she repressed all her distinctive mannerisms. She appeared to be almost demure. This test won her a long delayed chance in Hollywood—but once inside the door, the conniving Mae bounced back into her familiar role and, as everybody knows, became an immediate sensation with a large box office.

Everybody said that Katharine Hepburn was not a picture type. Her unorthodox face and personality ran the gantlet of many tests before a producer ventured to take a chance on her. Needless to say, they’re all looking for Hepburns now.

Ruby Keeler was tested by one of the most important companies and turned down. Ruby, it is said, was willing to drop the thought of a screen career, but her husband, aggressive Al Jolson, was not. He persuaded Warners to take a look at the test which the first company had made and rejected. They did, and signed Miss Keeler to a contract. They soon had reason to congratulate themselves.

One is tempted to ask, do screen tests actually test? And that question is of quite as much concern to the producers as to the players. No producer likes to see a million-dollar "find" slip through his net and into the lap of a rival. And that is the reason why, in the past few years, there has been an immense improvement in screen tests.

The casual, inexpensive test that used to decide the fate of all screen aspirants won’t do any more, except for the selection of girls for decorative purposes and the like. Today many tests are produced as carefully as scenes for features. A Broadway player, for instance, will reenact a big scene from his current hit. It will run several minutes of screen time. The make-up, the photography, the sound recording, must avoid any shortcomings which he may possess, and reveal his qualifications to perfection—a tough job, even for the experts, and one requiring a good deal of experiment. How tough, one can judge from the fact that many established Hollywood stars insist on being photographed only by certain men who have studied them for years. And no test expert wants to have his work shown up later by some studio virtuoso.

Very likely the test makers will not be content with one scene from one play; they’re afraid, with good reason, of turning in a one-sided portrait of John Doe and his qualifications which may brand him as a flop. Therefore, if the first scene is heavy drama, there will be another which shows Doe’s qualifications for comedy, light romance, or something else. If he sings, or dances, there will be a generous sample of that. The result will be a rather complete bit of repertory, often better entertainment than some of the shorts shown in theaters. But these little pictures, of course, are for studio eyes alone.

The large companies maintain elaborate and expensive scouting organizations for rounding up talent for their test mills. These operate in New York, in Hollywood, and sometimes abroad. You'll find the talent scouts prowling about wherever singing, dancing or dramatic talent may be budding. They cover Broadway shows, night clubs, radio acts, summer theaters, concerts and the opera, school and college plays, foreign-made films.

They study the pictures in the newspapers, looking for Continued on page 90.
"Stage Door."—RKO. Too long eclipsed by weak pictures, Katharine Hepburn comes from behind the cloud at last and displays her captivating charm and individuality once again. And Ginger Rogers, who bid fair to dance away her reputation as an actress with Fred Astaire, comes across with a performance that should make her mother proud of her coaching. But the picture belongs to neither. It shines as a performance that derives its luster from brilliant writing and the contribution of every member of the long cast. The screen play is far keener and more entertaining than the stage original. Gossip says that only two lines were retained. The puzzle is where to find them now. All that is left is the Footlights Club, a sort of boarding house for girls on the stage or trying to get there. The inmates are sharply defined types understandable at a glance and good for laughter or tears, mostly laughter. Miss Rogers is the stormy petrel of the group, Gail Patrick her sworn enemy, their exchange of insults never letting up and always good for a laugh. Then comes Miss Hepburn, a stranger who chooses to live among them in spite of her good clothes and inexperience with the stage. The mild mystery attached to her is cleared up when she appears in a play backed by her rich father, but her victory is canceled when the girl who was promised the part commits suicide. This is only a hint of the story and scarcely more than a whisper of the picture and its excellence. Diverting from beginning to end, it is so well worth seeing that I refrain from "selling" it to you.

"First Lady."—Warner. Political society in Washington is mercilessly lampooned in the wittiest and most adult picture in which Kay Francis has ever starred. I don't know how her admirers will take it. For she neither suffers from nobility of character nor the perfidy of man. Instead, she is a scheming politician who practices hypocrisy as a fine art. Though her objective is advancement of her husband's career, so ingrained is her double-crossing that one is sure she would keep busy at the game if she had no husband at all. Her enemy is Verree Teasdale, discontented wife of a supreme court justice. Their exchange of polite insults never lets up and is always good for chuckles and laughter. Miss Francis maneuvers to have Miss Teasdale's husband nominated for President of the United States through the support of an organization of women controlling millions of votes. Louise Fazenda, president of this league of womanhood, offers a priceless caricature. With the prospect of becoming First Lady of the Land, Miss Teasdale stops thinking of leaving her husband and becomes a model of cooing comumbial bliss while Miss Fazenda and her cohorts look on and approve their wise choice of the perfect couple for the White House. Then Miss Francis turns the tables, reduces Miss Teasdale to abject humiliation, causes her husband to decline the nomination and triumphantly submits to Miss Fazenda her own husband as the ideal choice. The picture ends with Miss Francis determined to be First Lady. All this makes a brilliant, cynical study of character of especial comfort and satisfaction to those who don't believe all they read in newspapers.

"Make a Wish."—RKO. Bobby Breen's popularity with children makes it imperative, I suppose, for his pictures to be carefully patterned to a juvenile audience. They are produced by a veteran who knows what is expected of a singing boy. Which is to say that his new one is melodious, wholesome to the point of sweetness, with beautiful natural backgrounds to make sure of it, and with no dramatic integrity at all. Its humor is captured in master Bobby's prize bon mot. He wittily describes a litter of dogs as "quinquuplets." He is first seen at a boy's camp in the midst of swarming juveniles. He meets a New York composer who is in search of a melody for his operetta. It isn't surprising to discover that Bobby has it within himself all ready for Basil Rathbone, the musician. Bobby's mother appears. She, too, is a singer and is accompanied by Ralph Forbes who vaguely disapproves of Bobby, Mr. Rathbone and the Maine woods. Gossip tells Bobby that Mr. Forbes will never marry his mother if she returns to the stage. That's enough for Bobby. He sees to it that she stars in Mr. Rathbone's operetta, which apparently is laid in fairyland, and this, of course, leads to his annexing Mr. Rathbone for a new papa. The mystery of the story is what makes Mr. Forbes so sore. Perhaps it is Bobby Breen.

"100 Men and a Girl."—Universal. Perfect entertainment is here! Deanna Durbin is every inch a star to-day. To-morrow will find her one of the greatest screen attractions, unless I and many others miss our guess. Lovely as her singing was in "Three Smart Girls," it has improved, and her girlish charm and spontaneity are as natural as if no camera were watching. I believe that half the secret of her picture's success lies in the fact that only great music is heard. No tin-pan-alley ditties, no crooning and no swing bands. Instead, Leopold Stokowski leads a symphony orchestra of one hundred and Miss Durbin sings an aria from "La Traviata," Mozart's "Allegretto" and similar musical delicacies, leaving her hearers with a desire to hear more rather than wondering when she will stop and let the picture go on. The story is just right, too. Miss Deanna's father, Adolphe Menjou, is a musician without a job who is not allowed to see the great Stokowski about getting work. He finds a purse which enables him to pay his rent, then his daughter returns it to its rich owner, Alice Brady, who flutters over Deanna and thinks her idea of organizing an orchestra of unemployed musicians is cutely original. Just how the girl accomplishes her object and tricks Stokowski into leading the men is something that must be seen to be fully enjoyed. Miss Brady, Mr. Menjou, Eugene Pallette, and Mischa Auer, not forgetting Stokowski, are at their best and Deanna is queen of them all.

"Victoria the Great."—RKO. The immense popularity of Helen Hayes's stage play, "Victoria Regina," assures for this an audience bent on comparing England's best with our own. Herbert Wilcox produced and directed it and Anna Neagle is the British queen, with Anton Walbrook, "Michael Strogoff" a few months back, as the Prince Consort. The story of Victoria's life as queen from 1837 to 1901 is dignified and true to fact, lavishly mounted and articulately written. It is a slow and heavy picture because of its truth. It will appeal more to the studious than to the seeker after conventional entertainment. Also, the very nature of the material and the great lapse of time it covers make a picture of episodes rather than a continuous narrative. But this also is true of the successful stage play. The screen panorama begins, as the play does, with young Princess Victoria being awakened and told that she is Queen of England and ends with the jubilee celebration of her sixtieth year as sovereign. This is a superb spectacle photographed in technicolor. Miss Neagle holds her own in the trying role, at her best as the young queen. Mr. Walbrook is splendid as her some, idealistic Albert, and all the parts are well played.

"There Goes the Groom."—RKO. Critics of the stage call Burgess Meredith its most important young actor. "Hamlet in 1940" is their slogan. Mr. Meredith last year won a film audience in "Winterset," a grave, poetic drama. This season he returns to the screen as a substitute for Gene Raymond in a farce with Ann Sothern. He says that an actor must return to the stage to progress, to grow. One heartily applauds his wisdom after seeing him in his new film. He will never grow as a cinema actor in a piece like this. For it is inconsequential to the point of nothingness, a frail something about a young man who simulates amnesia to escape marriage, and a crack over the head administered by the heroine, which brings him to his senses. Of course it isn't without laughs. But it is de-that his commanding whistle summoning them for dinner took them by surprise. Knowing that their father expected them to be playing in their own backyard, they took a mad plunge down the roof to make up the time element involved in covering the distance from their neighbor’s property.

When they sprawled to the ground, Louis looked despairingly at a bleeding hand which had been torn to the bone by a protruding nail.

Mr. Ameche beamed proudly to think that his boys were so interested in the appearance of the family belongings, and his wrath turned to sympathy. The next day, hammer in hand, he spent several diligent hours looking for the protruding nail without success.

But Don explained that by saying that he had pulled it out and tossed it away right after the accident, so that no one else would suffer the same experience.

This example of foresight on the part of his son again pleased the unsuspecting parent and the incident, much to the satisfaction of Louis who knew how narrowly he had escaped an unpleasant session with the razor strop which was used for more than sharpening blades, was completely forgotten.

There were other incidents, too, which Mrs. Ameche recounts with sympathetic understanding. In his college days, she remembers the numerous telephone calls from girls, enchanted by the romantic air about this dark Italian boy.

But Don’s attention was reserved only for one—his boyhood sweetheart who now shares his success. And Don’s father, forgetting the legal career he had planned for his son, is with him heart and soul now. For the first thing Don did when fortune began to travel the trail with him, was to build a home in California for the parents who had sacrificed so much to provide his early training.

To his three brothers and four sisters, too, Don is the same impetuous boy who shared their joys and sorrows and was the first to rush to their assistance.

You rise to go, feeling like an impostor for demanding two hours of time from so loving a mother who, although gravely concerned about the condition of her daughter in the hospital, does not refuse to go back over memory’s trail with you to tell all about Don.

Her son-in-law who follows through the interview, refreshing Mrs. Ameche’s memory with his recollections of Don, motions you to sit down again.

“Would you like a glass of wine?” he asks.

And knowing full well the significance of this gesture of Italian hospitality, we accept. Mrs. Ameche does not join us in the libation, but smiles approvingly as we raise our glasses and drink a toast to Don’s continued success.

Don was sent away to his first boarding school.

“His father was a great believer in them. He wanted Don to be a lawyer and he believed that private schools would give him the proper kind of early training for a legal career.” Mrs. Ameche pauses.

“Do you think Don would have made a good lawyer?” we ask.

She smiles, and behind that smile you feel that she had known all her life that fame in law was not his destiny.

“Don was always a smart boy,” she continues. “I’ll never forget the time he was just beginning first grade in school. He took sick just after school started and had to stay away from his classes for two weeks. When he returned he found that his friends had learned to read.

“That night he brought home his first book. While I was busy with the dinner he sat at the table and began reading to me. I thought he was just making believe, so I looked over his shoulder and, sure enough, he was reading the story in the book, word for word.”

With understanding patience, Mrs. Ameche watched the flowering of the dramatic in her son. Somehow, secretly she felt it would never flourish in the kind that would wring mercy for his client in the hush of the courtroom.

But Mr. Ameche pictured his boy in the rôle of another Clarence Darrow. Particularly pleased was he when Don, taking part in a school play, made every one in the audience, including his teachers, dab tears from their cheeks.

“If he can do this now,” remarked the enthusiastic father to Mrs. Ameche as they strolled homeward, “what will he be able to do before the jury box in those big cases he will handle some day.”

“Yes, dear,” Mrs. Ameche answered. “Don will be a great man some day.”

And had you been walking beside her and Mr. Ameche at that moment, you would have felt she already knew in which line he was destined to become great.

Don, exhibiting unusual powers for moving people, at an early age did not hesitate to use this ability to protect others.

Late one afternoon, he and his brother, Louis, were sliding down the roof of a neighbor’s woodshed, a feat which was forbidden by Don’s father. They were so occupied with their sport

Fan-shaped pleating is used to soften the décolleté and to accent the hemline of Beverly Roberts’s brocaded gown.

“Leave this to me, Louis,” Don spoke as their feet pattered homeward. While the frantic parents bandaged the hand and summoned the family physician, Don spoke:

“Louis couldn’t help it, dad,” he explained suavely. “We were cleaning up around the chicken coop and he caught his hand on a nail.”
tion not to swim against the current. No longer will they stage amusing, futile rebellions against the inevitable attitude of Hollywood toward a star’s husband. Rebellions such as their classic, the buying of a twenty-dollar car in which they drove for months to show folks they were living on Ham’s income. Those who had been insinuating that the orchestra leader couldn’t support his wife were so stupid they failed to get the point.

Careers are built on selfishness, says Bette. So she considers this departure from her former chip-on-shoulder attitude a deliberate selfishness in the interests of career. But knowing her enjoyment of domesticity, I feel that “selfish” is the wrong word. “Sacrificial” would be better.

Selfishness or sacrifice, it is part of the change in her, and it will unquestionably redound to her professional advantage.

Another phase of the change is at least a partial, overcoming of what she used to term her “strait-laced New England inhibitions.” Things her characters had to do on the screen made her blush. Some of their actions gave her feelings of actual revulsion. Her best work has been done under the guidance of strong-willed or persuasive directors, who kept reminding her that the film character, not she, was motivating the action.

Now she seeks such directorial encouragement, and in addition has overcome some of the restraints bequeathed her by those Puritans in her Cape Cod family tree. On that tree, by the way, are statesmen, educators, writers, lawyers. Her family and personal background is one of culture, education and refinement, a fact her studio has neglected to stress—probably because such things have never proved good box office for a star.

Which brings us to another phase of the change in Bette. Hitherto she has been quiet and retiring, even after winning an Academy award and other honors.

No more of that. She is avoiding no part of the career of a modern woman in the public eye—not even social work. She has addressed large meetings and radio audiences. The President’s wife and his mother received her in Washington. In common with women’s club leaders, feminine legislators, judges and educators, they are interested in Bette’s advocacy of, and opinions on, certain social reforms that have to do with career and marriage.

Yes, the girl whom casting officials once branded too colorless for movies has come out of her shell. She has changed, and she will continue to change, moving on as her art goes forward. My money is on Bette to stay on the crest of the movie wave for years to come. to work in the Kubelsky store. Jack’s father was called away on business and left his son in charge. But the easy-chair was too much of a temptation for Jack and he was soon fast asleep. Meanwhile, some one tiptoed into the store and walked off with a whole table full of trousers. Jack wished he had all those trousers on when his father wielded the strap in the back room!"

Jack really got started along the entertaining line at school. It was there that his talent came to light. He was the life of every gathering and his natural flair for entertaining made him the target of many requests.

In those days Mr. Sinykin had a great interest in dramatics and headed a stock company which made regular appearances at the old Barrison Theater. By that time Jack had organized his own orchestra and directed it in the pit of the theater to provide musical accompaniment for Mr. Sinykin’s acting.

"I still get a laugh when I think how Jack failed me one night," Mr. Sinykin says, his eyes beaming with reminiscent affection. "I don’t know whether it was our acting or the stuffy air of the theater, but Jack fell asleep during an entire act. When the cue came for music I looked over the footlights and there was Jack peacefully dozing in his chair.

"Somehow, after that Jack lost interest in leading an orchestra. He used to tell me that he didn’t want to be a musician. He’d say confidentially: ‘I see too many great musicians starving. I’m going to aim at comedy.’"

Jack’s first partner in vaudeville was Cara Salisbury, a Waukegan pianist. Jack was seventeen when the team went on the road. When Miss Salisbury played the piano, Jack fiddled away and kept the audience in stitches by interpolating timely gags. After several years, Miss Salisbury was forced to retire. Jack teamed with Lyman Woods, a pianist from Chicago, and the pair became a hit in vaudeville circles. For five years they did three-a-day and then came the World War.

"Jack came back to Waukegan and asked my advice,” Mr. Sinykin reports. "I knew several officers at the Great Lakes training station and I advised Jack to enlist in the navy.

"We went to Admiral William A. Moffett and Jack enlisted. In his application he indicated that he was a musician and when the admiral found out it was the violin he played he nearly gave up in despair. Of what use was a fiddler in the navy? But they did give Jack a flute and during dress parade he used to March around with a flute to his lips, but he never played a note."

Robert Spindola, the sprightly eight-year-old Mexican youngster, who scored an outstanding hit in the stagecoach sequence in “The Firefly.”

Soon Jack's talent for entertaining came to the fore and the officers transferred him to the navy relief division which furnished entertainment for the boys. In a few weeks he was in the Great Lakes revue put on by members of the camp. Then he teamed up with "Zez" Conrey, who later became a well-known orchestra leader and music arranger in New York.

"I'll never forget Jack's act with Zez," beams Mr. Sinykin. "Zez's real first name was Eleazar, but he never used it. He and Jack played at the Barrison in the revue and the act brought down the house. In the skit, Jack was 'Izzy There,' the admiral's disorderly. His antics nearly drove the audience wild and the next day the papers referred to him as the bay with the 'come hither' eyes."

The act was so good that I suggested he and Conrey obtain an honorable discharge and tour the country in vaudeville again. This they did. At that time Jack used the name Ben K. Benny and they played the Orpheum circuit for several seasons. Later, when Jack became popular, he changed his name to Jack Benny because many persons confused him with Ben Bernie."

Came 1927 and Jack began to write Mr. Sinykin about a beautiful girl he had met in Hollywood. Mary Marks was the name. It's January 14, 1927. The phone rings and Mr. Sinykin answers. It's long distance.

"Hello, Julius," comes the voice on the other end. "How are you, you old san-at-a-gun? This is Jack. I'm in Chicago and I'd like to come up and get married—yes, in your apartment. Remember Mary? Well, she's the victim."

That afternoon Ben Kubelsky and Mary Marks were married in the parlor of Mr. Sinykin's apartment. The bridal party traveled back to Chicago for the wedding supper. Until that time Miss Marks had no connection with the stage outside a sister through whom Jack and Mary had met. But soon Jack worked out a part for Mary in his act. To-day Mrs. Benny is known as Mary Livingstone.

March 23, 1937, was a great day for Waukegan and Jack Benny. It was the day when the "local boy who mode good in a big way" came home to receive the plaudits of the citizens who used to know him 'way back when his dad ran a clothing store.

Mr. Sinykin was chairman of the event and all arrangements were in his hands. Several days before the celebration Jack wired:

"Will arrive Tuesday morning with Mary and Dan Stop. Make any plans you Mayar Talcott and committee think best Stet Na parade Stet. Remember om nervous Stet. Go easy on an old home boy who still likes Waukegan and his schoolday pals Stop Jack."

"When I met Jack at the train that morning I knew at a glance he was excited," Mr. Sinykin remembers. "He told me that he didn't deserve the honor."

But despite the fact that Jack wanted a quiet reception Waukegan's proud citizens thought differently. Jack was escorted in a gigantic parade through town, a mass meeting was held in the school gymnasium and a dinner and dance tapped off the evening.

It was during the meeting in the afternoon that Jack got his greatest thrill. The gym was packed with kids who shouted, whistled, and stamped their feet as Jack made his entrance with Mr. Sinykin. Jack gulped and said to his friend:

"Julius, I never did anything to deserve this."

Before the afternoon was over, Jack was forced to entertain in typical Benny style for almost an hour to satisfy his young admirers. Earlier in the day he had visited the veterans' hospital with the same results.

Jack showed his wise-cracking ability during the afternoon when Mayor Moncel Talcott affiliated at a tree planting ceremony in the city hall park. The tree was christened the "Jack Benny Elm" and commemorates the peace treaty ending the feud between Jack and Fred Allen. Summoning his knack for humor, Jack said in response to the mayor's talk:

"I appreciate Bidy Talcott naming the elm tree after me. It's a great tribute to me and all the dogs in the county."

But no matter how much greater Jack Benny becomes, Mr. Sinykin is sure he will always remember the comedian as the boy who enjoyed a joke and loved to entertain.

"And don't forget," Mr. Sinykin says, "Jock can really play the violin."
Now this New Cream with “Skin-Vitamin”
Helps Women’s Skin More Directly

“It keeps skin faults away more surely”
—ELEANOR K. ROOSEVELT

A NEW KIND OF CREAM is bringing more direct help to women’s skin.

It is bringing to their aid the vitamin which especially helps to build new skin tissue, the vitamin which helps to keep skin healthy—the “skin-vitamin.”

When there is not enough of this “skin-vitamin” in the diet, the skin may suffer—become undernourished, rough and subject to infections.

For over three years Pond’s tested this “skin-vitamin” in Pond’s Creams. In animal tests, skin became rough and dry when the diet lacked “skin-vitamin.” Treatment with Pond’s new “skin-vitamin” cream made it smooth and healthy again—in only 3 weeks!

When women used the creams, three out of every four of them came back asking for more. In four weeks they reported pores looking finer, skin smoother, richer looking!

Same jars, same labels, same price
Now everyone can enjoy these benefits. The new Pond’s “skin-vitamin” Cold Cream is in the same jars, with the same labels, at the same price. Use it your usual way for daytime and nightly cleansing, for freshening-ups before powder.

Every jar of Pond’s Cold Cream now contains this precious “skin-vitamin.” Not the “sunshine” vitamin. Not the orange-juice vitamin. Not “irradiated.” But the vitamin which especially helps to rebuild skin tissue. Whenever you have a chance, leave a little of the cream on. In a few weeks, see how much better your skin is.

Hollywood High Lights

Vittoria had trekked to Hollywood to study movie production under the Roach guidance.

However, the anti-Nazi league, which numbers many picture people in its membership, did publish a protest against any social fêtes for the Italian emissary. The league didn’t like his participating in Ethiopian aerial warfare. But protesting was about as far as the opposition went. Hollywood is scarcely pugnacious enough to raise any great row at any time.

Anti-Fascist Sentiment.—The Spanish loyalist cause received its due recently, though, when two ambulances were sent across country to collect funds for medical aid of the sufferers belonging to this party. The ambulances were liberally autographed with the signatures of such players as Franchot Tone, Robert Montgomery, Chester Morris, Nancy Carroll, and Florence Eldridge (Mrs. Fredric March), proving perhaps that there is an active anti-imperialist party in movieland.

Who’s the boy? Guess again. It’s none other than Jane Withers dressed up for her new rôle in "45 Fathers."

Ruth Well Remembered.—Ruth Roacht, bent on fulfilling the ceremomial requirements, kept an Slipping, and perspiration broke out on the brows of Gray and his other friend. Finally George himself gave them a sort of jerk that brought them to their knees, and then they knew what it was all about. Rait was deeply affected by his mother’s passing, but he isn’t a fainting type.

Symbolic Shirley Resented.—Quite a bit of dismav prevailed in the Shirley Temple family when they returned from their trip to Honolulu and happened to visit Clara Bow’s "It" café in Hollywood. Admiring the wall of this café was a sketch of little girl looking much like Shirley, with all sorts of fantastic symbols at wealth about her — moneybags, jewels à la Mae West, and the like.

We understand that the Temples entered a protest about the whole thing, but it appears that it was a decographer’s idea, and it wasn’t his intention to single out Shirley especially, but just to give a notion of how money rolls in the infant actors in movieland. Naturally, such a thing could paint only one way and that was toward the affluent little Temple girl.

Footlight Bug Bites.—There’s no denying that stars are becoming serious about the stage again, what with Jaan Bennett doing a tour in "Stage Door," Sylvia Sidney, Henry Fonda, and the Fredric Marches appearing in new plays, and Mary Astor a guest artist on the Coast with "To-night at 8:30," Noel Coward’s series of short footlight pieces.

Mary suffered a real disappointment when her new husband, Manuel del Campo, who uses the name of Michael Field when he is acting, couldn’t join the company in Los Angeles. He was with them at Santa Barbara, but Equity ruled him out after that, because he is a foreigner, and there was a change in management between the two engagements. Kind of technical, what?

Protested with Reserve.—Arrival of Vittorio Mussolini, son of Il Duce, gave every promise of inspiring a hurricane in Hollywood, and so there was a terrific police guard on hand to protect him when he flew in with Hal Roach.

All the chatter seemed unwarranted, because there wasn’t even the suspicion of an anti-Fascist demonstration. Some suggestion was made that it was possibly all a publicity build-up, since land is perhaps a memory to many people, and just a name to mast, but she was a great star of the serials during the height of her career. Consequently her death was big news in the papers, which should be a gratifying thing for many luminaries to consider who have passed from the spotlight.

Impression is that "names" are quickly forgotten in Hollywood, but that has really never been true of big "names" and older "names" associated with the movie industry.

Ruth was always a part of the life of Hollywood, an astute business woman, and charityl in a manner that was never ostentatious. The final picture that she made was about a year ago—a so-called quota film produced in Canada, which will probably be rather widely presented as an aftermath of her death which followed a painful and lingering illness due to a malignant cancer.

Mysterious as Usual.—With deepest secrecy shrouding the actual character of his plans, Charlie Chaplin is working on the scenario for his first talking picture. He offers no prophecies as to when it will be ready. He calls it the most important step in all his long experience, and suggests that many months will elapse before the picture is finally produced, which may leave the way open for Paulette Goddard to play "Scarlett O’Hara" in "Gone with the Wind."

Charlie has a marvelous new series of imitators, and might brighten his film with these. In remarkable fashion he takes off the lip acrobatics of the singing stars when they are endeavoring to warble a tune. They are a bit grotesque, you know. And by the way, Charlie’s last picture, "Modern Times," is expected to gross around $4,000,000 over the world. Even in silent films he is still probably the biggest money-making star.

The Revenue of Kay.—Kay Francis would be making $7,000 a week by 1942 if she were not seeking to break her contract with Warners. As a matter of fact, she asserts the studio broke it when the promised lead in "Tava- rich" was given to Claudette Colbert. Kay wanted to play this part, doubtless due to the fact that she has had some rather poor ones lately. The whole matter is now in the courts. The suit divulged Miss Francis’s present salary as $5,250.

HOPE HAMPTON

HER CLOTHES AND HER HOME
The unusualness of Hope Hampton's Park Avenue home is that it is situated between two skyscrapers and has but two rooms on each floor. The living room, upper left page, has champagne satin draperies. The furniture is needlepoint and satin brocade. Zebra skin covers the stairs. Outer left, a view of the entrance hall with its black marble flooring. The dining room, top, has a Louis XVI influence. Above, the elaborate bathroom. Left, the sitting room or library, done in beige and brown.
Silver fox and gray broadcloth, both the darlings of fashion, are combined in this town ensemble. The swinging cape is entirely bordered with the fox.

For the cocktail hour, Fay Wray chooses a luxurious ensemble of perfectly matched silver fox skins over a short gown of blue-and-silver lamé.
A breath of provincial France is caught in this gown of black velvet and taffeta combination worn by Fay Wray. The tiny fitted bodice with huge stiff sleeves points down into the full circular skirt. A cross of emeralds matches the bracelet.

Plastron of timber wolf trim the boxy coat of beige nubby wool which partially covers the beltless slim frock of "Deraine" green. Kidskin gloves, bag and shoes match a brown pull-on hat.
• Grecian in feeling with its shoulders caught together with jeweled clips and fitted circular skirt is this dress of black velvet. The waistline shows the new influence of both high and low in its draped closeness from the hipline to under the bust.

FOUNTAINS OF BEAUTY

BY LAURA BENHAM

LET YOUR PERFUME TELL A LOVELY STORY ABOUT YOU.

BEAUTY is, as I've reminded you many times before, the result of faithful, painstaking care. Even if you are one of the lucky few born with a peaches-and-cream complexion, lustrous hair and a slim, firm figure, you have to devote a certain amount of time and attention to keeping these blessings in good condition. While if you, like most of us, do everything possible to improve upon nature, even more time and effort are required.

But there is one—and only one—form of beauty that every woman can possess absolutely without effort and that is the beauty of fragrance. For an aura of daintiness and fragrance is the one form of loveliness that can be achieved by the simple procedure of using perfume properly.

Of course women have used perfume in some form as far back as there's any record. Our prehistoric ancestresses stuck flowers in their hair and on their leopard-skin frocks, Cleopatra anointed her body with scented oils, and our grandmothers relied upon sachets of dried rose or lavender leaves. To-day, perfume is available to us in many delightful forms—in bath oils, toilet waters, eau de colognes, sachets, extracts—yet it has not yet come into its own as the real beauty aid that it is.

Oh, I know that most of you have a bottle or two of perfume on your dressing tables and that you dab a drop on your blouse or handkerchief or behind your ear before leaving home. But how many of you really think about perfume and what it can do for you?

For perfume can—and should—be the most potent instrument you have in creating the impression that you wish on people. Scents are definitely linked with associations and memories. So, by using perfume to advantage, you can be sure that every one associates you with daintiness and fragrance and loveliness.

Now, the first step in using perfume properly is to choose a fragrance—or several fragrances—that you really enjoy yourself and with which you feel comfortable. Your perfume should become part of you, so that its fragrance seems to exude from your pores instead of from your dressing table bottle.

So, be careful about that perfume that Aunt Lucy gave you for your birthday and don't use it if you don't feel right with it on. It may be a fine, expensive scent—but perhaps it's an out-of-doors sort of odor and you may be a home-ond-fireside girl.

Or, if you really enjoy active sports and your best beau, in his manlike ignorance, presented you with a heavy, exotic perfume, do tell him you dropped the bottle—and wear a light, woody scent that expresses your own true personality.

Not only according to your personality, but according to the time of day and the occasion should perfumes be chosen. There are enough perfumes in each and every category to allow you to match all these factors.

For instance, if you are a slim, delicate blonde, you can choose a light floral bouquet like Coty's L'Aiment for daytime occasions and a definite one-flower fragrance for evening. Only, be sure the flower you choose is a fragile, delicate one like lily-of-the-valley, lilac or rose. In fact, any of the less heavy, less exotic flower scents will be fine for you.

On the other hand, if you are firmly built with brown hair and eyes, and you like sports, you'll choose a crisper daytime fragrance to wear with your smart tweeds—one like Matchobelli's Georgian cornation or Lenthéric's Tweed. And in the evening you'll wear something that's still crisp and young and gay, but a bit lasting and heady, like Guerlain's L'Heure Bleu, which is very definite without being languorous.

An entirely different parade of perfumes should march across your dressing table if you are tall and slim and dark. While you will still choose a lighter scent for day than for night, you will probably select a subtle but sophisticated blended perfume like Patou's Moment Supreme to wear from dawn to dusk, and after dark you'll choose something heavier and more pungent in either a blend like Weil's Zibeline or in a single exotic flower scent like Caron's Bellodgia.

The point is that there are different perfumes for different types—and certain fragrances are more appropriate for day, others for night. And there are enough of each for every woman to find exactly the right one for herself for each period of the day.

Once you have selected the type of perfume you like and have decided which to use for day and which for night, the way you use them is the next important thing to consider.

Of course you know that perfume should be applied directly to the skin—but I can't resist putting it on my furs and on my coat collar, too. And it's fine to begin scenting the skin with eau de cologne in the same scent as your perfume. Then, after you have finished dressing, put perfume behind your ears and at the hollow of your throat, on your eyebrows and on your hair. For evening, you may even put a drop or two inside your elbows and on the back of your neck at the hairline.

There are several methods of applying perfume and while the "finger dab" system is fine for the particular spots I've mentioned, you'll get the best general results if you spray it on with an atomizer.

You can use an atomizer, too, for your eau de cologne. And while we're on that subject, let me suggest that you business girls should depend upon eau de cologne rather than perfume for use during the day.

For in business you are associated with so many people and they may not all like your particular perfume. So, it's better to rely upon eau de cologne for that faint, delicate fragrance you desire and which will undoubtedly prove pleasing to every one, including the boss. Then, at night you can use the stronger extracts to your heart's content.

Of course the price is always a consideration when choosing perfume—and, unfortunately, it's usually the case that the perfumes we like best are the ones we can't afford. But to-day there are several ways of solving this problem.

The first is to find a moderately priced perfume as nearly as possible like the expensive one we like. Or we can do like one of the smartest young business women I know, and use the less expensive eau de cologne exclusively. By doing this, she is able to have the scent, though fainter, of the fine perfume she likes, for a price she can afford.

The third system—and I'm a believer in this one—is to buy our expensive perfumes in small quantities. Most manufacturers now package their fine perfumes in tiny flacons that are duplicates of their large bottles. Or, in almost every town there are drug or department stores that sell fine perfumes by the dram from their original bottles.

So, it's possible for every woman to use a good perfume and still keep her budget balanced. And now I want to tell you about several of the newest fine perfumes that I'm sure you'll want to try.

First, there's R. S. V. P., the new Richard Hudnut perfume which is a delicately blended floral bouquet from France. It's a brilliant, provocative perfume, beautifully packaged in a white-and-gold box shaped like the envelope of the invitation to which its name asks you to respond—"repondez si vous plait"—and the bottle is in the same design. A vibrant, modern perfume, it will be the choice of sophisticated women who have gayety and the spirit of eternal youth.

And Lucien LeLong, too, has a new perfume—Impromptu—which is as exciting as its name. Coming in a stunning tall crystal flacon, carved in sun-ray affect, and this inclosed in an impressive gold-embazoned box, it is another vital French bouquet fragrance for the smart, modern woman.

Now no perfume discussion would be complete without mention of Elizabeth Arden's Blue Grass, though it isn't new this year. But it's a fragrance so brilliant and thrilling, so thoroughly bred, that it is really always new. It is, I think, a perfect daytime fragrance and not only does it come in an extract, but in toilet water and eau de cologne as well. And there are both soaps and soap and dusting powder to match, too, if you would be truly and completely smart.

Another famous woman who has just introduced a new perfume is Lanvin, whose Pretexte will win many followers.

One more way in which we can add to our fragrance and daintiness is to be sure that our hands always are deliciously scented. And this is as easy as the rest of keeping fragrant—all it means is that you use a sweet-smelling hand lotion every time you wash your hands. This will also assure you of having soft, white hands that feel and look attractive.

One of the best hand lotions for the double purpose of keeping your hands lovely and making them fragrant at the same time is Chamberlain's Hand Lotion, which is scented with orange blossoms.

Of course I know it's needless to remind you that perfume will fail to make you the fragrant, lovely woman you wish to be unless you are absolutely free from all odor of perspiration. And winter or summer, you can't be too careful.

So, be sure to keep a jar of Mum right next to your perfume bottles on your dressing table so that you'll be assured of complete daintiness at all times. Mum is a mild, pleasant-smelling salve which, applied to any part of the body, eliminates the odor from perspiration. And even if you use a non-perspirant regularly, there is still a place for Mum in your life, for it gives you added protection in case your non-perspirant is not perfectly effective, or for those days on which you have just used a depilatory and thus cannot apply a non-perspirant.

then after wandering through all the strange-sounding towns he can find, he will visit Budapest which is to be the scene of the first picture he will make on his return. Later, he promises you, he will continue the series of 'Thin Man' pictures with Myrna Loy.

Bill Powell confuses autograph hunters by looking and acting exactly like "My Man Godfrey" or a card sharp or an adventurer, not like a harassed actor trying to get through crowds of admirers. Except for looking at him suspiciously, and with downright alarm sometimes, people rarely bother him. For this, and all the prosperous years he has behind and before him, he sends thanks.

Tradition versus Money.—When the Ballet Russe opens its annual engagement at the Metropolitan Opera House, Zorina will be detained in Hollywood for the Goldwyn "Follies."
Maybe Mr. Goldwyn was sure of that all along, but Zorina went into pictures only after she was assured that she could go back and join her old troupe for a few weeks. The ballet has a hold on its members that cannot be broken. It is like a religion. With its somewhat weather-beaten scenery and tawdry costumes, the Ballet Russe still has more dizzy glamour for Zorina than all the gold in Hollywood.

Her Private Life.—Luise Rainer, in and around New York for some months resting while her husband, Clifford Odets, finishes a play, has a lot of people puzzled and some quite definitely antagonized. At a not too select, one might almost say raffish, beach colony near Stamford, Connecticut, Miss Rainer was approached by a moonstruck fan who requested an autograph. "Best regards, Mary Pickford" is what the fan got.

Lethargic in mood in her not too public appearances in obscure Greenwich Village restaurants, Miss Rainer dresses in any old thing. That used to be an effective disguise in the days when her pictures surrounded her with glamour, but not any more. In "Big City" her fans felt that she had let them down. They want a good show for their money, on and off the screen.

She Ought To Be in Pictures.—The most talked about one-picture girl in cinema history, Paulette Goddard, inspires the question whenever she goes, "Why isn’t she in lots of pictures?" Only that slow-moving Charles Chaplin who has so long promised to make look at a country that is serene and wholesome and should be a wonderful place to sleep. Then he is going to Paris to get all tired out again. And

Course in Diplomacy.—Barbara Stanwyck is not only a candid and charming and magnetic person, she is also a pretty sly one. When she sailed, not to London to join Robert Taylor as some giddy thousands had imagined she would, but to California via Panama Canal, she neatly steered conversation away from matrimonial intentions.

"I try to keep out of that argument," she replied, when asked if she expected to marry Bob.

Barbara’s departure turned into an al fresco old home week, for it developed that two photographers, the liner’s press agent, and a reporter were all old schoolmates of hers from Brooklyn’s Public School 152. She could remember the names of the kindly and the mean teachers better than she can recall the titles of her own pictures. And she hailed the boys by their old nicknames, same not too complimentary, when they called her Ruby Stevens—which happens to be her real name.

Special Delivery.—Much of that confusion and rushing about on the night when James Cagney’s "Something To Sing About" opened on Broadway was a relay of Mona Barrie’s friends racing to give her a scene by scene report of her reception.

At the Center Theater a few blocks away she was busy amidst the plush elegance of the musical extravaganza "Virginia," but she wanted to know how she was doing on the screen. Except for the fact that Mona likes the blond wig she wears in the picture, and I don’t, reports from the front were received pleasurably.

Fashion artists in the audience marked her down as an ideal subject. Except for Constance Bennett and Claudette Colbert, Mona Barrie is the only film beauty with a figure slim enough to grace the tightly draped new dresses that look as if they were plastered on. She says the noise in New York would make any one thin.

With Best Regards from Bill.—There is little danger of the public forgetting Bill Powell, even though he has gone off to Europe for a long vacation. Ever
What Do People Say About Your Eyes?

Everyone notices your eyes first—remember this! Eyes without proper eye make-up often appear dull and lifeless—bald and unattractive. Many women deplore this in their appearance, but are timid about using eye make-up for fear of having a hard "made-up" look, as with so many ordinary mascaras.

Maybelline, the eye make-up in good taste, has changed all this. Now you may have the natural appearance of lovely, long, dark lashes—easily and instantly—with a few simple brush strokes of harmless Maybelline mascara. Non-smarting and tear-proof.

You will be delighted with the other exquisite Maybelline Eye Beauty Aids, too! Try the smooth-marking Maybelline Eyebrow Pencil to form graceful, expressive eyebrows—it may be had in shades to match the mascara. Use Maybelline Eyelash Shadow for truly glamorous effects—a touch gently blended on the eyelids intensifies the color and sparkle of the eyes immensely.

The new Maybelline Cream Mascara and the ever-popular Solid Mascara are preferred by over 10,000,000 discriminating women the world over. Either form is only 75c at leading toilet goods counters. Generous introductory sizes of all Maybelline Eye Beauty Aids may be purchased at all leading ten cent stores. For the finest in eye make-up, insist on genuine Maybelline!

How Time Flies.—Loew’s State Theater, the last stand of big-name vaudeville on Broadway, celebrated its sixteeth birthday recently and brought out a lot of facts that practically everybody would prefer to ignore or forget.

For instance, in that star-studded audience sixty years ago, the leading celebrities were Gloria Swanson, Richard Barthelmess, Monte Blue, Mary Pickford, and Douglas Fairbanks.

In that sixteen years a new type of film favorite has risen, and many of them have catapulted to fame from this stage. Burns and Allen were leading favorites there, Edgar Bergen and his Charlie McCarthy have played at Loew’s State twice a year almost ever since it opened. Martha Raye shouted her way through twenty engagements there before Paramount adopted her.

Jimmy Cagney played there in 1922, without too smashing success, one may assume, since he did not come back until 1927. Walter Huston did a sketch there in 1922, and Joe E. Brown held forth as an acrobat. Hugh Hoo-hoo Herbert made them laugh there in 1921.

In recent years Loew’s State has held out a helping hand to picture stars on the decline. A week’s booking there in personal appearances has many times revived producers' interest in a player.

a picture starring her, can answer that. Miss Goddard says nothing, but her friends insist that it is all set for her to play "Scarlett" in "Gone with the Wind."

The week when the cast of that picture is finally announced is now appointed National Bore Week during which every one will, I feel sure, join me in showing a complete lack of interest, if not actual distaste. And since it would be so difficult for me to show less than glowering enthusiasm for the spirited Paulette, I hope that it is some other picture that will bring her back to the screen.

I wish you could have seen her as she lounged at the Colony one day recently, so young, so vivid, so radiantly healthy that she made all other skins look like putty. She was wearing a black bolero trimmed with braid, a mustard-colored blouse, and a wide-brimmed, towering crowned hat that looked as if a gust of wind had suddenly shot it up like an inside-out umbrella.

important young things. Clara invited them all in and provided ice cream and autographs for the lot. "Fifty three at 'em. I counted!" she announced wearily afterward. Maybe Clara is beginning to build-on entire new public.

HEREAFTER at Paramount all actors and actresses making tests will have also to identify themselves vacally. The producers and directors thought of this spoken biography idea as a timesaver; na great mind will have to be bothered wondering whans on the screen. Of course, to the actors it's a cut-back to high school public speaking days. It's warse to face a camera and detail one's past experience without any action than it is to dedicate a cornerstone.

WHEN Jeanette MacDonald gets mad she becomes expressive. But she doesn't use naughty words. Why be trite? She has three pet exclamations. She'll cry excitedly, "Oh, slighbbergibbal!" Or "Oh, shatlelab!" And if she's seriously upset she lets go with "Oh, rittletap!" Then everybody dorks. Are you reading, Mr. Raymand? When you finally hear the missus speak up so strangely you'll know the honeymoon is over.

THOUSANDS can and da write letters to Mae West without getting more than the routine answer accompanied by a photograph, but when Jack McCauley, San Francisco theater manager, wrote to her his letter was so full of humor that Mae has kept up a regular correspondence with her ever since. On one of his recent visits to Hollywood he admired a handkerchief Mae was carrying and she gave it to him. Back in San Francisco this girl coveted the scent on the handkerchief so he wrote Mae and asked the name of the perfume. Mae's answer was a huge battle with return mail.

As Clark Gable walked briskly out of his bank the other morning he ran smack into a lady and gentleman. They were visitors from San Francisco and Clark Gable fans. Oh, my, yes! Flabbergasted as they were at meeting their hero face to face, they still had presence of mind to remember their movie camera slung over the gentleman's shoulder.

"Will you pose for us, Mr. Gable?" they asked, and Clark, with a big smile, said: "Sure!"

He could easily have said he was in a hurry, as he probably was: "Sorry, same other time,"" as many stars do. But he didn't. He struck a pose, turned on all the charm and let them photograph him.

THE Leslie Howards, accompanied by children, secretaries, horses, dogs and automobiles, departed from Hollywood recently. As they were about to board the train, they saw half a dozen news photographers at the station.

"No, no, we won't pose," said Mr. and Mrs. Howard in chorus, but a friend persuaded them to line up for one shot. The cameramen focused their cameras and just as they were ready to shoot, they saw the real object of their trip to the station—a much publicized criminal suspect—about to board the same train. As one man they rushed away leaving the Howards puzzled and embarrassed.

When Leslie learned who the celebrity was he said: "I'm going to get acquainted with him on the train. He must be a very interesting chap."

been puzzled as to just why I'm on the screen. So I hardly think he'd choose me for such an important picture.

Two months later Barbara and Joel were working together again, in "In- terns Can't Take Money." Casually Joel told Barbara that he had been to see Goldwyn who was confined to his bed with an illness. Barbara listened indifferently, until Joel confessed that he had mentioned her name for "Stella Dallas." The pounding of Barbara's heart would have put a thunderstorm to shame. Breathlessly she waited for Joel to continue.

"Goldwyn was telling me what a hard time he was having to get the actress he wanted for "Stella Dallas,"" Joel explained. "So I noncholantly told him to get you—if he really wanted a great actress. His answer was that you didn't have any sex-appeal. I mentioned that there was an actor named Robert Taylor who was seen with you occasionally. And then I thought that was a pretty good time to make my exit!"

From then on, every time Joel went to the studio, he'd manage to say hello to Sam Goldwyn. Loyal friend that he is, he'd always mention Barbara's name before leaving. Then, just as Barbara was sitting down to dinner one evening, her manager phoned. Sam Goldwyn wanted her in his office next morning!

"So you think you can play 'Stella Dallas,'" Goldwyn greeted her. "What makes you think so? What do you know about mother love? Have you ever been a mother?"

"Yes, I think I can play it," said Barbara, trying to keep calm. "And I think I know a great deal about mother love. I think I can play the part—you think I can play it. However, it's still a matter of opinion, Mr. Goldwyn. Either one of us could be right or wrong. And I do have a young son."

"Well, the only reason I sent for you, is that I can't get the actress I want. Gladys George is the only actress who can really play the part. But I can't borrow her," Goldwyn replied.

"Nice office you have here," Barbara murmured as a telltale note of warning crept into her voice. "Just because you've given birth to a son, is no reason why you're capable of feeling the love a mother should have for a twenty-year-old girl," the inimitable Goldwyn persisted.

"Oh-h," answered Barbara, "I didn't give birth to my son. I adopted him."

When Mr. Goldwyn found his voice, he said emphatically, "The actress who plays 'Stella Dallas' must be a mother in real life!"

"It was nice of you to send for me," said Barbara. She started walking toward the door.

Before she got out Goldwyn called her back. He asked her if she would make a test anyway and suggested the party sequence and the final fade-out in the rain. Barbara refused. She explained how impossible it was to break right into the middle of a characterization that should gradually be built up as the picture progressed. She also reminded Goldwyn that she, didn't want to be laughed at. So she was taking no chances on making a bad test.

If it hadn't been for Joel McCrea, Barbara Stanwyck would never have played "Stella Dallas." To Joel Barbara gives full credit. Her manager begged her to make the test. Barbara said no. But to Joel Barbara listened. She described her interview in detail. She told Joel that for her the incident was closed. But Joel was not to be brushed aside so lightly. In fact, he was simply delighted at the whole set-up.

"You don't know Sam," cried Joel. "You've got to win him over. If you think you can play 'Stella,' then show him. Goldwyn will be the greatest booster you've ever had if you prove it to him."

The morning of the test, Barbara awakened with a cold that made her voice sound like a basso profundo. Turning to Holly Barnes, her friend and hairdresser, Barbara said: "Goldwyn didn't like my voice before. Just wait until he gets an earful of this." Then she went forth to face her ordeal.

"Everything went wrong when I made that test," muses Barbara today. "It was one of the hottest days of the year. The sound stage hadn't been opened in months. My blond wig was pasted on with spirit gum. My body was covered with tinfoil padding. My mouth was filled with cotton to round out my cheeks. Under those hot lights I began to perspire. The wig began to slip. I didn't want to get too close to Anne Shirley and give her my cold. We shot continuously all day until I lost my voice. Then I went home to bed. Several days later I was told that Mr. Goldwyn was on the phone.

Naturally her friends couldn’t understand what had come over her. Members of her household for the first time found her difficult to have around. Only Holly Barnes, who never left the set, knew what Barbara was going through. Holly went home with Barbara nights. No outsider saw or talked to her until the picture was finished.

Barbara Stanwyck was on the RKO set being wooed by Herbert Marshall the day of the “Stella Dallas” preview. Some kindly soul had advanced the word that the picture had been shown out of town and the audience had walked out on it.

Even the hysterical affections of Mr. Marshall failed to soothe Barbara’s shattered nerves. She was twenty pounds underweight as the result of wearing heavy padding many months. She was worried over the outcome. By the time she arrived at the Warner Theater with Robert Taylor Barbara was on the verge of hysterics.

The near-riot that occurred is now Hollywood history. An officious policeman, mistaking Barbara for a fan, brutally shoved her back when she tried to enter the theater with Bob.

There were rumors that it had been a publicity stunt originating in the Goldwyn offices. When Barbara heard this she humorously remarked that she wished Goldwyn had let her in on it and she would have put on a real show!

When she returned home that night she sent a wire to Samuel Goldwyn. “Thank you,” read the simple message.

Next day, Barbara’s dressing room was flooded with messages, notes, telegrams, and letters of congratulations. All day long people dropped in to express their appreciation. One wire in particular touched Barbara. It was signed by Tex, Bernie, Joe, Whitey, and Cliff, the electricians who worked on “Stella Dallas.” When one of the critics suggested that Barbara be nominated for the Academy award, she turned to Holly Barnes and said:

“If it should happen—if I should be considered for the Academy award, that’s one banquet you’ll attend with me. I couldn’t have gone through it without you. You’ve earned a chance for that award just as much as I have. If I should win it, I want you to be there to share it with me!”

youthful celebrities that photograph like Sonja Henie or Johnny Weissmuller. They look for beautiful faces, arresting faces, in magazine ads, in radio journals, everywhere. They read letters and scan photos sent to them by thousands of ambitious unknowns. They keep an eye on eye on beauty pageants, amateur hours, new face and voice contests of all sorts. Often they encourage these talent-dredging activities.

And some producers, having decided to make a test of a promising but inexperienced actor, will have coached for several weeks before he faces the camera and the microphone. There may also be intensive experiment with make-up, lighting, and other things. They don't like to think of losing another potential star because his test didn't show as much about him as it should.

Talent, like gold, is where you find it—that is, almost anywhere. Fred MacMurray was spotted playing a saxophone in the stage show, "Robert." Dixie Dunbar was a dancer in a night club. Rosalind Marquis was singing in one. Dick Powell was master of ceremonies in a Pittsburgh theater. Bobby Breen was heard singing at a party. Mona Barrie was seen on top of a New York sight-seeing bus—a Australian actress on her way to London for a stage engagement. William Corson, Anita Colby, Lucille Ball and many others were artists' and photographers' models. Adele Bailey was seen waiting on tables in a restaurant. Olivia de Havilland, as well as Robert Taylor, were glimpsed in college theatricals. Simone Simon was approved in a French-made film. Don Ameche, Bing Crosby, and many others earned their screen tests by way of the radio. And the Broadway stage, of course, is the greatest source of screen star material. From the footlights there come such players as Robert Montgomery, Joan Blondell, James Cagney, Walter Abel, Helen Broderick, Tyrone Power—the list might go on indefinitely. If a player makes good in a Broadway show, the screen scouts will test and re-test him.

Players who have made a reputation in other fields of entertainment sometimes escape screen tests entirely through entering feature pictures by way of short subjects. Many have been introduced to Hollywood through the Vitaphone shorts made in Brook-

There was nothing of the brat about this. In fact, the autograph seemed more sincere than most. Of course, I told myself, the Granville could be hypocritical—posing as a sweet child while seething with fury.

No, boys and girls, such an opinion is totally wrong. Bonita is radiant. And I might close all discussions about her suggested evil when I tell you that Marcia Mae Jones—the little girl she bullied and slapped round in "These Three"—is one of her best friends.

Her mother ushered me in. Lady Bonita entered the room right away and started to speak in a natural manner. We did not bother about introductions. We each knew who the other was, and there you are. She speaks in a clear, perfect voice. Speech seems as natural to her as acting.

The Granville maroon was born in Chicago, Illinois, February 2, 1923.

Like her friend and fellow actor, Mickey Rooney, Bonita is also a stage child. Her mother was an actress. Her father was Bernard Granville, star of vaudeville and musical comedy. Bonita's dad taught her to dance and to act. He died in 1936, without seeing what a wonderful actress his daughter has become.

"I like drama best," Bonita said, when we sat down to discuss life, love and art. "I like a rôle that makes you feel you are being a person who isn't you, but only made to seem real!"

Surely a simple truth for all players to ponder over!

"If I get a part that makes me appear mean, I like to play it. Just as I enjoy doing what I did in 'Call It a Day.' At least I've proved I can act."

This was not boasting. Bonita was merely replying to my questions in a simple, unassuming manner. Like her co-fine Mickey Rooney, la Granville knows her work.

The only thing that bewilders her is the fact that there are so many fine players in Hollywood who don't get work.

"Stock players are cast for parts by a studio before outsiders are called in. A free lance has to hope that no stock player will suit the part. I get awfully tired of seeing good stories made ordinary by the same players appearing in everything a studio makes."

"I do, too, and like Bonita I often wish I could remodel Hollywood nearer to my heart's desire during my spare moments."

Spare time doesn't exist for Bonita. A student at Hollywood High School, when not acting, she also studies designing and interior decorating. She tops these with music, dancing and French.

I assured her that her acting alone would buoy her over the emotional hills and valleys. Bonita did not think so.

She does appreciate her fans' comments. Of course, every newcomer gets a thrill out of fan mail. But Bonita knows what's what. Equaling Mickey Rooney in common sense, she is not easily deceived by flattery.

There is nothing about Bonita Granville to complain of. Her first name is the Spanish for fairly good. This is the only cause for criticism. There is not a thing just "good" about la Granville. She is nothing less than perfection itself.

judgment on players and their possibilities are, I think, more accurate than any rating obtainable anywhere. They hear, at first hand, the voice of their audiences. And eighty million theater-goers can’t be wrong!

Mr. Erickson, exhibitor of Iron Mountain, Michigan, casts a vote for Deanna Durbin. “There is no limit to this youngster’s success,” he comments. “Without question she will pass all current stars. She will be, in my estimation, a champion box-office draw by 1939.”

Exhibitor E. R. Griswold, of Sewanee, Tennessee, comments on Mr. Power: “He has looks, can act, and, if my college boys are a criterion, he should go to the top. They like him better than Gable or Taylor.” He casts a vote for Virginia Bruce in this fashion: “Her acting ability will at last be appreciated.”

He votes for Judy Garland, too, saying, “She typifies the spirit and youth of her age.”

But do they really know? Their opinions are as varied as those of the Hollywood producers. However, their his birthright, and swept him up into his work.

Governor Al Smith, of New York, granted special permission for Joe, Jr.'s, professional activities. And since the whole thing was a special event, he made him a special fireman.

It was while he was in a Will Morrissey revue, billed as Mickey Rooney, that studio scouts beheld the infant.

Judy Canova, dressed in a natty costume and filled with nutty notions, cuts capers in "Thrill of a Lifetime."

Thus the old veteran of eight entered movies.

I suggested he'd probably alter his first name to Michael when fame and added years crowded in on him. Mickey looked incredulous. "Oh, no," he said quite flatly. "I'll always be Mickey. It suits me. I suit it."

Though he has only been seen to advantage these last four or five years, Mickey has been in Hollywood much longer. His first part of importance was with Tom Brown, in "Fast Companions," a race-track story. Some said Mickey stole the picture. More recent commentators declared he stole "Slave Ship."

We need not stop there. Mickey has proved his excellent acting in every picture I've seen him in. "Little Lord Fauntleroy," "The Devil Is a Sissy," and "Captains Courageous"—though the latter opus offered only a bit of the Rooney talents—showed us that he knows his job.

He used to regard acting as just a job. Something that had to be done, and done well. "Now, with more experience," he added, "I think more about it."

Mickey's present desire is to play a leading role opposite Spencer Tracy. "He's the greatest actor in Hollywood," he said very definitely, almost forbidding argument. As I am a Tracy fan, I had none to offer.

Rooney fans swear by their idol. Mickey notes the particular States and cities where his acting strikes home with most telling effect. He gets letters from those points in piles. Any State lagging behind in Rooney enthusiasm is a slow State.

"I learn a lot from fan letters," Mickey related, glancing hurriedly at the wall clock, for he had to go God knows where, to see about Heaven alone knows what. "One certain part I play strikes different persons in different ways. But their comments make a sensible plan when compared. I seem to know the fans better by comparing them, if you understand."

I told him I not only understood, but could even offer an explanation. "I bet you could," Mickey conceded, but didn't ask for one.

He believes heredity has something to do with acting when both parents are in the profession. Tyrone Power, Tom Brown, Bonita Granville—there you are.

Living with his parents in Hollywood, Mickey does not mix much with the usual cinema coteries. He likes Hollywood. He enjoys life. His friends are in the majority nonprofessionals.

"Of course I run around with several young people in pictures," he put in, "but most of my friends are not actors."

Tennis and swimming are his chief recreations. But a tourney of ping-pong is dear to his heart. Naturally, he's good at them, as he is at all he does.

Of all young picture folk, he may honestly be regarded as the most sincere. Beneath hisleonine exterior there is a depth of sentimentality and emotion.

As it is, Mickey Rooney is Hollywood's best actor, (my profound apologies to Spencer Tracy). But one day soon, he is going to drop constructing mazes. The real inner Mickey Rooney is going to walk out into the daylight. Then I'm afraid—especially for others in Hollywood—we'll face genius!

Bartholomew! Until seeing this child I felt that there were only three things which could stir my soul to a deep sense of perfect contentment.

While watching "David Copperfield," there came the realization that here again was a perfect thing—a child actor whose hair, eyes, and every physical feature were so full of beauty, whose diction was so unusual, whose skill in acting was so flawless, whose character was so charming, that one had the sense of being in the presence of almost divine perfection.

What the Fans Think

I have seen every one of Freddie's pictures, have seen him on the stage, and also have heard him on the radio. He is the most talented star on the screen, child or adult.

Freddie may count his life well spent, because he has given in such full measure of beauty and tenderness and pathos and joy to this old world of ours.

Too Unkind.

I HAVE taken Picture Play for several years and, in my opinion, it is far and away the best of all movie magazines. The portraits alone are worth twice the cost of the magazine.

I always enjoy reading "What The Fans Think," but one fact puzzles me very much. The fans seem to delight in tearing each other to pieces, and in making uncomplimentary remarks about the stars who don't happen to please them personally. The ferocity of their attacks is alarming. Each writer makes sweeping statements and condemns stars wholesale as though his or her word were law. Each, after all, is entitled to his own opinion, and surely there is no need to sling mud so vehemently at the many whose tastes may differ.

And now, congratulations to Picture Play for being the first magazine to run a story on Brian Donlevy. You certainly picked a winner, as the success of this fine actor has proved. He made an immediate hit in "Barbary Coast," and in an incredibly short time has risen to be one of our leading players. Equally impressive as a valiant hero and taciturn menace, he well deserves his popularity.

Extra or Costar?

I SAW "Maytime" the other day, starring Jeanette MacDonald and Nelson Eddy—beautiful!

Nelson Eddy was the costar, but you'd never know it. The prize scenes, songs, close-ups, emotional high lights, in fact, everything, went to Jeanette—Nelson was squeezed in somewhere.

I have nothing against Miss MacDonald. She is all her fans claim her to be—a fine singer, lovely, and a splendid actress. Nevertheless, I don't think that she should be the whole show when that popular team play together.

It is quite a disappointment for an Eddy fan to wait patiently a whole year to see one of his films, and then to find that three-fourths of that film made up of MacDonald. Nelson Eddy has one of the finest baritone voices in the country; he has a vivacious personality and a fine sense of humor. Let him stand on his own feet and show what he can really do!

Not a Wonder Child.

W R I T E R S for fan magazines and others connected with the industry would have us believe that the reason Shirley Temple has not been heard on the radio is because her parents and others think that radio work would spoil her or cause her to know how important she is. I suppose Miss Temple has never seen the dolls, dresses, shoes, soap, etc., named in her honor. She must be quite stupid if, by now, she doesn’t realize how important she is.

Her parents don’t object to this form of making more money for their daughter, so there seems to be just one reason for Shirley’s absence from radio and that reason is that she could never face a mike. All other well-known child stars have been on the air. For instance, Freddie Bartholome, Bonita Granville, the Mauch twins, Sybil Jason, and Jane Withers. This proves that Miss Temple is not the wonder child she is claimed to be. She is no real actress and it is about time that the public awakes to the fact that she is just like any other kid attending a dancing school.

A Lovely Voice.

I READ the letter in the August issue by R. O. Waite criticizing Deanna Durbin’s singing. To me this letter illustrates nothing but ignorance in not being able to appreciate a lovely voice. I too saw “Three Smart Girls” and I enjoyed Deanna’s singing immensely due to the fact that her voice was so clear and her words so well enunciated.

As for her beauty, she certainly has something more than a smile, and any one who can’t see it must have eye trouble. Let me give three cheers for Deanna Durbin; one for her singing, one for her acting, and one for her beauty. I hope more people will see their disapproval of R. O. Waite’s letter.

Mourned.

As the sad news of Jean Harlow’s passing came over the air in a local broadcast, my mind traveled back through the years to a night in a theater here, and once again I seemed to be a part of the vast audience that had hailed her first major performance in the now memorable “Hell’s Angels.” How well I remember it all! The house was sold out hours ahead of time. And before the picture had ended, we realized a new star had been born.

To-day, in less than a decade, a world that has grown to love her, mourns her loss. But I feel it was not merely the role she portrayed that endeared Jean Harlow to her fans. It was more. It was that something sometimes referred to as the soul. It was herself. For beneath that sophistication she so well exemplified on the screen, there lived a vivid personality, warm and human, that even the hard-boiled character of China Doll could not obliterate. It was this same element perhaps, that running in a seemingly different vein, that drew us to the beloved Marie Dressler. For at heart, are not all hearts, if human hearts they are, the same?

And so farewell is said, as tributes are paid to yet another great star, deprived, and so very prematurely, of a career and of a happiness in life so deservedly hers. But Jean Harlow is not dead. She is gone no more than dear Will Rogers. Remembrance of her with the passing of time will become a cherished and respected memory. And memories do not age or pass away; they live on forever.

Norbert Lusk's Reviews

Mr. Martini stuns the crowd with his singing the thieves make off with the pearls. A girl composer who has crashed the party to meet the great conductor, Rodowsky, is suspected for no reason. Mr. Martini goes to the station house to give himself up, there meets the girl and juvenile romance begins. One of the brightest episodes is when Rodowsky tries to identify the voice of Mr. Martini over the air, but it is all pretty childish, and the picture gives us a version of a Hollywood party that makes one shudder at its dullness and ostentation. Joan Fontaine is a heroine with beauty, good sense and promise.

"Something to Sing About."—Grand National. James Cagney's new picture is his best in a long time. It is a small wood picture but not of a poor quality and certainly not in his so-called singing, but the pleasantness of the whole. It is an unusual combination of the rowdy and the sensitive, with Mr. Cagney giving nothing less than a brilliant account of himself in both moods. He is a performing band leader who is "discovered" for pictures. His single appearance as a star disgusts him with studio life and ends in a terrific rough-house. He marries a singing girl and they honeymoon in the South Seas. His film is a big hit and he returns to find himself a famous actor. Another try at pictures is more difficult than the first. He has a wife, now, who is forced to pretend to be only his secretary. Naturally, it is a trial to her to remain in the background with fascinating Mona Barrie playing opposite her husband as a broken-accented siren in a blond wig. Miss Barrie is capital and Evelyn Daw, Mr. Cagney's wife, has a lovely voice. The cross-currents of their make-believe are lively and downright pleasant.

"Big City."—MGM. Spencer Tracy and Luise Rainer are two of our most important artists. Brought together for the first time, their picture falls short of their individual and collective status. In a word, it is trivial, unimportant, though not without entertaining moments. The material provided for the stars doesn't permit them to make much of their respective roles but they play them all they're worth. Mr. Tracy is a taxi driver, Miss Rainer his foreign-born wife; the immigrant's class. Fantastic background there is some sort of taxi war going on. One is in doubt which side is right and who is in the rival factions. But there is noisy conflict, ending when a group of prize fighters—real ones like Jack Dempsey and James J. Jeffries—muscle in and give the newcomer a reverse trouncing. Just how they happen to become interested in making it possible for Miss Rainer to give birth to a baby on a steamship pier is more than I can tell you. But, anyway, she does and everything seems all right after that. At least the picture ends.

"Music For Madam."—RKO. Mild as skimmed milk is Nino Martini's new picture, but his singing is like honey and cream. I don't think anybody since Caruso has sung "Vesti la Giubba" with such throbbing beauty and with better taste. But I can't accept Mr. Martini as a screen actor. His is a blank personality that is at its best disguised as the chalk-faced clown in "Pagliacci" or weilded in double exposure when he sings "Music For Madam." In case I haven't made myself clear, Mr. Martini is most effective when seen dimly, if at all. The childish frolic devised for his exploitation has him an accordion player who is picked up by crooks and introduced at a Hollywood party. While Gloria Marconi.—The only other picture I find that Margaret Marquis appeared in besides "A Family Affair" is "The Last of the Warners," released in 1936. Mickey Rooney was born in Brooklyn, New York, September 23, 1921.

L. M.—Fredi Washington was the young colored girl in "Imitation of Life."

Carole Jennings.—There was a gallery portrait of Jean Arthur in June, 1936.

E. J. L. W.—Frances Farmer has blond hair and hazel eyes.

Ruby Trent.—"Red Dust" was used as the frontispiece of the January, 1933, issue, and it was reviewed in February. "Hold Your Man" was reviewed in September, 1933. Neither appeared in the preview section. Barbara Barondess was not in the cast of "Turn Off the Moon."

Gail Stevenson.—Olympe Bradu was born in Paris, France, August 12th, but she doesn't give the year. Eighteen months later she was appearing with her mother and father in "The Bradu Family," which was originally an equestrian act. At eight, Olympe made her first hit with specialty and acrobatic dancing in the French version of "Hit the Deck." Then she joined the Poies Bergère for a year and a half engagement, emerging at fourteen a star of the French Casino. After further engagements and two French motion pictures, she was signed for the New York production of "Folies Bergère," where she was discovered by a Paramount scout. Latest is "Souls at Sea." Dorothy Lamour was born in New Orleans, Louisiana, and is married to Herb Kay, orchestra leader. She has appeared in "The Jungle Princess," "Swing High, Swing Low," "The Last Train from Madrid," "High Wide and Handsome," and "The Hurricane." Colbert Lawrence played the role of Genevieve (Ellie) Strenn in "Hotel Haywire."

LAURITZ MELCHIOR of the Metropolitan Opera finds Luckies gentle on his throat... even under this strain

LAURITZ MELCHIOR is known as the greatest Wagnerian tenor in the world. His roles—such as "Tristan"—are among the most difficult—and hence the most throat-taxing—in opera. So it means a lot to every smoker when Mr. Melchior says: "I prefer Luckies for the sake of my throat."

Luckies are the one and only cigarette that employs the "Toasting" process, the special process that removes certain throat irritants found in all tobacco—even the finest. And Luckies do use the finest tobacco. Sworn records show that among independent tobacco experts—auctioneers, buyers, warehousemen, etc.—Lucky Strike has twice as many exclusive smokers as all other cigarettes combined.

In the impartial, honest judgment of those who spend their lives buying, selling and handling tobacco...who know tobacco best...it's Luckies—2 to 1.
